Mr. Palmer: The part shown to me has already been read in evidence, which merely shows preferred stock, number of shares, common stock, number of shares, but does not state the names. Now, my question to Mr. Marshall was as to why the names were not set forth, and my remarks which I was about to direct to the Court when I was interrupted, were that it is not shown who was present representing which stock, so that it can be checked whether that stock was correctly represented and correctly there, and it is the first time in at least a good many years at which that practice was not followed.

The Court: Well, the witness has advised me that a committee was appointed for that purpose. Do you know why they did not detail it?

The Witness: I do not know, unless it was because of the time element, your Honor. We were told that this Court wanted that report in that day, and I didn't even wait for lunch. Just as soon as I could get the material [fol. 3001] I started out.

[fol. 3002] Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Marshall, it is true, is it not, that as general counsel of Fidelity you passed upon and approved all of the fees paid to Mr. Arthur B. Koontz or the firm of Koontz & Koontz or their predecessors for legal services rendered?

A. I don't know about that. I was supposed to, but I don't know.

Q. You were supposed to.

A. I say our firm was supposed to.

Q. So far as you know it was done in the proper manner?

A. I don't know. I mean I would have no way of knowing. It is conceivable that a fee might be paid by an officer without my approval. I have known it to be done.

[fol. 3003] Q. In connection with Mr. Koontz?

A. Not in connection with Mr. Koontz.

Q. So far as you know, you never raised any objection to any fees paid Mr. Koontz?

A. I never raised any objection. I have never made any check whether I approved. In a great many cases I tried to get lawyers to reduce their bills, and if I finally approved it that was because I was unsuccessful. I tried to be conscientious.

Q. I am speaking only about the Koontz fees. Have you discovered in your notes any place where you raised any objection to them at any time?

A. No fee ever rendered by Koontz & Koontz that I objected to.

Q. And when it was approved by a board of directors' meeting or executive committee meeting you never raised any objection at any time?

A. I am sure that I never did.

Q. And you were familiar personally at least to a large extent with the legal services that Koontz & Koontz were rendering?

[fols. 3004-3012] Mr. T. C. Townsend: We object, your Honor. That has all been gone into very thoroughly.

The Court: Overruled.

A. I kept very closely in touch with Mr. Koontz.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. So that in connection with the bills you had a general idea of the work that had been done by Mr. Koontz and his firm?

A. The ones I approved.

Q. And you stated that so far as you know you raised no objection to any of them?

A. I never raised an objection, I am positive, to any bill that was ever presented to me from Koontz & Koontz.

[fol. 3013] JOHN MARSHALL, recalled, testified as follows:

Q. It is true, as shown by the minutes of the corporation, that your son, John Marshall, Jr., is and has been a director for some period of time, is it not?

A. That's correct.

Q. It is also true, is it not, Mr. Marshall, that immediately following the appointment of State Court receivers, your son, John Marshall, Jr., was dismissed as an employee of the State Court receiver?

A. That is correct.

Q. Mr. Marshall, is it a fact that after Mr. Messick became chairman of the board, he placed much more substantial duties upon your son, John Marshall, Jr., than had the officer theretofore—much more substantial and responsible?

[fol. 3014] A. The only—I can't answer definitely to that. I know that Mr. Messick once undertook a survey of our securities and so forth, and my son——

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Excuse me. I want to get that question, if the Court will pardon me.

(The question was read.)

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I can't see where it is leading to—I can't see where it is leading to anything material.

The Court: Let it be answered.

A. I know that Mr. Messick undertook to make a survey, which he testified about here recently, of our portfolio, and how he consulted experts and bankers and so forth, and in that study he had my son, who had trained along that line with J. P. Morgan & Company and had majored in economics in college, work on that situation for several months. I know with respect to that, he added that responsibility to him. I think he also asked him to make surveys or ascertain if expenses couldn't be reduced. I think he did that.

Q. Those had been more substantial duties and more important duties than your son had theretofore been performing, is that correct?

[fol. 3015] A. I can't say about that.

Q. Mr. Marshall, did the fact that Mr. Messick had seemed to realize the capabilities of your son, after he had been discharged by the State Court receivers play any part in your change of opinion from wanting it in the State Court to wanting it in the Federal Court?

A. Not at all.

Q. Mr. Marshall, after the meeting in Pittsburgh, was there a discussion had that Mr. Fleming was to present as the attorney for the debtor the petition to the Southern District Court of West Virginia?

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Steussy has come here, the witness we expect to introduce. I want to ask counsel if there is any objection to having him in here?

Mr. Ray: He might wait outside like the other witnesses did.

Mr. Palmer: Is there a question there?

(The question of Mr. Palmer was read.)

A. I don't know that that was specifically discussed. As I understood it, the institution of this proceeding was authorized, and not only my understanding was—but I arranged for them to see particularly my brother in south-[fols. 3016-3020] ern West Virginia, to discuss the whole situation with him. I don't think a meeting was needed. I was general counsel. I could approve of Mr. Fleming acting without any discussion of the board of directors. I am satisfied that the minutes will not show that that specific action was taken.

Q. My question was as to whether there was a discussion at the meeting in the sense that Mr. Fleming was to be the attorney to present the petition for the debtor in this Court?

A. I don't think so.

Q. Now, was there any discussion, Mr. Marshall, at that meeting that Mr. Fleming and Mr. Messick were to be employed by the trustee to aid the trustee in reorganization?

A. I am certain that wasn't discussed, although Mr. Messick, you understand, had been appointed by the board of directors the chairman of the Committee on Reorganization with power to select persons, and I knew he had asked Mr. Fleming to be associated with them. The question that they were to be employed by the trustee I am sure wasn't discussed.

[fol. 3021] Q. Mr. Marshall, in your letter to Judge Healy of May 10th, did you state to him these words: (Reading) "I was advised that as soon as the insurance commissioner of West Virginia learned our plan had not been approved by the Securities and Exchange Commission, he took steps which subsequently resulted in the appointment of receivers. I think it only fair to say, however, Judge Healy, that if I had had a choice in the matter I would have preferred the course which has been taken." I asked Mr. Marshall [fol. 3022] about that in substance without having the exact words, and I submitted that at that time, if he had answered, his answer would be Yes. I wanted the exact words, your Honor.

The Court: I don't recall any question this morning or ruling or why it was made, but I will permit the witness to answer.

A. I assume that that is correct. The record bears out the fact that I preferred the State Court. That is the reason

I voted for it in the first meeting of the board of directors, on the representations and information I had at that time.

Q. And the following sentence was this, Mr. Marshall:

Mr. Ray: How far is he going with this letter?

The Court: I don't know.

The Witness: It is a private letter.

Mr. Ray: I object. If he is going to read the letter——

The Court: Let's see what it says.

Mr. Palmer: The following sentence was this: (reading) "I have reasons for this which I do not care to put in writing. If the matter is of any interest to you, and we are being confronted by this situation, I would deem it a favor to be permitted to explain them."

[fol. 3023] A. I remember saying something like that.

Mr. Palmer: All right, sir.

Mr. Townsend: Read the answer.

(The answer was read.)

Mr. Ray: May I see that? (Referring to paper)

Mr. Palmer: I would prefer not to, because the Court has deemed that some of those letters are confidential—unless Mr. Marshall says he would be glad to. Otherwise I would not like to show him the letter.

The Court: The Court's ruling on the confidential nature was due entirely to Mr. Marshall.

Mr. Palmer: Yes.

The Court: It seems that it wasn't so confidential after all, if you have it in your file.

Mr. Palmer: If Mr. Marshall desires that I show it to Mr. Ray——

The Witness: I prefer not to. I regarded—I wasn't writing the Commission; I was writing the Commissioner. I regarded the whole file as confidential. On the other hand, the firm of Koontz & Koontz had been appointed by the directors to represent us in this matter, and I felt they [fol. 3024] should have the benefit of any information that I had.

Mr. Palmer: Then with that, your Honor, I think the only pertinent part, which I have read, would be the only part which should be given to Mr. Ray.

Mr. Ray: I don't think Mr. Palmer should be permitted to bring a letter that counsel haven't seen, read part of it in the record and ask questions about it without letting counsel see it. I therefore move that the questions bearing on this letter be stricken from the record.

The Court: The privilege is Mr. Marshall's. If he wants the letter exhibited to counsel, it should be. If he doesn't, it shouldn't.

Mr. Palmer: Let the record show I have no objection to it, but believe it is a privilege with Mr. Marshall.

The Witness: If Mr. Palmer is to read parts of it, there is no reason why Mr. Ray, representing the debtor, should not see it.

Mr. Palmer: Let the record show that Mr. Palmer has now presented to Mr. Ray the papers about which we are speaking.

The Witness: I think in fairness I ought to say, the reason I didn't care to put the matter in writing—certainly [fol. 3025] it has no relation to this Court, because since that time—I never knew—I never did see Judge Moore until I came in this Court room. It was outside—it had nothing to do with this Court is the reason I have for my actions.

Mr. Ray: May Mr. Marshall be excused from the witness stand for a moment while I ask him a question about this?

The Court: All right.

(Witness leaves stand and confers with Mr. Ray.)

Mr. Palmer: Your Honor, I withdraw until Mr. Ray wants to ask about this letter, and then I will resume.

The Court: All right.

Mr. Ray: Mr. Marshall, just now when you withdrew from the stand I asked if you had any objection to filing two sentences in this letter of May 10th, and you told me you did not.

A. I understood they were really parts of what had been read.

Mr. Ray:

Q. The sentence immediately preceding the one which Mr. Palmer read. May I read them into the record?

A. I have no objection.

[fol. 3026] Mr. Ray: (Reading:) "I have carefully read the paragraphs of your letter referring to the efforts of Fidelity and the Commission to reach an accord. The only thing I did not understand was that the Commission had coupled with its refusal to approve the plan of reorganization submitted the further recommendation that the Association resort to the reorganization procedure of Chapter 10 of the Bankruptcy Act. In any event, the Association had no choice of decision."

Q. Mr. Marshall, are those the two sentences which I have just read in the paragraph immediately preceding the sentence which Mr. Palmer read?

A. That is my understanding.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I have something that I would like to ask the Court, but I hesitate greatly to ask to be permitted to go into the record. The Court has on several occasions reprimanded me as counsel for asking for the production of a letter which the Court felt, after a comparison of a newspaper article or letter, was improper to be brought in or even if proper, it was of such relative unimportance to raise such a furor about, and I have pro[fol. 3027] ceeded in accordance with the Court's reprimand in that respect. I felt somewhat embarrassed about it. Your Honor, having had this letter before me for the first time where I could compare the two, there is to my mind a distinction which I would like to be permitted to point out to the Court and to ask Mr. Marshall about, if the Court doesn't feel that counsel is being improper to present this matter that the Court has ruled so conclusively about.

The Court: Let's see what it is.

Mr. Palmer: I would first like to read, your Honor, the pertinent part of the letter of Mr. Healy——

Mr. Ray: That is already in the record.

Mr. Palmer: I am just reading it to the Court.

(There was a discussion off the record.)

Mr. Palmer: My distinction is this, your Honor, that in one, the Commission doubts as a practical matter whether any plan could be put into effect without the Chapter 10 proceeding, and said it would not approve of any in any other Court which didn't come up to the standards of Chapter 10. The letter of Mr. Marshall says that the Commission flatly says, no matter what happens, it wouldn't approve of any plan that went through unless a Federal Court [fols 3028-3039] had done it. Your Honor may be correct that I am splitting the northwest corner from the north side of a hair from the south. I do deem it a substantial difference; as Mr. Marshall put in his letter, it would leave an alternative for the Federal Court proceeding, whereas the Commission, in stating its tentative position, would leave a way open for the State Court proceedings that were then going on.

The Court: That distinction seems to me so trivial that it is practically non-existent, and I feel that if I had been in Mr. Marshall's place, I would have drawn the same conclusions from the letter he drew and expressed in his letter. That's why I have said what I have on this record about that letter.

Mr. Palmer: Your Honor, I am sorry I misinterpreted. I thought there was a substantial difference or I would not have raised the question. In view of the Court's ruling, I will make no more mention of the matter.

• • • • • • •

[fols. 3040-3046] Q. Didn't you have conferences with Mr. Messick and Latta in February 1941 about these plans?

A. I can't remember the dates. I remember one further fact that Mr. Latta was recommended by the Lincoln Life Insurance Company.

Q. Of Fort Wayne, Indiana?

A. Yes. I think they gave a number of names of persons that would seem to fill this specification, and Mr. Latta seemed to be the highest of any recommended.

Q. What special qualifications did he possess?

A. Well, he had been in reorganization matters and was acquainted with the same type of business that we were in and in the insurance business that we would go into.

[fol. 3047] Henry M. Steussy, called as a witness, having been first duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. You are Mr. Henry M. Steussy?

A. That is right.

Q. (Spelling) S-T-E-U-S-S-Y?
A. Yes.
Q. Where do you live?
A. At Milwaukee, Wisconsin.
Q. How old a man are you?
A. Forty-eight.
Q. Were you formerly connected with the Fidelity Assurance Association?
A. Fidelity Investment Association.
[fol. 3048] Q. Now known as Fidelity Assurance Association?
A. That is correct.
Q. When did you first become connected with Fidelity?
A. April 7th 1931.
Q. Prior to becoming connected with Fidelity, what was your business?
A. I was with the Provident Life Insurance of Philadelphia.
Q. In what capacity?
A. As an agent.
Q. Had you enjoyed some success in that line of endeavor?
A. I did.
Q. Now, Mr. Steussy, will you just relate in your own words, if you will, how you first heard about Fidelity and what it was that induced you to take up work with it?

Mr. Ray: I object. That cannot be material.
The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Steussy, when you became associated with Fidelity, in what capacity was it?
A. I was the manager of the Wisconsin office.
Q. That meant that you had charge of the Wisconsin salesmen?
[fol. 3049] A. That's correct.
Q. Now, through whom did you become associated with Fidelity?
A. Mr. J. H. Pulfer, who was the assistant supervisor of the company.
Q. And was it Mr. Pulfer that explained Fidelity's plan to you?
A. That is correct.
Q. Was there anything in particular about Fidelity's plan that attracted you to it?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, I think that is immaterial.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, if the Court will allow another counsel to be heard on that objection, I believe the form of the question is improper, but would it not be material as to what Mr. Pulfer or another officer of the company told him about Fidelity that made him decide to go with it, on the question of whether or not, if it would be reorganized, other salesmen could be had upon that same proposition, or whether that proposition would be one that would now be impossible to comply with or whether that particular explanation by the company was an erroneous one.

[fol. 3050] The Court: No. A reorganization wouldn't have any bearing on the old setup. That is, what I mean by that is that if there are objectionable features about the representations made to salesmen by the old company, they certainly wouldn't be carried over into any reorganization.

Mr. Palmer: That was my point, your Honor. Unless we know what they were, it would be impossible to say that they might not be carried over.

Mr. Lauritzen: It is really unimportant.

The Court: Then why ask the question.

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Steussy, did you become aware that the company operated under a deposit law in Wisconsin?

A. Very definitely.

Q. Was that one of the reasons you were attracted to it?

A. I didn't go with them until I had full time to check it up and satisfy myself as to the safety of the sale of the contracts to our Wisconsin people.

Q. Is it a fair statement that that was the chief reason why you took up——

The Court: Mr. Lauritzen, I sustained the objection to these questions, and while counsel is not objecting to it now, I think that I ought in my own motion prevent you from asking the question. It is immaterial why this witness went [fol. 3051] with Fidelity. That certainly is an understandable ruling.

Mr. Lauritzen: I think the materiality of it will be evident in a moment. Now, what was the status of Fidelity in Wisconsin as to total outstanding liabilities when you came with it?

Mr. Ray: If he knows, your Honor.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. If you know.

Mr. Ray: And if he has had charge of the books and records which would show that his information is accurate. I don't think he should guess at it.

Mr. Lauritzen: Strike the question.

Q. Mr. Steussy, when you took up your association with Fidelity, was information given to you as to the total Wisconsin liability?

A. I was told there was less than twenty thousand dollars.

Q. Did you later ascertain that to be a fact by reports that you received or copies of reports sent to the Banking Commission of Wisconsin?

A. That is correct.

Q. When you first took hold of the Wisconsin office, how many salesmen did you have?

[fol. 3052] A. Two.

Q. Now, tell us what you did with respect to recruiting a sales force; how you went about it and what results you obtained.

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, I submit that that is immaterial to the issue in this case.

The Court: Point out its relevancy.

Mr. Lauritzen: The point is that Mr. Steuss was in charge of developing one of Fidelity's largest and most successful sales forces, and with that as a background, his testimony will certainly have a great deal more significance than if he were just some stranger to this entire proceeding.

Mr. Palmer: May I suggest that the qualification of the witness is to show the Court his background of experience and learning upon which later questions would be based.

Mr. Ray: Questions based upon the issue in the case?

Mr. Palmer: In other words, if you put a doctor on the witness stand——

Mr. T. C. Townsend: You ask him about a medical proposition.

Mr. Palmer: If you want to ask this witness about sales [fol. 3053] later of a company to be reorganized, then you would have to ask him about what his experience has been in the selling field and how he arrived at it. It is a qualifying question, your Honor.

The Court: Do I understand that this witness is an expert witness, or does he know facts?

Mr. Lauritzen: I would say he would come in both categories. If the gentlemen will just let me develop his connection with this company. I don't think it is fair.

The Court: The thing I am interested in, is whether your line of examination is pertinent to the case. If it is, we will permit you to go along with it.

Mr. Lauritzen: This witness has had a background of experience with this company of a great many years, and he was a high executive. Surely he is going to be a witness that this Court is going to listen to with respect to expressing opinions on what the future of this company may be, or what can be done or could be done.

The Court: Are you going to use this witness as an expert witness or a witness to facts?

Mr. Lauritzen: I think he would be a witness to facts.

The Court: Then how are the facts pertinent?

[fol. 3054] Mr. Lauritzen: As to his contact with this company?

The Court: Yes.

Mr. Lauritzen: Why, just this.

The Court: You can't bring in every salesman all over the United States and show that he was a salesman for this company.

Mr. Lauritzen: This man is a managing director of the company in charge of sales in a large area, in the largest office they had in the company.

The Court: I will sustain the objection to the question.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, were you successful in recruiting a large number of salesmen for Fidelity and did you do it?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, I submit that is irrelevant.

The Court: Sustained. I don't care to argue. I have ruled.

Mr. Lauritzen: If the Court please, I will offer to prove that Mr. Steussy built up a very large force of salesmen in the State of Wisconsin through his efforts in recruiting them; that he became extremely familiar with that work and was extremely able in that work, as demonstrated by [fol. 3055] his record with Fidelity. I don't suppose anyone will dispute it that by 1938 he had 225 men working for him in the State of Wisconsin. Now, if the Court will permit, I would like to ask him what sales volume he obtained in Wisconsin.

The Court: If you will show me the materiality of it I will permit you to get it on the record. Since I think it is not material, I have sustained the objection and you may put it in the form of a proffer.

Mr. Lauritzen: May I say that Mr. Steussy will later testify as to a business connection he has since he left Fidelity, and with regard to efforts that he has made in trying to sell similar contracts for a life insurance company. There has been voluminous testimony introduced by the debtor here as to the possibility and desirability of Fidelity continuing in some form of a life insurance company. This witness is going to be a man who will tell you exactly what his experience in that very field has been.

The Court: Mr. Lauritzen, I have asked you twice about whether this witness is to be used as an expert witness or a witness to facts. You have told me that he is to be used as a witness to facts. I have ruled as to the facts. They are [fol. 3056] immaterial and therefore I sustain the objection. If you are simply qualifying him as an expert witness, and that is the sole bearing of the testimony that you are trying to elicit, and that is the sole purpose of the testimony, then my ruling would be different, because probably it is material in qualifying him as an expert witness.

Mr. Lauritzen: I don't think we understand each other. I will say that I believe Mr. Steussy is an expert witness, and if the Court will permit me, I would like to qualify him as such. If I fail in that, then these objections will be made and sustained on the same ground your Honor has already ruled.

The Court: The question will be permitted for the sole purpose of qualifying him as an expert witness.

Mr. Luaritzen:

Q. Will you now tell us what methods you pursued and what you did and what the results were in recruiting your sales force in Wisconsin on behalf of Fidelity?

A. From the beginning?

Mr. Ray: Just a minute. I object.

The Court: I didn't say I would permit your question [fol. 3057] to be used——

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Then tell us what you did and what results you achieved. Tell us what results you achieved.

The Court: The only question that this Court will permit along this line is for a qualifying question, to qualify this witness as an expert. You may ask him how many salesmen he got together, whether he operated, and the length of time he operated with those salesmen, and the degree of success that he had; but as to details of his methods and so on, that has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. Lauritzen: That is what I want to bring out. How many salesmen did you finally have working under you in Wisconsin?

A. The first year I developed an organization of about forty salesmen—forty-two, I think, is the correct figure. The second year that amount grew to some sixty-odd. Then that brought us to 1932. Then we lost a few—but from 1934, that organization kept growing, and in 1938 I had a license with the State Banking Department of Wisconsin and the northern peninsula of Michigan. I had some 225 men. The volume of business had reached, in the last month I operated, over a million dollars per month.

[fol. 3058] Q. Now, Mr. Steussy, did you have occasion, while you were with the company, to have statistics and tables prepared relative to the efficiency of your group of salesmen as measured against the efficiency of other salesmen within the Fidelity Association?

Mr. Ray: We object.

The Court: Overruled.

A. We had tables of all district operations furnished us monthly.

Q. And how did your men compare in production and efficiency with the general run of salesmen?

A. Well, I think that our office without exception ranked in top position in all, measuring what they did by form of record, an average of nine months out of every twelve for each year that I was in the company, from the 7th of April 1931 to the 31st of December last year.

Q. What were some of the tests of efficiency that you used?

A. Volume per man in the organization, volume per producer, collections per unit, persistency of the business, the size per unit sale. I think that covers it.

Q. Will you tell us the nature of your arrangement with [fol. 3059] Fidelity? What kind of a contract did you have?

A. When Mr. Pufer hired me, he had the territory west of Ohio. He was the supervisor. He hired me under a manager contract. In 1934, I believe it was, when Mr. Evans was made director of agencies, he gave me a direct contract in May, giving me the entire territory direct from the home office by direct contract.

Q. Now, you received a commission on the production of your men? Is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. That's all you received?

A. The company in its contract with me undertook what we called "stationary expense," such as rent, light, heat, power, and a limited amount of clerical help. All other expense such as long-distance telephone, advertising, additional office help beyond the amount allowed——

Mr. T. C. Townsend: That is going pretty far afield, it seems to me.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Did you receive any salary?

A. I did not.

Q. And out of what you received as commission you had [fol. 3060] to pay certain expenses?

A. That's correct.

Q. You were running this more or less in a way as your own business? Am I correct in that?

A. Yes.

Mr. Ray: This has no pertinency to these issues. We object.

The Court: I sustain the objection.

Mr. Ray: I should think counsel would stop it.

The Court: I told counsel the only questions permitted here at present are questions qualifying this man as an expert, unless you ask questions that the Court feels are pertinent to the case factually.

Mr. Farmer: If the Court please, I don't like to butt in on this; but the debtor offered quite a number of witnesses whose experience had been along the same line as the man who is now on the witness stand.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Who were those witnesses?

Mr. Farmer: Mr. Pulfer and Mr. Reed.

The Court: Mr. Pulfer was a member of the board of directors of the company and had a great deal to tell about the factual issues.

[fol. 3061] Mr. Farmer: And Mr. Reed was an honorary vice-president and he went around and——

Mr. Jaegerman: I think Mr. Palmer told Mr. Reed——

The Court: That doesn't have a thing in the world to do with whether this witness' testimony is pertinent or not.

Mr. Farmer: I was telling you why. They got up on the witness stand and expressed opinions about whether this company could be reorganized, and about the salability of these face amount——

The Court: I suppose this man will too if he is qualified.

Mr. Farmer: And they won't let Mr. Lauritzen qualify him. Here is a man whose experience has been such as it is, and he wants to tell about it, and Mr. Lauritzen has brought him here to testify about it.

The Court: It is too bad we can't satisfy you, Mr. Farmer. The Court can't let evidence in except as is indicated, so I will ask counsel to confine his examination to that line.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Did you yourself personally train salesmen?

[fol. 3062] A. Yes, sir.

Q. In that training course, did you make them fully familiar with the Wisconsin law relating to Fidelity's operations?

A. Very definitely.

Mr. Ray: We object.

The Court: Sustained. Strike out the answer.

Mr. Lauritzen: Q. This may not be material as to qualifying this gentleman. Surely it is material in the representations that were made to Wisconsin contract holders of the manner in which the sales campaign was conducted.

The Court: It doesn't make any difference.

Mr. Lauritzen: What I asked him was whether he instructed his men in those particulars.

The Court: No. I sustain the objection.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Did you advise them of the law?

Mr. Ray: We object.

The Court: I sustain the objection.

Mr. Ray: That wouldn't have a thing to do with it.

Mr. Lauritzen: As to whether the salesmen, when they were given their training course and told what they were to [fol. 3063] present to the public, were told that they were to present to the public the situation with respect to the operation of the laws of Wisconsin upon that contract?

The Court: I sustain the objection.

(Whereupon at 3:20 o'clock P. M. a recess was taken until 3:32 o'clock P. M.)

After Recess

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. I believe you told us that your work with Fidelity was of recruiting, managing, and directing a sales force?

A. I did.

Q. How did you get your salesmen in Fidelity?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, that is irrelevant. We don't care how he got them. I don't believe it makes a bit of difference.

The Court: Overruled.

A. I got them by personal contact, through bank contacts in the cities and villages throughout the State, and through newspaper advertising, in the want-ad columns in the newspaper.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. And did you become familiar with the difficulties and problems generally of recruiting salesmen for this type [fol. 3064] of operation?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you become familiar with what the ratio would be as to the number of men you would have to interview to get one man?

Mr. Ray: If the Court please, that has been gone into several times. There is no issue about it. It is irrelevant.

The Court: Who was the other witness?

Mr. Ray: Carroll Evans.

Mr. Palmer: I understand this question is asked to show this man's qualifications in order to answer the hypothetical question later on, not the truth as to facts one way or the other.

The Court: That is the only reason why this is being admitted.

Mr. Palmer: The truth of the answer doesn't make any difference. It is a question to show his experience.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Lauritzen: Will you read the question.

(The question was read.)

A. By actual statistics——

[fol. 3065] The Court: He just asked you a question to be answered Yes or No.

A. Yes.

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Steussy, did you become familiar with the length of time and effort it took to train a particular salesman and to impress upon him the sales policies and practices of Fidelity?

A. Yes.

Mr. Ray: The same objection.

A. Yes.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. How long were you with Fidelity? From what time to what time?

Mr. T. W. Townsend: I believe he answered——

A. April 7th 1931 to the 31st of December 1940.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. And when you left Fidelity, where did you go?

A. Franklin Life Insurance Company, Springfield, Illinois.

Q. In what position?

A. Capacity of vice-president in charge of annuity sales.

Q. Will you tell us just what that meant, as to what your [fol. 3066] duties were.

A. My duties were stimulation in the recruiting of life insurance salesmen generally, and particularly in teaching them the annuity selling business.

Q. And are you still with the Franklin Life Insurance Company in that capacity?

A. I am.

Q. What particular type of contract sold by Franklin Life Insurance Company have you been concerned with in your work?

Mr. Huwe: I object.

The Court: Overruled.

A. The contract created last Fall to take the place of a contract that our agents were selling, issued by the Great American Underwriters in Texas, which was a face amount certificate. This contract was constructed as a life insurance policy with six premium years on a monthly payment basis, at the end of a certain waiting period creating a cash value for which a life annuity could be purchased at the time it matured, or get it thereafter with the interest computed at 3% annually after maturity.

Mr. Huwe: I move that the answer be stricken either [fol. 3067] qualifying him as an expert or with reference to this particular hearing.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Steussy, was that a contract originated by Franklin?

A. Originated by Franklin when the Investment Act of 1940 rendered their Underwriter's certificate unsalable after the first of the year, because it didn't comply with that Act.

Q. Then do I understand that Franklin was selling what you term the "Underwriter's certificate" prior to January 1st 1941?

A. Franklin's agents were selling that certificate; that is right.

Q. And, Mr. Steussy, in how many states were they selling that certificate?

A. They were selling that certificate in Texas—the answer is five states.

Q. Now, with regard to the presnet contract with which you went with Franklin Life to promote the sale of, in how many states was that policy filed with the state authorities and offered for sale?

[fol. 3068] A. Qualified in eighteen states.

Q. Including the State of Wisconsin?

A. Correct.

Q. Mr. Steussy, when you went with Franklin in the capacity that you just related, I take it that you again engaged in the business of recruiting salesmen?

A. Correct.

Q. And in recruiting salesmen, did you take on any of those that had been with Fidelity?

Mr. Ray: That certainly is irrelevant.

The Court: What is the purpose of that, Mr. Lauritzen? Do you want to show that they have got them now and can't get them back?

Mr. Lauritzen: If the Court please, we want to show, your Honor, the experience of the same men who had sold for Fidelity under Mr. Steussy and their experience in selling under Mr. Steussy under this present contract that the Franklin Life Insurance Company is offering.

The Court: It is too remote. I sustain the objection.

Mr. Palmer: Some of the witnesses were testifying in great detail that the Franklin Life Insurance Company was selling contracts very similar to what any reorganized com- [fol. 3069] pany would sell and having no difficulty. I believe this would be pertinent and contradictory, if the Court will allow the statement of that witness——

The Court: That isn't the point. He is asking what Fidelity salesmen got.

Mr. Palmer; I presumed he was leading up to a comparison of their selling experience afterward and before, and this was really a qualifying question.

The Court: Let's go direct to what the experience is in selling this contract, and not complicate that with questions about former salesmen of Fidelity.

Mr. Lauritzen: All right, your Honor. Mr. Steussy, have your efforts in attempting to sell the new Franklin Life contract been comparable to those which you put forth in selling the Fidelity contracts?

Mr. Ray: We want to object, because there are so many differences between the new contract and the Fidelity contract.

The Court: Overruled.

A. We find the selling of the savings contract very difficult.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. What I mean by that, did you use the same type of [fol. 3070] sales effort and put the same amount of energy and time into it?

A. Very definitely, and employing the same men.

Q. Mr. Steussy, what success have you had in selling this Franklin contract?

A. Very disappointing.

Q. Will you elaborate on that a little bit?

A. When we first started out——

Mr. Ray: We object to that.

The Court: Overruled.

A. When we first started out, these men were naturally very happy to have a new connection, realizing that they had some income.

The Court: That doesn't make any difference. Just answer his question.

A. May I say that our sales volume in April, the fourth month, reached $300,000. By June, with the defense bond program competing very severely, it dropped to a hundred thousand. It has been below that since.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, what is the size of the Franklin Insurance Company and how long has it been in business?

[fol. 3071] A. Fifty-seven years, and their resources are slightly in excess of forty-five million dollars.

Q. Mr. Steussy, can you give us the reason why your efforts to sell this Franklin contract have not been successful?

Mr. Ray: We object, your Honor.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, can you tell us, did you have occasion to find out in your experience, as you have related it, what it costs to build a sales force comparable to that which you built for Fidelity in Wisconsin?

Mr. Ray: We object to that, your Honor.
The Court: Overruled.

A. I did.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, if you were again to attempt to recuirt such a sales force, would those costs be greater or less than they were when you recruited them?
A. Four hundred per cent greater.

Mr. Huwe: Your Honor, I move the answer as well as the question be stricken. Here is a man who has recruited for from five to eighteen states, and to compare the figures of Wisconsin, one state, with five to eighteen where the law [fol. 3072] might be different, where there might not be any deposit, and therefore any attraction or argument on the salesmen's part, is not comparable. It is not a fair question.
The Court: The Court will make the proper comparison in view of those circumstances, so I will overrule the objection.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, you had experience in determining how long salesmen would stay with an organization, such as those that you have been in charge of, have you not?
A. I did.

Mr. Ray: If that is relevant or material, it certainly has been gone into in this hearing. Mr. Evans and other witnesses on cross-examination have been asked about that over and over again. There doesn't seem to be much dispute about what the turnover is.
The Court: It is a qualifying question. I overrule the objection.
Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Steussy, in your opinion, would you have a greater or less turnover in salesmen if you were now starting to recruit a sales force for Fidelity or some similar organization?
[fol. 3073] A. My experience is that it is greater.

Mr. Ray: Objection.
The Court: Overruled.
Mr. Lauritzen: I didn't hear that.

A. My experience is that it is greater.

Q. Can you tell us why that is true, Mr. Steussy?

Mr. Ray: Mr. Evans went into all these questions, your Honor.

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Ray, Mr. Evans wasn't my witness.

Mr. Ray: I don't care whose witness he was. He was put on the stand and testified to these facts, and they have not been disputed.

Mr. Lauritzen: I don't know what this witness' answer may be.

The Court: He is attempting to answer now a question which is based on the qualification that he has been shown, I am sure, to possess: The question, as I understand it, asks him to give his opinion. I will overrule the objection.

A. Chiefly because they cannot get into production as quick as they used to, because the market isn't there for a saving certificate.

[fol. 3074] Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. And why is that?

A. Due to the fact that the costs of living are high, out of proportion with earnings, and the defense bond is keenly felt—sale of the defense bond.

Q. Can you tell us whether or not the sale of installment Building and Loan Association stock on the installment plan has any thing to do with that situation?

A. They dropped there because of the insurance, very definitely and yet their sales show a drop in the last six months due to the fact that the market has changed.

Q. You mean because they are insured by Federal insurance?

A. By an agency of the Federal Government. That is right.

The Court: Mr. Steussy, do you find the same situation applied to the sale of life insurance contracts?

A. The so-called savings side of the life insurance contracts. In other words, the sales of annuity endowments, high premium life insurance is now at a new low, and the low premium life insurence is constantly offsetting that volume loss the other way. In other words, the men who must pay, as they anticipate, increased taxes this year, [fol. 3075] must immediately establish for their families additional resources in the event of death to offset losses of that kind, which they must pay out; hence, it has stimulated the sale of the so-called low premium insurance, and it has curtailed the sale of so-called high premium insurance. That is universally and nationally our picture, here and in Canada both.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Do you know of any life insurance company that is presently making a success of selling its savings type of annuity policies or contracts?

A. They are all finding the same report that I have just given on our situation—those with whom I am familiar—and I believe I know the entire setup.

Q. By reason of this situation existing, what action has your firm taken with respect to the cessation of efforts to sell this particular contract, or either to drop it or to make increased efforts to put it across?

Mr. Ray: We object your Honor.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Steussy, in your work, have you become familiar with the fact that oftentimes one life insurance company takes over or reinsures various types of [fol. 3076] policies or contracts issued by other life insurance companies?

A. I have.

Q. And in your experience, under what circumstances will it be desirable for a life insurance company to take over or reinsure such other policies or contracts?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, the vast subject of reinsurance has no place in this hearing.

The Court: I sustain the objection.

Mr. Ray: We can talk a week just on that.

Mr. Lauritzen: If the Court please, there has been an overwhelming, a voluminous amount of testimony here as to the fact that various officers and people in Fidelity felt and still feel that a life insurance company might be able to take Fidelity over. Now, I think Mr. Steussy has amply qualified himself to state what the facts are which would lead to a life insurance company doing such a thing.

The Court: That doesn't have anything to do with reinsurance.

Mr. Lauritzen: Let me strike the term "reinsurance." What I mean is taking over and continuing the business of [fol. 3077] another company selling such a contract as Fidelity's, or some other form of saving plan.

Mr. Ray: You didn't ask him if he had any experience along that line——

Mr. Lauritzen: I now amend that, Mr. Ray.

Q. Would you like the question read?

A. As it is amended.

(The question was read as amended.)

The Court: He asked this witness if he had had any such experience as that.

Mr. Lauritzen: Whether he had any experience which would enable him to tell us under what circumstances a life insurance company would find it desirable to take over a company issuing such contracts. Have you had any such experience, Mr. Steussy?

The Court: I think I would have to sustain the objection to the question in that form. You are leaving it to the witness, whether he has experience that will enable him to tell that or not. If what you are doing is to find out what experience he has had, then we will see whether that qualifies him.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, in your connection with the Franklin [fol. 3078] Life Insurance Company, have you had experience with that company considering various propositions made to them to take over companies selling face amount certificates or some comparable contract?

The Court: That won't do.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. What experience have you had with respect to your company's having analyzed the prospects and determining for itself the desirability of taking over a company selling face amount certificates?

The Court: I will admit that question if the witness has had experience in the actual taking over and operation;

you may bring that out and then that will qualify him by what his company is considering to do; otherwise I don't think it will qualify him.

Mr. Lauritzen: He is permitted to testify as to what facts and circumstances must exist for a company to undertake taking over such a company, if he can answer my next question.

The Court: I have ruled on that.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Has the Franklin Life Insurance Company taken over any companies selling annuity policies?

Mr. Ray: We object to that because annuity policies are insurance policies, and it may have reinsured insurance [fol. 3079] policies. That isn't taking over a face amount certificate company.

The Court: What kind of annuities do you mean?

Mr. Lauritzen: Annuity contracts based on a savings feature of placing installment payments with a concern for the purpose of accumulating a sum of money; in other words, on the savings side of a life insurance annuity policy.

The Court: Without life insurance as a part of them?

Mr. Lauritzen: Or with life insurance as a part of them.

Mr. Ray: You cannot have an annuity without insurance, as I understand it.

The Court: If you divorce it from insurance I will permit the answer.

Mr. Lauritzen: When Fidelity sold its series B, which was, in effect, an annuity coupled with insurance——

The Court: It wasn't life insurance. It was insurance that would pay out the face amount of the certificate.

Mr. Lauritzen: But it was life insurance on the life of the contract holder?

The Court: Life insurance to that extent.

Mr. Lauritzen: Well, now, let me clarify that, will you, [fol. 3080] Mr. Steussy.

Q. Will you explain for us, if you can, the similarity or differences in the contract which Franklin Life Insurance Company has been attempting to sell, with the contract which Fidelity sold having the insurance feature.

A. The contract Franklin is now selling is an improved face amount certificate taken over from the Great American Underwriters and since that qualifies as an insurance policy, the face amount certificate was reconstructed just as the Fidelity contract would have to be reconstructed if the Fidelity Assurance Association was going to operate as an insurance corporation—briefly, that is it.

Q. Was that Great American Underwriters contract a contract similar to Fidelity's?

A. So much alike that they were almost like twins.

Q. Now, can you tell us, was that the same contract that has proved successful with your firm? Is that not correct?

A. That contract was sold up to the close of last year.

Q. And now that contract business has been taken over by Franklin?

[fol. 3081] A. And the same sales people are selling it in the new form.

Q. Yes. And in that new form, you haven't been able to sell it, as I understand you?

A. Last December they sold a million dollars' worth of face amount certificates, a little over a million and forty-odd thousand of the Great American certificate, and their January sales were two hundred thousand; at the end of April we reached three hundred thousand face amount, and since then it has been going down.

Q. And is it your opinion that it will continue to go down?

A. It will always sell, because it is in the rate book. Life insurance companies put everything in their rate book. It is part of their line, part of the "57 varieties." Salesmen here and there will find a good need for that type of form.

Q. But you believe that the demand and sale of such a policy is decreasing at the present?

A. Materially.

The Court: Mr. Steussy, does the salability of a contract of this kind depend largely on the vigor with which [fol. 3082] the salesman pushes it, as against other forms of contracts or policies?

A. I would like to answer that by saying this to you, that the unfortunate thing of a life insurance man talking to the prospective buyer about a savings account is this: Let us say he is going to save $150 a year, twelve and a half dollars a month, and he only gets a thousand dollars of life coverage in this so-called certificate. For that same $150 he can get a low premium life insurance policy and get his family ten or twelve thousand dollars of protection. That is the stumbling block of tying up a so-called monthly savings program with a life insurance policy, and that has definitely been the experience of the Great American certificate and the Franklin plan in trying to sell it as——

The Court: What I am trying to find out is, if there is a definite connection between the salability of one of these savings plans and the vigor with which the salesmen push it, as distinguished between it and some other plan.

A. Of course, it's needless to say that a man, if he is excited about something, enthusiastic, can do a better job of selling, but believe me when I say to you, we tried [fol. 3083] exactly the same methods and just couldn't get that enthusiasm up to where it did the trick.

Mr. Lauritzen: I think I might clarify that.

Q. Did you not, in effect, in your connection with Franklin, set up what we might term, in the Franklin Life Insurance Company, a separate division with respect to the activity and force used in sales and placing that force and activity entirely behind this annuity type contract which you testified they had created?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, I don't see how that could be material.

The Court: Overruled.

A. We very definitely had special training classes and gave special training to a special group of men who, to all intents and purposes, specialized in that matter.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Were a great number of those men the men who had been at the top in selling for Fidelity under your supervision?

A. That's correct.

Q. Now, after the S. E. C. investigation in 1938, it became very difficult to sell the Fidelity contract, is that right?

A. That's also correct.

[fol. 3084] Q. Were there some of your men in Fidelity who were nevertheless able to sell Fidelity contracts at all times after this S. E. C. investigation?

A. I was able to retain out of 225 that I had under license in 1938 thirty-seven for 1939.

Q. And did a number of those men sell Fidelity under those circumstances——

Mr. Ray: I object.

The Court: Sustained. I thought the Court made it plain, since there is no controversy as to the particular fact that you are asking about now, that there is no use putting and duplicating the questions on the record. This witness was qualified to give his opinion as an expert. The Court will permit him to give his opinion as an expert. but not give cumulative testimony of what has already been gone into.

Mr. Lauritzen: I think my next question will clarify it. Of the salesmen that you took into the Franklin setup from Fidelity, were those the salesmen who had, after the S. E. C. investigation, been able to continue and still make a living selling the Fidelity contract?

Mr. Ray: Objection.

[fol. 3085] The Court: Overruled.

A. Only those salesmen that were able to carry on and keep themselves above water, so to speak, were the ones that I took in.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. What has been the experience of those men?

A. I took twelve men with me from Wisconsin, and I have one of them left.

Q. And what happened to the eleven?

A. They have passed out of the picture.

Q. And why?

A. They were unable to sell a sufficient volume to stay in the business.

Q. In addition to those twelve men, did Franklin take on some other Fidelity men in various places in the country in which Fidelity or Franklin was selling?

A. About a half dozen in Michigan, eight in Ohio, about six in Illinois, a dozen in Missouri and Kansas combined, and we sent some from those states into other states.

Q. And what has their experience been?

A. There are now a total of five of them left.

Q. Was the American—can you give me the name again?

[fol. 3086] A. Great American Underwriters.

Q. Was the Great American Underwriters the only type of face amount certificate company that Franklin ever took over?

A. That's correct.

Q. Have they considered taking over others?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, I object.

The Court: Sustained. Mr. Steussy, do you know what these salesmen of Fidelity other than the five you still have working for you are doing?

A. Yes; I know what a great many of them are doing.

Q. Are they working along the same line as they formerly did, as salesmen?

A. No. That would be about fifty-fifty.

Q. You mean fifty per cent are still engaged in some form of salesmenship similar to that which they did before?

A. They are selling tangibles.

Q. The other fifty per cent—are they employed at anything, as far as you know?

A. I know of one men who has gone into Y. M. C. A. work. Another man has gone into a manufacturing plant. I know of another man who has gone into another manu[fol. 3087] facturing plant; another who has gone into the mortgage and real estate business; another who has gone into the stock selling business.

Q. By selling "tangibles" do you mean something other than an investment, whether a life insurance or new contracts or stocks and bonds, anything of that sort?

A. I mean goods of various industries—sash and doors, building supplies, iceboxes, automobiles, and so on.

Q. When a company has a large number of contract holders such as Fidelity did, and sold a large number of contracts, may it under some circumstances be desirable for another organization to take that organization over and continue it in business?

A. Very definitely.

Q. Now, with respect to your knowledge of Fidelity's affairs, do you believe it would be advantageous for any organization to take over Fidelity in that manner?

A. Very definitely not.

Q. Will you amplify that?

A. It has lost that which a company taking it over is after—the sales organization. It has disappeared, disassembled and disintegrated.

[fol. 3088] The Court: I thought you meant, when you said it would not be advantageous to take it over, that it would not be advantageous to the holders of contracts in that company.

A. Oh, no.

The Court: I judge from your answer you mean it would not be advantageous to the outside company.

A. The company taking it over—that's right.

Mr. Lauritzen: With respect to contract holders of Fidelity, do you believe it would or would not be advantageous to them to have Fidelity taken over by another organization and continued in business?

Mr. Ray: We object to that, your Honor.

The Court: Overruled.

A. I would say that it would be a disadvantage to them.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Will you amplify that?

Mr. Ray: I don't like that word "amplify." I want to know why he makes that statement.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Will you give the basis for your statement?

A. The basis for my statement is this: Anybody that takes it over must make some money in order to continue to take it over, and that would be transferring equities [fol. 3089] into a new kind of paper which would mean a new load, because of the fact that the very same purchaser would have to pay in more money—when he found it would be better to take a loss, keep what he already has, instead of paying in, take another loss and make it a disappointment later on.

The Court: You seem to base your answer on a very fanciful fabric of your own mind which was not in the question. Do you have any ideas independent of this imaginary fabric that you have built up?

A. Will you ask me a direct question?

The Court: I ask you—will you read the question.

(The question of the Court was read.)

A. Your Honor, of course I have talked to a great many thousands of Wisconsin contract holders since 1938. I was born and raised in the State. I know a great many of them personally. I know their ways. I know their methods—their way of living, and I believe that I can say to you very definitely that what I said wasn't something that I haven't thought about a great deal. I believe that my statement wasn't at all fanciful. I think it is the truth and very evident, so far as my Wisconsin people are concerned. [fol. 3090] The Court: Now, you said it would be a disadvantage if some structure were formed and transfer made to a new company, that it would take money from the equities of contract holders and create some new form of obligation. It would give them less than what they now have. Of course that is quite apparent without your answering. If the question and answer are going to be of any benefit to the Court, you have got to base it on something different from that. You have to base it on the assumption that there will not be taken anything from the equity of the contract holders or given to anybody at all. If you have any answer based on that assumption, the Court will be glad to hear it.

A. I can say this too, that the sales people that I tried to adopt—or adapt to the new operation—that we had to adapt ourselves to—where does a salesman logically go but back to his old customers to get new names, and I often find that the people who are now so-called delinquent have found a new outlet for that money, have made new commitments, and in most cases would be unable to again reinstate themselves and continue payments as they are now making. They could, of course, get the benefit of what a paid-up contract would do for them if a firm rate of interest [fol. 3091] would prevail.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, in your answer, you mentioned a company taking them over and paying a new loading charge. Is that based on some experience that you have had with respect to contract holders surrendering policies in——

The Court: I sustained the objection and will ask counsel to base no questions on any assumption that there will be any equity taken from anybody that has equities.

Mr. Lauritzen: I don't mean to base my question on any such assumption, but what I am getting at is this: Let us say, Mr. Steussy, that Mr. Jones, a contract holder in Wisconsin or elsewhere, has a par cash surrender value of a thousand dollars, and that if the rights which were attempted to be secured to him under the Wisconsin laws were left unimpaired and he got that thousand dollars, what is your answer with respect to the desirability of that man going into an organization either taking over or created out of Fidelity.

The Court: Well, the Court knows about as much about that as this witness could. I sustain the objection.

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Steussy, in selling Fidelity's con-
[fol. 3092] tracts in Wisconsin, was it a factor of assistance in the sales organization that there is in existence in Wisconsin certain laws relating to Fidelity?

Mr. Ray: We object to that, your Honor.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Lauritzen: If the Court please, I think this would bear directly on Mr. Steussy's testimony that if you have no such factor, as to whether or not it would be more difficult to sell another type of contract or whether that difficulty might be overcome in some manner.

The Court: The question clearly calls for an opinion of the witness, and the Court is just as well advised before as after as to whether that law would have been a factor.

Mr. Lauritzen: If the Court please, I asked him in his actual experience as head of this sales organization, what effect, beneficial or otherwise, on the ease of selling that factor has—not his opinion but what his experience was as head of this sales force.

The Court: Now you are changing your question. Read the question, please.

(The question was read.)

[fol. 3093] The Court: I sustain the objection.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Let me ask you this, Mr. Steussy. Was that law of aid to Fidelity's force in Wisconsin?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, that is the same question.

Mr. Lauritzen: I don't think so. The Court just explained the distinction. Now, let us say——

The Court: You say, "Was that law of aid?"

Mr. Ray: And the other was, "Was it a factor of assistance."

The Court: I don't see any distinction.

Mr. Lauritzen: In the Court's previous ruling the Court ruled——

The Court: I sustain the objection.

Mr. Ray: We objected because it isn't material.

Mr. Lauritzen: I believe that is about as material a thing as we could possibly have, both as regard to Wisconsin contract holders, whether they are going to get under way with a type of operation similar to this in the future——

The Court: I sustained the objection. If you have a law out there in which the present holders are protected 110%, then that law will be just as effective, whether it was of assistantce in selling a contract or not; so I don't see [fol. 3094] that it is at all material.

Mr. Lauritzen: Just this, if the Court please: If they were attempting to sell some sort of insurance contract which would become subject to the Wisconsin insurance laws, this law would no longer be a factor at all. They would be operating, under those circumstances, under an entirely different part of the law, and any assistance that might have been given them in the past, in being able to quote this law, would not be in existence under the new situation.

Mr. Ray: Certainly if this contract which the Franklin is selling is so different, then the same Wisconsin law cannot apply. I got the idea from the witness' discussion that it was quite different. Now the attorney from Wisconsin tells the Court that it is so different that it is not even restricted by the same statutes in Wisconsin.

Mr. Lauritzen: Only for the purpose of illustrating and forming a basis for Mr. Steussy's previous opinion as to the difficulty that you now have in getting under way with any savings plan, if you couldn't have the benefit of such a law.

The Court: Let's go ahead. The court has ruled.

[fol. 3095] Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. To your knowledge, Mr. Steussy, did the Banking Commission of Wisconsin at one time become concerned for the safety of Wisconsin contract holders of Fidelity?

Mr. Ray: We object.
The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, did Fidelity have negotiations in which you took a part with the Banking Commission of Wisconsin relative to ascertaining the safety that was being provided for Fidelity holders in Wisconsin, and what their rights were?

Mr. Ray: We object to that, your Honor. That is not relevant to the issues here.
The Court: Sustained.
Mr. Lauritzen: If the Court please, just this: There has been a great deal of testimony and discussion in this case to the effect that these deposit laws—whether it was on a total contract liability basis in the various states; and in that connection, I desire to bring out through Mr. Steussy the direct representations that were made by Fidelity through its counsel and officers to the State authorities of Wisconsin, as to defining the rights of those contract holders, which rights will ultimately have to be decided [fol. 3096] in this proceeding, both as to whether there can be a reorganization, and if there is a reorganization, as to what their rights will be. I think that is a subject that we have gone into at considerable length here during this hearing.
Mr. Ray: That subject isn't pertinent to the matters which the Court must decide, and what has been gone into has been brought into the case by cross-examination of Mr. Lauritzen over our objections, and why should he now bring a witness in to testify to matters which are now immaterial which he has himself brought into the record?
The Court: You don't think that is material now?
Mr. Lauritzen: Definitely, your Honor.
The Court: I mean on the question of good faith.
Mr. Lauritzen: On the question of feasibility of the thing—just this: If the Wisconsin law is valid, both as written and as administered; and if the terms of the contract which, by reason of that law, and the contract of Fidelity and representations made to contract holders—that that trust deposit out there is entirely valid under the representations that Fidelity made, then it will have a great effect in determining whether there can be a re-[fol. 3097] organization, because that would remove the possibility of the reducing, over the objection of any of those contract holders, of those equities and would make more difficult the search for additional capital, which apparently and without question must be found somewhere, if Fidelity were to continue both to comply with the present state laws which are not abrogated and with the Investment Company Act of 1940, which is on a plain arithmetical basis. I think that is of the essence in this proceeding in determining the feasibility of any plan which might be proposed or determined, whether any possible plan could be proposed.

The Court: It is your contention that the status of the deposit in Wisconsin is to be determined by negotiations between Fidelity and the officers of Wisconsin rather than by the law of Wisconsin?

Mr. Lauritzen: I would say, your Honor, that if there were any room for doubt in the construction of the law, that the practical application of it, as between the authorities in charge of administering that law and the officers of Fidelity in setting up a deposit for the benefit of the contract holders would be very material.

The Court: I sustain the objection.

[fol. 3098] Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Steussy, do you recognize this document which I show you?

A. Yes, sir. (Examining document.)

Q. Will you tell us what it is.

A. It is a part of the sales kit that we used in the sale of the contract, in the sale in Wisconsin.

Mr. Ray: I can't see that anything in the sales kit in selling contracts in Wisconsin is relevant to the issues before the Court.

Mr. Lauritzen: It has already been ruled, and there is evidence in the record here, as to representations made in other states, and surely these representations must be of equal value as those.

The Court: I will overrule the objection.

Exhibit 106

The paper referred to was marked for identification, at the request of Mr. Lauritzen, as above indicated.

Mr. Lauritzen: We offer in evidence Exhibit 106.

Exhibit 106

The paper referred to, having been previously marked as above indicated, was admitted in evidence. The same is attached hereto as a part hereof.

[fol. 3099] Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, are you a stockholder in Fidelity Assurance Association?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And how much stock do you hold?

A. Ten shares of common and five shares of preferred.

Q. Can you tell us what you paid for it?

Mr. Ray: We object, your Honor.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Lauritzen: I think, if your Honor please, this would show the interest of Mr. Steussy and would provide a criterion for the Court in determining the value of his testimony.

The Court: What difference does it make if we know what he paid for it if we know it isn't worth anything?

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. May I ask, did you pay money for it?

A. I did.

Q. How long ago did you get it?

A. 1932, I purchased the common and the preferred I got as a dividend.

Q. I didn't hear that.

A. Purchased the common in 1932 and the preferred I got as a dividend later on, and I kept it.

[fol. 3100] Q. Mr. Steussy, Fidelity sold various contracts of various types—am I correct in that?

A. That is right.

Q. When Fidelity came out with a new series of contracts, what instructions did you receive from the home office of Fidelity as to contacting previous contract holders with respect to the purchase of a new contract?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, I object to the question. I can't see how that would be relevant to the issue of jurisdiction——

Mr. Lauritzen: Just this, your Honor: If it is shown that by numerous switches of contract holders from one contract into another, it provided a basis for giving a salesman something to sell, and provided a man a livelihood and kept him on with the compnay, and further, was a source of profit to the company, the availability of such inducements to salesmen and such inducements to the company in the future would have a great bearing on prospective earnings of income.

The Court: It is too remote. I sustain the objection.

Mr. Lauritzen:

Q. Mr. Steussy, from your experience, can you tell us how much you estimated it would cost in dollars to develop [fol. 3101] a sales force for a company comparable to Fidelity, a sales force comparable to that which you had in Wisconsin?

Mr. Ray: We object. In the first place, when he uses the words "How much it would cost," the costs of developing a sales force do not all fall—in the past did not all fall upon the company.

Mr. Lauritzen: I realize that fully, Mr. Ray.

Mr. Ray: If you had some way of getting at the net cost to the company, it might mean something.

Mr. Lauritzen: That is what I mean to ask him.

The Court: It seems to me when you are attempting to confine it to the State of Wisconsin that you are very much too localized to be of any assistance to the Court. I sustain the objection to that question.

Mr. Lauritzen: I think that's all for the present, Mr. Steussy.

Mr. Palmer: May I have permission to examine the witness on one phase?

Mr. Ray: What is that?

Mr. Palmer: I understood the witness to say he did not think Fidelity could be reorganized in any way and should [fol. 3102] be liquidated.

Mr. Ray: I didn't understand him to say that.

The Court: Yes, I think he did testify to that effect. Go ahead.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Steussy, if the Court will permit me, after you became a salesman in Wisconsin or any place else, did you study selling methods?

Mr. Lauritzen: Excuse me, Mr. Palmer. I think you should say, manager of the sales force, because I understand Mr. Steussy was not a direct salesman.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. After you became a sales manager, did you study selling methods?

A. Very definitely.

Mr. Ray: I object to that.

The Court: I don't think we ought to go into the qualifying questions again. Let's get to the heart of anything new.

Mr. Palmer: I wanted to broaden, if possible, his qualifications for the basis of later questions.

The Court: Well, he has already qualified along that line.

Mr. Palmer: I wanted to get what studies he had made; [fol. 3103] in other words, the basis of his——

Mr. Jaegerman: Is Mr. Palmer challenging his qualifications?

Mr. Palmer: No, your Honor. They were given very generally, and I wanted to broaden the qualifications if I can broaden them. In other words, as I understand it, the weight of any expert witness' testimony, the weight which the jury or the Court gives to the witness' testimony depends to a large extent upon the qualifications which he exhibits to that body.

The Court: All right. Without any further argument, go ahead.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Now, in studying selling methods, did you read books on the subject?

A. A good many volumes. I wrote some—taught salesmanship; been a salesman all my life.

Q. Where were you teaching salesmanship?

A. In a certain small school in Milwaukee—as something to do.

Q. Have you since that time studied insurance?

A. Studied insurance way back in the twenties; studied it all the time as I went along.

[fol. 3104] Q. Did you study face amount securities so you would know the difference between one type and another?

A. I believe I have every type of certificate that has ever been construed or thought of or sold on record in a file and available.

Q. Have you made a study of them?

A. Very definitely.

Q. Have you made a study of various types of insurance policies?

A. I have bought a good many thousands of dollars' worth of them during my time, and when reverses come, you get delinquent and buy some more. I have certainly studied every branch of life insurance from the corporate sinking fund type to the benefit of the trust fund, which is created by means of insurance purchases, of course.

Q. Now, have you since your employment with the Franklin Insurance Company discussed with other officials of that company the various types of policies which they sell?

A. Very definitely.

Mr. Ray: He is getting into the Franklin Life Insurance Company, which has no relevancy here.

Mr. Palmer: I am getting to it.

Mr. Ray: That is about a fact having to do with another [fol. 3105] company——

The Court: I overrule the objection. See what it leads to.

A. We have regular conferences and intercompany study and meetings on the different types of instruments that we sell, very obviously, and have district sales meetings. Those are all discussed minutely.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Do you have outside experts in the insurance field come and lecture and discuss insurance problems with you?

Mr. Huwe: I object. He is doing what Mr. Lauritzen was unable to do, trying to show that they have conferences and consider small insurance companies for reinsurance and all that sort of thing.

The Court: I don't so understand the purpose of his question. He is just trying to find out how much experience this man has in the field in which he operates.

Mr. Huwe: I suggest we get right down to the opinion question, and then if he isn't qualified, I think that is the best way to do it.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Palmer: Will you read the question.

(The question was read.)

[fol. 3106] A. We subscribe to, I suppose, all the important services, of which there are many, as you know. We are obviously members of the Life Insurance Company Convention, which Mr. Johnson is president of. We have naturally the benefit of everything available.

Q. Do you read those various journals published on the problems of insurance?

A. That is the reason why I own these glasses. I ruined my eyes doing it.

Mr. Huwe: I object to that answer and move it be stricken.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Have you studied the reports made by the S.E.C. to the T.N.E.C. in pursuance to the Act of Congress? Have you read them?

A. I have read them but never studied them.

Q. Have you attempted to familiarize yourself with state laws in various states in which companies operate?

A. Will you state that question again?

Mr. Palmer: Will you read the question.

(The question was read.)

A. To a limited extent.

[fol. 3107] Q. Now, have you familiarized yourself to any extent or been advised as to the financial condition at present of Fidelity?

A. I believe that I have the information right up to date.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I didn't get that.

Witness: I have the information right up to date.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Do you know whether that information is that the general fund is approximately two and one-half million dollars or slightly more in the hole?

A. I believe that is about the figure.

Q. And does your information include the fact, if such it be, that Fidelity, with all of its assets against all of its liabilities, is about ten per cent under water, as it is called?

A. You mean by putting it all into one fund?

Q. Yes.

A. I didn't look at it from the per cent standpoint particularly.

Q. Will you take that as an assumption upon which I may base future questions. Were you also advised that the later series of contracts, A, B, and D, were nearly [fol. 3108] solvent, whereas the early series special annuity and special endowment had their reserve impaired to a far greater extent?

A. That's right.

Q. With those facts in mind, are you prepared to give the Court answers as to your opinion, based upon your experience and background, as to the possibilities or impossibilities of Fidelity being reorganized, or whether it should be entirely liquidated?

Mr. Townsend: I object.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Palmer: Will you read the question, please.

(The question was read.)

A. I wish you would read the question again.

(The question was reread.)

A. I will be very glad to answer those questions.

Q. Do you feel prepared and capable of giving answers to them?

A. I do.

Q. Now, keeping in mind the facts of Fidelity which you and I have discussed, so that your opinion with reference to Fidelity is based upon those facts, what have you to say as to whether or not Fidelity can be reorganized into a face amount securities company?

[fol. 3109] Mr. Hume: I object.

Mr. Palmer: All right. I mean a company selling face amount certificates.

Mr. Hume: This man is not qualified to answer that question, because he doesn't have any idea of finances, the actuarial features of a business, and is merely qualifying as an expert salesman. He was working, up to 1940, as manager of sales in Wisconsin, and in this short period of nine months, even though he says he read thoroughly the T. N. E. C. reports on insurance companies, and listens to lectures; I say, he is not qualified to answer that question just on the experience that he has related.

The Court: Overruled.

A. The company cannot be reorganized with the loading cost permitted by the 7 per cent of the sum of money paid in by the depositor, or possibly load the contracts so that it can assemble a sales force and be successful in the selling of it.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Are you basing that upon your experience first with Fidelity and your later experience with Franklin?

A. I am basing it on my experience in following the savings deposit certificates qualified with the S. E. C.

[fols. 3110-3119] Q. My next question is this. It is your further opinion, I gather from what you have told us, that Fidelity cannot be reorganized into a company which would sell a policy or certificate or contract similar to the one that Franklin Life Insurance is selling?

A. A salesman cannot sell one contract with a life insurance company, nor can a life insurance company sell one contract and be in the life insurance business.

Q. So that your answer to my question would be that a company could not be formed from Fidelity which would sell a policy or contract exactly similar to the Franklin policy?

A. The company could not be qualified with an insurance department in most states of this Union.

Q. I want your own opinion as a practical matter whether that company could work and exist.

A. Absolutely not.

* * * * * * *

[fols. 3120-3140] Mr. T. C. Townsend: Your Honor, the trustee has completed the first installment of its report, and has six copies: one for its office file, one for the Court, two for the S. E. C., and two additional ones. This can be filed with the Court now or it can be filed with the Court tomorrow morning.

The Court: I suggest you just wait until tomorrow morning.

By Mr. Huwe:

Q. As I take it, Mr. Steussy, you are holding yourself out as an expert with reference to both face amount certificate companies and with reference to insurance companies, as to the buyer's point of view, as to the seller's point of view, as to the financier's point of view, and as to the management's point of view, with the exception of the actuarial feature of the management?

A. That is exactly what I desire you to understand.

Q. That is the impression you desire to make?

A. That's correct.

• • • • • • •

[fol. 3151] Q. Then you emphasize the factor of rebuilding a sales force. That is the chief reason, you say, that a company like Fidelity could not re-enter successfully under the 1940 Investment Company Act?

A. I didn't say that was the chief reason. It is one of the paramount reasons.

The Court: What is another?

A. Another is that you have to qualify in the different states, which is expensive.

The Court: Doesn't any other company have to do that?

A. Most of them that are in existence are qualified. There are many states that I know of, for instance, if new companies of life insurance wanted to get in, they say, "We have plenty of them now."

The Court: We are talking about companies that qualify under the 1940 Investment Security Act.

A. From my study and observation, I would say to you that it is very remote.

The Court: I don't understand what you are talking about. I want to know what other element there is other than the difficulty of creating a sales force that would pre-[fol. 3152] vent Fidelity from going ahead as an investment certificate company?

A. Consumer acceptance.

The Court: What is that?

A. Consumer acceptance, purchaser acceptance of the idea of such a plan.

Mr. Palmer: Is the Court assuming that Fidelity could qualify under the Investment Company Act?

The Court: I want the witness to tell me, if he can, what are the reasons why a reorganized Fidelity couldn't go ahead and sell face amount certificates as any other company could.

Mr. Palmer: Is the Court assuming by that question that the company could qualify under the Investment Company Act and asking the witness to dismiss that from his mind, or is the Court——

The Court: Certainly I am including that it could qualify. That's what I want to know. He says one reason why it couldn't is because it would take a lot of money to create a sales force. I want to know if there are any other reasons. Now, you say public acceptance or non-acceptance, but that applies equally to all companies.

A. I am afraid it doesn't, for the simple reason that the [fol. 3153] hundreds of thousands of lines of publicity that Fidelity has had, obviously it cannot live down unless the element of time continues to irradicate it.

The Court: Your next element is unfavorable publicity in the past?

A. That's right.

Q. Let's see if there are any others.

A. Unfavorable whispering campaigns among those who benefitted by the fact that the Fidelity sales activities became extinct.

Q. I don't know whether I understand that or not.

A. May I tell you off the record what I mean?

Q. Tell me on the record.

A. Let us assume that the company sold in a given area $600,000 of maturity fund face certificates per month, which would be in the neighborhood of seven million dollars a year. It takes those active, aggressive, highly specialized salesmen out of the field, and in that same area other—now qualified under the Investment Act of 1940—face amount certificate companies are operating. They have taken your customers away from you; they have started them on a new certificate, where they cease paying on the other, and so on. That is what I am attempting to have the Court under-[fol. 3154] stand.

The Court: Go ahead, Mr. Huwe.

Mr. Huwe:

Q. So that there are successful face amount certificate companies operating now, taking customers away from Fidelity?

Mr. Palmer: I object to that, your Honor. The witness used that as an example and not as a statement of fact at all. Mr. Huwe should have so understood it.

Mr. Huwe: If he can't use a true statement of fact, what good is his example?

The Court: I overrule the objection.

Mr. Huwe: Now, Mr. Steussy——

The Court: Read the question.

(The question was read.)

A. There are very few operating, and they are not taking anything away from anybody. They are merely, in many cases, I am sure, where the people have discontinued their monthly installments because of publicity, court proceedings, and so forth, if they have money to save, it creates a field and they are going into other methods, rather than discontinuing savings—one of them being Government defense bonds.

Mr. Huwe:

Q. How long has this Government bond been on sale? [fol. 3155] A. I believe you are familiar with that.

Q. Well, let's have it in the record. You are an expert on these things.

A. Well, the present defense bond, as you know, is created out of and in no wise existed except by series numbers out of the original so-called savings bond. That change, as you know, took place late last year and finally got on sale this year.

Q. Now, do you know how many people are still paying to this day on their Fidelity contract? Do you know how many and the amount?

A. I know how many, if the information I received yesterday is correct.

Q. Do you know the amount?

A. I do not know the amount.

Q. Did you know the amount in September, August, and July?

A. No, sir. I can merely tell you what I was told it was presently receiving monthly on the protected contracts.

The Court: One question, Mr. Steussy. How long have those defense bonds of the Government been sold?

[fol. 3156] A. As defense bonds?

The Court: As savings prior to the change in the name?

A. Well, they came out, I would say, about 1937 or somewhere back there. I think Mr. Jaegerman can tell you exactly. I was very busy with the other selling.

Q. Fidelity had its peak sales after those bonds went on the market?

A. Savings bonds?

Q. Yes.

A. Certainly.

Q. You say there is no difference in defense bonds and the savings plan?

A. Only in face amount, and in some, only in yield, but we are in a different time again. In other words—discussing with you what I have said to one of the gentlemen in the room—the originality of the fact that the Government went into a monthly or a periodic savings plan—the inception of it was beneficial to Fidelity, beneficial to the syndicate, because it indicated that the Government was approving and rather encouraging an orderly program of thrift. Then they turn around and take your program and build it up where the cry is to the point where you get your [fol. 3157] change in grocery stores in stamps.

Q. Did it have the same advantages of the Fidelity plan then as it has now?

A. You mean from an actual, mathematical and actuarial standpoint?

Q. From every standpoint.

A. The answer would be No, from every standpoint.

Q. In what standpoint was there any difference?

A. There was no advertising at the beginning—this wholesale mailing crusade that is going on from coast to coast, and from Alaska to the Border wasn't in effect, and neither were the banking institutions of the country supporting it with ads in magazines and newspapers, half pages, encouraging thrift, as they are today. The banks were trying to get savings accounts. Today they are telling you to buy defense bonds—entirely changing the situation.

Q. Is this advertising campaign the only difference in the situation of 1938 and now?

A. I am attempting, your Honor, to obviously cooperate with the Court as much as I can——

The Court: I don't want you to cooperate with me. I just want you to testify. I am asking you facts—if there [fol. 3158] is any other difference between the two between 1938 and now, between these defense bonds and the Fidelity contract. If you know, I want you to tell me.

A. There are no mathematical differences that have made any difference at this time than they did when the contract —when the savings bond was previously put on the market.

Q. You said there are some advertising differences. Are there any other differences?

A. Yes.

Q. What are they?

A. Well, for instance, when—and I understand this is pretty general—life insurance companies, for instance, are instructing their agents, when they meet the apparent competitive elements of defense bond buying, they shall encourage not only their buying more, but continue the program they have started, and from the standpoint of patriotism, support the issue of doing your share for America, which is a tremendous thing—favorable to the one and adverse to the other.

The Court:

Q. Is that all? Are there any other differences?

A. Well, there would be—as I just touched upon—with stamps. With the original savings bond, you could merely [fol. 3159] buy a bond and take your money to the post office. You couldn't send money by mail originally, until the latter part of 1940, when they did put an installment and envelope-sending system in effect on the other bond. Now you can go to your Kroger Grocery and buy your groceries, and get stamps in change. The vehicle is now made easier —the difference between buying an icebox and radio for cash and being able to buy it on the installment plan—an entire difference in selling.

Q. Are there any other differences?

A. I don't think any material or important ones.

Mr. Huwe:

Q. And didn't the Government advertise a baby bond? They sent to you about the same kind of advertising with reference to baby bonds back in 1938?

A. They did not.

Q. You didn't receive any?

A. Not only didn't I receive any, but they didn't send them, for I made myself familiar with them.

Q. You mean to say that they didn't advertise them at all?

A. No, sir; I didn't say that.

Q. Answer my question.

A. I am answering your question.

[fol. 3160] Q. They didn't advertise them through the mail?

A. They did some advertising through the mail. You infer that they were doing as much as they are doing now.

Q. Now, how about the sale of series B of the old Fidelity to people who were physically ineligible for low premium insurance? Would there be competition by low premium insurance in such a situation?

A. That question answers itself; obviously not.

Q. Thank you. And wasn't that a sales feature and factor in the success of series B?

A. It was not.

Q. It was not?

A. That's what I said.

Q. Are you speaking about Wisconsin, or are you speaking about all the states?

A. Speaking about B wherever and whenever it was sold.

Q. You do not attach any importance to the fact that the contract holder received a certain type of protection with reference to completing the face amount of the certificate without having to have a physical examination?

A. Will you read that question, please.

(The question was read.)

A. Very definitely a benefit to the man who bought it.

[fol. 3161] Q. So it was an attractive feature to the man who could buy a series B policy who couldn't pass a physical examination for low premium insurance?

A. I don't know what you are trying to ask me. You are trying to tie two things up, but you won't let me answer them separately. I can't answer them together.

Q. You have agreed that there is the ability of a series B contract holder to enter a contract wherein, if he predeceases the face amount maturity date, that face amount maturity sum is paid up for him by some insurance feature?

A. That's correct.

Q. Is that particular feature attractive to a prospect who cannot buy insurance and who is looking at the investment from the standpoint of a savings point of view?

A. Has no benefit at all if he cannot qualify for the insurance.

Q. Does he have to take a physical examination in series B?

A. He does if he has attained the age of forty-nine and a half years, or if the sum is greater than five thousand dollars.

Q. Suppose the sum is less and he is less than forty-nine and a half?

[fol. 3162] A. Then the life insurance company passes upon what they call the medical inspection bureau reports. They rely on the system that the insurance companies use, which is a national method, which is equivalent to a medical examination to a certain extent, equivalent to it to a certain extent, because it is medical information.

Q. To a degree.

A. To a degree.

Mr. Palmer: Mr. Huwe has apparently assumed that if a person goes to a life insurance company and is refused for life insurance, he could automatically walk into Fidelity, and being under forty-nine and taking an amount less than five thousand dollars, sign a certificate that "I have been rejected by the life insurance company and therefore take series B." I don't know whether that is a fact. Before he assumes it as a basis for his questions, I think the witness should——

The Court: All that he has assumed is that a man may be under the age of forty-nine and a half years and want less than five thousand dollars, and not be in a physical condition to pass an insurance examination, and such a man may get a series B contract. Now that apparently is the fact, with some qualifications, and the witness is going ahead [fols. 3163-3171] and explaining what those are.

A. The first qualification is that the life insurance company issuing the coverage on it always has the right for the request of a physical examination, regardless of age or regardless of the amount. The other—at all times, the method employed by the institution of life insurance is medical inspection reports and the so-called "rate card" which give a complete record of previous applications of insurance, which would automatically mark anyone who had been turned down for life insurance.

* * * * * * *

[fols. 3172-3180] Q. You thought it was a good idea to emphasize the exacting law of Wisconsin?

A. Very definitely.

* * * * * * *

[fol 3181] Cross-examination.

By Mr. Ray:

Q. Your experience has been exclusively in selling, has it not, Mr. Steussy?

A. You mean, have I devoted my time to selling?

Q. Yes.

A. Substantially, yes.

Q. As special agent of the Provident Life Insurance Company, you were engaged in selling life insurance, were you?

A. That is correct.

Q. What else did you do besides sell life insurance for that company?

A. I sold annuities.

Q. But you were engaged in selling?

A. Oh, very definitely.

[fol. 3182] Q. What business experience did you have before your connection with the Provident Life?

A. Well, way back in my educational set up I prepared for business by business schooling, and I was in the general mercantile field most of my life previous to the time of entering into the life insurance business.

Q. What business schooling did you have?

A. Well, I finished the public and high schools of my home town community, which was New Glarus, Wisconsin; after that I went to a commercial academy and took a commercial business course.

Q. What was the name of that business school?

A. Capital City Commercial College, still in existence and doing——

Q. Where was that?

A. At Madison, Wisconsin.

Q. How long were you there?

A. The length of time that it took to complete the course—I can't remember at the moment exactly how long.

Q. Was it four or five months?

A. Longer than that; but it wasn't any four or five years, I would say. I can't tell you exactly how long I was there, [fol. 3183] because I took it piecemeal, for one thing, and for that reason the time doesn't follow itself. It isn't continuous.

Q. You did what?

A. I took it during so-called interval periods.

Q. I see. What do you mean?

A. I don't like to testify as to time; it seems that I went longer than I went.

Q. I see. What was your business experience before you got into Provident?

A. I was in the general mercantile business in the rural community with my father from the time I finished school until 1914.

Q. You mean in a country store?

A. I don't mean that—in a chain of stores; five, to be exact.

Q. Grocery stores?

A. Everything from silk shirts down to the buying of hides, groceries; we sold sewing machines, pianos, and so forth—large inventories and a large volume of business.

Q. And you were primarily engaged in the sales of that business?

[fol. 3184] A. I was engaged in buying, went to the market to buy—had a complete general experience from A to Z in the operation of a general enterprising business.

Q. What became of that business?

A. That is partially out of business. The real estate people have now rented it to chain stores mostly, some now owned by my father—and very successfully rented, incidentally.

Q. When did you leave that business?

A. I left when I started to enter business in my own account and went to the city.

Q. When was that?

A. That was in nineteen—just about the time of the other War; I went to Milwaukee and engaged in the mercantile business, specializing in the musical instrument business.

Q. You were still engaged in selling?

A. Engaged in buying and selling, and got in the manufacturing of pianos the following year.

Q. After that, what did you do?

A. Then I continued in that business, because connected with the American Piano Company of New York—represented them in Wisconsin, representing the highest grade, [fol. 3185] together with their cheaper merchandise. At the time the automatic pianos were losing their popularity, I went with the radio business—went into the radio business with Grisby-Grunow in the peak years of 1928 and 1929.

Q. During those years you were principally engaged in selling?

A. I bought millions of dollars of merchandise during that time and beyond the early thirties; bought hardware, wire—everything in the manufacture of pianos; had to do with the financing—had a lot of dealings with financial companies.

Q. My questions were relating to the Grisby-Grunow people. You were principally engaged in selling during those years, were you not?

A. Of course, any mercantile enterprise, everything you buy for it must be sold; otherwise you couldn't economically operate the business.

Q. That has been your specialty—selling?

A. I would say the training of help and executive capacity of a sales organization.

Q. Let us get back to the Grunow business. You were principally engaged in selling radios, were you not?

[fol. 3186] A. The training of salesmen to sell them.

Q. That is being engaged in the selling of radio equipment is it not?

A. That is right.

Q. From the Grunow people, where did you go?

A. Provident Mutual.

Q. During the years with Provident Mutual, you were principally engaged in selling?

A. Entirely so.

Q. From Provident you went to Fidelity?

A. That is correct.

Q. Have you ever been connected with Fidelity in any way but the selling department?

A. No, sir.

Q. Since you left Fidelity, have you been engaged in anything but the selling department?

A. Yes.

Q. What department?

A. I am on the so-called inter-company meetings that we have. We counsel on all the things; we have advertising—the sales of different departments——

Q. Did you——

[fol. 3187] Mr. Palmer: Let him finish his answer.

A. (Continuing) I obviously discuss investments. I made some commitments for investments, have been on investment committees, and so forth. Those policies, they are all discussed. If you become an executive of an insurance company, your duties are obviously very broad.

Q. Did you not state that you were made a vice-president and put in charge of selling this particular form of contract?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Isn't that what you have been principally engaged in?

A. Oh, yes; principally, I have.

Q. And that is what you went there to do?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. And it was your experience as a salesman which was responsible for your going to Franklin?

A. That is also correct.

Q. What work have you ever done in any actuary department of any company?

A. Well, actually creating mathematical equations—none; checking them as to salability, desirability, usability beneficial to the buyer—a lot of it; a lot of it for Fidelity and since—in other words, when new contracts came out, [fol. 3188] the supervisors were the fellows that were asked whether it was salable; they had control of it. There wasn't anybody in the home office—they didn't know "boo" about it.

Q. You didn't do any actuarial work on it?

A. I didn't do any of the mathematical equation work, no.

Q. What did you have to do with the investment policy of Fidelity?

A. Not a thing.

Q. What did you have to do with the investment policy of Franklin?

A. I have nothing to do with the policy. That is established and on record by the State law and the State requirements, and they certainly didn't change that because they found me.

Q. And you have made no changes in investment practices or policies or conditions at Franklin since you went there?

A. I am afraid I haven't.

Q. Did I understand you to say that the reason face amount certificates would not or could not be sold under the Investment Act of 1940 was because the loading charge was only seven cents out of each dollar paid in by the contract purchaser?

[fols. 3189-3202] A. I said the loading charge was too low, and I referred to the seven per cent of the net deposits of the purchaser, which you will find in the law, if you examine it.

Q. Do you mean by that, that only seven cents out of every dollar which the buyer pays to the company can be used for loading, and that seven cents out of every dollar paid in by the buyer is too small to carry on the business?

A. That is exactly what I mean.

Q. Do you want to make any explanation or any amplification of the answer you have just given?

A. I don't think so.

[fol. 3203] RICKARD H. LAURITZEN, called as a witness, having been first duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Palmer:

Q. State your name, please.
A. Rickard H. Lauritzen.
Q. Your residence, please?
A. Madison, Wisconsin.
Q. Your occupation or profession?
A. Attorney.
Q. What, if any, official position do you hold with the State of Wisconsin?
A. Senior Assistant Attorney-General.
Q. How long have you held that position?
A. Since March of 1939.
Q. Do you know Mr. James Fleming, the attorney for the debtor?
A. I met Mr. Fleming.
[fol. 3204] Q. And do you know Mr. Allen Messick, Chairman of the Board of Fidelity?
A. I have met Mr. Messick.
Q. During the early part of June 1941, state whether Mr. Messick and Mr. Fleming came to the State of Wisconsin, and in your official capacity, you had a conference with them.
A. They did and I did.
Q. Who else was present at that meeting?
A. Mr. Allen Pflugradt, Chairman of the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, and Robert Reiser of Madison, attorney for Fidelity Assurance Association.
Q. Will you tell the Court what was said at that conference?
Mr. Ray: We object, your Honor.
Mr. Palmer: I was asking the witness to tell the Court what was said at that conference.
The Court: Certainly everything said at that conference couldn't be said by the witness.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. What was stated by Mr. Messick and Mr. Fleming as to whom they represented, if anyone, and their purpose in holding the conference.

[fol. 3205] Mr. Ray: If it please your Honor, I object.

The Court: Overruled.

A. Mr. Fleming first stated that he represented the debtor with respect to the petition filed in this Court for reorganization, and Mr. Fleming and Mr. Messick both stated that they were authorized by the trustee to go out to the various states to ascertain what the attitude of state officials holding state deposits was with respect to those deposits.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Thereafter was the conversation general, but with reference to Fidelity and its deposit with the State of Wisconsin?

A. It was.

Q. Were you also present at a meeting held in the City of Chicago on Friday, June 13th, about which meeting Mr. Harlan Justice had previously testified?

A. I was—that was the next day.

Q. That was the day following the meeting in Wisconsin?

A. Yes.

Q. Will you tell the Court please what Mr. Fleming said, and first with reference to whom he represented, and secondly, as to his purpose in being there.

[fol. 3206] Mr. Ray: Let the record show another objection.

The Court: Mr. Palmer, was something said without the hearing of Mr. Justice?

Mr. Palmer: No. This is cumulative testimony.

The Court: If there is any controversy, I will permit the question; otherwise I don't see any use to put in this testimony.

Mr. Palmer: Of course, since the Auditor and West Virginia State Court officials are still presenting their case, we have no way of knowing whether or not Mr. Fleming or others will be called upon to rebut the testimony of Mr. Justice thereafter. We were putting in corroborating evidence because of our lack of knowledge.

The Court: Let us see if we can get any statement on the part of the debtor.

Mr. Ray: The debtor doesn't intend to put in any evidence in respect to that question. It doesn't deem it material to any fact.

The Court: Does anybody else intend to put in any evidence on this matter? If not, I sustain the objection on the ground that it is cumulative as to this particular meeting, and we have already had one witness testify [fols. 3207-3208] to that fully, and unless there was something that occurred without the presence of the other witness, I will sustain the objection.

Mr. Palmer: If the witness were permitted to testify he would in substance relate the same thing that Mr. Harlan Justice has related.

The Court: All right.

* * * * * * *

By Mr. Ray:

Q. Mr. Lauritzen, is it true that the principal object and the principal inquiries made by Mr. Fleming and Mr. Messick when they came to Wisconsin was with respect to the sale of securities by the officials of Wisconsin?

A. That was discussed, but other things as well. I can't say—I can't answer as to whether that was their principal object in coming there.

Q. Do you know that that was the matter, in their opinion, which was of primary importance?

A. I don't know, sir.

[fol. 3222] Raymond Latta called as a witness, having been first duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Palmer:

Q. Will you tell the Court your name.

A. Raymond Latta.

Q. Where do you live, Mr. Latta?

A. I live at Wheeling at the present time.

Q. And from what place were you summoned to come to this hearing?

A. Plymouth, Michigan.

Q. Were you there on a vacation or a visit?

[fol. 3223] A. Well, it's partially a visit, partially business.

Q. I believe you came here only in response to a subpoena and not voluntarily? Is that correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. Were you formerly employed by Fidelity Assurance Association?

A. Yes.

Q. For how long a period were you employed?

A. I started with Fidelity on February 12th 1941.

Q. And when did you terminate your employment with that company, either under receivership or trusteeship?

A. September 15th.

Q. Will you relate to the Court the schooling or education that you had, Mr. Latta.

A. I studied actuarial mathematics at the University of Michigan from 1929 to 1934.

Q. Actuarial mathematics?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I presume you were a high school graduate before that?

A. Yes.

Q. After that time did you go into that business?

[fol. 3224] A. Yes.

Q. Could you tell us with what firm you were employed?

A. Well, for a year I was with a life insurance company —1934 to 1935; then in the summer of 1935 until I came with Fidelity I was with a consulting actuarial firm.

Q. Do you care to give us the name?

A. Welch and Baird.

Q. Of what city?

A. Cleveland, Ohio.

Q. State in general what your duties were with that firm.

A. We did actuarial work for various life insurance organizations, and specializing in reorganization of life insurance organizations.

Q. Did you yourself take part or take any part in aiding in the reorganization plan of any life insurance company?

A. Yes.

Q. How many different ones, if you recall, did you take part in?

A. Well, if you take all reorganizations as a class, I would say approximately fifteen.

[fol. 3225] Q. And taking individual or specific ones, how many did you take part in actively? Would it be the same number?

A. Yes, the same number.

Q. Will you tell the Court just what part you took in those reorganization proceedings, and also what part your firm took, and what part was left to others, so that we can get just your background on that.

A. My work with the firm was the supervising of the actuarial work. The firm worked out the reorganization plans and in some instances made the calculations for the valuations determining the equities. I think the calculations would cover most of them, and the plans of reorganization.

Q. Will you tell us whether the reorganizations in which you took part were in any court proceedings or under proceedings of any authorities.

A. Yes; some of them were under court proceedings.

Q. Will you tell us, did you take part in any reorganization proceedings in which the state authorities had charge by statute of those reorganization proceedings.

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, he couldn't reorganize life insurance companies unless the state authorities were inter-[fol. 3226] ested.

Mr. Palmer: I have that in mind. My question was as, distinguished between the state statutory authorities and perhaps a state court proceeding; if there is such a distinction, I wanted to determine that matter.

Mr. Ray: If there was, it was a proposition which this witness couldn't do——

Mr. Palmer:

Q. I am asking whether you took part—is my question clear to you?

A. Restate it, please.

Q. Some life insurance reorganizations occur by virtue of creditors or other persons causing court proceedings to be instituted; some occur whereby the state authorities in charge of life insurance by statutes conduct or manage the reorganization proceedings. Now, I would like, if you could, for you to state if you have been in either or both of those types of reorganizations or taken a part therein.

A. Well, all of those I worked on, so far as I know, came under the jurisdiction of the state authorities. I can't go further on the question.

Q. Now where they were under the state authorities, how [fol. 3227] many of those fifty you mentioned would that apply to?

A. What was that, please?

Q. You said that you worked upon fifty——

A. Fifteen.

Q. Fifteen? Could you tell us how many of them necessarily included working with the statutory state officials of more than one state?

A. No, I don't believe I could state that.

Q. Were there some of them which included working only in the one state and some which included working in one state in connection with other states necessarily involved?

A. That is correct.

Q. In reference to those latter ones, were there more than one of those, that latter type of reorganization, upon which you worked?

A. Yes.

Q. With reference to those, what can you tell us as to whether the statutory officials of the state in which the life insurance had its home office or principal place of business were cooperated with by the statutory state officials in the other states in which the company did business?

[fol. 3228] Mr. Ray: We object to that.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, we are attempting to determine whether Fidelity could have been—whether the interests properly could have been subserved by State Court proceedings. If we show that in other kinds of somewhat similar proceedings, State Court officials did work and cooperate together to achieve the end, I think that would be a matter that your Honor would be interested in, or if the State Court officials did not cooperate together and the end result wasn't satisfactory. That's what I have in mind.

The Court: When we have evidence in this particular case that the State officials are not cooperative, it seems to me that testimony that in other reorganizations they were or were not cooperative is immaterial.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor would refresh my memory as to the evidence that they were not cooperating—I perhaps heard the evidence and don't recall.

The Court: They stated on the record——

Mr. Palmer: I realize that the debtor passed a resolution to that effect, but so far—— [fol. 3229] The Court: I mean these representatives here, one and all stated on the record that they were not prepared to say that they could cooperate with State Court proceedings. Some of them said they wouldn't cooperaete with it; others said thy didn't know. None of them, so far as I can recall, said that they would, unless on their own terms. Do you have any difference recollection?

Mr. Palmer: I don't recall the statement of anyone that said they would not cooperate with the West Virginia State officials.

The Court: They didn't state that in those exact terms, that they would not cooperate; but they made statements which the Court could not interpret in any other way.

Mr. Palmer: That is why I wanted this witness to explain, if he could, how the various states do work together, but each retains its own sovereignty and retains jurisdiction over its own funds—for that very purpose—to show where each state has its own deposit and each its own laws, how they do work together in insurance company reorganizations to reach a final result, that they frequently do—and if this witness is familiar with the mechanics of how that is done, I would like it explained to the Court [fol. 3230] and for that reason I think it is material.

The Court: I will let him answer the question as to what the State officials did in these cases.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Limiting my question as indicated by his Honor, Mr. Latta, would you tell us the mechanizations of how the various state statutory authorities worked together, if they would, to achieve an end result of a reorganization of a life insurance company with which you were familiar.

The Court: Your question is still objectionable, because you are bringing in the element of working together, whereas that element is not in this case.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Will you tell us how they did work?

A. As a rule, the state in which the company was incorporated held—you might say—held supreme; in other words, the other states left it up to that state primarily, because they first had to have their approval on any reorganization plan.

The Court: I will have to rule that out.

Mr. Palmer: I was going to ask a little further. Will your Honor permit me?

The Court: All right.

[fol. 3231] Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Latta, did the other states other than the home office state of the company turn over their deposits to the home state of the company or did they retain those in their own state?

A. I would have to qualify that statement. I have seen it both ways. I have seen them turned over after a a period of time, depending upon the working out of the plan. Then I have also seen them where they did not turn them over until forced; in other words, they didn't do it voluntarily.

Q. Prior to the adoption by the home office state of a definite plan of reorganization, did they ever in any case turn over the assets to the home office state?

A. I can't answer that question.

Q. Could you answer it generally or not?

Mr. Ray: If he can't answer, he can't answer.

A. It is not clear enough to me.

The Court: That is a question that can't be answered generally.

Mr. Palmer: You are right, your Honor.

Q. In the majority of cases that you worked on, what can you say as to that?

A. I don't think the number is sufficient to even answer [fol. 3232] that.

Q. What can you say as to whether or not there were conferences between the officials of the home office state and the statutory officials in other states leading to the working out or rejection of a plan by the home office state?

A. There were none to my knowledge.

Q. I beg your pardon?

A. On the plans I worked, none to my knowledge.

Q. After the home office state had worked out a plan, was it adopted by the other states or rejected by them in their discretion?

A. Yes.

Q. What can you say as to whether or not the majority of the states adopted the plan that had been proposed as satisfactory to the home office state?

A. I don't think I get that question clear enough.

Q. If a plan had been made by the home office state, it was then submitted, as I understand, to the officials—proper officials in the other states. Is that correct?

A. In some instances.

Q. In those instances, was it submitted to them for the purpose of agreeing to it or criticising it or rejecting it, or what was the purpose?

[fol. 3233] A. Depending upon whether the company wanted a license in that state, as a rule.

Q. If the company wanted to renew its license or a new license in that state, it was submitted to the officials in that state. Is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. And they went over the plan to find out as to whether it was a proper plan for use in their estate. Is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. If they determined it to be a proper plan for use in their state, they so informed the state of the home office; otherwise they informed them that it was not a proper plan.

(No answer.)

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I object to this line of testimony. It is too general to be of value.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Now, of the fifteen companies that you worked upon for reorganization, how many were successfully reorganized through state statutory proceedings?

A. I can't interpret that question exactly. It's too gen[fol. 3234] eral for me.

Q. You were working on fifteen companies, helping to try to reorganize them. Is that correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. At the time you left your employment, had reorganization been completed in any of those fifteen different reorganizations you had been working on?

A. Yes.

Q. How many of those had been completed?

A. Approximately twelve, I would say.

Q. Of the three remaining, were they still being worked upon, or had they been finished and been found to be impossible to reorganize?

A. I don't know that we can interpret reorganization—it's a rather broad statement. Reorganization, your Honor, to me means changing of a company's complete plans——

Mr. T. C. Townsend: We didn't hear that.

A. (Continuing.) Reorganization means changing of the company's complete plans, and possibly equities of the contracts involved. In some cases, some reorganization plans require years to work out, or at least to tell the tale. To say whether one is successful or not is rather a broad [fol. 3235] statement, unless defined. If you define what you mean I might——

Mr. Palmer: I understand what you mean.

Q. Had your work been completed in those other three in the company with which you worked?

A. Yes.

Q. And was the plan upon which you had worked being put into effect and operation?

A. Yes.

Q. On any of the companies that you ever worked—and I am speaking of life insurance companies—towards their reorganization, was it ever found to be impossible to effectuate a plan or method of operation?

A. That is rather broad.

Q. Sir?

A. That's rather broad.

Q. Will you narrow it as much as you wish and tell us how you are narrowing it before you answer.

A. Before a plan is put in effect, it is pretty well laid out.

Q. Yes.

A. (Continuing.) And, on the contrary, if the plan isn't, [fol. 3236] we probably didn't work on it; we couldn't have worked out a plan if it hadn't been put into effect. When we entered the work, some of those things probably had already been determined.

Q. Now, of the fifteen companies that you worked actively upon, and particularly the twelve that you say were more or less completed, how many of those twelve became operating companies again in the sense that either due to themselves or to someone taking them over, they kept on going in the life insurance field?

A. Your question—one part contradicts the other. If they are turned over they don't keep on going.

Q. The company itself does not?

A. No.

Q. That part of it which was a part of the new company is being operated. Is that correct?

A. That's correct; that's it. If they are turned over, the equities are preserved up to that date, but they don't continue to operate as a company, so I can't answer your first question for that reason.

Q. Mr. Latta, would you explain to us the mechanics, if it isn't too broad again, of attempting to reorganize a life [fol. 3237] insurance company; what is involved and what you must look for and what you must attempt to do.

Mr. Ray: That's going too far afield.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, that is preliminary to later questions so that the Court and counsel will understand the definition of terms that may later be inquired about.

The Court: I think we understand it. If we don't we will ask you about it and we will bring it up at that time.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Of those twelve companies of which you have been speaking, how many were put upon or attempted to be put on a plan whereby the company itself would be rehabilitated into a new company, and how many were put into the category of a new company absorbing it?

Mr. Ray: I think we have heard enough about those twelve insurance companies. We don't know what their problems were, what the conditions were. There is nothing to show that the conditions were like conditions in connection with this company. What we are interested in is the jurisdiction of this Court to reorganize Fidelity, but not [fol. 3238] about what this witness did with some twelve companies from 1935 to 1941. We admit he is an actuary, and he has had broad experience. Let's get down to the jurisdiction of this Court in connection with Fidelity.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Palmer: Will you read the question.

(The question was read.)

A. I can't answer that question. There are too many phases that I would have to discriminate in order to answer that question.

Q. Were there some in each category?

A. You might say if you have twelve companies you might have twelve categories.

Q. Now, did you make a study of Fidelity after you came to Wheeling?

A. I studied phases of it.

Q. And what phases of it did you study?

A. That's a rather broad——

Q. What is that?

A. That is a rather broad question.

Q. Did you study them from an actuarial end?

A. Some of them, yes.

Q. What else did you study?

[fol. 3239] A. Some of the financial statements—phases of the statements; some of the contracts—some phases of the contracts.

Q. Did you study any selling ends at all?

A. Very little.

Q. Did you study the investment end of it?

A. Very little.

Q. What was the purpose of your study?

A. At various times, the phase of determining the condition of the company. It changed very often—the purposes were changed very often due to the status of the company.

Q. Were you also attempting to make a study to see if Fidelity could be rehabilitated?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you formulate either roughly or fully any plans or ideas as to how far Fidelity could be rehabilitated?

A. I formulated some general ideas. I couldn't say plans—no.

Q. Did you formulate or attempt to formulate any plans whereby Fidelity would be rehabilitated or could be started again solely as a face amount certificate company?

[fol. 3240] Mr. Huwe: I object. His testimony has been that he formulated general ideas, and couldn't say they were plans. That question infers that he went further and formulated plans.

The Court: Mr. Palmer, you are asking him now whether, according to his plan, his idea—whatever you may call it, it was possible to rehabilitate Fidelity solely as a face amount certificate company?

Mr. Palmer: Yes.

The Court: What pertinancy do you think that sort of exclusive question has here? Is it your idea that the only way Fidelity can be reorganized under Chapter 10 is to reorganize it solely and only as a face amount certificate company?

Mr. Palmer: No, your Honor. My idea is that Fidelity can never be reorganized solely as a face amount certificate company, and I want to show, so we can get that feature out of the road—and then investigate the possibilities of some plan that might be possible.

The Court: That might be pertinent at some later date; but now the narrow question is whether it would be reasonable to suppose that if it were reorganized, it could be re-[fol. 3241] organized at all, whatever may be the means or methods.

Mr. Palmer: In my examination I am attempting to investigate that by breaking it into the various categories in which it is possible theoretically to reorganize it, and examine each one to see whether, as the Court has suggested, it is possible to be reorganized at all; then, if need be, we can take them into groups. To get up to that idea, you must take it into the common or basic categories in which Fidelity could ever operate in again. We can exclude, for instance, tht Fidelity could be reorganized to make fire engines or airplanes. Then as to the question of whether Fidelity could be reorganized as a bank, that is too far afield. Then we come to a face amount certificate company that would sell term life insurance, a company that would sell a combination of various life insurance. In order to test the idea whether it can be reorganized at all, it has been my idea that we should take each of the various categories and see if it could be put into that category solely.

The Court: With that understanding, go ahead.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Did you investigate or attempt to determine whether [fol. 3242] Fidelity could be reorganized solely as a face amount securities company?

Mr. Ray: I don't think he is qualified as having sufficient experience with face amount certificate companies and with all the phases of such a company, and with all the statutes which regulate such a company, to be able to make such a study.

The Court: It seems to me that so far, his qualifications have been limited in his examination to familiarity with a reorganization of insurance companies.

Mr. Palmer: My question was only to ask him if he had made any investigation into that possibility. I don't know that he has made it.

The Court: Unless he is qualified in the first place, then whether he made an investigation would be immaterial, because anyone of a number of persons you may bring here might have made an investigation; still, that wouldn't make his testimony relevant.

Mr. Palmer: Let me see if I can understand the position that the attorney for the debtor has taken. This morning he objected to asking the witness questions about a face amount certificate company because the man wasn't an actuary, and now we bring in an actuary, and he says we [fol. 3243] shouldn't ask an actuary questions about a face amount certificate company. May I ask whom we should bring here? Various directors of the company who had no actuarial experience? Mr. Burt, who had no selling experience and testified in full how easily the company could be reorganized? Men of that sort?

Mr. Ray: Mr. Burt was president of this company for a great many years. It would be presumed he should be familiar with every phase of it. I think Mr. Palmer would have been, and I might have been.

The Court: When an objection is made, I feel compelled to rule on it, but I think the law requires, and I believe this witness ought to be qualified as to some familiarity with face amount certificate companies before we proceed along that line.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Latta, have you studied and did you become familiar in you work with what are known as face amount certificate companies, such as Fidelity had been?

A. Phases of it, yes.

Q. Which phases of it?

A. The mathematical phases.

Q. Speaking from the mathematical end of it only then, [fol. 3244] did you investigate or did you attempt to ascertain whether Fidelity could be reorganized as a face amount securities company purely from a mathematical viewpoint?

Mr. Ray: I submit that that doesn't qualify him.

The Court: It depends on what Mr. Palmer means by "purely from a mathematical viewpoint." Do you mean by that, whether any actuarial plan could be figured out whereby a face amount securities company could operate?

Mr. Palmer: I was asking if he had considered that or thought about it. I haven't even come to the question that Mr. Ray is objecting to. I don't know the answer to that yet.

The Court: Will you read the question.

(The question was read.)

The Court: The question was as to the meaning of reorganization. That is a broad term and pursues in the Court's mind, for purposes here, the actual operation of the company after it is set up. If that question is limited to simply a consideration of whether or not a mathematical an dactuarial basis can be arrived at for such a company to proceed on, then it is all right.

Mr. Palmer: I think your Honor is right. If your Honor will hear the question read again—if he made any investi- [fol. 3245] gations; my question is to find out what he did himself towards investigating these conditions.

The Court: All right; I will let him answer the question.

(The question was read.)

The Court: Answer that Yes or No.

A. With the word "reorganization" there, I can't answer the question—with the word "reorganization."

Mr. Palmer: Strike the word "reorganization" from it then.

Mr. Jaegerman: Then you don't have any question.

Witness: Pertaining to reorganization—it is too broad.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Did you investigate or make an attempt to find out about face amount securities as sold by Fidelity, from a mathematical viewpoint?

The Court: I didn't hear that question.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I object. Read the question for the Court.

(The question was read.)

The Court: I overrule the objection.

A. Face amount securities? You mean contracts?

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Face amount certificates.

[fol. 3246] A. Yes, I investigated them.

Q. Did you make a study of Fidelity with the view in mind of the possible transformation of Fidelity into a life insurance company?

A. In general—yes.

Q. Did you make a study of Fidelity, in general, with a view of an attempt to rehabilitate that company into a going concern?

A. Yes.

Q. Will you tell the Court generally what you did along those lines?

A. My work along those lines was in collaboration with certain other officers in a plan that they had instigated, and it only dealt with the handling of equities of the contract holders.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I didn't hear that. Will you read the answer, please.

(The answer was read.)

Mr. Palmer:

Q. This work was then with the equities of the contract holders? Is that correct?

A. That is correct—limited to this plan that we first talked about.

[fol. 3247] Q. Yes. Now, what did you do with reference to ascertaining what could be performed with the equities of the contract holders?

A. That's too broad.

Q. Will you tell us what you did with reference to that particular phase of your work?

Mr. Ray: I don't think that is pertinent.

The Court: Overruled.

A. I can't answer that question.

The Court: Can't you explain what you did? That is what he is asking now—what you did.

Witness: To this plan?

The Court: The question is what you did with reference to any examination of the equities of the contract holders in framing any plan as a result thereof, or any skeleton of a plan, or ideas for a plan.

Witness: There were very many skeletons made, and as I said, my work was only in collaboration in connection with how the equities—whatever they may be—could be used in applying toward the life insurance annuity contract.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Did you attempt to work those equities of the contract holders into any form or plan for face amount certifi-[fol. 3248] cates?

A. No.

Mr. Huwe: I thought he said life insurance annuities.

The Court: He did.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. I hand you herewith two volumes, one marked "Uniform Plan," and one "Graduated Plan," and ask you if you have seen those before?

A. (Examining books:) I have seen parts of them, yes.

Mr. Palmer: Will you mark these for identification, please.

Exhibits 111 and 112

The books referred to were marked for identification respectively as above indicated.

Mr. Ray: I am going to object to the use of these because they are dated before this actuary became connected with the company.

The Court: Let me take a look at them. (The reporter handed Exhibits 111 and 112 for identification to the Court.)

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I would like to find out where these files came from. May I ask, Mr. Palmer, where did you get them?

Mr. Palmer: I think it will be disclosed in proper [fol. 3249] time.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: From the legal files of Fidelity?

Mr. Palmer: I said, I think it will be disclosed at the proper time.

Mr. Ray: Now is the proper time.

The Court: Before ruling on the admission of these, have you offered them?

Mr. Palmer: No, sir. There was an objection to my using them.

The Court: You have had them marked for identification. Are you going to ask a question about it?

Mr. Palmer: Yes, sir.

The Court: Ask your question and see if there is any objection to it.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Handing you first Exhibit for identification No. 111, will you tell us with what parts of that you are familiar?

A. (Examining exhibit:) I am not familiar with any of the details of this particularly, except this is the part, as I recall—it is a plan in which, as I stated before, that I went into and helped collaborate with upon the plans of any equity—whatever it may be. I made a statement similar [fol. 3250] to that effect.

Q. And the same statement applies to both plans?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, let me ask you this, as a general question: Is it true that the equities of the contract holders of Series A, B, and D were in proportion much greater than the equities of the contract holders of the older series of contracts?

A. What do you mean by "equities"?

Q. The same thing you do, I hope.

A. I don't understand the question, I am sorry.

Q. You spoke of equities——

The Court: Do you mean greater in proportion to 100%?

Mr. Palmer: Yes, your Honor.

A. They have a higher percentage of equity, yes; as far as the solvency of the company, the general statements show that the A, B, and D—the degree of solvency is much higher.

Q. In working out any procedure or plan having to do with the equities of the contract holders, tell the Court whether or not the fact of that unequalness of the equities in proportion to solvency of the company was a barrier or hazard that was blocking your efforts.

[fol. 3251] A. In this plan, you mean?

Q. In this or any other plan.

A. I thought you were speaking of these. That's a question we didn't know the answer to.

Q. It was a hurdle that you didn't know how to get over. Is that right?

A. As far as the exact equities, their percentage have never been determined. Various estimates have been made, but no——

Q. Did you ever attempt to find those exact equities?

A. I have worked towards them roughly.

The Court: In any reorganization, whether of this kind of company or a life insurance company, don't you ordinarily find that different creditors or policy holders or contract holders have different equities, and some of them are more nearly 100% than others?

A. Well, as far as life insurance, the only place I found that where it varied between any two contract holders, in life insurance, the only place I found that it varied was in the fraternal life insurance company.

The Court: Have you reorganized some of those?

A. That is the only place you have a general fund—a [fol. 3252] life insurance company—just one fund.

The Court: If these varying equities are determined by a Court having the power or authority to do so, then it becomes comparatively simple to work them into a plan, isn't it?

A. Yes, as far as handling—handling of the equities and use of the equities—you can figure out the equities, whether it is one dollar or one thousand or one hundred per cent.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. In any attempt, however, to rehabilitate the company before there were receivership proceedings, the fact that, let us say, the B fund had a 95% equity and the special annuity had, let us say, a 25% equity, was a difficult matter to work out. Wasn't that true? I mean, as a practical matter?

A. My experience there was they never determined what amounts each fund had. As far as working out a plan is concerned, it offered problems to what we were working toward, because we had no assumptions to make toward determining the equity of each fund.

Q. Let me develop that a little more fully. You attempted to find out how much equity or cash against liability each [fol. 3253] policy holder of each series of contracts would have. Is that correct—roughly?

A. Worked out statements of that nature revealing information of that nature, with innumerable assumptions made.

Q. What was that?

A. We tried to develop figures along that nature, with—making innumerable assumptions—a number of them, I mean.

Q. Part of the trouble was that you had loans between funds and transactions between funds and as shown by the books of the company. Isn't that true?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you would have to assume in some instances that the loan would be paid back by one fund to the other fund before you would work on it. Isn't that right?

A. We made various assumptions.

Q. Yes. That was one of the assumptions you made.

A. Yes.

Q. And in other assumptions, you just took the reserve as shown by the books of the company as belonging to that fund, without paying back any of its loans in other funds and worked on that assumption.

[fol. 3254] A. We made various assumptions along that line; yes.

Q. You had no way, prior to receivership proceedings being brought, of determining which of your assumptions would be lawfully and legally correct?

A. Did you put a date in there? I can't answer that with a date.

Q. You had no way of determining that any of your assumptions was lawfully and legally correct?

A. I haven't heard the answer as yet, if that is what you mean.

Q. By that you mean the answer to the question is that you had no way of determining it?

A. That's right.

Q. Now, with what other officers of the company did you work?

A. I worked with the president, vice-president and secretary, chairman of the board, and other vice-presidents.

Q. Did you work any with the firm of Koontz & Koontz, or any of the members thereof?

A. On a plan?

Q. Yes.

A. No.

[fol. 3255] Q. Did you submit any plans to them after you had finished, or did you discuss with them any ideas?

A. I discussed some ideas with Mr. Thomas, who was the receiver.

Q. Prior to receivership, it has been testified here that you and Mr. Tom Foulk and Mr. Risley attended a conference in Mr. Koontz' office.

A. We discussed some phases of reorganization.

Q. At that time had you achieved any plan which could have been presented to contract holders?

A. No.

The Court: He says he hasn't yet, Mr. Palmer.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Did you have tentative ideas or workings on which you hoped that a plan might be built at the time you had a conference in Mr. Koontz' office?

A. We had some ideas that we hoped might work out—yes.

Q. Now, these two volumes which I have handed to you, Exhibit 111 and 112, can you tell us whether or not they were prepared as tentative or rough working plans upon which it was hoped that a plan could be worked out?

A. It was rough work, is my understanding. These were drawn up by various officers of the company to be [fol. 3256] presented to the S.E.C. in a hearing held there on April first to discuss the rough ideas of a plan that might work out.

Q. These were not thought to be nor meant to be any finished product or plan?

A. No. That is my understanding.

Q. Yes. They were merely ground work upon which it was hoped that ideas could be based to build a finished plan?

A. That's correct.

Q. Can you tell us, if you know, where the figures used here in both of these Exhibits 111 and 112 came from?

A. I didn't see the figures in there before they were bound in the volumes.

Q. Will you tell us, can you point out what, if any, particular parts of it you worked upon?

A. I testified before that I only collaborated.

Q. Yes. Well, excuse me. Can you tell us upon——

A. By collaborating I mean discussing with the officers as to what—as to the phase discussed in there.

Q. In other words, there wouldn't be any particular part that you could say, "I worked with the president in pre-[fol. 3257] paring this particular page" or something like that?

A. No.

Q. It would be a joint or group work of yourself and a number of officers in collaboration and discussion of ideas, and these would be the rough setting down of the joint thought?

A. That's correct.

Mr. Palmer: With that thought in mind, your Honor, I believe they became relevant to be offered in evidence now for that purpose only, and not that they represent the facts or figures set out there are correct, but only to show a—what the witness has called it—rough working sketch or outline jointly contributed to by the various officers; as I say, not for the purpose of showing that any of the figures or tables represent correct figures or purport to.

The Court: Is there any objection to the offer of these two booklets?

Mr. Huwe: Your Honor, we object and will say that only the parts which Mr. Latta can particularly point out as his contribution should be admitted and not generally.

Mr. Ray: It's quite hard to know what to say about a thing of that kind before you know what is in it.

[fol. 3258] The Court: As I understand it, the offer is for the purpose of showing that there was a plan, or maybe more than one plan, of reorganization being considered prior to receivership, and that these booklets outline the plans that were being considered.

Mr. Palmer: There were two different plans which handled the equities of the contract holders in different respects. Am I correct in my distinction of that, Mr. Latta—uniform and graduated plans? Each handled——

Q. You mean handling or allocating?

Mr. Palmer: Allocating equities.

A. Yes.

Mr. Ray: I am inclined to think that they are relevant.

Mr. Jaegerman: If I understand Mr. Palmer's offer, it is hardly necessary to have them in—just to show that there was a plan considered.

The Court: Then this is the plan.

Mr. Jaegerman: Do you offer it for its contents?

Mr. Palmer: To a limited extent. I am not offering that the figures are correct or that they represent the accurate figures of what they purport to represent.

The Court: I will permit them to go in.

[fol. 3259] Exhibits 111 and 112

The books referred to were admitted in evidence, having been previously marked, respectively, as above indicated. The same are attached hereto as a part hereof.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Now, Mr. Latta, you recall that the state receivership proceedings were brought on April 11th, 1941?

A. Approximately that date, yes.

Q. And you further recall, do you not, that Mr. Ross Thomas and Mr. Isaiah Smith were appointed State Court receivers?

A. Yes.

Q. And you were an employee under that receivership?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you continue the work which you had been doing prior to receivership in attempting to work out the equities and the allocation of them towards the general idea of preparing a plan of rehabilitation of Fidelity either yourself or in collaboration with others?

A. Yes. We took some steps along that line—yes.

Q. Did you go so far as to put into a rough plan some of your ideas in that regard? (Handing paper to witness.) [fol. 3260] A. Examining paper:) This doesn't apply, in my opinion, to the last question.

Q. To what does this paper which I have just handed you apply?

A. That applies to a memorandum on ideas that might be applied to some plan of reorganization of Fidelity under the State Court. The last question, as I recall it, referred to equities.

Mr. Palmer: I would like this marked for identification.

Exhibit 113

The paper referred to was marked for identification as above indicated.

The Court: May I see that, please.

(Mr. Palmer hands exhibit to the Court.)

The Court: From my brief examination of this paper that you handed me, I presume that you are undertaking to show that there was a plan being developed under the receivership which had some fair possibilities in it. Now, you have also taken the position, as I understand it through this litigation, that for the purposes of good faith of this petition, there is no feasible plan of reorganization under [fol. 3261] Chapter 10. To proceed with this, I would like you to develop, if you can, any reasons why there would be a feasible plan under the state procedure and none under Federal procedure.

Mr. Palmer: I had that intention with this witness to develop that. Might I also state that I think, as stated before on the record, that it is the opinion of myself as counsel that while a life insurance plan is feasible in the State Court, it is not feasible in the Federal Court because of my own personal view of the law that this Court cannot reorganize Fidelity into or keep it as an insurance company for the reason that I think this Court has no jurisdiction to give birth or to help grow an insurance company where it cannot bring it its demise or obsequies.

The Court: You think that because this Court can't be an undertaker, it can't be an obstetrician?

[fol. 3262] Mr. Palmer: We would like to introduce this Exhibit 113 in evidence for the same purpose that the others were introduced.

The Court: It may be admitted.

Exhibit 113.

The paper referred to, having previously been marked as above indicated, was admitted in evidence. The same is attached hereto as a part hereof.

Mr. Palmer: Exhibit 111 and 112 apparently show that some of these figures were prepared prior to your coming to Fidelity. Will you tell the Court about that, why they appear to be that way, and whether this is the actual thing that you worked on.

[fols. 3263-3264] A. They are the plans, as I say—not working on—but I collaborated on; the figures that were explained to me were based upon statements that were prepared as of December 31st. The plans, as I recall, were brought together some time during the month of March, but the figures were on the basis of some statement prepared as of December 31st, of which I took no part in.

[fols. 3265-3269] Q. From your experience and study, Mr. Latta, if there had been a rehabilitation of another face amount securities company through statutory or court proceedings, would you have known of that fact, of the conversion?

A. Not unless it was converted into a life insurance company; otherwise I would have no reason to pay much attention to it.

Q. Do you know of any such conversion into a life insurance company?

A. I don't know of any, no.

[fol. 3270] Mr. Palmer: I will make an offer. When the witness conversed with me, he expressed the opinion that [fol. 3271] this company could not be rehabilitated in the Federal Court because he knew generally of the mail sent to contract holders, particularly the older series, and it had been returned because the person was either dead or was not able to be located, and that returned mail was in such a proportion to indigate that two-thirds of the contract holders, particularly the older series, could not express their desires one way or the other.

Mr. Jaegerman: I think Mr. Palmer knows that under the Act, it is two-thirds of the creditors who filed their claim; if they aren't located to file their claims——

Mr. Palmer: I know; what I wanted to make was an offer into the record, and I have made that offer.

Mr. Huwe: I move that it be stricken on the ground that it involves a conclusion of law for which this man is not equipped to give such an opinion to Mr. Palmer, to be second-handedly prof-erred into the record.

The Court: It has already been stricken, but I will permit it to be proffered on the record.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Latta, is it not true that before it can be determined whether or not any plan can be made, that the first thing that must be ascertained by any Court is the equity [fol. 3272] of each contract holder.

The Court: That question is objectionable because it calls for an opinion on the part of the witness as to what the Court would be required to do. He is not qualified as to that.

Mr. Palmer: This is as to a practical matter, not as to a legal matter.

The Court: You asked what it was necessary for the Court to do as prerequisite to a plan.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Before any plan can be attempted to be formulated by anyone, is it not true that the exact amount of the assets of the company would have to be ascertained?

A. No, I don't think so.

Q. You would have to obtain approximately the exact amount of the assets of the company?

A. Before any specific plan applying to contract holders—naturally you would have to determine the amount of equity that had to be applied to the plan.

Mr. Palmer: That is what I am getting at.

Mr. Ray: You wouldn't have to determine what they had at all under any circumstances.

[fol. 3273] (There was a discussion off the record.)

Mr. Palmer: So that the first step will necessarily be to determine approximately the assets? Is that correct, Mr. Latta?

A. I don't know what you mean—first step. That would have to be done before you could offer something definitely to the contract holder. I don't see that that would be the first step toward a reorganization plan. "Reorganization plan" is a rather broad term. It is like speaking of the whole government.

Q. Then you would have to ascertain the equity of each contract holder in the assets? Is that true—that would have to be determined?

A. Will you restate that, please.

Q. You would have to ascertain the equity of each contract holder in the assets of the company? Isn't that true?

A. It is part of the plan, in my opinion. You would have to do that before you could apply any equities to the plan; that depends on your definition of a plan.

Q. Now, in Fidelity, is it not true that you have questions—I am not stating that you may know the answers [fol. 3274] to or that you may not—but you have questions which involve the various series of contracts, and the relationship of the contract holders of each series to the other, as you have previously explained. Isn't that true?

A. That I have explained?

Q. I am sorry; I don't hear you.

A. You say, that I have explained?

Q. Yes. Didn't you explain that?

A. You are talking about the solvency of each fund?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes, so far as—as far as mathematically speaking, you cannot determine the exact solvency of any fund due to the problems that are presented, you might say.

Q. Isn't it true that until there has been a decision of law, there arises a problem concerning the deposit of each state as regards to the contract holders of that state?

A. I can only answer that broadly, and that is, that naturally anything that an actuary can work out is only an assumption. So far, no definite answer has been given to me whether the location of assets mean anything, or how to consider them in making a statement. It has all been in a memorandum form.

[fol. 3275] Q. If it should be determined by a judicial body or proceedings that all of the assets could be put into one jackpot and divided among the contract holders in proportion to their own claim, you would have one method of calculating, whereas if you determine it according to series claims, there would be a different method of determination. Is that correct?

A. Naturally, if you consider each fund separately, it would be different from considering all funds in one jackpot.

Q. If besides that, you considered that in each state the state depository fund bore a different degree of solvency to that of every other state, if it should be held that each of those state depositories is a separate fund, that would again complicate your problem to that greater extent. Isn't that true?

A. Naturally you would have different categories, if you take into consideration the various state deposits.

Q. And no actuary could work out a plan until those questions had been legally determined. Isn't that true?

A. A plan would mean nothing with only assumptions. We have made assumptions. Naturally we have had no [fol. 3276] answers—as I have stated several times.

Q. You would need a legal determination of those questions that I have been discussing with you just recently before you could actually put some base under your assumption?

A. Yes.

The Court: I believe Mr. Palmer may not have understood the witness in some of his previous testimony. I understood him to say that there is a difference between devising a plan and then working out that plan, and that it is possible to devise a plan even before the equities are determined or the legal principles relative to the various funds are determined, but that before the plan is put into operation, they would have to be determined. Is that correct?

A. Yes.

Mr. Palmer;

Q. And it is further true, is it not, that in order to help a person to determine whether they would like that plan, you would have to solve these difficulties that I have been talking about in order to let them know whether they were getting 100% or 50% equity. Isn't that correct?

The Court: That is a legal conclusion to be determined [fol. 3277] by the Court.

Mr. Palmer: I suppose it probably speaks for itself.

Q. In the various ways of determining equity—you would have to work them out in their various funds in order to let each contract holder see how he would stand in reference to any particular fund before he could determine whether he would like that plan?

The Court: That's obvious.

A. Yes.

The Court: The distinction that is in my mind—if you want to clear me up I would like you to do it—the distinction is that there may be a plan, and a feasible plan, under the contemplation of Chapter 10, and yet at the same time, we may not know in advance what the equities of the various contract holders are, but the equities, when determined, can be fitted into the plan that is already there.

Mr. Palmer: With this exception: There can be a plan, but I doubt whether there can be a feasible plan in view of what I have been saying, because the Court would be unable to determine whether the plan would give any likelihood of being accepted, for if the old series of contracts [fol. 3278] were going to get nothing back, and A, B, and D were to get 100%, the Court would very probably know that the holders who were going to get nothing would say they refuse any plan whereby the A, B, and D series were entitled to get 100% back; but on the contrary, if the plan indicated that they get back 80% as well as the old series were to get 80%, then the holders of A, B, and D might be said to say that they would refuse that until that was determined—so that with the exception of the question of feasibility, I believe your Honor is right that a plan can be worked before the equities are determined; but until the equities are determined, it is impossible to say it is feasible, because as I understand feasible—it means acceptable and workable—with the equity holders.

The Court: This Court has already indicated that there wouldn't be any plan considered at all except one that would give each contract holder his full equity. Now then, if the contract holder or group of them were advised that it had been decided his equity was 80% or 100%—now here is the plan into which this equity of 80% or 100% is fitted—then it just seems to me at this stage that there wouldn't be any question there as to whether or not that contract holder [fol. 3279] would accept or refuse that plan on any ground, because when it is presented to him, he knows what equity the Court has determined he is entitled to—then it seems to me that this question that you are bringing in has no place.

Mr. Palmer: Let me explain it this way, your Honor, more practically. One of the two older series owes another series certain money, evidenced by a note. Now suppose the Court would hold that the series which owes the money—the contract holders of that series were entitled or had a lien on that part itself. They didn't have to pay back that note, but that the other series just came in as a general creditor behind those contract holders. Now, in that case, it would mean that the holders of contracts in that fund would get about thirty to fifty cents on the dollar, and the fund to which the money was owed would get, say, eighty to ninety cents on the dollar. Now if, on the contrary, the Court would determine, as a matter of law, that the fund which owed the money should pay it back first, then the holders of the fund that owed the money would get nothing at all, and the holders of the fund into which the money would be paid would get one hundred cents on the dollar. Those [fol. 3280] getting nothing would reject such a plan.

The Court: Suppose the Court would say, would you approve of a plan or reorganization under which you get 80% or would you prefer to have the entire matter liquidated.

Mr. Palmer: Now, in answer to that, in the first case, where the contract holder got 80% by reason of the fund not being repaid to it later in the series—the B fund—then that contract holder will say, "I am only going to get 80%. I might as well take a chance on that 80%, and it might work out." If the Court says, "I will require that fund be paid back," and the man says, "I am going to get 100%. I am going to get it out now, because I have one hundred cents on the dollar and will keep it, rather than gamble on a new company; but if I am only going to get eighty cents or ninety cents, I may take a chance on getting more, although I realize the Court will give me everything I am entitled to."

The Court: Suppose the Court should approve of a plan of paying off, and going ahead with some reorganization and then continuing with the other?

Mr. Palmer: Then we would be back to the State Court [fol. 3281] because if two-thirds of these groups don't agree to the plan, and the plan merely says we are going to liquidate——

The Court: It depends on what you call "groups."

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I have contended from the start, if the Court is going to say, "Fifty per cent of you can get paid off in cash—now take the other fifty per cent into reorganization"—that that's what we could have done and intend to do in the State Court; and that is what this Court isn't permitted to do, and one of the reasons I object to the Federal Court jurisdiction. Two-thirds of the group must agree to the plan. If fifty per cent say, "We want cash," and whoever is in charge says, "We will give you cash," and the other fifty per cent says, "We are willing to reorganize"—that is what we could do in the State Court, and I don't believe this Court——

The Court: Who is going to say who composes the various groups?

Mr. Palmer: Some judicial body or personage will have to make that decision.

The Court: That's what I thought.

Mr. Palmer: Whether that would be this Court or some other Court, it will have to be a determination whether [fols. 3282-3295] it shall be the series groups—117 groups, considering state lines and series—or one entire group; but still, you must have two-thirds of that group, and our contention is that if in the State Court you get 50%, you can pay those off and go on with the rest of the group, but in this Court, you can't do that, and that is one of our bases of opposition to the debtor's petition.

The Court: I didn't mean to start an argument.

Mr. Palmer: I didn't mean to make a speech on our position.

Mr. Jaegerman: I want to say that I can't agree with Mr. Palmer's interpretation of the statute with reference to the plan.

Mr. Palmer: Why don't you say you prefer the Federal Court, and so state it?

The Court: I don't think it matters which one either one of you prefer.

. . . . . .

[fol. 3296] Q. Can any life insurance company continue in existence that remains static and does not sell any policies?

Mr. Ray: I object to that, your Honor.

The Court: Overruled.

A. You mean by remaining static they do not sell any policies?

Mr. Palmer: Yes.

A. The company can't remain static and not sell policies.

Q. That's my question. If they don't sell policies.

A. If a company doesn't sell policies, they are under a [fols. 3297-3299] voluntary—they are naturally liquidating; they are not liquidating as far as assets are concerned, but liquidating as far as contracts are concerned, so far as volume of business is concerned. Theoretically a life insurance company is supposed to be able to liquidate; in one sense of the word, the figures are set up that they could liquidate down to the last person, but by that theory it is overlooked the fact that life insurance is made upon large numbers, and when a company is going down and liquidating and getting down to a few numbers, you have no average set, because you are referring to the specific case; therefore a mortality table means nothing when you are talking about a few individuals. It can only be applied to a large group.

Q. Therefore you must keep that large group to keep this law of averages working?

A. You must have a large enough number. The practical thing is that a company that does not get new business does not have new rates upon which they have policy holders which have been newly examined. If you take a specific group of policy holders that were examined years ago, the mortality may exceed 100%, while those that have been newly examined have been as low as eight to ten to twelve per cent.

[fol. 3300] Q. Now, can you tell me from your experience in the actuarial field if it isn't true that life insurance companies generally have lost money on annuities due, in part, to the fact that very healthy persons seem to desire the life annuities, and the mortality table has been very different from the mortality table for death under life insurance?

A. Well, as stated before, the result is exactly the opposite as life insurance. I might answer it this way. For years and years they have studied life insurance and established records in statisties on that, while life annuities have not been issued and a study has not been made for that for a sufficient period of time under the present conditions [fols. 3301-3303] in order for you to even know too much about it.

Q. And haven't you had to disassociate the mortality table for life insurance from the mortality table for annuity?

A. As a rule, a different table is used.

Q. And hasn't the annuity table been continually changing in the last few years—that is, the table used by the companies?

A. Companies—some companies keep changing the table they use, is how I might answer that.

Q. And isn't it true, or if you don't know, please so state—that because of the apparently erroneous calculations made by the companies, that they have—as it is called—lost money by virtue of the annuity table as contrasted with making a profit by virtue of the mortality table used in life insurance?

A. Well, it is the general consensus that money is being lost.

Q. By all of the insurance companies?

A. Not all of them—in general, I would say.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 3304] Q. With reference to Exhibits 111 and 112, can you tell us briefly what the difference is between the so-called uniform plan and the so-called graduate plan.

A. Well, as I testified before, I stated that those two exhibits were rough ideas of plans that may be used.

Q. I meant the difference in the terminology of the two words.

A. The graduated plan meant applying this percentage equity—in other words, a person's equity would be the percentage determined by that fund alone, while the uniform plan was treating all funds alike; in other words, if one contract holder in one fund received 80% or 85%, the contract holder in another fund received 80% or 85%.

Q. And in the—— [fol. 3305] A. In other words, all contract holders of all funds were treated by the same percentage; they would receive the same percentage of their reserve.

Q. And in the graduated plan the A, B, and D contract holders would receive 90% of the special income, special annuity, and the remainder would receive thirty to fifty per cent?

A. It would vary according to each fund. I don't recall as to how each one varied.

Q. Now, you told us about these plans being worked out more or less cooperatively with a group—no one person working on any particular portion. Is that correct?

A. That's my understanding of it, yes.

Q. And you never devoted your entire time, or attempted to, getting up some kind of a plan, did you?

A. No.

Q. And after the State Court receivers were in, you still had other duties whereby you couldn't devote your entire time to preparing a plan. Isn't that so?

A. That's right.

Q. Do you know whether or not a plan was ever arrived at by the group in which you worked or by any other [fol. 3306] group separately which could be put into effect?

A. There was none to my knowledge.

Q. Over how long a period were these various plans worked upon?

A. I couldn't answer that.

Q. (Continuing:) To your knowledge?

A. Some of them were in process when I became affiliated with Fidelity.

Q. Did each of the plans have in the background or as its basis the idea of Fidelity as a life insurance company?

A. While I was affiliated with Fidelity, I heard of no other plans than of it planning on becoming a life insurance company; in other words, all discussions with me were on the assumption that it would become a life insurance company.

Q. And all of your thoughts and suggestions and efforts which you would contribute to the group from time to time were on that assumption or background. Is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. Did you ever attend any conference with the Securities and Exchange Commission or any of their commissioners in Washington?

A. I attended one conference there, April 1st 1941.

[fol. 3307] Q. In Washington?

A. In Washington.

Q. And at that time, was an attempt made to give the Securities and Exchange Commission some idea or rough plan—rough idea of a plan—which it was hoped might be able to be worked out?

A. As I recall, this Exhibit 11 and 12 that we were discussing a while ago was presented to the S. E. C. at that time, and there was considerable discussion on those plans.

Q. And Mr. Arthur Koontz was the one who was spokesman for your group in presenting those; he was there and made their original introduction?

A. He made the introduction, I would say.

Q. Who else was there?

A. Mr. Goldsmith, also of Koontz & Koontz, and F. S. Risley, the president, Mr. Frank McNulty and Mr. Pulfer and Mr. Clarke of Haskins & Sells, and Mr. Carver and Mr. Jaegerman and Mr. Jackson of the S. E. C.

Q. Was the discussion general with the idea of attempting to solve some way out of Fidelity's difficulties?

A. The understanding I had, the attempt was—they were attempting to agree more or less with the S. E. C. that [fol. 3308] some plan could be worked out whereby Fidelity may go through a voluntary reorganization. That was the whole entire intent and purpose of the meeting.

Q. What was the attitude of the S. E. C. or those who were there to speak on its behalf?

A. They didn't believe that the plans presented—Exhibits 11 and 12—as I recall, their chief objection was that the financial status had not been sound, based upon the status in those exhibits.

Q. Did they offer any suggestion of a plan?

A. The one point that I believe that they contributed was that the company should have some kind of "umbrella"—as they used the term—in other words, they must be protected by the Court to prevent a run on future cash liabilities.

Q. During the time of the conversion?

A. During the time of the voluntary reorganization.

Q. That was the suggestion to the S, E. C.?

A. Primarily, I think that was.

The Court: Wait just a minute. How were those two ideas reconciled—the two ideas of protecting the company by the Court, and at the same time, voluntary reorganization?

A. That was what I could never understand. If it was [fol. 3309] to be protected by the Court, I couldn't see that it was entirely voluntary, unless the company was voluntarily going into Court for a reorganization, rather than being pressed by some other outside creditors.

The Court: Are you speaking about Chapter 10?

A. Of course, no chapter was referred to. I don't know what else it could be. I stated that that was the suggestion offered. That might have been the point, it appeared to be to me, that they were most insistent upon, but as I understand it, it didn't seem voluntary to me.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Sims and Mr. Justice were present?

A. I don't believe either were present.

Q. And isn't it true that Mr. Goldsmith and Mr. Koontz, after the point was raised, discussed the possibility of putting an umbrella over the company by State Court proceedings?

A. I don't recall it being discussed with me.

Q. I mean, at the meeting—at the S. E. C. meeting?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Did the S. E. C. state whether the umbrella should be in Federal or State Court proceedings, or did they state any court?

[fol. 3310] A. I don't recall any specific manner to be used; that is the reason I used the term as they did—an umbrella—because they generalized it as a method of protection.

Q. They just suggested that the legal processes of the Court be used to protect the assets of the company from a run on it during the process of attempting to evolve some sort of a voluntary rehabilitation?

A. The point wasn't covered too far; I wouldn't want to make the interpretation.

Q. Would my statement be a fair general statement, or would it be too specific?

A. I think that is the general idea. It was to prevent a run for the cash liabilities, as I understood it.

Q. During the period during which the company was to attempt to voluntarily rehabilitate itself into a going life insurance concern?

A. That is correct.

Q. And that was the apparent hope of each and all of those at that conference that that could be done?

A. Will you read the question?

Q. I withdraw that question and state it this way: It was the apparent hope of everyone present that Fidelity could [fol. 3311] be rehabilitated into a going life insurance concern?

A. That appeared to be the hope of everyone, yes, sir.

Q. That was apparently why they were there, to see if it couldn't be worked out?

A. That is correct.

Q. Did the S. E. C. or the gentlemen there at that conference have any specific ideas as to any plan which could be worked out?

A. I think they made themselves clear that that wasn't their objective.

Q. I see.

A. (Continuing:) That they were sitting in on a conference or hearing and listening to what we had to submit; it wasn't their job.

Q. Their purpose was not necessarily criticism, but raising proper objections to any plans that you would have presented to them, and not their purpose or design to build a plan for you and work on it. Is that right?

A. Well, I don't know in a sufficient amount of what preceded our going there; to answer their purpose—I can't answer for them.

Q. Did you ever see any rough draft or purported plans [fols. 3312-3319] of any kind supposedly prepared by the S. E. C. or anyone connected therewith for the help and aid of Fidelity?

A. I did.

[fol. 3320] RAYMOND LATTA, the witness who was testifying at the time of adjournment, resumed the witness stand and continued his testimony as follows:

By Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Latta, how did you happen to go with Fidelity? What person or persons in Fidelity was responsible for that, if you know?

A. That I don't know.

Q. You were offered the employment and accepted it?

A. That is correct.

Q. We were speaking last evening when we closed about the April 1st meeting in Washington with the S.E.C. Would you again state, to refresh my recollection, all of those who were present at that meeting?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, that is in the record.

[fol. 3321] Mr. Palmer: I said to refresh my recollection.

The Court: I think I will let him state it, because I suppose Mr. Palmer didn't take down the notes.

A. Those representing the S.E.C. were Mr. Jaegerman, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Carver. There was Mr. Koontz and Mr. Goldsmith of Koontz and Koontz.

Mr. Palmer: A little bit louder.

A. Mr. Koontz and Mr. Goldsmith, Mr. Risley, Mr. McNulty, Mr. Pulfer, and Mr. Clarke of Haskins & Sells and myself.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. There was taken over there and presented to the S.E.C., was there not, some form of tentative or rough plan for voluntary rehabilitation of Fidelity?

A. That is correct.

Q. That plan was in typewritten form, is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. When was that plan put into typewritten form, if you know?

A. Well, just prior to going over to the meeting.

Q. Just prior to going into the meeting or over to the meeting.

A. Just prior to leaving Wheeling for Washington.

Q. That plan, as I understand it, was more or less the [fol. 3322] joint or cooperative work of a number of officers and employees of Fidelity, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Who all took part to any appreciable extent in helping formulate the ideas or various parts of the plan?

A. Well, I can't state that definitely. Some of those ideas had been prepared prior to my going with Fidelity.

Q. Well, after you got there, did Mr. Risley partake of part of the work?

A. Various parts of it we advised and used in a plan where Mr. Risley and Mr. McNulty and, as I recall, Mr. Messick and Mr. Pulfer all contributed various ideas. Beyond that I don't know what individuals were involved. There were others.

Q. Together with yourself to some extent?

A. Yes, I collaborated.

Q. To your knowledge, how far had that plan that was presented that day been discussed with Mr. Arthur Koontz before it was presented?

A. You mean the one that was presented in typewritten form?

Q. Yes.

A. Well, it was only completed just before we left for [fol. 3323] Washington and about in—I don't know what was discussed with him.

Q. So far as you know, he had not seen the plan prior to its presentation?

A. Well, so far as I know. I had not had an opportunity to see the plan myself.

Q. It is your understanding, is it not, that Mr. Arthur Koontz had arranged this conference and that the officers and those who had worked on the plan were to be present to present it to the S. E. C.?

A. I don't know how the arrangements were made.

Q. That plan provided for a voluntary acceptance by the contract holders, is that right?

A. That is right.

Q. And did it also provide thatt hose who didn't want to accept it wouldn't have to?

A. That is correct.

Q. Now, tell the Court this. Those who did not accept the plan, would they be the same or better off or worse off than those who did accept the plan?

The Court: How would he know?

Mr. Palmer: From the plan, your Honor.

[fol. 3324] A. Well, the plan provided that those who accepted—those that voluntarily accepted the plan would take a loss, which would be used to cover deficiencies. Those who did not accept the plan, their contract would continue as it is.

Q. So that one of the major difficulties with this voluntary plan was that those who did not accept it would be—if the plan were accepted by the others—better off than those who did accept the plan voluntarily? Is that in effect correct?

A. Well, one takes a loss and the other doesn't.

Q. Will you explain that by example to the Court? For instance, suppose there were a three-million-dollar deficit and a thousand contract holders, five hundred of whom accepted the plan and five hundred of whom did not. Will you give the Court—use that or some similar example a concrete basis to show how those who accepted would be worse off than those who did not accept it?

A. Well, as I recall, the plan it provided for—that is, the uniform plan provided for, assuming a 15 per cent decrease in their equity. Therefore if a person had a hundred-dollar equity, if he accepted the plan he only re-[fol. 3325] ceived eighty-five dollars, while if he didn't accept it, his equity still remained a hundred dollars.

Q. When you use equity in that sense, will you give your definition of the word "equity"?

A. Well, that is the amount he has coming from the assets that are held by the company at any given time.

The Court:

Q. You mean according to his contract; not according to the amount available to pay him?

A. That is right. His claim.

Q. So what you call his equity may be something different from what his actual equity was?

A. Well, no. As a rule I don't call equity that. I call equity the amount he has coming in proportion to the claim.

His contract called for a claim of a hundred dollars, but the plan provided that if a sufficient number would reduce their claim from a hundred dollars to eighty-five dollars, the company became solvent then. Of course, their equity would be to the extent of their claim.

Q. What I am driving at is this: If this company was insolvent to the extent of, say, fifteen per cent and everybody had an equal priority with reference to his claim, then the equity would actually be worth only eighty-five per cent of the amount of the claim?

[fol. 3326] A. That is correct.

Q. So when you say they would take a reduction in their equities, you don't mean that strictly, do you?

A. After the plan was completed, if a sufficient number covered the deficiency, then the equity in both cases would be a hundred per cent of their claim. In one case their claim would be eighty-five dollars, while in the other instance it would be a hundred dollars and their equity would be reduced accordingly. Their equity as termed in percentage, however, would always remain the same in proportion to the claim. If he reduced his claim, then his equity is reduced in proportion.

Q. Well, now, if the company is actually ten per cent insolvent and two-thirds or approximately that of the total number of contract holders were willing to take a cut of fifteen per cent in order to pay the other one-third, then that would conform roughly to the outline of the plan?

A. That is correct.

The Court: All right.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. What did Mr. Pulfer have to say as to whether that plan could be put into practical effect, and by what means of contacting the contract holders?

[fol. 3327] Mr. Ray: Your Honor, that would be hearsay. Mr. Pulfer has been here.

The Court: I don't see the materiality of that. If you will explain it——

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, we want to show admissions of the Debtor—I mean admissions against interest—and we want to show particularly what was attempted to be done by the Debtor and how it was attempted to be done.

In other words, I understand Mr. Pulfer, being a man of wide selling experience, was speaking for the group in explaining to the S.E.C. how you could get this plan over to the contract holders and get their consent and I wanted the witness to go into that phase of it.

The Court: But you didn't ask Mr. Pulfer anything about that. He was on the stand for examination——

Mr. Palmer: Mr. Pulfer forgot to tell us that he was in Washington, your Honor, and I didn't know it.

The Court: If he wasn't asked, I don't know that he had any obligation to tell you that.

Mr. Palmer: The Debtor didn't bring that out. The Debtor was the one that knew he was there; I didn't know it.

Mr. Huwe: Your Honor, this uniform plan calling for [fol. 3328] eighty-five per cent was the combined work of a number of people. It was in existence prior to the receivership and had been in the possession, I presume, of Mr. Palmer for a long time and one of the strongest parts of it is:

"It is proposed to secure the exchanges by both personal solicitation and mail. The selection of the method to be used will depend largely upon the residence of the contract holder."

That probably is Mr. Pulfer's contribution to this plan. This was in Mr. Palmer's control. While Mr. Pulfer was on the stand he could have asked him about it then. Even though he didn't know Mr. Pulfer was in Washington, he did know Mr. Pulfer contributed to the plan.

Mr. Palmer: I beg your pardon. I did not know it.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Palmer: I would like to make a proffer that at this meeting at which there was a general conversation with the S.E.C. Mr. Pulfer advised the S.E.C. that within sixty to ninety days he could get in touch with a sufficient number of contract holders, that the plan would be accepted, and that he could do this by direct mail first and by personal contact later so that the plan was a practical feasibility to be put in operation at that time; and that the Securities [fol. 3329] and Exchange Commission thereupon raised the objection that it could not be done within the time limit set.

Now, if your Honor please, I offer this not as what Mr. Pulfer said, but as part of the general conversation about this particular plan by the officers of Fidelity in their meeting with the S.E.C. in Washington. It is nothing against Mr. Pulfer or in any way detrimental to Mr. Pulfer. It was merely what the company was attempting to do at that time; and we want to show the various steps the company has taken in attempting to pull itself out of the difficulty before state receivership proceedings were brought; and I think what anyone contributed to that desire to help themselves should be relevant to this issue here.

The Court: I can't see how what Mr. Pulfer said in that conference would be relevant, because if it were, every single thing that was said in the conference would be and also every single thing that was said in every other conference that was held with reference to rehabilitating the company, and I am confident that that is not so and I sustain the objection.

[fol. 3330] Mr. Palmer:

Q. What if any other objections did the Securities and Exchange Commission raise to the plan other than those that you and I have already discussed, Mr. Latta?

A. I don't know what objections—any other objections particularly raised to the plan.

Q. Did they raise any objection as to the fact that the contract holders who did not accept would be better off than those who did?

A. I don't recall any specific objections there, no.

Q. Did they raise a point as to whether it could be put into practical effect by getting in touch with the contract holders as the plan suggests in the way Mr. Huwe read?

A. I think they covered that point particularly.

Q. Did the Securities and Exchange Commission approve the plan?

A. No, I can't say they approved it, no.

Q. After that meeting in Washington, was there a further meeting in Charleston? If so, who attended it?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, isn't he going all over the same ground?

Mr. Palmer: Same ground as what?

Mr. Ray: That you went over yesterday.

[fol. 3331] Mr. Palmer: I am sorry. I don't think so.

Mr. Ray: You asked about meetings in Washington yesterday and about meetings in Charleston yesterday.

The Court: I don't remember his asking about a meeting except for Washington. Overruled.

A. I don't know of any meeting, no.

Mr. Palmer: I beg your pardon?

A. I don't know of any meeting.

Q. Well, did you and others meet in Charleston?

A. We left Washington and came to Charleston.

Q. Did you have a conference about Fidelity?

A. Yes, we had conferences. Naturally, we were in conference most of the time while I was there.

Q. During the course of those conferences in Charleston after that meeting in Washington, tell the Court whether or not you were given any information as to any proceedings being brought?

A. The day after the meeting we left Washington and came to Charleston. One of the first things I heard the following morning was that proceedings were going to be taken by the—by the Auditor, Mr. Sims.

Q. That was court proceedings?

A. Well, I didn't know what the proceedings were. He [fol. 3332] was going to take steps to take the company; I presumed it was court proceedings.

The Court: He had notified the company of that before you ever went to Washington, though, hadn't he?

A. I heard rumors of it. I didn't know.

Q. This you heard after you came back from Washington was just a continuation of the rumor you heard before you went, wasn't it?

A. Well, yes, you might say it was revived. I know before we left to go to Washington a rumor came out that Mr. Sims was going to take steps. As to what those steps were to be, I didn't know, and then I heard that he was going to wait there till we went to Washington to see how the meeting turned out and since nothing conclusive was reached at the meeting, my understanding was that he was going to definitely take steps and he was not going to wait any longer.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Reverting for a minute to the Washington meeting, was there brought up or discussed or did you know of any possible idea of attempting to have Mr. Sims declare a moratorium on cash surrenders of the company?

A. Well, the S.E.C. did—it was their strongest opinion [fol. 3333] and they tried to get the admission from the company, it appeared to me, that the company was insolvent; they should stop paying cash surrender values. That was one of their great objections to going into the plan. In other words, it wasn't on the plan particularly, but they did object to continuing paying out cash surrender values when we were trying to go through with voluntary reorganization and have certain contract holders take a loss which would be more or less admitting the deficiency, and why pay out a hundred cents on the dollar to those who came in and asked for their cash today? That, in general, I think, covered the point.

Q. What, if anything, was suggested about the moratorium to be declared by Mr. Sims?

The Court: Mr. Palmer, I don't understand your term "moratorium" or how Mr. Sims could declare any moratorium.

Mr. Palmer: I don't either, your Honor. That is why I am asking the witness about it.

The Court: All right.

A. Well, there was some discussion as to whether they could declare a moratorium on the cash values for a period of time while this plan was being carried out——

The Court: Who could declare it?

[fol. 3334] A. That I couldn't learn. It was mentioned as to whether Mr. Sims could declare a moratorium without going into court—a temporary moratorium for a period of time. As to whether he could or not, I couldn't find out from anyone and no one seemed to state definitely what the steps would be or how. I didn't understand it myself.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. If a moratorium had been declared which lasted more than sixty days, would that be in violation of the terms of the contract?

A. Well, the contract, in my opinion, provides that the company must pay the cash value within sixty days from the application, or something to that effect.

The Court: It wouldn't be necessary, then, to have a moratorium during that sixty days?

A. No, but that goes back to the question as to how long it would take. In other words, the S.E.C. felt that no cash value should be paid. Then the argument arose as to whether the plan could be put into effect within sixty days.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. And was there a discussion had about whether it could be put into effect within sixty days?

A. There was various discussions pro and con.

[fol. 3335] The Court: With reference to this so-called moratorium, now, that wouldn't begin to be effective until the sixty-day period was up?

A. That is true because we were allowed sixty days in the contract at our option.

Mr. Palmer: And what, if anything, was said as to whether it would be an act of bankruptcy if at the end of sixty days anyone declared a moratorium and the company did not meet its obligations as set out in its contract?

A. There was some discussion in that regard as to whether it would be an act of bankruptcy or not, but I don't believe any conclusion was reached that I heard except there was a discussion as to whether that would be an act of bankruptcy.

Q. Was there a discussion as to whether or not within sixty days the company could put over its plan to the contract holders?

A. Yes, there was some discussion on that.

Mr. Palmer: Now, if your Honor please, it is in reference to that discussion that Mr. Pulfer took part in that I want to ask about that discussion. I didn't want to go back into it over the Court's ruling.

The Court: I permitted you to develop that there was [fol. 3336] a discussion but I will have to sustain an objection to any questions as to what the discussion was.

Mr. Palmer: All right, sir.

Q. Now, getting back again to the conferences in Charleston, did Mr. Tom Foulk come from Wheeling at any time to take part in those conferences?

A. I believe he was here on Saturday—Friday or Saturday following—well, he was here in Charleston the last day that we were all here.

Q. That would be the third or fourth of April or fifth?

A. I would say the fourth, approximately.

Q. Mr. Pulfer said something about your having a plan—he didn't say whether it was oral or written—which you gave the rough details of at that meeting. Would you tell us first whether it was an oral or written plan?

A. The only thing we had was a verbal discussion on a plan of reorganization by voluntary basis different from that which was presented in Washington.

Q. You say different from that?

A. Yes, but they were both voluntary is the reason I said that.

[fol. 3337] Q. Will you give us what your ideas were as you expressed them to the others?

A. Well, when they heard of the proceedings being taken or that they were about to be taken, they were trying to find out if it was some voluntary plan that could be used that may be practical to be put into effect in a short period of time; and the thought was in presenting some plan of that nature to the Commissioner or to the Auditor to see if he wouldn't hold off the proceedings against the company. Now, the plan that was presented in Washington provided a complete change of the contract, in addition to the contract holders agreeing to take a loss, and it didn't—the consensus of opinion of a number of individuals was that a plan of that nature could not be put into effect in the short period of time; so they were trying to find some working mechanics that might be; so the plan discussed mostly was a voluntary lien plan which would require no change in the present contract immediately, but those accepting the plan would agree to a voluntary lien placed against the contract. By a lien I mean the company's claim against the reserve on that contract, which, after putting into effect, would become and be treated in the same manner as any [fol. 3338] policy or any contract loan in use by the company.

Q. In other words, this lien is a little different from what we lawyers speak of as a lien. It is just the same as though the policyholder borrowed the amount of the lien, but the company doesn't give him any money, but calls it a policy loan and treats it as such except that the lien covers the deficit by agreement of the policyholder instead of him getting money for his loan. Is that, in layman's language, about what it means?

A. Approximately. The lien is assumed to cover the deficiency and would bear interest in the same way as a contract loan and would be a claim against the contract.

Q. And it is an agreement voluntarily made by the contract holder to make up the deficit in his particular fund?

A. That is correct.

Mr. Jaegerman: That would bear interest to the contract holder, wouldn't it? The contract holder wouldn't have to pay interest to the company, would he?

A. The lien would increase as the result of the interest.

Q. But the contract holder wouldn't pay that interest? [fol. 3339] A. He wouldn't have to pay it in cash. It would be exactly the same as a contract loan except that it was intended that it should bear a different rate of interest, a rate of interest comparable to that on the reserve. If a person had a hundred dollars reserve and he was assuming a thirty per cent lien, actually he is reducing his equity to seventy dollars. However, since his contract has not been changed, his reserve remains at a hundred dollars. Therefore, he is charged interest on the thirty dollars that would offset interest that he is paying on the hundred while his equity is only seventy, and the effect is that he actually has an equity of only seventy dollars, while his contract calls for a hundred, but to keep from changing the contract, it continues to be a hundred. The interest charge on the loan is just offset on the over-statement of his lien over his equity.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. What was decided, Mr. Latta, at that conference as to whether that oral suggestion or idea of a plan could be put into prompt effect?

A. I don't know that there were any particular decisions except it was just felt—seemed to be the consensus of opinion that it could be put into effect much more readily [fol. 3340] than any plan previously discussed, although any decisions—I don't know of any decisions that were reached.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: It would take the consent of the contract holder to put it into effect, wouldn't it?

A. Yes. In other words, no contract holder had assumed a lien until he consented. It was a voluntary plan.

Mr. Palmer: And was it again the proposition that those who did not consent would be better off than those who did not consent?

Mr. Townsend: I object to that.

The Court: You say, "Was there again the proposition."

Mr. Palmer: No, the flaw.

Mr. Townsend: Read the question.

(The question was read.)

Mr. Palmer: I will say "flaw" instead of "proposition."

Mr. Ray: What right does he have to say it was a flaw?

Mr. Palmer: Were those who did not accept this plan to be offered to them better off than those who did accept it?

[fol. 3341] The Court: It is a legal conclusion, it seems to me.

Mr. Palmer: No, your Honor, it is a practical matter as the witness explained to the Court before; not a legal conclusion, but a mathematical calculation in the field where this man is an actuary.

The Court: Well, it certainly seems to the Court that if there were no corresponding changes in the plans for the ones who did accept it, and you say to one man, "We will give you a hundred per cent," and to another, "We will give you eighty-five per cent," that it is just obvious, without the need of any question, that the man who gets the hundred per cent gets more than the man who gets eighty-five per cent. I understand, however, that when the witness speaks of a plan, he means some sort of arrangement whereby the person that took the cut would get some corresponding advantage.

Mr. Palmer: That is what I was going to ask him, whether they would or would not.

Can you answer the Court's question, Mr. Latta, whether or not those who took the cut would get an advantage which those who did not take the cut would not get?

A. No, he wouldn't have any advantage the others [fol. 3342] wouldn't get.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: He would have a disadvantage, wouldn't he?

A. Well, the only difference between the two, one has taken a loss and the other has not. Outside of that, their contracts remain the same.

The Court: Mr. Latta, what is the difference between this plan you have talked about and the situation where there is a thousand dollars to be divided and fifteen hundred dollars of claims against it, and you go out and say to creditors that have the claims, "If you will all take a reduction amounting to two hundred dollars, we can distribute the thousand dollars, but if certain of you want to take a deduction and others don't, we will pay the ones that don't a hundred per cent and the others that do will get correspondingly less." Of course, such a plan as that would not appeal to anybody. I want to know, what is the difference between that sort of a plan and the plan you are talking about.

A. That is roughly the principle of the plan.

Q. Well, then, what hope did you have that anybody would ever sign it?

[fol. 3343] A. Well, the only hope that a voluntary plan might be put into effect is that a sufficient number of people representing large enough claims would contribute enough to cover the deficiency in order to keep the company going.

Q. What benefit is it to them to keep the company going?

A. Those people, probably the only reason they would agree to it, thinking that even after taking that cut they would be better off than if the company went into Court and was liquidated or some other proceedings taken.

Q. Is there any basis for that?

A. In this company I don't think there is the basis there is in an insurance company. In an insurance company there is definitely a basis for it.

Q. Was there a basis in the situation here?

A. Yes, there was some in the case of approximately half the contract holders, half the contract holders having insurance-protected contracts. Out of those, a number of them could not—although they were eligible for insurance at the time these contracts were issued, but at the present time they may be uninsurable. They had insurance protection which might have been carried on.

[fol. 3344] Q. Wasn't there also an advantage to the ones who signed such a plan that their contracts would be continued and that the rate of cash values in those contracts would increase in the future at a higher percentage than it had increased in the past, so that they would then get the benefit if their contracts were carried to conclusion of some large deductions that had been made from payments in the beginning with corresponding smaller deductions made towards the end of the payment of the contract? Wasn't there that advantage?

A. No, I don't think there was any difference in the deduction to be made or any deduction in the interest that they would receive.

Q. I don't mean to say that the contracts would be changed in that respect, but it has been developed that in the case of these contracts, their cash values during their earlier years are comparatively small and that during their later years, their cash values increase much more rapidly than they do in the early years. Doesn't that furnish some incentive to a contract holder to want his contract to go ahead to completion rather than take the cash value now?

[fol. 3345] A. Why, yes, because if they quit now and still want to continue making payments on the contract—or some new contract—they could not at the present time go out and buy a contract that would pay them as high an interest payment. Then in addition to that, when you buy a new contract, you have a certain amount of loading that must be paid in the earlier part of the contract, that is, presumably, the first year. After approximately the first year, I can't say that there would be any difference in the amount of increase in proportion to the payment made.

Q. Wasn't it that element in the situation that was counted on to persuade these contract holders to sign up to take their loss?

A. I think that is true in any reorganization. That is one of the purposes of reorganization.

Q. That was the offset the man got who had to take his loss of fifteen per cent?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. He got that offset to recompense him for the amount of cash, not getting a hundred cents on the dollar?

A. That is correct.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Latta, I am not certain, in view of the Court's [fol. 3346] last statement that the Court fully understands the entire proposition. The man who doesn't accept the plan didn't cash in; he went right along and paid, but he had a contract that called for a hundred cents on the dollar. Isn't that right?

A. Why, yes, they would both be able to continue their contract. One takes a loss and the other doesn't. That is the only difference between the two contract holders. But, I understood the Court's question more or less to be the advantage of—or why a person would agree to accept a loss.

Q. Persons who had only been carrying the policies for a few years would have a distinct advantage in taking the loss and going ahead as the Court has suggested so that they could in time have their cash surrender value equal the amount paid in, whereas perhaps a person who had been carrying his contract for seven or eight years wouldn't have that same impelling motive on that. That was the Court's suggestion. Do you agree with that?

A. I think that is true.

Q. So that there were some advantages to be gained by those who would accept the voluntary reduction as compared with those who did not?

[fol. 3347] A. I don't think that comparison can be made.

Q. You don't think that comparison can be made. Both were, however, under the plan expected to go on and continue their payments and maturing their contracts?

The Witness: Will you state that again or have it read?

(The question was read.)

A. There was no difference in the two whether one accepted or the other did not, except that the lien assumed by a certain number would be used to cover the deficiency. That is the only difference between the two that I can see.

Q. In your experience have you known of life insurance companies where a similar proposition to this was offered where anyone who desired could take a voluntary reduction or have a lien placed againt their policy and those who didn't want to didn't do it and whether that company went on and then was able to operate after that was done—one or more companies that did that, and mention their names, please?

A. Well there are two companies that I know of that used a voluntary lien plan very similar in nature. One of them was continued and is in business today. The other put the [fol. 3348] voluntary lien plans into effect and then was later reinsured with a company assuming the contracts with the liens against them.

The Court:

Q. Mr. Latta, do you think it is possible to get as equitable a result by that sort of plan which you call the voluntary lien plan in case two-thirds of the contract holders in certain classes want to do it and the other third don't want to do it—do you think it is possible to get as equitable a result in that way as it is by some plan where the other third is forced to comply with the wishes of the two-thirds?

A. Are you referring to the voluntary lien plan?

Q. Yes. I am asking you whether you think that voluntary lien plan produces as equitable result in cases where there are as much as two-thirds of the creditors or contract holders of a certain class that want to put it into effect as a plan, whereby the other third would be forced to comply and take its proportionate share of the loss, too?

A. I will answer that in this way: The voluntary lien plan, as far as my understanding of it being equitable, there is nothing equitable about a voluntary plan.

[fols. 3349-3363] The Court: That is what I thought.

The Witness: Because when a person accepts a voluntary lien plan, that is just an agreement between that individual and the company, while another case it is based on equal dollars and cents.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 3364] The Court: I will sustain that objection in that form. I will ask the witness this question, however, which I think will cover the situation, as I see it.

Q. Mr. Latta, is it possible to construct an actuarial plan of reorganization for Fidelity?

A. Yes.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. In your experience, Mr. Latta, would that actuarial plan work?

Mr. Ray: Oh, that is the same thing in another way, trying to get the witness to answer something the Court has ruled he is not qualified to answer.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Palmer: I will have to make an offer upon the record, your Honor.

[fol. 3365] The Court: All right.

Mr. Palmer: The witness, if permitted to answer the question, would state that it is unreasonable to expect a plan of reorganization can be effected for Fidelity. The witness would further say, if permitted by the Court so to testify, that Fidelity itself can never be reorganized as a going concern, either as a face amount certificate company or as a life insurance company. If the Court would permit, I would like the witness to be permitted to state his reasons why Fidelity can never be reorganized and operated as a face amount certificate company and as a life insurance company, those reasons being based upon his experience and actuarial knowledge. I ask the Court's permission for that.

Mr. Huwe: Your Honor, I move that the proffer be stricken from the record for the simple reason that all of Mr. Palmer's statement precludes any company other than a face amount certificate company or an insurance company, and there are possibilities beyond those two categories in which the Debtor could be reorganized, and therefore any statements in any proffers limited to those two fields are not proper.

Mr. Palmer: Will you inform me the other possibilities, [fol. 3366] please?

The Court: There is no use to argue that. All Mr. Palmer has done is to say on the record that he believes this witness would make certain answers if he asked him certain questions. Those answers may be that the earth is flat when as a matter of fact we know it is round, but if that has bearing on the case, and this witness's answer might have some arguable basis for being received, I feel that I would have to permit that to go on the record; so, regardless of what the facts may be, I am going to permit Mr. Palmer to make his proffer.

Now, he asked to be permitted to ask the witness a question, and as I ruled before, I will permit any questions to be addressed to this witness's knowledge of actuarial figures and plans, and if you will form your question, I will determine it.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Latta, can you give, from your actuarial experience, reasons why Fidelity can never be rehabilitated itself into a going life insurance company?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, that is putting into the record just exactly what you have excluded—an opinion of this witness.

The Court: He said a while ago in answer to a question [fol. 3367] that I directed to him that it was possible to prepare a plan of reorganization for Fidelity from an actuarial viewpoint, having stated that any opinion as to whether or not this plan would work would involve qualifications which he has said he does not possess, and so I will sustain the objection to the question.

Mr. Farmer: If the Court please, I would just like to call the Court's attention to this: That this witness who is now being asked these questions is a man who is brought here by Fidelity and entered its employ about the first of this year for that very purpose, as I understand it, of trying to assist in working out a plan, and he remained in the employ of Fidelity until it went into receivership; he remained in the employ of the receivers and remained in the employ of the Trustee until September 15th of this year; and if there is anyone who, from experience and study, especially the study of this company, and his borad training that he has had elsewhere and experience in other reorganizations, who is qualified to assist the Court in this way, it seems to me that this is the man.

The Court: You attorneys are undertaking to establish this witness's qualification simply by the statements that you are making to the Court. It happens that the answers [fol. 3368] that he has made have shown that his knowledge is confined to mathematical figures and until that is changed in some way by the witness's statements, I cannot go any further.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Latta, is your knowledge of Fidelity and the possibilities of its rehabilitation confined wholly to mathematical figures?

Mr. Ray: He testified about that fully yesterday.
The Court: Let's see what he says now.

A. That depends largely on what you mean by mathematical figures. I don't know that any two people can have the same opinion exactly of what it means by mathematical figures. Figures mean nothing except an expression. It is a means of computing and determining the quality of two expressions. In making a contract, we don't do it by just formulas, exactly. I still stick to my statement yesterday as to the actuarial phase of it; I am not trying to change that, nor do I care as to whether I answer the questions asked.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. The actuarial field includes more than mere figures addition and subtraction?

A. The subject of actuarial mathematics covers all phases of operating a life insurance company.

The Court: You mean covers selling—— [fol. 3369] The Witness: I was going to add that, with the exception of actual selling in the field.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. With the exception of selling in the field, it covers all phases of what—?

A. All phases of operating a life insurance company—and the making of investments, naturally it wouldn't—the interpretation of effects and results of selling or the results of the investments comes under the actuarial phase of it.

The Court: That gets us to this point in this witness's testimony. He says an actuarial plan can be developed for the reorganization of Fidelity. He says he knows nothing about the selling. When we put those two answers side by side, it strikes me that the witness can't be permitted to go ahead now and say that he has certain opinions about the success or failure when he has already said that a plan can be developed and he knows nothing about the selling end of it.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I am afraid the Court is not quite quoting the witness exactly. He said he knows nothing about selling in the field but he did know the effects of selling. That is, he knows the effects from an operating viewpoint of selling, but does not go int [fol. 3370] the field and sell.

The Court: I don't know what he means when he says he knows the effects of selling.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Will you tell the Court what you mean by that, Mr. Latta?

A. By selling in the field, I mean supervision of their agents and their sales talk. However, the appeal of the contract and the contents of the contract must be worked out as much by the actuary as it is by the sales manager or someone connected with the sales, because the sales manager knows nothing about the operations of the contract and whether it is profitable, sound, or otherwise, any more than the actuary knows about the selling. Now, in the reorganization plan, I know that in past cases where we have been called in that naturally we have been—worked on—the first thing we do, as a rule, is make a survey to see the possibility of making out a complete plan of reorganization which covers all phases of it except the manner in which to contact the contract holders. I don't know that you can define the discrimination where one cuts off and the other starts. I have never been able to do it in the past. I surely can't explain where one cuts off and the other starts.

[fol. 3371] Q. With reference to Fidelity, have you conferred with Mr. Pulfer, one of the selling heads, concerning the salability of Fidelity in any rehabilitated form?

Mr. Ray: I am going to object to that, your Honor, because he has already testified as to his familiarity with the selling phases.

The Court: Mr. Pulfer has been a witness in this case and as I recall, he said that in his opinion reorganization could be effected and the contracts sold to the public. I am not certain that he said it unqualifiedly, but if so, and this witness has conferred with him, then we would have to say that he got that information from Mr. Pulfer. Then if he would answer contrary to that information, certainly his conference with Mr. Pulfer couldn't have anything to do with his opinion. I will sustain the objection.

Mr. Palmer: I will make an offer into the record that the witness did confer with Mr. Pulfer, one of the selling persons of Fidelity, and as a result of such, he became familiar with the selling end of Fidelity, both as a going concern and with reference to possibility of rehabilitation thereof.

Mr. Ray: Show an objection to counsel vouching the record as to what he believes the witness would say in [fol. 3372] answer to questions when the material put in the record flatly contradicts what the witness has heretofore said on direct examination.

The Court: Overruled as to the last objection.

Mr. Palmer: I ask that the remarks of counsel in that regard be stricken from the record.

The Court: No, I think there is some basis for that.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Latta, will you please explain your answer to the Court's question when he asked you if Fidelity could be reorganized actuarially—I don't know the exact question, but you answered the Court's question "Yes." Would you explain your answer, please?

A. Actuarially whether it could be reorganized strictly from a mathematical viewpoint, as I interpreted his question to be, would be as to whether there could be computed, as far as figures are concerned, in order to place this company in a solvent condition, ready for operation on a sound financial basis as of that time. That is my interpretation of what he meant.

Q. Would it be possible to answer the Court's question by saying, "We will take from each contract holder forty per cent or place a forty-per cent lien upon each contract holder," work that out actuarially, and then you would [fols. 3373-3376] have the company reconstructed actuarially upon a sound basic? Would that be possible?

Mr. Huwe: I object to that question.

The Court: Overruled.

A. It would make the company solvent, but it wouldn't be reorganized on a sound basis, no.

Mr. Palmer: Beg your pardon?

A. It would be solvent at the time provided the forty per cent was sufficient. You could make the company solvent, but that doesn't make it sound from an operating viewpoint, actuarially or otherwise.

Q. What would you do to do that?

A. Well, as far as a plan of reorganization was concerned, you would have to make the entire construction of the company so that the future operations could be done on a sound basis—could be carried on on a sound basis. By a sound basis, I mean as far as being able to meet the obligations when they may become due as specified in the contract.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 3377] Mr. Palmer:

Q. In other words, whether or not you could possibly construct an actuarial plan for Fidelity and your answer to that bears no relation to what your answer would be as to whether Fidelity could be successfully rehabilitated, is that correct?

A. They are entirely separate questions.

Q. And bear no relation to each other?

A. No.

Mr. Palmer: Then we will, if the Court will pardon us, ask that the Court's question and answer be stricken.

The Court: No, that is the phase of it that this witness has qualified himself to speak on. I have permitted you to develop that that phase has nothing to do with whether the company could successfully operate. I never thought in the beginning that it had anything to do with that, but nevertheless it is the phase that this witness is familiar with and the one on which his help to the Court may be of some value.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I think I see our difficulty. The Court has assumed that an actuary of actuarial [fol. 3378] experience is one who deals only with building up a mortality or actuarial table, whereas I think the true situation is the actuary is one who is familiar with every detail of the life insurance business. In other words, he is the general manager of the life insurance business, knowing every one of the branches of it.

The Court: This witness has not said that.

Mr. Palmer: I thought he did say it.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: You are thinking about Steussy.

Mr. Palmer: Mr. Latta, how far wrong am I in my statement with reference to what an actuary is with reference to a life insurance company?

The Court: I don't like to give the witness that kind of question, how far wrong are you. I want him to tell me——

Mr. Palmer: Tell us, Mr. Latta, in detail as much as you can, what an actuary does and knows about the life insurance business.

The Court: What do you know about Fidelity is what I want to know.

Mr. Palmer: I would like to know about Fidelity and the life insurance business, your Honor. There isn't any such [fol. 3379] animal as I know it as an actuary of Fidelity, because Fidelity, if I may say so, is a monstrosity of which there are only one or two in existence and bear only a slight semblance of resemblance to other financial institutions. This gentleman comes qualified as a life insurance actuary. Whether or not his experience in that field will help in Fidelity we can investigate, but first I want to find out what is his experience in the life insurance field. That is his field and deep sea diving for Fidelity has been something of a side experience.

The Court: As to his qualifications, they are going to depend here on what he has been able to learn and know about Fidelity and not what he knows about life insurance actuarial practices in general.

Mr. Palmer: Can we first show what an actuary of a life insurance company does and knows to show this man's general background and qualifications?

The Court: Well, if he can make it any more definite than he already has. I thought he covered it.

The Witness: I think I answered that question a while ago that you can't draw a line where a phase of it cuts off and other phase of the business starts, and I also said—— [fol. 3380] Mr. Palmer: Does an actuary have anything to do with building up the life insurance policies—the terms of them—not the figures, but the conditions and terms?

A. As a rule, I believe most life insurance contracts are drawn by the actuaries in collaboration with an attorney for the legal phases and interpretation.

Q. What, if anything, does the actuary have to do with reference to discovering whether the policy he draws up is salable or not before he draws it up?

A. He has to work with the sales manager somewhat in the same manner that he worked with the attorney, as far as the actual drafting of the contract.

Q. Now, what does he have to do with reference to finding out the operating cost, whether the company could make money on selling that particular policy?

A. Well, that is for him—that is his job to determine. In life insurance work, the actuary is usually in the same category as a certified public—an accountant, I should say, would be with some other company. In other words, they deal with the operations, the causes and effects of the profits [fols. 3381-3391] and losses to be made as a result of changes in operation or whatever may be done—any phase of the operations.

Q. Does he have to know the various operating expenses, as well as operating income in order to be able to carry on his job properly?

A. Well, yes, that deals with the operations.

Q. And he has to realize how much income will come in from a policy and what the operations and overhead of the company will be — reference to it, is that correct?

A. That is correct.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 3392] The Court: If this witness is asked what it is necessary to do in order to convert Fidelity into a going life insurance company, I will permit him to answer that question and then we will leave it for the Court to decide or for some qualified person to give his opinion as to whether or not on the doing of those things a successful plan of reorganization would have been effected.

Mr. Palmer: All right. Can you give us your answer, [fol. 3393] Mr. Latta, to the Court's suggestion?

The Witness: May I have the Court's question read?

The Court: I didn't ask him a question.

Mr. Palmer: I meant, give us your ideas as to the Court's suggestion what you would be permitted to testify.

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, I think that is practically the question which Mr. Palmer asked immediately upon resumption of the hearing and the witness said he couldn't do it; that there would be infinite——

The Court: You may be right about that, but if he can do it, I am willing to permit him to do it.

Mr. Palmer: Will the reporter read the Court's suggestion to the witness?

(The statement by the Court which Mr. Palmer referred to was read.)

A. I could name some of the main problems.

Q. All right, sir. Will you do that, please?

A. But as to whether it covers the situation, I don't suppose it will. One is that it must be determined the amount of equity that a contract holder would be allowed to be applied toward any adjusted contract. One of the main problems is determining the new contracts—con- [fol. 3394] structing the new contracts that are going to be offered to the present contract holders and as well to any prospects that may be contacted. Another problem would be for the company, after reorganized and after established, to obtain a license in each state in which the converted contracts are to be sold or whereby new business may be sold. Another problem would be to determine in each individual case as to how the equities which he received as determined by the Court or otherwise may be applied toward such new contract as accepted by the contract holder. It would be necessary to determine some method whereby those contract holders not accepting any of the contracts—the new contracts offered by the insurance company—as to how he may receive his equity. And of course it would be necessary to set out your entire operating plans of your new company, the basis from an operating standpoint—I might say that phase of it would have to be considered the same as if you were organizing a new company of any kind.

Q. Mr. Latta, did you tell us yesterday you had taken part in the reorganization of fifteen life insurance companies?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: He has asked that. Everybody [fol. 3395] knows that he did say that.

Mr. Palmer: All right, then.

Q. Then, Mr. Latta, can you tell us whether or not as an actuary these problems that you have suggested can in some part be solved by an actuary?

A. I don't know what you mean by solved. I would have to qualify that. I can qualify it by meaning what the effects and causes would be, but the degree of what the results may be, that is another question.

Q. What part did actuaries take in the attempted reorganizations of the companies with which you worked?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, that is certainly irrelevant. He has gone into what actuaries do over and over again and I think he has testified as to what part he had in those reorganizations.

The Court: I think so too, but at the risk of repetition, I will overrule the objection.

Mr. Ray: He definitely said he supervised the actuarial work in those reorganizations. That was his exact language.

The Court: Well, now, I understand, Mr. Palmer wants to know what that actuarial work was that he supervised. [fol. 3396] Mr. Palmer: That is right, your Honor.

A. To give a definite answer to that—it is rather a broad scope—I will go back to my answer previously that as far as the reorganization covering the points I mentioned a while ago, it would cover those phases with the exception of the contacting in the field and making the sales of the conversions or the handling of the securities.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. And with the exception of the legal determination of the equities—it would not include that feature. By that I mean that the actuary could figure out percentages or proportions if some legal body would lay down the rules of law by which he should be guided? Is that correct?

A. Well, I think the actuary's work all the way through is necessarily guided by laws and rules laid down wherever the legality comes in.

Mr. Palmer: Now, if your Honor please, with those answers of the witness, I think the witness should be permitted to testify as to the method of solution with Fidelity of the problems which the witness has indicated.

The Court: You mean ask his opinions about that?

Mr. Palmer: Yes, sir, as to how that should be done. [fol. 3397] The Court: I sustain the objection. This witness testified a while ago in answer to the Court's question that he took all those phases that he enumerated of the actuary's contacts with the different elements in a plan that might be set up—he took all of them into consideration when he answered my question that from an actuarial standpoint a plan of reorganization could be framed. Now, that is, in my opinion, as far as this witness can go. He can't go beyond the actuarial phases of it.

Mr. Palmer: Still, if your Honor please, the Court has not permitted him to state whether or not from his experience as an actuary if he would do all that whether it would do any good and that is the point we are interested in.

The Court: We are just as qualified to form an opinion on that as this witness is so far as he has shown.

Mr. Palmer: How many of us have been in the reorganization of fifteen life insurance companies, if your Honor please, where we have had those problems and worked them out to see if they would be successful?

The Court: Well, I will have to sustain an objection to his opinion.

[fol. 3398] Mr. Palmer: Let the record show that if the witness were permitted to testify——

Mr. Ray: I object to this, your Honor. He is going to vouch an opinion which your Honor said he couldn't do.

The Court: No, I said he could vouch this witness's opinion all he wishes, but he is not permitted to vouch any facts in the record that the witness would testify to without first asking the questions about those facts and having it ruled on. You may state in the record, Mr. Palmer, whatever you wish as to his opinion.

Mr. Palmer: May I ask the Court's further protection also, since I can't get the courtesy from counsel, when I am addressing myself to the Court that counsel be instructed by the Court to wait until I have concluded my statement before they interrupt with the objection?

Mr. Ray: I am sure we would not have been interrupting if counsel at this end of the table didn't think you had made so many broad statements that shouldn't go into the record.

The Court: I will admonish counsel not to interrupt, because if the Court feels that anything of an improper nature is being said, the Court will do the interrupting.

[fols. 3399-3418] Mr. Palmer: Thank you.

Will you read what I said?

(Mr. Palmer's statement was read as follows: "Let the record show that if the witness were permitted to testify"—)

Mr. Palmer: (Continuing.) Counsel believes that the witness would say that it is possible in his opinion that as to each contract of Fidelity, the equities can be, when the rules for determining the equities have been first laid down by a proper judicial tribunal, exactly determined and thereupon applied to each contract and that that contract can be revised as to actuarial set-up so that that particular contract can be liquidated, either immediately or slowly from the assets of the company.

[fol. 3419] The Court: It would make a difference, wouldn't it, whether the securities were being managed rather than being just left where they are?

A. That is right. In the calculations in computing and determining a contract you are going on one theory of all life insurance companies, and I think it applies the same to a face amount certificate company, because the factors involved are identically of this nature. You are assuming [fol. 3420] that the company is operating as a perpetuity. For instance, you are not trying to determine when a security will mature, when it will be paid off, when it may or may be sold, and if sold, that the money received shall be reinvested. You are also assuming if in one case you are having new money coming in from one contract, that identical dollar, whatever way it is invested, has no practical relationhip to the contract in question. For instance, we have $10,000 here; we are talking about an isolated amount; that $10,000 doesn't apply to any particular contract, but applies to all of them alike. Whether one contract matures, it doesn't make any difference in your assumption whether that money is from premiums, income just received, or whether it liquidated a security. In the valuation of securities as used by life insurance companies it is considered on a long term basis. That is one reason they do not use market values. In making a valuation of the solvency of a company they are not considering as to whether that contract will be sold today, because they have assumed that all of these policies are not going to be cash surrendered today, or they are [fols. 3421-3423] not going to be matured today. That is where your large number comes in again; it is operating as a perpetuity, assuming the same number of contracts in force whether one begins today and the other matures today, that goes back to the theory of a perpetuity in large numbers. That annuity, if you are going to determine just how much they had, that they had $10,000, like you said, or $500 apiece. Now, there is no consideration to cover operating expenses. That would have to be taken into consideration.

[fol. 3424] Mr. Palmer:

Q. Suppose that today it would be decided to determine the proportion of the entire company that each contract holder was entitled to, that one would be entitled 1.52/80,000 and so forth of the company. In other words, there has been made a determination. Now, there is to be no new contract sold, no new payments paid in, but at the end of 10 years the fund is to be paid in its entirety to the contract holders at the end of that period of time, and during that time the securities are to be managed properly by a competent person to keep them so that they will return the greatest amount that can reasonably be expected when liquidated into cash. Now, what other factors in the way [fol. 3425] of operating expenses, in the way of the number of contract holders getting less and less each year, would be encountered in such an idea?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, what is the pertinency of such an idea?

The Court: Well, I will overrule the objection to that.

A. I can't see where—exactly what is meant by it, except that the assumption is—Let me interpret your question and ask whether this is a correct interpretation or not. Do you mean what would have to be considered in order to liquidate this over a period of ten years?

Q. That is right.

A. That goes back to the liquidation again of a fixed amount. Now, as to being able to determine if a person had an equity of 85 cents today, to determine what he could get, then you have a large number of factors there that are speculative.

Q. Well, what are those factors?

A. Well, you don't know what those assets are going to liquidate for, even though you determine the market value [fol. 3426] today, then you are going into the speculation of what these securities bring over a period of ten years liquidating them 1/10th a year. Who knows which securities are going to be liquidated? Putting them in the form of statistics, you are getting away from the perpetuity entirely, and you must liquidate possibly 10 per cent each year. Now, whether the next three years they would liquidate correspondingly to the value as to what they would bring today has no relation to what the securities you are going to liquidate four years from now, except through speculation. You don't know whether they are going to be up or down or what the securities the individual decides to sell, or whether he sells the security today even at a loss compared to the value placed on that today. That is the one large speculation. Another is the interest factor, another is the expenses. You can't estimate what the expenses are going to be unless you know the nature of your setup. Just before, when I was talking about going into the expense of a reorganization plan, or what the company may be, you are assuming as a going life insurance company what the expenses are going to be accord[fol. 3427] ing to the average or according to what can be expected. Now, as to what they are going to be, you don't know. When you are talking about a reorganized company you don't even know what the management is going to be, you don't know what the setup is going to be, you don't know what kind of people they are going to have. That goes back to taking the individual case and applying it to the general rule. You can't apply anything to this company, because as soon as you apply to the background of the company statistics do not apply. As soon as you change your basic information, it is like saying, "What can the profits be on this as a life insurance company as compared to a face amount company?

The Court: Isn't there a short answer to what Mr. Palmer asks you, that actuarial calculations are never made on a liquidation basis?

A. That is correct.

Mr. Palmer: You spoke about expenses. As the number of contract holders decreased in the assumed case I have given you, the expenses per person must go up? Isn't that true—or is it true?

A. Well, in general, if you have a fixed company, we [fol. 3428] have a company operating——

Q. No, forget that, please, sir, and stick to my question.

A. I have to make some assumptions. Maybe I misinterpreted your question.

Q. Taking Fidelity today, taking the assets of it, and we are going to finish up with them in ten years we are going to pay off the contract holders as we go along during that period of ten years, now, as the number of contract holders gets smaller, isn't it true that the expense per person left in the group will be high?

A. You are going back to the same statement we made a while ago in making a statement as to what the expenses are going to be operating under a given plan. You are assuming you know what they are going to be.

Q. Will your expenses be higher or lower per person?

A. You are not operating?

Q. That is right.

A. We just stated a while ago that in making computations from statistical data you are not figuring on a liquidating plan.

Q. Well, figure on this liquidating plan. That is what [fol. 3429] I want you to do.

A. I can only assume by comparisons with a life insurance company or even Fidelity.

Q. All right.

A. If you take the same company with a hundred thousand contract holders, and whether those, through forced liquidation, voluntary liquidation or just natural liquidation—that is, by natural liquidation I mean where the sales of new contracts are less than the maturing contracts of those who carried their contracts in—in other words, the normal operation of the business is decreasing as far as the number of contracts in force, yet a number of your expenses are fixed, such as the cost of the home office, such as managerial fees, in some cases, if it depreciated sufficiently, your expenses are coming down.

The Court: Are you talking about an operating company or liquidating.

A. Liquidating, whether it is voluntary or otherwise.

Q. Why do you think it is necessary to have a home office in case of liquidation?

[fol. 3430] A. Well, I said that I could only compare it to that, because we don't know under what conditions the company would be liquidated. That is to be determined. That is the reason I said I couldn't state a factor there.

The Court: Go ahead. I didn't mean to interrupt.

The Witness: That is all right.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. So that, as I gather it, your answer would be that the expenses, as the group grows smaller, are necessarily higher in proportion per individual in the group?

A. As a rule I think that would apply, because fixed expenses remain the same regardless of the number involved.

Q. When you take a large enough group, you can apply your totals based on past experience to that group, and you so do in your business? Isn't that true?

A. Yes, we apply it and then we compare the actual experience with what we have estimated.

Q. You would not, however, attempt to take one individual of that group and say, "These general rules should apply to that individual"?

A. When you are working on individual cases you ap-[fol. 3431] ply the general rule, yes.

Q. As you come gradually down, where you get a smaller and smaller group, is it true that you come further and further from your general rule of averages?

A. That is true; the smaller your sample the larger your fluctuation from that which you predicted or expected.

Q. So that if you assumed at the beginning a given rate of interest, as your group got down lower and lower the possibilities of your assumption varying would be greater and greater. Is that correct?

A. That doesn't necessarily apply. I think it does to some extent, but the degree, as far as the interest on investments is concerned, it goes back to this, if you have two securities, one of them earning interest and the other is not, naturally only 50 per cent is earning interest, whereas if you had a large group you could still isolate them and pick them out where only half of them are earning interest. Large portfolios usually vary to a less degree because they are more or less constant. Again, you are getting away from liquidating.

[fol. 3432] Q. Now, Mr. Latta, with reference to forming Fidelity into a going life insurance company, one of the problems that you would have—one of the problems, I say, —would be this question of the liquidation, slowly or rapidly, of some of those contract holders. Isn't that true?

A. That would be a question to be considered, and it would be different in each case of reorganization contemplated or each plan that would be contemplated.

Q. I say, in converting Fidelity into a life insurance company, you are going to have to have some of those contracts liquidated either immediately or slowly by virtue of this annuity plan or some analogous plan? Isn't that correct?

A. Yes, if you are going to liquidate over practically the limit of time involved in one contract, ten or eleven years, that is the life of them, therefore all of the contracts that are there now, assuming the practical question or the theoretical question, either mature or begin to mature within a period of ten years.

Q. Now, considering that you would take none of the assets of this company away from those former contract [fols. 3433-3437] holders, then the only way that you would have to get operating expenses under the new life insurance company to manage this voluntary or slow liquidation would be by virtue of the money you would get from new premiums? Isn't that true?

A. Yes, I would say that was true, unless you took it from the equity that was there now.

Q. I said, leave that equity there.

A. Oh, I didn't understand it.

Q. So, in other words, if you would turn Fidelity into a life insurance company and want to give each contract holder the equity that he now has, it would be necessary for new policy holders to pay for the liquidation of the old ones? Isn't that the substance of it?

A. Well, of course you are assuming that you are going to give it out to them in a fixed manner?

[fol. 3438] Q. Now, Mr. Latta, with reference to converting Fidelity into a going life insurance company, there would be a certain percentage who would be insurable—that is true, is it not?

A. Yes.

Q. And there would be a certain percentage of those who would take out insurance. That is true, is it not?

A. I would imagine that would be true.

Q. That would necessarily consist of an agreement between them and the new company for a conversion of their equity in their old Fidelity contract into a new life insurance policy. That is true, is it not?

A. I believe that would be true.

Q. As to the balance of the group who either were not insurable or who were not inclined to take insurance, there would have to be some means of liquidating their equities in their Fidelity contracts. That is true, is it not?

A. That would depend on what you mean by liquidating.

Q. There would have to be some way of giving them money in exchange for their equities.

[fol. 3439] A. Naturally if you are going to give them their equity they have to have some means of receiving it.

Q. That is right. One way would be to sell the securities or assets which back up their equity and turn [illegible] over to them in cash. That is true, isn't it?

A. That is one way. That is liquidating the equity, I would call it.

Q. Another way would be the hypothetical way we discussed earlier of giving it to them over a ten year period. Isn't that true?

A. Yes, roughly.

Q. Sir?

A. Roughly, I would say.

Q. I want you to give me other ways which you would have of converting their equity into and returning cash to them?

A. Well, there would be a number of ways, but they would all range between a case of immediate liquidation and paying the equities as soon as the assets could be liquidated, and offering them in some form of annuity or some method of payment over a period of time, or to operate the fund [fol. 3440] or those assets over a period of time and then having a deferred liquidation.

Q. In other words, it would either be immediate liquidation, and by that we are speaking of selling the as-ets and converting them into cash and distributing that, or deferring that to a later period, or giving them some form of annuity or a combination, or giving them an immediate cash liquidation plus annuities and later deferred liquidation? Is that correct?

A. It could be any degrees, yes—any number of degrees.

Q. But those are the basic principles?

A. I would say yes, because annuities is a broad term.

The Court: It could be fixing the amount of their equity on a percentage basis and then just letting their contracts that they now hole mature, couldn't it?

A. That is true.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. And each of those would involve the various items of expenses that you have heretofore discussed?

A. Naturally you can't manage it and handle it without having expense, if that is what you mean.

[fols. 3441-3468] Q. And be subject to the risks of depreciation and appreciation that you have discussed?

A. I covered two or three elements a while ago.

Q. With reference to reforming Fidelity as a going life insurance company, it is true, is it not, that that part of the company which would operate to sell new life insurance and set up reserves on it would be, in effect, beginning as a new life insurance company, starting from scratch? Isn't that true?

A. Oh, they have no life insurance now, and the only way I can see would be starting one from scratch.

Q. There would have to be a capital structure or fund set up to begin with, wouldn't there?

A. In some way, otherwise you can't obtain a license to sell.

. . . . . .

[fol. 3469] Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I ask that the testimony of Mr. John Marshall on his direct examination, Volume I, pages 429 and 430, to the effect that he thought a plan was feasible and that he never saw anyone who had ever made a study of the situation in our organization who did not feel that it was feasible and that he knew that that was the position of Mr. Arthur Koontz all these years—I ask that that testimony be stricken out. I further ask that the testimony of Mr. Pulfer, Volume II, page 788, as to the feasibility of a plan of reorganization, be stricken. I ask that the testimony of Mr. Messick, Volume II, pages 889-890, be stricken. I ask that the testimony of [fols. 3470-3477] Mr. Young, also introduced by the debtor, Volume III, page 1423-7, as to the feasibility of the plan, your Honor, stating their opinion be stricken from the record.

The Court: Overruled.

* * * * * * *

By Mr. Farmer:

Q. Mr. Latta, who employed you, that is, what officer of the Fidelity company, to come down to Wheeling the first of January and do this work which you did?

[fol. 3479] A. I wasn't employed by Fidelity until February 12th.

Q. All right; February 12th.

A. As to whom I was employed by, I can't say. I was so informed—rather I had interviews with various officers, and my understanding was that they took that into consideration, and I was informed after tentative arrangements were made that it must be approved by the executive committee——

Q. Who were those officers that told you what the nature of your work was to be—your duties?

A. Well, the nature of it in general—general consensus was that I was to be an actuary and underwriter for the time being.

The Court: He said who told you that?

A. Well, the tentative discussions were made with Mr. Messick.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. Mr. Messick?

A. He was the first gentleman to contact me; he was the first officer.

Q. Did he tell you that the company was in financial distress and he wanted you to go down and see if you could [fols. 3480-3484] work out some plan of keeping it off the rocks, or words to that effect?

A. No, he didn't say that.

Q. No, not those exact words—what did he tell you, then?

A. Well, his inference was essentially this, that the company could no longer operate in accordance with the laws as a face amount company in the manner that it had in the past, and they as a group—I don't know who he meant by "they"—had exhausted their possibility and made a complete study of the matter and had decided that they wanted to reorganize the Fidelity Investment company as an insurance company, and since they had to change their methods of operations that they believed that the nature was similar and their best future would be based upon reorganizing as an insurance company, and they had contemplated a reorganization program by which, through some method, they could convert this into an insurance company, and that was the reason they were interested in having me come with the company—that was the basis of the whole conference.

[fol. 3485] Q. If you have an insolvent company, of course, it is axiomatic that there are just two ways of obtaining a condition of solvency, either by increasing the assets from a source outside the company, or by effecting a reduction of the liabilities of the company so that the liabilities will correspond to the assets?

A. That is correct.

Q. Now then, what amount did you calculate, that is, in dollars and cents, that reduction of 15 per cent in the uni-[fol. 3486] form plan would be—roughly; I am not asking you to give it to me in dollars and cents.

A. Roughly it would be three and one-half million dollars.

Q. Did you and the other officers who worked on it, in suggesting this 15 per cent reduction, arrive at that percentage of reduction for the purpose of obtaining that given sum of three and one-half million, or how did you happen to take the 15 per cent?

A. Well, I think 15 per cent is set out in the plan—If you notice, you have two plans there; they are each different; and if you made five others—but in each case various factors were involved in determining which one would be given in typewritten form.

Q. Well, in each of them were you seeking to obtain the result of the release of about three and one-half million of liabilities?

A. Naturally we would have had approximately that amount, which, in accordance with the valuation of the assets as given in that exhibit, it would require that amount in order to make the company solvent and establish it as a going concern.

[fol. 3487] Q. Your plans were formulated with a view of obtaining that goal—that end—is that right?

A. That was one of the purposes.

Q. One of the purposes?

A. Yes, sir. Now, for instance you made the statement as to what the purpose of the plan was there, and you read in substance. If you will note, it called for a transfer of both the assets and liabilities of the fund to the general fund. You also made an inference in that connection, that it was for the purpose of establishing a surplus in the general fund. Well, that is not true. The purpose of transferring it to the general fund was not necessarily to create a surplus to the general fund, which belonged more or less to the stockholders, but the income funds, for instance, the special income, had a deficiency which had no direct relationship with the 15 per cent, and the same way with each of the other funds. Whatever method of valuation you used, each fund would have a different degree of solvency. Therefore the only way that a uniform plan would mean anything in order to reduce the liabilities on a uniform basis, would be a consolidated plan whereby the results [fol. 3488] would be that all assets and liabilities would be consolidated. One of the purposes, primarily, would be to eliminate so many different funds, because of the great expense of operating those on a fund basis. In addition, each time you have a fund and you later decide to discontinue the issuance of those contracts, where there is no new contract holders belonging to that fund, then immediately that fund becomes upon a voluntary liquidation basis—I should say automatic liquidating basis—because every time a contract matures there is just one less, and it will over a period of years, liquidate; it is on a liquidating basis. Therefore, one of the objectives in that plan would be to eliminate the various funds that it now has. In each of those plans I think it called for—at least the purpose behind it would be to eliminate those funds.

Q. You say in each of those plans?

A. Yes.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Eliminate which funds?

A. What I mean is, eliminate the segregation into special income and special annuity. I mean all the assets and liabilities would be in one general fund.

[fol. 3489] The Court: You mean eliminate the fund principle from the company's operation?

A. That is correct, and have all the operations just as the company, in one general fund.

Mr. Farmer: You say that was a feature or framework of each of the plans?

A. That is one of the basic principles, yes, sir, and that is the reason for transferring it to the general fund.

Q. That just made it convenient—the bookkeeping was separate?

A. Well, not only that, because, as I said before, each fund, whenever contracts are not being issued, it is automatically on a liquidating basis, and the contracts in establishing and setting up the contracts, they were not computed or determined to be on a liquidating basis, but on a perpetuity.

The Court: The result of that, as I understand your entire testimony, is that when a particular form of contract is discontinued, if that contract has been kept in a separate fund and thereby goes on a liquidating basis, it may, in the process of that liquidation, and without any other factors [fol. 3490] coming in, become insolvent?

A. That is true.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. Which had happened.

A. Which had happened. In other words, the history proves itself that that is what happens. You will note that the oldest fund in each instance is less than solvent.

Q. In other words, that was the history as exemplified by this company?

A. Yes.

Q. First income becomes insolvent and then special annuity?

A. That is true.

Q. And then the next one?

A. That has been true in every instance.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 3491] Mr. Farmer:

Q. Did I understand you to say, Mr. Latta, that there were six other plans besides these two?

A. No, I said several other plans that there could have [fols. 3492-3510] been put in there. I think you are referring to the 15 per cent, as to what was the purpose of using the 15 per cent?

Q. That is right.

A. I said there were several plans discussed and formulated. Each one was different, and there were various facts that entered into the reason for using the 15 per cent.

Q. Were the others all graduated plans, graduated like this plan you filed yesterday, except graduated on a different basis, that is, inflicting the loss in different ratios in the different funds?

A. There were different variations.

Q. And the problem is one of where the loss is going to be inflicted, isn't it?

A. That was one of the major problems, yes.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 3511] Q. The Court this morning asked you this question—I think this is a correct statement of the question—would it be possible to—the word wasn't "formulate"—to construct actuarially a plan for reorganization for Fidelity, and your answer was yes.

A. That is correct.

Q. You did not mean to say that it would be probable to construct actuarially, taking into consideration all these other factors that you have delineated since that question was asked as being considerations that an actuary must give effect to in constructing a plan that would be feasible and would probably be successful in operation, did you?

[fol. 3512] Mr. Ray: We object to that, your Honor. That is asking for an opinion.

The Court: You were asking him if it was probable that a plan would be constructed?

Mr. Farmer: Just read the question, if the Court please.

(The question was read.)

The Court: I sustain the objection.

Mr. Farmer: On what grounds is there objection?

Mr. Ray: Giving an opinion.

The Court: You mean the grounds of sustaining the objection?

Mr. Farmer: No, the grounds of the objection. I assume it was sustained on the same grounds as the objection.

Mr. Ray: It asked for the opinion of the witness, which the witness is not qualified to give.

Mr. Farmer: If the Court please, I think the witness is qualified to explain his understanding of the questions and answers.

The Court: Well, you may ask him to explain, but you are asking him now whether he says now that it is probable [fols. 3513-3517] that such a plan could be constructed.

Mr. Farmer: That is exactly the point, your Honor. Your Honor's question asked him if it was possible to construct actuarially a plan for reorganization of Fidelity, and he said yes. Now I think the witness will answer that mathematically speaking it will be possible, but that practically speaking, considering all these other factors, which an actuary must necessarily take into consideration, that it would not be probable that such a plan could be constructed that would be reasonably expected to be feasible.

The Court: Well, that is just another and probably a clever way of trying to get his opinion. I sustain the objection.

Mr. Farmer: It is more than that, if the Court please. I deem that confined to the issue that your Honor must decide.

The Court: Well, I sustain the objection. I don't want to hear any further argument about it. I heard enough of that earlier in the day.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 3518] Q. Mr. Latta, since February 12th you have examined only the probabilities of reorganization solely from the viewpoint of a life insurance company? Is that correct?

[fol. 3519] A. It is essentially correct, yes.

Q. So that any testimony you have given today has been mostly from the background of rehabilitation as a life insurance company, not as a face amount certificate company or as any other kind of company into which the debtor might be reorganized? Is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. Are you aware of any federal court receiverships in Chapter 10 or 77B proceedings in which there has been a reorganization of a life insurance company?

A. I don't know of any, no.

Q. You would not say that there were not any?

A. No, I am not qualified to answer that question, except that I know of none.

Q. You have just testified about features of Series B. Would there be a greater loss by liquidation to Series B contract holders than by reorganization?

A. Well, if a person had no insurance contract—let me put it this way. In dollars and cents I can't see—it has no bearing, except that there is one feature in the B contract that, if you liquidate, all of those having insurance have lost their protection and could not replace that insurance [fol. 3520] protection in case they were not insurable. That would be an intangible loss that could not be valued in dollars and cents, and would differ with every individual.

Q. And if, in the interim from the time they signed a Series B contract until the time it was cancelled, they became uninsurable, that would be a tremendous loss to them, would it not?

A. If they wanted to keep that insurance, yes.

Q. So that if the debtor is reorganized, in fairness to the Series B contract holders, some kind of insurance would have to be included in the reorganization for those people.

A. Well, to prevent them from getting a loss, there would have to be some provision.

Q. That would be one of the equities to be considered—I mean courtroom equities distinguished from actuary equities?

A. I think that would have some bearing, yes.

Q. You have prepared Exhibits 113, 112 and 111, which are, as far as 111 and 112 are concerned, two of the seven plans that you worked on between February 12th and April [fol. 3521] 12th?

A. I didn't say I prepared these.

The Court: He didn't say seven.

Mr. Huwe: Did you say several or seven?

A. In the first instance, I didn't say I prepared these.

Q. You contributed to them?

A. Yes, I collaborated in their preparation.

Q. How many were there altogether, seven or——

A. I wouldn't state.

Q. Those were presented to the SEC?

A. Yes.

Q. As far as you know?

A. That is correct.

Q. And you were there?

A. That is right.

Q. Let me ask you, what is the standard of evaluating securities in insurance companies for purposes of rehabilitation? What standard is used?

A. For the purpose of rehabilitation I can't say there is any set standard.

Q. Isn't it a fact that the recognized standard is the in[fol. 3522] surance conference method of evaluating securities?

A. Well now, that is not set up for the purpose of rehabilitation. As a going concern there is a standard set up by the Conference of Insurance Commissioners. They have set up a standard for evaluating the assets of an insurance company.

Q. Is there an insolvency standard?

A. In determining insolvency that valuation of assets is used.

Q. Would that be the valuation used for the purpose of reorganizing a company?

Mr. Palmer: I object to the question on the ground that the witness has just stated that that was used for a going concern method, which would naturally answer the question of the examiner.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Huwe:

Q. Then a going concern method would be the kind upon which a plan of reorganization would be based? Is that correct?

A. No, I stated that there wasn't a definite rule on that. The insurance standard valuation would be used in de[fol. 3523] termining the solvency, which would be an assurance of your success for future operations at a later date. That is not necessarily used in a plan of rehabilitation. I have seen a number of methods used.

Q. What standard was used in 111 and 112—West Virginia sound standard?

A. I did not evaluate the assets. I have stated in several instances that I had no part in the preparation of the figures presented in those exhibits.

Q. The SEC refused to consider those plans because you took an assumed valuation rather than an actual valuation of some sort? Isn't that correct, or isn't that one of the reasons for criticism and rejection?

A. The criticism that I mentioned before was that they objected they did not believe that they carried the element—in other words, it wasn't sufficient—that the plan when put into effect, the results attained were not sufficient to be carried out. Their interpretation of the evaluation of the assets I don't know.

Q. One of their objections or one of their suggestions was that an umbrella of court procedure was required in order to prevent cash surrenders? Isn't that cor[fols. 3524-3527] rect?

A. In substance I think that is correct.

• • • • • • •

[fol. 3528] Mr. Huwe:

Q. In your graduated plans, did you ever determine what amount each fund had in the way of assets?

A. I didn't refer to my graduated plan. He was talking about a specific exhibit. I made no plan.

Q. The plan that you contributed to, marked Exhibit 111.

The Witness: Now, the rest of the question.

(The question was read.)

A. I have never been able to determine the solvency of any of the funds, if that is what is meant by the question.

Q. Did you, in your contribution toward these plans, consider the value of the National Sales Agency's notes?

A. I did not.

Q. You accepted the October 31——

[fols. 3529-3531] A. I didn't contribute to the figures presented in this exhibit. I believe, though, that it shows in that exhibit that the National Sales Agency note is considered at zero, with no value.

[fol. 3532] Q. You did considerable work with Mr. Ross Thomas, one of the state court receivers?

A. I did some, yes.

Q. What can you say as to his knowledge and ability of [fol. 3533] the workings of Fidelity and the laws and parts of laws connected therewith?

The Court: Mr. Palmer, I don't desire to cut you off or anything, but it seems to me that you are going back now on to a resumption of asking this witness to give testimony —I understood you were through a while ago with the main phase of it.

Mr. Palmer: That is correct, your Honor.

The Court: Is this something that will take another long period of time?

Mr. Palmer: I think one answer will suffice. I want this witness's opinion as to whether or not Mr. Thomas, as a lawyer, being a receiver, was capable of handling Fidelity as a receiver. In other words, this gentleman has worked with other attorneys and other receivers and I wanted to know whether his opinion was that Mr. Thomas was capable of acting as attorney in that receivership and as a receiver.

The Court: Has there been any challenge of that?

Mr. Palmer: There have been more or less indirect challenges whether Mr. Thomas was capable as a state court receiver.

[fols. 3534-3547] The Court: As to his capability I have heard none.

Mr. Palmer: If he is capable then I will withdraw the question.

The Court: All right. We have been talking about his suitability, not his capability.

[fol. 3548] Arthur B. Koontz called as a witness by the Tennessee contract holders, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Farmer:

Q. This is Mr. Arthur Koontz?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are a practicing lawyer at the Bar of Charleston, West Virginia?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And senior member of the firm of Koontz & Koontz?

A. I am.

Q. Do you have several members of that firm in addition to your brother, Mr. Pat Koontz?

A. Several associates, yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Ross Thomas, Mr. Campbell Palmer are associ-[fol. 3549] ates?

A. They are.

Q. And Mr. Goldsmith, I believe?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Koontz, how long have you practiced law in West Virginia—Charleston?

A. Since 1911.

Q. Have you had any experience in financial or banking matters or in connection with banks?

A. Somewhat. I represented a national bank the first ten years of my practice and organized a state bank and represented it as general counsel.

Q. State whether or not you at the present time, are a director of the Pittsburgh Joint Stock Land Bank?

A. No, I happen to be a director of the Home Owners Loan of Pittsburgh, the same in that field as the Federal Reserve is in the commercial banking field.

Q. Are you a director of a Charleston bank?

A. I am vice-president and director of The Charleston National Bank of Charleston, a national banking association.

Q. These banks that you testified about organizing—— [fols. 3550-3553] A. I organized the Union Trust Company in 1913 and consolidated the Union Trust Company and a number of other banks into the Charleston National Bank in the late twenties under the name of Charleston National Bank.

Q. And it is now the Charleston National Bank you are connected with?

A. That is right.

Q. State whether or not you also happen to be Democratic National Committeeman from West Virginia?

A. For the past few months, yes, sir, since about May or June, 1940.

Q. So that your experience in addition to legal matters or legal practice has been considerable in the line of financial matters?

A. That is true.

Q. Mr. Koontz, when did you first become connected in any way with Fidelity Investment company?

A. In the early thirties, I think it was '32, they asked me to do some work for them here.

• • • • • • •

[fol. 3554] Q. Mr. Koontz, prior to that time had the directors of Fidelity had under consideration some sort of reorganization or recapitalization of Fidelity—that is, prior to 1938?

A. Not for the past three or four years just immediately prior thereto. They seemed to be doing a very good business in '36 and '37, and I don't remember that they had under consideration—under serious consideration in any way recapitalization.

Q. Prior to 1936 had it been under consideration?

[fol. 3555] A. It certainly had, from that on back to the early thirties the question of depletion of portfolio and reserves and so on. They would talk about trying to get new capital and how we might recapitalize and whatnot, but never did.

Q. What part had you to do, if any, with that effort during that period to secure new capital?

A. None whatever. None in particular. We discussed it at directors' meetings, and I was a committee member part of that time, probably all the time. They had two committees, one an executive committee and one a finance committee. I was on both of them part of the time, probably most of the time, but I never attempted to secure new capital for it before 1938.

Q. In 1938 did you commence efforts toward that end?

A. I did, beginning in December immediately after the SEC suit was filed in Michigan, I attempted to interest new capital and proceeded to try to interest new capital for—oh, about a year after that.

Q. Mr. Koontz, in your past experience had you had occasion, as an attorney, to take part in the reorganization of companies—had you had experience in reorganiza[fol. 3556] tion lines?

A. I had.

Q. Will you just state what reorganizations you had taken part in and acted as attorney in?

A. Well, I was receiver for some gas companies in Delaware, and we reorganized those companies. We reorganized here in Kanawha County some other gas companies, now known as the Cumberland group, and The Elk Horn Coal Corporation in a 77B proceeding in 1937. I was active in that in the federal court in Ohio. I was in federal court in Oklahoma City in connection with the reorganization of Consolidated Gas Company.

Q. State, if you will, what efforts you made in 1938 and following that to reorganize or procure new capital for Fidelity?

A. We had a director of Fidelity by the name of Grosscup who was connected with what is known as the Greenfield Banking crowd in Philadelphia, Bankers—not Bankers Trust Company, but Bankers Company, I believe is the name of it. Anyway, it is known as one of the Greenfield institutions; and through that connection we attempted to [fol. 3557] interest the Greenfield crowd—is that Bankers Securities Corporation? I believe that is the name of it. Mr. Grosscup happened to be head of that. That was the first group we tried to interest, and they were very much interested, and made a thorough investigation and talked for some time as though they were going to refinance the company and take care of whatever it needed.

Q. Was it your aim and your object to secure new working capital?

A. That is true.

Q. Operating funds?

A. That is true.

Q. That did not consummate?

A. That is true, it did not.

Q. Then did you make further efforts to secure new moneys?

A. Yes, sir, during the entire year, and probably on into the next year.

Q. What banking institutions or companies or individuals did you approach?

A. Lazard Freres in New York was one. We spent some time with them.

[fol. 3558] Q. Is that a brokerage house in New York?

A. It is, I think, an investment banking house.

Q. A large, well known, well regarded institution?

A. Yes, sir, very high class personnel, well regarded institution.

Q. Any others?

A. G. M. B. Murphy was another one.

Q. What is G. M. B. Murphy?

A. That is an investment banking house, not so large or so strong as the first one mentioned.

Q. What others?

A. I was trying to think of the order of them. Pell and company was another one.

Q. Is that the brokerage in which Mr. Hamilton Pell——

A. Mr. Hamilton Pell is the head of it, yes, sir. Some little Philadelphia life insurance company, the name of which I forget. I spent some time in Philadelphia—a very small company. Then a man by the name of Allebach in Cincinnati had an automobile finance concern, and got very much interested. He came to New York for meetings, came to Wheeling for meetings; somebody went to Cincinnati for other meetings there, and so on, and finally [fol. 3559] made some kind of contract with him.

Q. You mean the company did?

A. Fidelity—some arrangement whereby he was given an option for a certain time to come in on a certain basis. Never consummated.

Q. He was to put in new money?

A. He didn't put in any new money.

Q. He was to put in new money if that was carried through?

A. That is right.

Q. When did you see Pell and company?

A. I forget. I could check up, if that makes any particular difference.

Q. Was that in 1938 or 1939?

A. Late in '39, probably, or early in '40.

Q. Did those negotiations extend over a brief or long period of time?

A. No, they were right extensive negotiations. We had a number of meetings with them.

Q. And was that with a view to their putting new money into Fidelity?

A. It was, yes, sir. And naming some others, I tried [fol. 3560] to get the Lincoln Life Insurance Company people interested, because we had an arrangement with them whereby they carried insurance on a number of our contract holders; had a number of meetings with them.

Q. That is Fort Wayne, Indiana?

A. Fort Wayne, Indiana.

Q. Lincoln National Life Insurance Company?

A. That is right, Lincoln National Life Insurance Company.

The Court: Mr. Koontz, with reference to your negotiations with Pell and company, what was the rock on which they foundered?

A. Well, we have to earn so much money on reserves, they didn't think it was set up on a basis so we could earn that reserve requirement. It was 4 or 4½ per cent and 5 per cent, some of them, I think. They just didn't think we could earn that money under the conditions; and they wondered, since changing conditions, whether or not a company operating in this field might be successful in the future. It was just on general grounds.

Q. Did the fact that the assets of the company may [fol. 3561] not have been sufficient to cover all its liabilities have anything to do with the failure of those negotiations?

A. Your Honor, that is why we were negotiating, was to get money to supplement our common fund so that the company, no matter how these obligations were—could at all possibly meet its obligations.

Q. It is now stated that the company is about 10 per cent insolvent on the basis of market values. I want to know whether that particular feature of it had anything to do with Pell and company not coming into it.

A. I don't know that that was discussed at all. Of course, we were going to have to have a very substantial amount of money; we talked about from one to two million dollars with Pell and company, and they talked about some smaller picture or Fidel, and talked about being interested in a half million dollars. I don't know whether it was the insolvency of some of these funds or the amount of money involved or the lack of soundness economically of the system or just what it was that caused them to turn it down. I would say a combination of them, probably.

The Court: All right: go ahead.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. You say you were talking about Fidel at that time? [fol. 3562] A. They talked some about Fidel, yes.

Q. Did they, or not, indicate a willingness to take over Fidel at that time?

A. Oh, they did; they indicated a willingness to do some financing in connection with Fidel to make it a larger company.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: During what time was that?

A. That was at the same time we were negotiating for funds for Fidelity; I don't recall the date.

Q. Do you recall the year?

A. Either late in '39 or early in '40. If that date is essential I can get the exact date that I was in New York with Haskins and Sells' man, Mr. Clarke, because we were there for several days.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. Did the directors of Fidelity look with favor on letting Fidel go — them at that time?

A. No, they did not.

Q. Did you have any other negotiations with another investment house?

A. Yes, that brings out another one, the Atlas Corporation, Floyd Odlum's concern. Odlum had been a director [fol. 3563] in this company formerly, and I worked with them for some weeks, and that wound up just like most of the others. Odlum was interested, he said, in taking over Fidel—take it over and liquidate it. He told me that he would take it over and just liquidate it rather than carry on the business.

Q. Where was Mr. Odlum?

A. Well, we speak of him being in New York. His office is actually across in New Jersey, either Newark or Jersey City.

Q. That was a corporation, one of the big companies?

A. Yes, that is true, one of the very large ones.

Q. And Mr. Odlum is quite a prominent man in financial circles—investment circles?

A. Yes, sir, legal circles and financial circles and so on.

Q. Investment companies?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Holding companies and so forth?

(No answer.)

Q. Did you see anyone else in connection with the matter?

[fol. 3564] A. Mr. McCandless, the head of the Lincoln National Life, put me in touch with an old school friend and former business associate of his in Chicago whose name I forget. He managed for a number of years the Hearst papers and had had some insurance experience. I saw him for two or three days and he finally turned me over to what is known as the Chicago Corporation.

Q. What was the Chicago Corporation? Is that as big as it sounds?

A. The Chicago Corporation was organized about—oh, during the panic, as they say themselves, to take advantage of bargains. I forget the head of that. The head of it was formerly secretary to Mr. Cummings, who is head of the largest bank in Chicago, a man with some experience, and they were interested in looking into this for the reason that they had been asked not very many months before to refinance Investors Syndicate; they were very familiar wtih the general type of business; and they did look into this, asked me to submit all my reports, which I did, and finally decided that they did not want to go into it.

Q. State whether or not you negotiated with a Morris [fol. 3565] Plan bank?

A. I did, yes, for some time.

Q. Where were they located?

A. Well, over the country generally, but I negotiated with Mr. Arthur Morris, who is president of the New York bank, and is, I think, chairman of the board of the top company; the Morris Plan Corporation of America I believe is the name of it. I met with him and with his directors.

Q. Did he go into Fidelity?

A. Very thoroughly.

Q. Its operations?

A. Very thoroughly. He is another one that had some experience in his early business career of selling investment contracts, and he knew generally about the business, and he and his directors went into it very thoroughly.

Q. Did you see also the Cleveland brokerage firm of Otis and Company?

A. That is right. I did.

Q. Can you think of any others that you contacted which you have not already mentioned?

[fol. 3566] A. No, sir, I don't outside ones. I will say this, I had a meeting with the main business men of Wheeling and talked it over with them. They appointed a committee, and a number of them talked this over with other members of the company. I didn't negotiate very much with them except I laid the plan before them.

Q. And what was that plan?

A. Well, the plan—no interest evidenced.

Q. No what?

A. I mean the result was no particular interest was evidenced by them in going into it.

Q. These negotiations with these financiers and investment men and brokers and insurance men throughout the company, you said, commenced in 1939 and extended over into 1940?

A. I said late in '38.

Q. Did there come a time when Mr. Allen G. Messick came on the scene and manifested an interest?

A. That is true; Allen G. Messick and a man by the name of Bernard Rosset—we spoke of them as Rosset and Messick, the way they were written in the various papers—from Chicago.

[fol. 3567] Q. How did it happen, if you know, that they began looking into the company?

A. Hal Pulfer, who was in charge of the sales office in Chicago, seemed to be the one that got them in it.

Q. You didn't contact them yourself?

A. No, not at all. I think he and Messick were probably schoolmates. Knew each other at school, possibly.

Q. Did you have any part in the negotiations with Mr. Messick and Mr. Rosset that led to the drafting of this contract that has been filed here and introduced in evidence, referred to as the Messick contract?

A. Yes; I don't know what the contract is that has been introduced in evidence, but I did have considerable part in the negotiation with Rosset and Messick which led to their coming to Wheeling and entering into a contract which called for putting up a substantial amount of money upon certain conditions, a half million dollars as I remember is what they were committed on, if certain things were true and so on.

Q. Their plan was, was it not, that they were going to capitalize a new company separate and distinct from Fidelity?

[fol. 3568] A. That is true.

Q. With a half million dollar capital?

A. That is true.

Q. And issue new certificates and assume such liabilities of Fidelity on old outstanding certificates as the new company, at its option, might elect to assume.

A. That is true.

Q. And sell through the existing sales force of Fidelity?

A. That is generally what the plan was.

Q. The idea was that the new money that they put in would not be subjected to the risk that it would be if it were put in the old company?

A. That is right.

Q. Do you know the reason why that contract was not carried out—why that plan fell down?

A. I don't know the exact reason. I know there seemed to be some misunderstanding and scrapping between Rosset and Messick themselves. I don't know whether any notice was served on the company which gave any particular reason for their not going ahead with it or not.

Q. Did you know that Mr. Rosset brought a suit in Chi- [fol. 3569] cago against Mr. Messick charging breach of contract and seeking damages for his failure to carry that out?

A. I didn't see the praecipe or the declaration. I heard that that was true and saw some correspondence on it.

Q. I believe Fidelity was also made a defendant in that bill?

A. That is true.

Q. Did Mr. Messick later become connected with the company after that?

A. I don't know whether it was later. He did become connected with the company as chairman of the board, I think was his title. I am not sure but what that was before the filing of the suit. In fact, I think it was.

Q. Who was Mr. Rosset? Do you know what business he was in?

A. Mr. Rosset is a banker. He is head of what is known as the Metropolitan Trust Company. It is not a regular commercial bank; it is a trust company.

Q. Of Chicago, Illinois?

A. That is right.

Q. Do you know what Mr. Rosset charged in his bill seek[fol. 3570] ing damages from Mr. Messick for failing to carry out his contract—what his contention was about it?

A. You mean in the million dollar suit?

Q. Yes.

A. No, sir, I do not. I have never seen the declaration, if there was one filed.

Q. What was the reason for Mr. Messick becoming connected with Fidelity as long as the contract was not carried out, do you know?

A. No, I don't; I wasn't around Wheeling very much at that time, and I wasn't present when he was elected chairman of the board. I don't know how that came about.

Q. Do you know what services Mr. Messick was rendering to the company at that time that caused him to commence drawing a salary?

A. No, I do not. He was getting familiar with the affairs of the company when he was negotiating for Rosset and himself, and the next thing I knew he had been chosen chairman of the board of Fidelity.

Q. That was in 1940?

A. 1940. I am not sure of the month.

Q. And your negotiations with all these other men and [fol. 3571] houses—investment houses, bankers and so forth that you have outlined occurred prior to the time that Mr. Messick became chairman of the board or not?

A. Yes, that is right.

Q. After he became chairman were the efforts continued to secure new money, that is, after the deal with him and Mr. Rosset fell through?

A. I understood from him when I would see him occasionally that he was attempting to secure new money or a reorganization of some kind. I have not been active——

Q. I believe your firm, or Mr. Ross Thomas, did considerable work for the company with a view toward compliance with the Investment Companies Act of 1940 prior to the time that that act went into effect, which was January 1, 1941. Is that true? Were you familiar with that?

A. Well, in conection with the registration statement that work was done in 1939.

Q. In 1939 he did that?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you, or any member of your firm, have anything to do with advising the company on matters of that kind [fol. 3572] with reference to the applicability of its attempt to operate under the Investment Act of 1940? I do not mean applicability; I mean whether or not the company would attempt to operate under the Investment Act?

A. That is right. The registration statement was prepared in 1939, sir. The Investment Act became effective later than that, as I remember.

Q. Became effective?

A. With the advice of the company I registered with SEC before the effective date of this instrument we are talking about.

Q. Did you or any member of your firm assist the company in the legal matters of amending its charter so as to get the authority from the State of West Virginia to engage in the life insurance business instead of the investment certificate business?

A. We did.

Mr. T. C .Townsend: I object to that question and the answer. That is not what the charter did, and that wasn't the purpose of the application. That is, that is not what the amendment to the charter did, and that wasn't the purpose of the application, to substitute life insurance for an [fol. 3573] annuity company. It is all in the evidence here. All that charter did was to take on, in addition to what they already had, the feature of life insurance.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. Mr. Koontz——

The Witness: May I elaborate on that answer?

Mr. Farmer: Yes, sir.

A. I am not sure as to who drew that charter. As I remember, the amendment of the charter was drawn in the head office and was sent to us to file with the Secretary of State. As I remember, that was the way it was handled; we didn't actually do the work, make a study of the amendment, and so on.

Mr. Farmer: I ask this question because I don't recollect clearly. I did think that that amendment had been put in, and of course it will speak for itself—was already in evidence.

Mr. Palmer: Yes, it is in evidence in the minute book, is it not, Mr. Jaegerman?

Mr. Jaegerman: It is also in evidence in the charter, I believe, one of the documents—— [fol. 3574] Mr. Farmer: I thought that was one of the first documents filed.

The Court: If it is not in evidence it ought to go in.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: There was a copy of the charter put into evidence, your Honor.

Mr. Farmer: Well, it will speak for itself and decide whether my recollection is right or whether Mr. Townsend is right.

Q. Now, in 1941, after the Investment Companies Act went into effect and after the company had ceased to sell any new investment certificates, did you take any part in the consideration of plans for carrying on the operations of the company as an insurance company, and if so, state just what you did?

A. Well, its charter had been amended and they had hoped to start writing life insurance, but they were never able to get the green light from the Commissioner in Charleston. Various statements were worked on, various information asked for by the Commissioner from the company, some of the auditors came to our office with blanks and asked us to help them fill out those blanks, various [fol. 3575] work of that sort with a view of preparing the company to go into the business of life insurance if the statement, in the Auditor's judgment, showed that it should be permitted to write life insurance. We were in general touch through that last period.

Q. Did you attend any conferences at which representatives of the Securities and Exchange Commission were present where there was discussed possible plans for reorganizing the company?

A. Yes, I visited individually with some individual members in and around the Securities and Exchange. I went and had a conference with Mr. Risley at Mr. Schencker's office, at which Mr. Schencker was present and two or three of his assistants whose names I forget, except a Mr. Carver; and then we had a general town meeting, I think it was on March 17—I believe that was March 17th, as I remember.

Q. You say a general town meeting. What town is that?

A. I mean quite a conference in the general counsel's office. We had people from various sections of the SEC, [fol. 3576] had the Chicago representatives of Fidelity and Wheeling representatives, and I believe Mr. Goldsmith was with me. Many people there. I don't know how many.

Q. Was Mr. Latta present at that meeting?

A. Mr. Latta was present, yes, sir.

Q. I believe it has been testified by Mr. Latta, if I am not in error, that that meeting in Washington was on April 1st. You said that you attended the meeting on March 17th. Did you attend two meetings or one meeting there?

A. Wait a minute. I am pretty sure there was a meeting on March 17th, rather large meeting. These gentlemen should be able to straighten us on those dates. I did meet back in Washington again early in April.

Q. Then you attended two meetings? Is that right?

A. I attended more than two meetings, but I—I attended that one large meeting, which I thought was—I thought was March 17th. I have some correspondence about it from Mr. Schencker and a copy of a letter from Mr. Jaegerman, Mr. Jaegerman asking Mr. Risley for certain information.

Q. Will you refer to that—— [fol. 3577] A. If I can find it. I just remember those letters. (Witness looks through papers.) The one in Mr. Lane's office, Mr. Sims was there, by the way, and I think Mr. Justice. A letter from Mr. Schencker dated March 12 asked us to be there on Monday afternoon, March 17th, at 2:30, and I replied that I would be there. I don't remember that that date was changed. Copy of a letter from Mr. Jaegerman to Mr. Risley, which was sent to me—that is dated March 13th and he asks Mr. Risley to bring certain information.

Q. Asked him to bring certain information for the meeting of March 17th?

A. For the meeting of March 17th.

Q. Is that the town meeting that you were talking about?

A. That was the large meeting.

Q. And Mr. Sims was there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And Mr. Harlan Justice was there?

A. Yes, sir, Mr. Sims I know was there, and as I remember Mr. Justice was there.

Q. You said you were also present at a meeting at which [fol. 3578] Mr. Latta——

A. Mr. Latta was at that meeting, as I remember, too. Mr. Latta was at that meeting.

Q. Could you establish from your files whether or not you attended a meeting before the SEC on April 1st in Washington?

A. I was in Washington April 1st on Fidelity's business. I don't remember whether that was the day I was over at the SEC or not. I as an individual went and conferred with some of the people from SEC from time to time by myself.

Q. Do you recall whether or not Mr. Goldsmith went with you on April 1st?

A. No, sir, I don't about that date. Mr. Goldsmith was with me a trip or two. Mr. Goldsmith was with me one trip when Mr. Latta was present.

Q. Do you recall that Mr. Latta, Mr. McNulty and Mr. Risley were present at that meeting?

A. They were. I mean they were at a meeting. I don't know whether that was the meeting of April 1st.

Q. State whether or not at one of those meetings at which Mr. Latta was present he had some plans that he [fol. 3579] had prepared, rather elaborate plans—he didn't prepare them, but that had been prepared up there that he had collaborated with the officers of the company in plans for reducing the contract liability or cash liability to your contract holders by——

A. That is right, he did.

Q. By taking off 15 per cent, or something like that, from them.

A. Taking off a certain percentage all the way across the board, or taking off different percentages of different contracts and so on.

Q. And you were there at that conference when those ideas that he had, or plans, were laid before the members of the SEC and discussed?

A. That is right, I was.

Q. Was Mr. Jaegerman present at that meeting?

A. Mr. Jaegerman was present at the only meeting at the general counsel's office, I know, I remember that we were. I don't know about these various conferences, I don't know who was at all the conferences, except I remember that large conference that Mr. Jaegerman was there.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

[fol. 3580] Q. That was the March 17 conference?

A. I think so. That is what my correspondence shows, and I don't see anything that would indicate that that was changed from that date.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. What was the attitude expressed by the representatives of the SEC at that meeting at which you discussed those plans Mr. Latta had with him there—that is, the attitude of the SEC toward those plans?

A. Different attitudes by different members, just as there were different attitudes with different members on our own side. It was a question whether or not you should take a uniform percentage or whether or not some of the funds were solvent and they should let them alone or cut them down a very small percentage and take the large percentage off the others; and we broke up without having any particular conclusion on any plan.

Q. State whether or not the chief concern of the company, or the main pressing problem, was these maturing contracts of the old first issued contracts, special income and special annuity?

A. That is true.

Q. The drain on the company's cash position?

[fol. 3581] A. That was the main concern, of course, of the company, and also of the Commissioner and also of the SEC.

Q. Was it contemplated at that meeting, was it discussed, about court proceedings at that time, that the company would go into court?

A. Yes, we referred a number of times during the discussion to a proceeding of some kind that would be necessary to protect the company. That was discussed.

Q. Was there a discussion about what court the proceedings would go into?

A. No, a general discussion as between state court and federal courts. I don't know that any particular federal court was mentioned, if you mean it that way, a discussion as between state and federal courts.

Q. That is right.

A. That is right.

Q. What was the attitude of the SEC? Was it in a position of impartiality or did they have some partiality about it?

A. No, I didn't see any partiality about it. They always took the position that "that is a matter for you to decide; you are to choose your jurisdiction." I had discussed it [fol. 3582] not only that day but a number of times with a number of them and their decision always was, "We cannot decide for you what your jurisdiction should be."

Q. State whether or not at the time you had that conference it was recognized by the directors of Fidelity that some definite action must be taken without delay looking toward the rehabilitation of the company?

A. It was recognized by the members of the company and it was recognized and so stated by Mr. Sims, who was present, and seemed to be recognized by the members the SEC who were there.

Q. Did you get a letter from Mr. Sims dated March 25, 1941, notifying you in effect that something must be done, otherwise he would be forced to cause proceedings to be instituted by the Attorney General's office?

A. Yes, sir, I got a letter the latter part of March; I don't remember just what the date was. I believe I have the original of it here, sir.

Q. A copy of that has already been filed as Exhibit 94. Have you got the original letter?

A. Dated March 25, yes, sir.

Mr. Palmer: There was a copy of the copy filed, which [fol. 3583] was questioned, and I promised that would be connected up later, your Honor, and I would like to have the original go in the record, if possible, to make good my promise.

The Court: If Mr. Koontz wants to part with the original it may be put in evidence in substitution for the copy.

Mr. Farmer: Without reading it carefully, it appears to me to be the same. Do you agree, Mr. Ray, that the copy is a correct copy of the original or copy that has been filed?

Mr. Ray: It seems to be.

Mr. Farmer: Then it is stipulated that the copy is a correct copy of the original, and Mr. Koontz need not file the original?

Q. Mr. Koontz, those plans that Mr. Latta—that he introduced yesterday or day before, when Mr. Latta was on the stand—those plans that were referred to about taking 15 per cent level off all of them or distributing the loss among the various contract series—appear not to take into consideration the fact that the company's assets had been deposited—practically all their assets [fol. 3584] had been deposited with state officials in various states to secure the liabilities in those states. What consideration was given to that situation in your discussion?

The Court: If any.

Mr. Farmer: If any.

A. I am not sure what that discussion was, offhand. I don't remember that there was any discussion on that line. I don't remember that there was any consideration given to that, except this one thing: in West Virginia it was—everybody knew that there was a surplus in West Virginia, but that deposit was made to secure contract holders outside where no deposits were made or where insufficient deposits were made. That was always recognized in all these discussions.

Q. There have been filed here, Mr. Koontz, some descriptive booklets that the company issued and used in conection with the sale of its Series B income reserve contracts, filed as Exhibits 85, 86 and 87, setting out certain financial statements and other statements with reference to state deposits, the company's business and so forth. Had you had anything to do with those descriptive [fol. 3585] booklets?

A. Prepared when, sir?

Q. Well, I will hand them to you. In 1939 and 1940, I think, after the Detroit proceedings.

A. We were consulted from time to time about notes to be put on the Auditor's reports, explanations to make, so that we would not be in—violate the injunction of the Detroit court, and to that extent we did have something to do with the preparation of the statements made after that Detroit proceeding.

Q. When you all were working on these plans, having conferences with the SEC, were you cognizant of the fact that the securities in these reserve funds—various securities in the reserve funds—had been deposited with state authorities and were subject to the requirements of the state with respect to all the contract funds of Fidelity Investment Association, and if those funds were not held for the sole benefit of the holders of the particular contracts as stated in this descriptive booklet filed as Exhibit 85 on page 11, note 4?

The Court: Mr. Farmer, it seems to me that you are assuming something there that is a question for legal de- [fol. 3586] termination. Although there has been no objection to this question, I don't feel that there ought to be any such assumptions made. You may ask him if he was cognizant of the fact that that statement is in the booklet, but if you are assuming that statement to be true as a matter of law, it may be subject to some question.

Mr. Farmer: I will reframe the question in accordance with your Honor's suggestion, although I am still of opinion that that is a fact.

The Court: I understand that is your contention, but there may be other contentions of other attorneys. Go ahead.

Mr. Farmer: Of course, nobody has made any yet, in the proceedings that I have heard.

The Witness: Are you going to reask the question?

Mr. Farmer: I will try to state it again. Were you aware of the fact when you had those conferences discussing those plans that that statement that I referred to was in that descriptive booklet?

A. Yes, I knew about this statement in the descriptive booklet, of course. I don't know that it occurred to me [fol. 3587] at the time we discussed the latter plans, but I knew of this.

Q. When those booklets were prepared by the company and sent out for use in 1939, after the Detroit proceeding, did you have any conferences with any representatives of the SEC regarding those booklets and regarding the accuracy and sufficiency of those descriptive statements in the booklet?

Mr. Jaegerman: Your Honor, when those booklets were first offered there was a discussion about that. May I ask Mr. Farmer the relevancy?

The Court: I think I will overrule any objection to it, anyhow, so go ahead.

A: When the first statements were prepared there were some representatives of the SEC in Wheeling, Mr. Jackson and someone else whose name I don't recall, and of course they always took the position they couldn't advise us on how to prepare a booklet, but they were very kind in saying, "We see no objection to that. Of course, that is our idea. There is no objection to that so far as we know;" and the first statement was put in after advising with them. Later [fol. 3588] on, when Haskins & Sells came in and made the audit, it seems they had had a great deal of experience preparing the booklets, and they talked over with us the various notes which were attached to these statements, and they kept in touch, and did keep in touch with the SEC, and Mr. Clarke and I made a special trip to Washington once and went into the SEC relative to this.

Q. Mr. Clarke, you say?

A, Mr. Clarke, who is manager of Haskins & Sells. He is the one that finally gave the clearance on this booklet, Clarke of Haskins & Sells.

Q. Who did you confer with at the SEC about it?

A. I usually conferred with Mr. Kline or Mr. Lane, but I don't think they purported to pass on this. Mr. Clarke knew the contentions of the auditors, and I was in to see Mr. Andrew Jackson, head of the—I am not saying I conferred with him about this; some auditor from Tucson, Arizona—I don't remember his name—but Mr. Clarke being the one who was familiar with the auditors, was the one that did the talking on this, and we had given him our judgment on whether or not this statement violated any part of the injunction order in Michigan, and we were merely talking [fol. 3589] further with the SEC.

Q. Mr. Lane was general counsel?

A. Yes, but Mr. Kline was the man generally in charge of this. Sometimes he referred us to somebody else.

Q. Will you state, Mr. Koontz, how anyone there at that meeting expected to consummate a plan like one of those presented by Mr. Latta that he had there with him, the situation being as it was with reference to those deposits in the states?

A. How anyone at our meeting in Washington expected that?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. Well, that plan was a new plan and not very many people were very familiar with it.

Q. Had you seen it before you were there?

A. I am not sure that I did. Doubt if I had seen his completed plan. I had heard some talk about it over the phone, or probably had some second hand reports. I don't believe I ever saw the plan called the completed plan till I went to the Washington meeting.

Q. Well then, will you state, in your own words, the re-[fol. 3590] sult of the last, final conference that you had with the SEC before the proceedings in the state court occurred?

A. What was my last conference? I remember very well the general result of our big meeting. I talked to some men around the SEC after that, some individual men. I am not sure whether I had a conference after March 17th. Maybe I had one—I was there on April 1st. I can't get my dates straight on that. I can give you the general result after the March 17 conference: "No definite conclusion."

Q. I want to ask you this, Mr. Koontz, because Mr. Latta has stated on the stand that he attended one conference on April 1st, and you have stated that you thought he was at the March Conference or the town meeting that you referred to on March 17th. There seems to be that conflict between the recollection of you gentlemen to that extent. Can you make sure that that meeting was held on March 17th, or is there any likelihood that it was postponed or it was not held until April 1st? Can you be positive about that?

A. No, but I feel sure that I have in my files somewhere a list of the names of the people who attended that confer[fol. 3591] ence. I think I jotted it down.

Q. The March 17th conference?

A. Well, whenever it was. It was called for March 17th.

Q. Would you mind doing that?

A. I will have to do that back at my office. I don't think I have it with me. I am not sure that I have, but usually after those conferences I marked down——

Q. I would like to clear that up, if I can, in some way.

A. Excuse me just a moment.

Mr. Farmer: Mr. Jaegerman, maybe you can clear it up and give us your recollection. Did you attend two such meetings?

Mr. Jaegerman: I attended more than two.

Mr. Farmer: More than two at which Mr. Latta and Mr. Koontz were present—I mean two at which they were present?

Mr. Jaegerman: I don't remember how often Mr. Latta was present.

Mr. Farmer: Have you got anything that would enlighten us about the March 17th meeting or the April 1st meeting? [fol. 3592] Mr. Jaegerman: What is the difficulty about the dates? What are you trying to prove?

Mr. Farmer: I stated to Mr. Koontz the reason I wanted to clear it up, because there is some discrepancy between Mr. Latta and Mr. Koontz, and evidently one of the other is mistaken.

The Court: Do you regard the question of date as being of any importance?

Mr. Farmer: No; I don't regard it as being so terribly important, except that Mr. Latta testified that those plans were prepared by him the night before the meeting of April 1st, and Mr. Koontz had not seen them, and he only attended one meeting, and apparently Mr. Koontz's recollection was the other way, that there were two meetings at which Mr. Latta was present.

The Court: You can't change that testimony so unless there is some importance about the date of the meeting, let's go ahead.

Mr. Farmer: In fairness to Mr. Koontz, I thought I should—and I told Mr. Jaegerman to give us his recollection about it, if he had any notes or information about the [fol. 3593] meeting.

Mr. Townsend: He didn't say he didn't have any information about it.

Mr. Farmer: Would you mind, Mr. Jaegerman, stating your recollection of the facts?

The Court: I think you had better just go ahead, Mr. Farmer. We don't need to get a lot of stuff on the record about some discrepancy——

The Witness: I was invited to Washington on the 17th; I was in Washington on the 17th on Fidelity business, so I just assume it connects. There is a Securities and Exchange Commission letter here. I know—I feel sure we had that meeting on April 17th. I was in Washington again on April 1st. I don't remember what meeting that was, though, whether an individual meeting, whether it was with Latta and probably two or three others or what. The big meeting, I feel sure, though was the 17th, because I see nothing that would indicate any change of that date.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. I will ask you this. After the final meeting, the April 1st meeting, was any definite decision reached about whether [fol. 3594] the company voluntarily, of its own initiative, be able to work out any sort of plan that would enable it to carry on business?

A. A decision was arrived at to the effect that it could not carry on or did not see how it could carry on. It was not doing business—it was not permitted to do business, and Mr. Sims had stated to them that he wasn't going to permit them to do business unless there was a change in the situation.

Q. Then were you notified later that Mr. Sims had called on the Attorney General to institute proceedings in the Kanawha County Circuit Court?

A. I was, yes. Mr. Sims wrote me that letter, and I checked with the Assistant Attorney General relative to these jurisdictions relative to this matter in general, and we started doing some work on it. I notified Mr. Foulk at Wheeling about it; I notified Mr. Marshall at Washington.

Q. Was a directors' meeting called about that time?

A. I understand so. I wasn't a director, and so, of course, I didn't get their notice. I won't say I wasn't told that there would be one. I understood there was one.

[fol. 3595] Q. Were you furnished with a copy of the resolution authorizing Koontz & Koontz to represent the company?

A. That is right, we were. I have forgotten what that date was, though.

Q. Have you got that with you here?

A. Yes. We were notified that we were appointed counsel to represent Fidelity in the proceeding which we are talking about—notified by letter.

Q. Who notified you?

A. Mr. J. F. McNulty, vice-president and secretary, wrote April 10th as follows:

"Koontz & Koontz, Union Building, Charleston, W. Va.

GENTLEMEN:

This is to avise you that the board of directors of Fidelity Assurance Association, at a meeting held on April 7, 1941, at which a quorum was present, authorized the employment of your firm as counsel to represent this association in the pending suit instituted by the Auditor and ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia. The formal resolution as adopted by the board is as follows:

[fols. 3596-3597] " 'Upon motion of Mr. John Marshall, Sr., seconded by Mr. F. H. Pulfer, the law firm of Koontz & Koontz is authorized to represent the association in the pending suit instituted by the Auditor and Ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia'."

Q. Did you appear and represent the company—make your appearance?

A. Someone from my office did. I accepted service for the company and appeared for the company.

. . . . . .

[fol. 3598] Mr. Farmer:

Q. You said that Mr. Sims was at this conference in Washington, whether it was March 17th or April 1st. Were you familiar with any sort of ideas or plans that Mr. Sims had for rehabilitation of the company or converting it into a life insurance company, what his ideas were, whether they corresponded with those of the company or not?

[fol. 3599] A. I don't remember that he had any particular ideas about rehabilitating the company. He was leaving that as the task for the company, that he was not going to let them start writing life insurance until the company got in such shape financially that they could make a statement that would justify his permitting them to start business.

Q. Well, at these conferences that you had before the SEC, were the only plans—I don't want to ask a leading question—state whether or not the only plans under consideration were plans with a view of the company continuing in business as an insurance company and not a face amount certificate company.

A. The company had just changed its charter and expected to continue in business as an insurance company handling this business of face amount certificates, if it handled it, as a side line rather than as the main object of the corporation, like some insurance companies that were mainly insurance companies but did write contracts.

Q. Did you know anything about the directors of the company appointed a so-called reorganization committee?

[fol. 3600] A. I heard of that only. I wasn't present at the meeting where that was done. I heard there was one and Mr. Messick was a member of it. He told me that he was chairman of that, I believe.

Q. Mr. Allen Messick?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you talk with him about it?

A. I did. He told me——

Q. When did you talk with Mr. Messick about that?

(No answer.)

Q. That is, after the state court proceedings or before?

A. It was shortly after he was appointed. I saw Mr. Messick in Washington April 5th, I believe is the last lengthy conference I had with him. I talked with him a number of times by telephone, however.

Q. Were you acquainted with Mr. James R. Fleming?

A. I am, yes, sir.

Q. When did you first become acquainted with Mr. Fleming?

A. Sometime early this year. That is 1941.

Q. Prior to the state court proceeding?

[fol. 3601] A. That is true.

Q. How did you become acquainted with Mr. Fleming?

A. In the station at Washington, Mr. Messick introduced me to Mr. Fleming. I was getting off of an early morning train waiting for a taxicab, and Mr. Fleming happened to be getting off the train, as I remember, from somewhere else, and Mr. Messick introduced me to him.

Q. Did you have any conversations with Mr. John Marshall after the state court proceedings with reference to this proceedings?

A. A number, yes, sir.

Q. Where did you have those conversations and state what they were.

A. Well, I had a great many conversations with him, and most of them were in Washington, unless I was conversing with him by phone. I was in Washington a great deal during the early part of this year. I saw him every day for several days.

Q. Did Mr. Marshall express any dissatisfaction with the course of the proceedings, the fact that they were in the state court rather than in the federal court?

A. No, none whatever. He did raise this question: he [fol. 3602] said that there were some people that thought this proceeding should be in the federal court.

Q. Did he say who they were?

A. No. Finally it developed that Fleming was one that felt that it should be in the federal court.

Q. You say it finally developed?

A. That is right; that is right. I had a meeting with Mr. Marshall and Mr. Fleming in Washington.

Q. Do you know who Mr. Fleming was representing at that meeting?

A. Yes; if you will permit me to clear that I will go back and say that Mr. Fleming came to my office prior to our Washington meetings.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Here in Charleston?

A. Here in Charleston, yes, sir.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. How did it happen that Mr. Fleming came—at whose request?

A. He had been put in touch with this situation by Mr. Messick, who is a very good friend—and again a college friend, I think classmates; they seemed to be very close friends—Messick and Fleming—about May 1st Mr. Fleming came to my office.

[fol. 3603] Q. Here in Charleston?

A. He had phoned me some days before from Fort Wayne and asked whether I would be home and so on and said he wanted to see me and talk to me about this matter; that Mr. Messick had been talking to him and had gotten him interested; and he did come, as I remember, on May 1st.

Q. He came down here to Charleston?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. To a conference at your office with you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was anybody else present at the conference?

A. No, just the two of us.

Q. What was the discussion about?

A. The general situation and what it would take to rehabilitate the company, to put it in shape to do business. He talked to me about his conference with Messick—and by the way, before that Messick had advised me by phone several times before that he had succeeded in getting Fleming interested in getting him actively to go into the company or the reorganization plan and could get a substantial amount of capital, if need be could get a million dollars. [fol. 3604] That was Messick: and then Fleming came over for a conference.

Q. Was that after the Rosset and Messick deal fell down?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. He still had capital, did he?

A. Yes, from another source entirely. That was this year. We are talking now about this year. So Mr. Fleming did come to the office for a conference, and he said, if you care to have me——

Q. I would like for you to go on and give us——

The Witness: Any objection to the result of that conference, your Honor?

The Court: No.

A. Well, he wanted to know why we had proceeded in the state court rather than the federal court in a matter like this, and we discussed that and just went over the ground, that the ones who thought we were familiar with this before the proceeding was filed had covered, and we referred him to the state statutes, and we discussed the advantages and disadvantages of state courts as against the proceeding under Chapter 10 of the Chandler Act; and he talked about [fol. 3605] the people he represented.

Q. The people he represented?

A. That is right, the group he represented in Fort Wayne, and wondered if we could work together on this and wondered if I was wedded to Messick or Pulfer and asked what I thought about them and about their ability and so—a general discussion along constructive lines.

The Court:

Q. During that discussion, Mr. Koontz, was it the thought of both you and Mr. Fleming that the proper thing to do was to reorganize Fidelity in some way, whether in state court or a federal court?

A. That is true, yes, sir, reorganize it by rehabilitating it with some capital. That is right. But it had already been changed into an insurance company. He talked more insurance than he did these investment contracts, and he asked me specifically whether or not I thought the assets ought to be sold to a life insurance company, disposed of, closed up, or whether or not it could be reorganized, and talked about how to reorganize it, if we did, what people to take care of.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. What do you mean "what people to take care of"?

[fol. 3606] A. I meant the contract holders, the preferred stockholders, the common stockholders.

Q. Well, I hope you gentlemen at that conference didn't forget the contract holders.

A. The contract holders were first. And we agreed that if there was any way of giving present contract holders, although it looked as if there was no equity for them whatever, the right to buy in later on by way of rehabilitation, it should be done.

Q. You don't mean that there was no equity for the contract holders?

A. I mean the stockholders; I beg your pardon. Then he left that conference asking me if I couldn't draw a plan of reorganization and get it to him by the following Monday. That was about Thursday. I remember I said to him, "I don't think I am that good; I don't know enough about reorganizations for that. It is too soon." He said, "Get me something if you can, because I want to talk it over with my associates and I want to tell them that there is some chance, we think, of rehabilitating the company."

Q. Did he say who his associates were?

[fol. 3607] A. Yes, I questioned him about his associates. Frankly, I thought he might represent the Lincoln Life Insurance Company, with whom we had been dealing. He said definitely he did not, but he did represent the same interests in Fort Wayne, being the Lincoln National Bank people, and had them as associates—the same people that did control the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company.

Q. They are in South Bend, Indiana, and Mr. Fleming was from South Bend?

A. No, Fort Wayne. I didn't get a plan to send to him like he had asked, of course. I was at Cincinnati the first of the next week, and I tried to get him on the telephone, but missed there, but got him a little later and we discussed it again by telephone.

Q. Did Mr. John Marshall talk to you about any plans that Mr. Fleming and Mr. Messick had?

A. John Marshall later on later on talked to me about Fleming, and he believed that Fleming had some people that would go into this, and Mr. Fleming had said to him that he thought it ought to be in federal court, but that was considerably later.

[fol. 3608] Q. Up to the time that Mr. Fleming first came on the scene in the way that you have outlined, had anyone connected with the company as attorney or director or as officials—public officials—taken the position that the proceedings ought to be in federal or bankruptcy court and not in the state court?

A. No, nobody ever took that definite position.

Q. In your conferences with the Securities and Exchange Commission had they taken that position?

A. No, no, they had not. They said, "That is a matter for you gentlemen to decide, what your jurisdiction is. We won't advise you on it." I talked that over with Mr. Carver a number of times, and he said, "No, we refuse to advise you the forum you are going to choose." I think it is only fair to say that our state proceeding had been filed. I did see Mr. Schencker a number of times. I used to see him at lunchtime at the Carlton Hotel; and he said, "Well, my thought was this"——

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Who was that?

A. Mr. Schencker, who is head of one of the departments of the department.

[fol. 3609] Mr. Jaegerman: He is no longer associated with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The Witness: I know, but what department was it?

Mr. Jaegerman: Investment companies.

The Witness: But that was the most definite thing any SEC man ever said to me. He said, "My thought was that you would have fared better probably under Chapter 10." That was after this other was over. He was interested, and would ask me how we were getting along. I saw him from week to week for several weeks.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. After that Detroit proceedings had the Securities and Exchange Commission kept in very close contact with the Fidelity company?

A. Had the SEC kept in close contact?

Q. Close contact with the company.

A. I feel that they had kept rather in close contact. They went through the various proceedings, the circuit court of appeals, the appeals from the receivership proceedings in the Northern District here, and I had myself advised from time to time how I thought they were getting along, and had during last year sometime gone over there and talked to [fol. 3610] them about the policy of what we thought then might be done of getting these contract holders where the contracts were so much under water to revise their contracts and cancel out a lot of their claims. One series, for instance, we had only about a thousand contract holders and thought then that they could contact them and get them to revise their contract. I talked that over with them.

Q. You say revise their contracts——

A. I say they talked that. That was one plan we talked about putting into effect.

Q. After the Detroit proceeding did Mr. Jackson and other accountants or auditors stay down at Wheeling for some time? Do you know whether or not that is true?

A. Well, for two or three months I would say it was. But I don't think it was all on Fidelity. I think they were in that district on other matters, and were keeping in touch with Fidelity. I gathered that from conversations, that they would keep in touch with a case for some time after it looked like it was over.

Q. In your experience in handling reorganization matters and in the study that you have made of it and the contracts that you have had and talking over reorganization of this [fol. 3611] company and other companies with persons having experience, have you found out whether or not in a reorganization of a company of this kind, or insurance company, that the speed with which the reorganization is handled is essential?

A. It is at least very advantageous.

Q. That is, I am talking about what is the effect of protracted litigation on policy holders or contract holders as to whether or not they will keep up their payments?

A. Well, they usually don't keep them up, of course.

Q. State whether or not in taking over companies, reinsuring companies, it is an accepted fact among insurance circles that those policy holders that have ceased for some length of time to make payments and have dropped out, so to speak, are disregarded as being of any value as an asset?

A. I am not an insurance man. I don't know that I would be qualified on that, but I will say this, with all these people with whom I talked, these bankers, they regarded the live contracts as the real assets of the situation rather than the [fol. 3612] ones who had ceased paying. If that is an indirect answer to your question——

Mr. Farmer: Yes, sir, I believe that is all.

The Court: Before cross-examination of Mr. Koontz is started we will take a short recess, and reconvene at twenty minutes after three.

(At 3:06 P. M., a recess was taken until 3:20 P. M.)

After Recess 3:20 P. M.

Mr. Farmer: If your Honor please, I have one more question I want to ask the witness, the main question I subpoenaed him here about.

The Court: I don't want to prevent you from asking the main question, so go ahead.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. That is this, Mr. Koontz: Mr. A. L. King testified that he got the impression from talking with you and Mr. Foulk casually that the company would perhaps have to go through the federal court with your plan—go to the federal court with your plan worked out as far as you could get it in the other court or with the state department. In other words, he said his impression from talking with you and Mr. Foulk was that eventually you would have to go into the federal court. Did you advise Mr. King to that effect or [fol. 3613] make such statement to him?

A. No, I did not. The only discussion about that that I remember was a general discussion that after this proceeding was filed here we would probably have proceedings in various places both in state courts and federal courts over the country; that there would probably be a lot of suits, like there was before when there was a suit in Michigan and then receivership in the Northern District of West Virginia and various suits over the country. We talked about various suits being filed, but never the main proceeding in another court.

Q. In your negotiations with these different men and houses and financiers and bankers throughout the country, as you have detailed throughout the years 1939 and 1940, did you endeavor at all times to give them the true and Fidelity?

A. Oh, yes, insofar as I was able to I gave it to them, and then invited them to take the audited reports; and the ones of them who got down and worked on it seriously sent their men to the head office at Wheeling and made audits of their own and checked audits that they had and [fol. 3614] so on. I attempted in no way to conceal any facts, and if I had I couldn't, because they were all business houses and made their own audits really, most of them.

Q. State whether or not the principal officers of the company are men that have been with the company over quite a period of years, a number of years, and have more or less grown up with Fidelity?

A. Mr. Risley, who has been president until lately, is probably one of the oldest members, yes. He has been there, I think, probably twenty or twenty-five years.

Q. Longer than Mr. Messick?

A. Yes, Mr. Messick has been there only since last year sometime.

Q. These other men, the officers or heads of departments, they, of course, feel a great disappointment in the fact that Fidelity had to fail, do they not?

A. They certainly do.

Q. And they have hoped—have always expressed hope that in some way there could be some reorganization of the company?

[fol. 3615] A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that sort of their attitude?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Farmer: That is all.

The Court: Who wants to cross-examine Mr. Koontz?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Your Honor, I would like to ask a few questions.

The Court: All right; go ahead.

Mr. Lauritzen: If the Court please, before Mr. Townsend starts his cross-examination, this morning it was suggested that the State of Wisconsin had no interest in Mr. Townsend's matters in this Court relating to the administrative conduct of this estate. I wish to renew my objection to Mr. Townsend conducting a cross-examination on this issue.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I think my position will be clear before I get through. At least, I hope so.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Mr. Koontz, how long were you connected with Fidelity?

[fol. 3616] A. I think it was in 1932 and went out as a director in the early part of 1940.

Q. Do you know what time in 1940?

A. Not later than the middle of the year, probably a little earlier. As I remember, I resigned and they asked me to permit them not to accept the resignation for a few weeks. That is merely from memory. I think the minutes should show that. I have never seen them.

Q. How did you happen to become connected with Fidelity at all?

A. As I stated on the main examination, I did this piece of work for them, and I was asked by Scandrett and Marshall to become associated with them, and I refused the request, and a little later they made me a director and renewed the request, and I became connected with them; by invitation I became connected with them.

Q. Then you were a director from the time you became connected with Fidelity until 1940?

A. That is right.

Q. How many shares of stock did you own at any one time in Fidelity?

A. One was assigned to me as a qualifying share; that [fol. 3617] is all.

Q. And you never owned to exceed one?

A. Never owned—never paid for that; that was assigned to me. It was a qualifying share only.

Q. As a matter of fact, you were a director of the company from April 15, 1932, to June 30, 1940? Is that correct?

A. I accept your dates, yes, sir. I don't know that it is incorrect.

Q. And you were a vice-president of the company from April 28, 1933 to April 27, 1934.

A. I don't think I was, sir. They elected me vice-president once, and I refused to accept it.

Q. Well, you mean, then, that you did not actively serve?

A. That is right, yes, sir. I didn't know that it was—I was asked to serve as vice-president and said no—I didn't know if I——

Q. You were placed on the investment committee on September 18, 1934, and served till June 18, 1940? Is that correct?

A. I accept your dates. I don't remember.

[fol. 3618] Q. And you served on the executive committee during the years 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939?

A. I accept the dates, yes, sir.

Q. And you were selected special attorney, that is, your firm of Koontz, Hurlbutt & Revercomb, in 1933, and you served during that year and for 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937?

A. All right.

Q. And then the firm name appears as Koontz & Hurlbatt and you served with that firm in that capacity for the company for 1938? Is that right?

A. That is right.

Q. And then Koontz & Koontz served as special attorneys for the company for 1939, 1940 and 1941?

A. That is right.

Q. Up until the time it went into the hands of the receivers?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever resign as special counsel at any time?

A. No.

[fol. 3619] Q. Then your relationship as special counsel was terminated by action of the court in 1941, that is, the state court receivership?

A. Yes.

Q. If it was terminated at all.

A. If it is terminated——

Q. It may still be going on. I don't know.

A. Well, the compensation is not going on, so I assume our relationship is not going on.

Q. If you owned no stock in the company or your stock was limited to one share during those ten years, what was your real interest in the company?

A. My real interest in the company was upon request of these gentlemen to help them build the company up, rehabilitate the portfolio——

Q. Was it in bad shape when you went with it in 1932?

A. Yes, sir, it was.

Q. And it was your special interest, then, after you went with the company to rehabilitate it and build it up?

A. Was to help rehabilitate it and build it up, yes, sir. [fol. 3620] At the same time, I was getting a monthly stipend, as I remember, Mr. Townsend.

Q. I was just going to ask you something about that. I wondered if you were.

(Witness laughs.)

Q. I am going to ask you this particular question, and you can break it down, if you please, if you can't answer it as a whole. What was the total compensation you received from Fidelity during the time you were connected with it from 1932 to 1941?

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I fail to see the relevancy of anything in connection with the trustee to this hearing in that matter, and therefore I object to it.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I think the relevancy will appear, your Honor, otherwise I would not ask these questions.

The Court: I overruled the objection.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Go ahead and answer.

A. I don't know exactly what it was. I have understood that some figures have been submitted here that lead into [fol. 3621] eighty-some thousand dollars. I have no reason to feel that those figures are not correct.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. That $80,000 didn't cover this ten year period. I am asking you for the total compensation you received for the ten year period, if you know?

A. I do not know, sir. I did not receive any very substantial fees; I received $200 per month; no large fees of any kind up until the SEC proceeding.

Q. Now, Mr. Koontz, in what litigation was the company engaged while you were its attorney, special or otherwise?

A. Very little; a few cases here. People would sue the company on contracts trying to get back their payments with interest; and we went to Ohio at one time to meet with the Commissioner, and I think probably two trips two of us were over there—just advised generally. I don't know—there were not very many suits.

Q. Well, you did have some litigation pending in the courts in the several states, did you not?

A. Not that we handled, sir, or were responsible for.

Q. I don't know who was responsible for if, but you had [fol. 3622] to have—you did have litigation that you were called upon to take a part in.

A. You mean Fidelity as a company?

Q. When I say "you" I mean Fidelity, unless I say otherwise, or I can use the term Fidelity.

A. I don't—I don't remember that we had any very important litigation between the time I went on as a director and the SEC litigation.

Q. My question would include the SEC litigation. You did have the litigation in Michigan in 1938.

A. Oh, yes, that is true, getting up into 1938, yes.

Q. And you had litigation in the Northern District of West Virginia?

A. That is true.

Q. When was that?

A. That was in the early part of 1939.

Q. And that litigation was conducted in the District Court for the Northern District of West Virginia, and ultimately in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit?

A. That is true.

Q. And the litigation in Michigan ended in the District [fol. 3623] Court for the Eastern District of Michigan?

A. That is true.

Q. Do you recall any other suits that Fidelity had in the courts of any magnitude that you were called upon either to defend or prosecute?

A. Well, in connection with this—or at the same time that this receivership proceeding was filed in the Northern District of West Virginia, various proceedings were filed elsewhere. For instance, there was a proceeding in Pennsylvania, there was a proceeding in Indiana. Some suit of some kind against the directors over in Cleveland.

Q. All right, let's take the suits in the Northern District of West Virginia. What particular part did you take in that, in conducting that litigation in the Northern District? Any?

A. I was there day and night except for one or two days that I went to Detroit.

Q. I mean, what did you do in that litigation?

A. Well, my firm was responsible—largely responsible for that. Goldsmith did the arguing before the Court. [fol. 3624] Local counsel were, in addition to Mr. Foulk, Mr. Wood.

Q. Did you do any yourself?

A. Very, very little.

Q. You didn't appear in court in connection with it——

A. Oh, yes.

Q. You appeared in court, but you took no part in the court proceedings? That is what I mean.

A. You mean in arguing the case?

Q. You didn't argue it?

A. I didn't argue the case, no, sir.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I am going to renew my objection. Mr. Townsend has not yet disclosed any relevancy of the questions to the present proceedings and whether they are brought in good faith or not. I think even Mr. Townsend, representing the trustee, should be limited in his examination to the scope of these issues.

The Court: I have indicated that my view is that the connection of Mr. Koontz or his firm is relevant on the issue which may arise under sub-section 4 of Section 146——

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Your Honor, that is the reason for my taking part in this examination. If your Honor thinks [fol. 3625] these questions are not relevant to that particular question, or won't lead to that particular question, I am entirely willing to abandon them.

The Court: It seems to me that they are relevant.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: That is what I thought.

Mr. Palmer: Your Honor, may I ask what right the trustee and its counsel, who are supposedly disinterested parties, have to attempt to uphold the good faith of the debtor in filing the petition? That would immediately disqualify the trustee and its counsel from being disinterested. The statute requires the trustee and its counsel to be disinterested on the question of whether the debtor's petition is filed in good faith, and if counsel for the trustee or the trustee becomes interested in it, they immediately become interested and should be disqualified by the Court.

The Court: I have overruled the objection.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Did you argue it in the Circuit Court of Appeals?

A. No.

Q. You did not go down there?

A. No.

[fol. 3626] Q. You did not prepare a brief?

A. No.

Q. You did not prepare a brief in the state court?

A. My firm did.

Q. I am trying to find out what you did.

A. Well, I—(witness laughs.)

Q. Not your firm; I want to know what service you rendered.

A. Well——

Q. The only services rendered in the litigation in the Northern District of West Virginia and the Circuit Court of Appeals in connection with that case were rendered by your firm, and not yourself individually? Is that a correct statement or not?

A. No, sir, it is not, because I took part in conference day and night with the District Court——

Q. Then I will put it this way: the services you did render in that litigation was in the way of conferences among counsel?

A. That is right.

Q. Does that same thing apply to the litigation in Michigan? If so, you will save me from asking a number ques- [fol. 3627] tions.

(No answer.)

Q. That is, the only way you took part in the litigation in Michigan was by conferring with other counsel that were conducting the litigation for Fidelity? Is that right?

A. No, the Michigan situation was handled primarily in Washington in the SEC offices, where we did confer, and got an agreed order or judgmnet before we went to Michigan. Then we had a local representative that appeared in Court in Michigan on one side, and Mr. Jaegerman and Mr. Lane on the other side, the day that order was entered.

Q. And the only appearance in that court was for the purpose of entering that final order, by anybody.

A. That is true at that time. Later on, when some literature was sent out that the SEC criticized, I went to Michigan and met Mr. Lane there, and we appeared before the court in chambers relative to that, the propriety of sending out a pamphlet, and a discussion of what could properly be sent out.

Q. You stated in your examination in chief that you spent [fol. 3628] a good deal of effort and time in trying to interest financiers in furnishing money to rehabilitate Fidelity. That is correct, is it?

A. That is correct.

Q. When did you first decide, in your own mind, or by reason of conferences with others, that Fidelity was in need of rehabilitation?

A. We were convinced by the SEC proceeding that we could proceed much more smoothly with a buildup of our general structure.

Q. What situation presented itself to you when you first became connected with the company in 1932? What was its condition then?

A. The condition then was that it was under water quite a bit.

The Court: You mean it was insolvent?

A. I meant—I think on an overall basis it was insolvent. They were selling then this B contract, which they provided a special deposit back of, so that the actual contract they were selling was not insolvent, but on an overall basis I think it was insolvent, that is, adding all of the obligations together and all of the assets of the company together. [fol. 3629] On a market basis it certainly was.

Q. Did it ever get out of that condition?

A. I think so. It was supposed to be out of that about 1936 or 1937. It was 1937, I believe, they claimed to have made a very substantial amount of money.

Q. Then when did you find out it had got back in, if you did find out?

A. Well, these gentlemen from the SEC analyzed this whole situation and claimed that we must make representations to the public on the exact standing of all these contracts outstanding, rather than make an overall statement and add all assets and all liabilities together. No matter if you appeared solvent by that kind of statement you still were not justified in doing business with that sort of statement; and when you broke your statement down into the contracts and what was back of those contracts some of them showed in red. So they felt they needed capital at that time—was to get enough capital in your common stock account to show that you had enough to meet your payments on all of your contracts.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Let me see if I understand you. [fol. 3630] Do I understand you to say that when you went with the company in 1932 in your opinion it was insolvent?

A. On a market basis it probably was, yes—on a market quotation basis.

Q. You mean if you valued the securities——

A. At their quotation on the market.

Q. Quoted market value.

A. That is right. Of course, the statement of the company did not show it was insolvent by any means. They left the securities on the books at appraised value, purchase value or whatnot. The statement did not show insolvency.

Q. If it was insolvent in 1932, when you first became connected with it as a member of the board of directors, what did you do about it?

A. We attempted to make money and to keep on running until your market quotations went on back up, like all other institutions.

Q. Did you feel at that time that you needed any new capital?

A. We certainly felt we would like to get new capital.

Q. Did you make an investigation of Fidelity after you [fol. 3631] became connected with it to find out some of the reasons why it was insolvent?

A. No, I graduâlly learned some facts about it, that they had sold securities on the way down, as the market went down, and they kept getting harder up and harder up and were not able to replace those securities in the portfolio.

Q. Is that the only thing you learned with reference to its condition, that it sold stocks on a declining market?

A. Well, stocks and bonds. I learned it had some very substantial losses, too, on some post office bonds—I think that was the biggest loss it had—something that had been purchased some few years before.

Q. Well then, it was your opinion after you made an investigation that when you became connected with the company its condition was due very largely, if not altogether, to the fact that it had sold securities on a declining market? Is that true?

Mr. Palmer: Your Honor, I object to the use of the words "after he made an investigation." The witness has not said he made an investigation. He said he learned [fol. 3632] things slowly. He never investigated.

The Court: I think that is correct. The question may be revised to conform.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I didn't get the Court's ruling.

The Court: Mr. Palmer is correct. The witness didn't say he made an investigation when he came in.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. When you became connected with the company in 1932, did you ever make an investigation to determine what its financial condition was?

A. No, I merely looked at the statement furnished.

Q. What sort of statement?

A. They had, as I remember, Ernst & Ernst for the auditors at that time. They would have a statement at the end of each year. A little later on one of the nationally known auditing firms audited the company for a year or two; and I just accepted those statements at face value.

Q. That is the only investigation you made?

A. That is true.

Q. How did you find out about these falling securities?

A. That comes out from time to time in discussion or [fol. 3633] directors' meetings.

Q. That was an investigation, wasn't it, to that extent?

A. Well——

Q. If it wasn't an investigation, it was knowledge.

A. I was gradually getting knowledge, yes, sir.

Q. Then you began to get knowledge by reason of these falling securities that the company was in bad condition?

A. Based on a market value, yes.

Q. And after you received this knowledge, your opinion was and your conclusion was that it was in bad condition because of the falling market? Is that correct?

A. That is correct. Market-wise it was in bad condition, yes, sir.

Q. And no other reason. You attributed to that falling market bringing about of the financial situation with reference to Fidelity? Is that right?

A. I think that was the main item. There may have been some mismanagement in prior years. I don't know about that.

Q. Did you investigate to find out?

[fol. 3634] A. We tried to build up management. Got a man by the name of Pole, who was comptroller of the company, go in as president. At all directors' meetings we were talking about what we should do to become stronger, both in management and assets.

Q. I understood you to say you learned that there had been some prior mismanagement.

A. No, I said there might have been.

Q. Well, was there, prior to the time you became connected with it?

A. There may have been?

Q. Well, was there?

(Witness laughs.)

Q. You can answer that, Mr, Koontz.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, if the trustee is finding that out for the purpose of its 167 report, the books of the company are open to it and it can investigate it just as easily as Mr. Koontz could. If they are asking it for any other purpose it is an improper question.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Answer the question, if you can.

[fol. 3635] A. Well, according to my ideas there had been some loose management.

Q. Well, all right; what was it?

A. For instance, the sales agency.

Q. Well, that was what?

A. I thought had been spending too much money; were in debt to the company.

Q. Anything else besides the sales agency?

A. That was—stuck out like a sore thumb. I am not so sure about——

Q. Well, were there any fingers sore next to the thumb that you discovered?

A. I do not——

Q. Or that stuck out——

The Court: Mr. Townsend, if you would let this witness answer instead of interrupting him——

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Your Honor, I did not mean to do that. He had not started to answer.

A. When I first knew about the company they had a part time president of the company, Mr. Burt, who was on for a very nominal salary as a part time president. The company was really being run by a vice-president. [fols. 3636-3641] That didn't look like good management. Later on that was changed, as I say, by taking Mr. Pole as president and asking to get in anybody he wanted to build up his management, and he is the one that first brought in his securities man to keep tab on the portfolio.

[fol. 3642] Mr. Palmer: During the cross-examination of Mr. Marshall last Saturday morning I attempted to ask him the same or similar questions along the same lines, and the Court ruled at that time that the Court was not interested in whether the company had been mismanaged because he would not have anyone that had had anything to do with the mismanagement have anything to do with the company in the future, and therefore the questions were irrelevant. I am suggesting that to the Court because I believe these questions are along the same line as those I asked Mr. Marshall which were excluded upon objection of the trustee and debtor.

The Court: I thought I clearly explained my reason for admitting evidence of Mr. Koontz's conection with Fidelity, but I will restate it. Under Section 146, sub-paragraph 4, one of the questions to be decided in determining whether a petition is filed in good faith is whether there is a prior proceeding pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best sub-[fol. 3643] served in such prior proceeding. Now, there is a proceeding pending in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, and Mr. Ross Thomas, of the firm of Koontz & Koontz, has been appointed one of the receivers; and I am of opinion that any evidence of the connection of Mr. Koontz or Mr. Thomas or any member of the firm or associate of the firm of Koontz & Koontz with the affairs of Fidelity prior to that appointment of those receivers is of some pertinency in determining that question, and therefore I have ruled that that testimony is admissible, and I adhere to that ruling. Of course, a different situation was presented when the questions were asked of Mr. Marshall's connection.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, may I ask the Court to clear this up, which I think you did yesterday. The questions were not as to the ability of Mr. Thomas, but as to his suitability, I believe the Court said?

The Court: That is correct, yes.

Mr. Palmer: I have this thought in mind, your Honor, that the suitability would be dependent upon the question of whether or not there was a possibility of any wrong-[fol. 3644] fulness going on, that that would be entirely under the judge of that court as to the compensation and guidance and so forth of that receiver.

The Court: Well, I don't so perceive it. I think the decision under Section 146 is entirely the responsibility of this Court and not of another court; and although some other court may feel that a prior proceeding that is now pending would be for the best interests of creditors and stockholders, this Court must examine into that and determine for itself whether that is a fact or not a fact.

Mr. Palmer: I agree with your Honor on that, but the point in mind that I couldn't see was this, that in state court proceedings there is no law or intimation of any law that a person representing a debtor who goes into receivership cannot be one of the receivers. In fact, as this Court knows, that is a very common practice. In federal court there is a direct law against that. Now, the only way that I can see the relevancy of that is that the Court would be attempting to apply the federal rule to the state court.

The Court: I am not applying any rules to the state [fols. 3645-3664] court.

Mr. Palmer: May I have an exception to the Court's ruling? Perhaps I did not make an objection at the time I was asking the questions.

. . . . . .

[fol. 3665] The Court: Let's see if we can get at the thing that the Court thinks is the only material phase of this in this way. In setting up an appraised valuation for the trust certificates of Marston Company and Paull Company, was the obligation of National Sales Agency treated as having any value, and if so, what percentage of its face value?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: That is a question to the witness, I understand.

[fol. 3666] The Court: That is right.

A. I don't know what percentage, your Honor. I remember this, that when the sales organization was taken over, various statements were made as to the cost of building up a sales agency and that we were getting this for nothing; if we had a million dollars just to pay over to the National Sales and they would pay it back it would clear in that way and wash out, but we didn't have the million dollars to pay, and it was handled the other way. We were told that there was actual value back of the sales force that was taken over. Thereafter interest was paid on this note and some reductions made from time to time.

The Court:

Q. Well, was it given any value, if you know, in the appraisal of the Marston and Paull Company securities?

A. I think it was given some value, yes, sir. I remember it was questionable what the value was; there was quite a large insurance policy that was collateral on that note, and the company carried that for some time. That had a cash value.

Q. How much, if you know?

[fol. 3667] A. I don't know. That is in the record somewhere.

Q. What other assets, if any, were behind it to give it a value other than this consideration that Mr. Palmer spoke about?

A. Only the value of the building up of the organization—the sales organization.

Q. That would not enter into any appraisal of the worth of it in the hands of Marston Company and Paull Company, would it, as securities of those companies?

A. Well, you were in this position, having taken that over, it was built up at quite a cost. You could have foreclosed and taken it over and not given it any value, or you could keep your books the other way.

Q. I am not speaking now of its value in the hands of Fidelity, but I mean do you know of any way that that would add to its value as a security in the hands of some state depository securing contract holders?

A. It would be hard to appraise that as a value of $750,000, although over a period of years it might be paid off with interest, if I may answer it in that way; because that is exactly the way it was handled; it was reduced so much each year, interest paid on the note and it was to be reduced [fol. 3668] from time to time. Of course, it is valueless if you are not a going concern and can't use the asset that was taken over.

The Court: Are there any other questions, Mr. Townsend?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Not on that point. If Mr. Jaegerman wants to ask a question on it, I think now is the time to do it.

The Court: All right, Mr. Jaegerman.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Jaegerman:

Q. Isn't it true, Mr. Koontz, that these National Sales Agency notes amounting to a million dollars resulted from advances by Fidelity to National Sales Agency?

A. Isn't it true that this amount represented by the note resulted from advances?

Q. Yes.

A. I understand so.

Q. And these advances came from the Fidelity general fund? Isn't that so?

A. They were supposed to, yes, sir. As far as I know [fols. 3669] they did.

Q. But the general fund, not having enough money, sold or transferred these notes to two of the contract funds, the income fund and the annuity fund? Isn't that right?

A. I don't know. I don't say it is not right. I just don't remember the answer.

Q. So that a condition resulted where the National Sales note, if it were an asset, was an asset held by two contract funds? Isn't that right?

A. Well, it may have been. I am saying I don't remember what those transactions were.

Q. And as National Sales Agency notes they were not depositable with any state against contract liability for the income or annuity contract? Isn't that right?

A. Well, I don't know. I don't think they would qualify as deposits, if that is what you mean. Is that what you mean?

Q. Yes. When they were converted into Paull and Marston bonds, the bonds, in turn, were transferred to the contract funds, the income and annuity funds, were they not? [fol. 3670] A. Well, I assume they were.

Q. And isn't it true that the only state that would accept them for deposit was the State of West Virginia?

A. I don't know. I understood West Virginia accepted most of them. I don't know.

Q. Did any other state accept them?

A. I don't know whether they were accepted anywhere else or not.

Q. Isn't it true that for deposit——

A. I don't know whether they were tried anywhere else or not.

Q. Do you know that they were tried anywhere else?

A. No, I say I don't know that they were tried.

Q. Are you familiar with the Craigin Morris valuation?

A. Generally, yes.

Q. What were those Craigin Morris valuations?

A. Craigin was a real estate man from Cleveland who had worked for the Insurance Department of the State of Ohio, and he was recommended to Colonel Thompson, who was from Ohio, as a man who knew real estate valuations, and he put him on these real estate holdings of this company and asked him to evaluate them.

[fol. 3671] Q. And the deposited value of the Paull and Marston bonds was determined on the basis of the Craigin Morris valuation, was it not?

A. I think so, where they were available. If not, some other yardstick was used.

Q. And didn't the Craigin Morris valuation accept at full face value the notes of the National Sales Agency?

A. I don't remember about that, Mr. Jaegerman. I am not evading; I just don't remember whether they accepted that note at full face value or not. As I remember, they did. As I remember, that note was in there at full face value and was reduced from time to time.

Q. And on the basis of the statements by certain officers and directors of Fidelity to Craigin Morris that the interest was paid on these notes, Craigin Morris accepted the notes of the National Sales Agency at the full face value?

A. That is true.

Mr. Jaegerman: That is all on this point, your Honor.

The Court: All right.

[fol. 3672] Cross-examination (Resumed).

By Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Mr. Koontz, at the time you went on the board of directors of Fidelity, did you find anything with reference to what has been referred to here as interfund loans?

A. Not for some time. If I did, it didn't impress me as to what it was.

Q. Well, did you finally find out?

A. Yes, I finally found out.

Q. How long had you been on the board?

A. I don't remember, sir.

Q. What were those interfund loans?

A. Well, when one fund would be in excellent shape and another fund would need some advances, there would be an intefund loan to take care of the one that needed the advances.

Q. Take it from the good fund and transfer it to the bad one?

A. That is right.

Q. And authority for doing that under the contracts that you sold?

[fol. 3673] Mr. Palmer: Objection, your Honor.

The Court: That is a legal conclusion. I sustain the objection.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. When these various series contracts were sold, did you set up separate funds for each one of them?

A. I didn't come on until after most of these contracts had been sold. The B contract was the one I was familiar with. It says specifically that there should be a contract fund set up and maintained for that. There was always a question and some argument about whether separate contracts should be kept for the other.

Q. The books of the company did show that a separate fund had been set up for each contract?

A. I think they kept the books on that basis.

Q. But in practice, so far as the funds were concerned, they were not carried out according to the bookkeeping system? Is that correct?

A. I think that is correct, yes, sir.

Q. In other words, you didn't keep these funds separated as a matter of fact?

A. They were deposited, as I remember—the securities [fol. 3674] were deposited all in one vault, or one box in the vault, instead of being kept separated, although they were kept on the company's books separate and distinct.

Q. Did you think it was a good practice to take the funds—take the money from a solvent fund and lend it to a fund that was insolvent?

Mr. Palmer: Objection.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Well, was that done? Did Fidelity use the money from solvent funds and lend it to insolvent funds?

A. I don't know about funds being insolvent at the time, and those interfund transfers, Mr. Townsend, they did transfer from one fund to another—had some interfund loans.

Q. Well, why did they do that?

A. I don't know all the reasons, but I know one reason was if one fund needed some money at a particular time and did not want to cash in some of its own securities or might have been short on securities at the time, the other fund would lend it some money. Remember, your common [fol. 3675] fund was back of and was a cushion for all these funds. If that were in shape to take care of it, the transaction would have been a cleaner transaction if the transfer had been made from the common fund into these funds rather than one fund to another, but so long as that fund was enough to take care of any advance or transfer I think your transaction was all right.

Q. How long was this system of interfund loans carried on? Until December 3, 1938, wasn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. An then it was stopped.

A. By the SEC. That was part of the injunction.

Q. I am going to pass that over and ask you something else. I want to get through if I can. Mr. Koontz, when did it first occur to you—I am talking to you now, not to Fidelity—when did it first occur to you as attorney for Fidelity or in the capacity of a member of the board that it was necessary to have some sort of court proceedings to continue Fidelity in any capacity?

A. Well, Mr. Sims made some very strong suggestions very early in this year.

Q. He wrote you a letter——

[fol. 3676] A. Wrote me the letter in March, but he had made suggestions even before that, by telephone and face to face.

Q. Well, I am going to keep it as short as I can. You did confer with Sims?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was the situation discussed by the board?

A. Well, I wasn't a board member and wasn't at their meetings. It was discussed with the officers of the company from time to time.

Q. Was the situation of the company discussed with the attorneys of the company—special attorney—discussed with you?

A. The situation was discussed between Mr. Sims and me, yes, and I, in turn, discussed it with Mr. Foulk, who is the general attorney inside the company, and with Mr. Marshall, who was chief counsel for the company.

Q. But you were special attorney?

A. Yes. I didn't know I was named as special attorney. I thought I was kind of local-attorney here.

Q. You were pretty active, weren't you?

A. Fairly so.

[fol. 3677] Did you discuss the matter with the SEC, the condition of Fidelity?

A. Yes, yes.

Q. Was that at the March 17th meeting?

A. Well, we did discuss that at that time.

Q. Well, did you discuss it at the March 17th meeting?

A. That is right; that is right, yes, sir.

Q. Was there any discussion at that time as to which court the proceedings should be begun in?

A. Yes, sir, questions were asked between and among us as to what forum should be chosen for this.

Q. What court did you prefer?

A. I had no preference. I had concluded, and so expressed myself—I am not sure whether it was at that meeting, but it was to Mr. Kline, and I think before that maybe, I preferred either the local court here, because of the statutes naming it, or the federal court in the Northern District, where the chief office of the company was located. Those were the two courts discussed most in connection with this.

Q. That was discussed at this meeting——

A. No, I am not sure that that was discussed in open [fol. 3678] meeting now.

Q. I am talking about this meeting of March 17th, when Mr. Jaegerman was present and other persons representing the SEC.

A. The general discussion then was limited, as I remember, as to whether it be state or federal; no particular court; just the two classes of courts.

Q. Did you express yourself at that meeting?

A. I don't believe I did. I am not sure.

Q. Did you have a preference when you were discussing it?

A. No, not at that time I didn't.

Q. That was the purpose of the meeting, was it not, to determine what sort of court proceedings should be instituted?

A. No, not necessarily. I think we discussed whether or not we might still go ahead and reorganize this company outside a court proceeding.

Q. But you concluded you couldn't do that?

A. No, No, Mr. Townsend, we did not. No, no, we discussed cutting down——

Q. I know you discussed that.

[fol. 3679] A. We discussed that, and my memory has been refreshed since I have been here and have another week to do some more work on it, to try to put our men out and ask the contract holders to cut down their claims on contracts and still go on through reorganization outside any court.

Q. In addition to discussing the question of reorganization, you did discuss the question of instituting court proceedings? That is true?

A. Yes, at some of these times very shortly unless something was done outside by way of reorganization it would be necessary.

Q. A general discussion of the advisability of going into court took place at your March 17th meeting? Isn't that true?

A. Well, we discussed court proceedings. I wouldn't say it was the main part of the discussion by any means.

Q. I didn't say it was the main part, but I said it was discussed at that meeting.

A. Well——

Q. Did you discuss particular courts, that is whether it [fol. 3680] should be in the state court or the federal court?

A. We discussed among ourselves whether it should be in state court or federal court.

Q. What do you mean by "among yourselves"?

A. The lawyers, on the side. Most of the discussion I remember was after the meeting broke up, and some of us, Mr. Jaegerman included, were standing over at the side discussing this.

Q. Was that a discussion with reference to what court the proceedings should be instituted in?

A. Well, some proceeding, yes.

Q. What was the result of that?

A. No conclusion reached on their part or our part either. Mr. Carver was there and some of Mr. Jaegerman's associates. My understanding was there was no definite conclusion on their part as to where proceedings should be filed, if it were filed, by the company.

Q. Did you express your preference at that meeting?

A. I don't think so.

Q. Did Mr. Jaegerman express his?

A. I am not sure that he did.

Q. Did anybody express their preference as to where [fol. 3681] the proceedings should be?

A. Somebody said this, that "I would think, with a general situation like this, it would demand federal procedure" —some expression of opinion like that.

Q. Do you remember who made that statement?

Mr. Palmer: Let him finish his answer.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I thought he had finished.

A. Oh, no, I don't remember who it was. As I remember, I talked to Mr. Carver, of Mr. Schencker's department, more about this jurisdiction question than anybody else. He said, "No, we don't want to be put in position of advising you what your forum is to be; we don't know." We discussed both angles of this thing, and Mr. Kline expressed the same opinion.

Q. In your discussions with Mr. Carver and Mr. Kline, did you discuss the advantages or disadvantages of state and federal proceedings, respectively?

A. I discussed with Mr. Kline the terms of our statute and talked to him about a plan of reorganization, and he agreed that he would put me in touch with the reorganization division of the SEC and have them help work out something at any time I was ready to proceed, if we went [fol. 3682] that way. If we went the other way, they would come in automatically.

Q. What do you mean "the other way"?

A. If we went into a federal court. As I understand, it is automatic for you to come in, Mr. Jaegerman, if we are in a federal court; and they were to assist the other way, if we went the other way.

Q. After you had this discussion on March 17th and near that time, did you attend any meeting of the board of directors of the association?

A. No, I didn't.

Q. When was this state court proceedings decided upon?

A. This letter was addressed to me dated March 25, wasn't it? We had a number of conferences shortly thereafter. My advice was it was a separate proceeding in the state court, under our state statute. I talked to Mr. Partlow, as I said a while ago; I talked to my own associates, talked to Mr. Sims a number of times.

Q. Mr. Sims, in his letter to you of March 17th—or 25—says this in effect, "I should like to explore the possibility of placing this company in trusteeship under 77B." "Inas- [fol. 3683] much as you have acted for this company in a legal capacity for several years, I wish you would consider the observations made herein." Did you make any reply to Mr. Sims in reference to instituting a proceeding in federal court?

A. Under 77B?

Q. Of course, 77B was repealed at that time. Did you reply to that feature of his letter?

A. I did personally, yes, sir.

Q. What did you tell him?

A. After I made further investigation there I told him I thought the simplest procedure would be in the State of West Virginia.

Q. Why?

A. And the proper procedure.

Q. How did you reach that conclusion in preference to a federal court proceeding?

A. All right, sir. In the first place, the statute recites that he may proceed in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County. This was some of the reasoning, not only mine, but some other people I talked to in connection with this, Mr. Foulk, to be specific. In the old days the salesmen [fol. 3684] all recited and referred to these various statutes in West Virginia and what protection the people had and son on; so that we felt that these contracts were sold with these statutes as really a part of them, whether they were written into them or not, because they referred to them, and also that that statute probably meant something, and if it meant anything you would read into it a less expense to administer these assets by a state officer in a local court than if you did go in a federal court and get outside, away from your officer who was on a state payroll, than otherwise.

Q. You think, then, it would be more economical to administer this——

A. I certainly do, Mr. Townsend—I do.

Q. Just let me finish my question. You think it would be more economical to administer this proceeding in a state court than in federal court?

A. In case of liquidation I certainly do.

Q. I am not talking about liquidation.

A. All right.

Q. Talk about anything you want to.

A. Then, going to the other side, about reorganizing, this was our reasoning on that, that no reorganization could be [fol. 3685] successful without the co-operation and assistance of our own Insurance Commissioner and some of the other insurance commissioners.

Q. You thought you could get them to—then it was a voluntary matter in the state court?

A. We would get those insurance commissioners sold on a plan and get before the state court and you would have a better chance to reorganize than anywhere else.

Q. And it would be entirely a voluntary matter in the other states outside West Virginia?

A. Yes, or you might have some ancillary proceedings in the other states, but we didn't see how you would have any chance to reorganize this—we talked about how we would get these securities in from the other states—if we could get them in—whether or not you could get a plan approved by the commissioners more quickly in a voluntary way than to bring them into court, and so on. That was talked of at considerable length.

Q. You didn't find any way to get them in, though, did you, the other states?

A. We didn't get to that, sir.

Q. Didn't you——

[fol. 3686] A. We never had a plan of organization.

Q. How?

A. We never got to a plan of reorganization to submit to the Court down here.

Q. You couldn't unless you got control of the assets, could you?

A. Well——

Q. And you did take steps to get in all the assets——

A. We did——

Q. (Continuing.) From the other states?

A. Down to our local court?

A. Yes.

A. I didn't so understand it. Our Insurance Commissioner wired all the other people and asked them to act as receiver for the assets in their respective states.

Q. Didn't you send some representatives of your office to some of these other states to confer with them about coming into this state court proceedings here?

A. No, I did not.

Q. Didn't Mr. Goldsmith go out to Madison, Wisconsin, with reference to that question?

A. He went out with Mr. Messick on some hearing out [fols. 3687-3690] there. I don't know just what the scope of it was.

Q. And didn't you go out to see the Insurance Commissioner or insurance department with reference to bringing the assets into this court?

Mr. Palmer: I think there is no such testimony.

A. Not that I know of.

The Court: I will permit the cross-examination by the question. I agree with Mr. Palmer that there is no testimony to that effect.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 3691] The Court: That ought not to take much time.

There is one other observation I have to make in connection with the ruling that I made yesterday. Mr. Palmer [fol. 3692] made a motion to strike out certain opinion evidence which had been given by Mr. Burt, Mr. Pulfer, Mr. Risley, I think, and perhaps some others. There had been no objection made to this opinion evidence at the time it was received, and at the time Mr. Palmer objected to it yesterday I overruled his objection, and I am still of opinion to overrule the objection, but I want to make this observation in connection with it. The entire testimony of those gentlemen with reference to whom he made his motion is not fresh in the Court's mind. I am of opinion, from my recollection of it, that they qualified to give their opinion. However, if, on a more close perusal of their testimony I conclude that they did not qualify to give their opinions, then those opinions will not be given any weight whatsoever by the Court. I thought I should make that statement in view of my hasty ruling yesterday.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, the reason I made that motion was this. We did not object to the opinion being given, because, as I stated to the Court, we felt the Court would judge as to the weight which should be given it, having full advantage of their testimony and knowl- [fols. 3693-3694] edge. We felt, though, that Mr. Latta, the witness on the stand, had given his qualifications, and therefore was entitled to give an opinion, but if he were not entitled to then under the same basis the Court should not consider the other testimony, and it was only for that reason we made the motion.

. . . . . .

[fol. 3695] Q. Mr. Koontz, after you received the letter of March 25 from Auditor Sims setting out his views with reference to Fidelity, did you make any written reply to that communication?

A. No, sir, I feel sure that I did not.

Q. Positive of it?

A. I think that is right.

Q. Did you reply to it at all?

A. Yes.

[fol. 3696] Q. In what way?

A. I conferred immediately with Mr. Partlow of the Attorney General's office.

Q. Well, did you confer with Mr. Sims?

A. Well, after that I conferred with him and talked to the various boys around my office and talked to Sims then shortly after that.

Q. You and Mr. Sims held a conference then, after the receipt of this letter?

A. Well, several conferences between the time that letter——

Q. March 25?

A. Yes, I conferred with him a number of times by phone and talked to him personally a number of times between that time and the time of filing the suit.

Q. Of course, in your conversations and conferences with Mr. Sims after the receipt of this letter, you notified and advised him fully with reference to the subject matter of the letter, did you not? Here is the letter, if you want to look at it. (Handing paper to witness.)

A. Thank you. Well, we talked—our conversations were [fol. 3697] on the main subject as to whether or not there should be a proceeding in the state court or the federal Court. That was the general basis of the discussion.

Q. And you advised him to proceed in the state courts rather than in the federal courts?

A. I advised him that I thought that that was the better place to proceed, yes, sir.

Q. Well, you expressed that to him as your best judgment?

A. I did.

Q. And as your legal opinion, that it was best.

A. I advised him definitely, Mr. Townsend, that he could proceed in the Kanawha Circuit Court or the federal district court of northern West Virginia. Those two courts were talked of; and then we talked about the advantages of one over the other and what was the proper one.

Q. I am not talking about a preference between the Northern District and the Southern District. I am just talking about your preference as between federal courts and state courts, and you advised him in favor of state courts?

[fol. 3698] A. I did. I thought it was proper for him to proceed in the state court rather than in the federal courts.

Q. After you had so advised him or between the time of the receipt of that letter and the institution of the suit, did you confer with the officials of Fidelity as their attorney?

A. I conferred a number of times with Mr. Tom Foulk, talked to him by phone, talked to Mr. John Marshall a number of times, yes, sir; I think with Mr. Risley; I am not sure. I talked to two lawyers, however.

Q. Did you give them your views as to a preference between the state and the federal courts?

A. I did; I expressed myself freely to them, as I had before.

Q. And you advised them to the same effect that you advised Sims?

A. Well, yes, sir, that was my conclusion. I let them have my conclusion.

Q. That you thought it was best for all concerned that the suit be instituted in the state courts?

A. That was my advice, yes, sir—to which they agreed, let me add.

[fol. 3699] Q. Then, through your rendering of your legal opinions after Sims had agreed to institute suit in the state court and officers of Fidelity had agreed that that was the thing to do, you then proceeded to get ready the papers, or your firm did?

A. That is right.

Q. In conjunction with the Attorney General?

A. That is right.

Q. Is that correct?

A. That is true.

Q. And when the bill was filed in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County the Attorney General appeared there representing Sims?

A. That is right.

Q. And you, or your firm, appeared there representing Fidelity?

A. Well, I will say this. Mr. Sims asked—discussed fully after it was agreed that this proceeding should be filed, the question of handling it and so on. We did represent Fidelity in accepting service for Fidelity—represented them to that extent.

Q. Well, as a matter of fact, Mr. Koontz, on the 7th of [fol. 3700] April the board of directors of Fidelity passed a resolution and sent you a copy of it?

A. That is true. That is true.

Q. And pursuant to that resolution you did represent Fidelity in the state court?

A. That is right.

Q. And at the time the petition was presented you appeared there for Fidelity, the Attorney General's office appeared for Sims, and you entered a consent order?

A. That is right.

Q. With your full approval?

A. That is right.

Q. As attorney for Fidelity? Is that right?

A. They accepted service, Mr. Townsend. I wasn't present. There was no answer filed for Fidelity, remember.

Q. You assented to the order that was entered?

A. Made no protest to the order.

Q. You assented to it, didn't you?

A. Have it that way if you will, sir.

Q. The order so recites, doesn't it?

A. I don't remember the order, sir.

[fol. 3701] Q. At the time the bill was presented to the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, was there a representative of the Attorney General's office there at all?

A. Yes, sir, Mr. Partlow was there.

Q. And the order that was entered with your approval, to which you consented, appointed Mr. Ross B. Thomas as one of the receivers? That is correct?

A. That is true.

Q. And he is a member of your law firm?

A. Associate of my——

Q. And the other receiver was Mr. H. Isaiah Smith?

A. That is true.

Mr. Palmer: Mr. Townsend, was it an order or decree entered?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Well, call it either one, I guess.

Mr. Palmer: Well, I just wondered. It was either one or the other.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: There was one order—I don't remember—appointing these receivers. I don't think there was but one entered at that time. That is the only one I am inquiring about.

[fol. 3702] Q. Now, Mr. Koontz, Section 146 of Chapter 10 of the Bankruptcy Act provides in effect this: "A petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith under paragraph 4 when a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors or stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding." Now, at the time the petition was filed in his Honor's court and since that time and now, is it your reasoned opinion and judgment that the best interests of the creditors and stockholders could be subserved in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County rather than in a district court of the United States?

A. With due respect to this Court, it certainly is, Mr. Townsend.

Q. You maintain that opinion now?

A. I do for a fact, yes, sir.

The Court: Do you mean in this particular proceeding, Mr. Townsend, or in any proceeding?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: My question was broad enough to cover any proceedings, I think.

The Witness: I didn't so understand it. I understood it to be confined to this case, of course.

[fol. 3703] The Court:

Q. Do you mean in this present proceeding, with Mr. Thomas as one of the receivers?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: That is what I mean, yes, sir.
The Witness: He said "the petition".

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Now, Mr. Koontz, I want to ask you this question. Assuming there exists a possible or a probable liability on the part of the management of Fidelity to the contract holders because of bad management, and it was deemed necessary to institute suits to recover wasted funds, do you think that could best be done in a state or a federal court?

The Witness: Shall I answer that, your Honor?
The Court: If that question is amplified as to whether he thinks it can best be done as a part or as a result of a proceeding in a state or federal court—your question, as you asked him there, does not mean that, as I construe it.
Mr. T. C. Townsend: Well, I will amend it as your Honor suggests. Now answer it as amended.

A. It seems to me if the liability were established on the part of anybody you could sue them either from a state court proceeding or a federal court proceeding. In other [fol. 3704] words, that the receivers could sue them or the trustee could sue them.

Q. Well, in this particular proceedings where do you think you would get the best results?

A. I am not sure that there would be any difference. I think that your state receivers——

Q. Do you think the chances would be equal?

A. They certainly would within the State of West Virginia, and if you would get on the outside of the State of West Virginia your receivers could bring suits in another state against anybody who was guilty of mismanagement.

Q. Well, it is your opinion, then, that you could get as good results in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County as you could get in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of West Virginia against any officer of the company who might be guilty of or connected with the wasting of funds of the debtor?

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I will have to object to that. Mr. Koontz has said whether a suit was brought in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County or the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of [fol. 3705] West Virginia is a matter of no importance. I think what your Honor has indicated as a result of the proceedings in any of those courts may be pertinent.

The Court: That is right: It doesn't make any difference to this Court, if the liability were attempted to be established, whether a suit was brought to enforce that liability in federal court or state court. That is not the point. And I don't think that is what counsel intends to address the question towards.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Well, that is. Is that question objectionable?

The Court: Well, if you mean whether the company or the receivers of the trustee could better succeed in a suit brought in a state court or in a federal court against someone who is alleged to have been guilty of mismanagement, then I sustain the objection.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Read the question.

(The question was read.)

Q. Let's put it this way. Is it your opinion that you could get as good results if you proceeded against an officer of the company or if it was found advisable to proceed against an officer of the company for wasting the debtor's funds, [fol. 3706] in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County or in the federal courts.

Mr. Palmer: Objection.
The Court: Sustained.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Let me ask you this question. In the state courts or in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, your firm represents Fidelity. Would you—and I mean you—feel free and unhampered in any attempt that might be made to recover funds due Fidelity from any party whom it was deemed advisable to proceed against in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County?

A. Mr. Townsend, you stated in the beginning that we are counsel for Fidelity. May I ask that you correct that and tell me whether or not the record shows that we are still counsel for Fidelity, because, if I understood, Mr. Fleming was appointed counsel for the company later on, and I just assumed that that meant we were cancelled out as counsel for Fidelity.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: There is nothing in the record so far as I know, that cancels your attorneyship.

Mr. Palmer: No, I think Mr. Townsend is right, your Honor; there is nothing showing any right of Mr. Fleming [fol. 3707] or Mr. Ray to appear in these proceedings on behalf of Fidelity, and we have raised that objection before, that they have no right to appear as counsel here without the authority of the corporation, and we renew that objection.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Will you answer that question?

A. I will answer that question and say that if there were any particular reason why we couldn't represent these receivers as against anybody because of close association or whatnot, we certainly would step aside and the attorney general would appoint somebody else to prosecute the case.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Will you read the question, please?

(The question was read.)

Q. Can you answer that question yes or no and then make such explanation as you care to make?

Mr. Palmer: I object to that, your Honor. I think the witness has answered the question with a proper explanatory answer.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I think his answer is equivocal. [fol. 3708] The Court: No, it struck me that he answered the question. The question, however, is objectionable, although no objection was made to it, in that it wouldn't make any difference whether they were proceeded against in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County or in the Circuit Court of California.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: That is right, your Honor, but I only used that because that is the only suit that is pending.

The Court: Well, you are confusing the suit that is pending with suits that may be brought to enforce the same liability. It doesn't make any difference, as far — I see, where the suit is to enforce the claimed liability for fraud; the question is whether the proceeding in the circuit court or the proceeding in the federal court is a more available and suitable way of arriving at a point where such suits can be brought, not as to whether those suits are proper one place or another.

Mr. Townsend: I think that is right. It is a question of which courts could furnish the best relief.

The Court: Yes, but don't confuse the courts in which these proceedings are pending with the courts in which some [fol. 3709] suit may be brought against some person that is alleged to owe money.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I would like to note another objection to that. It is not a question of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County. If Fidelity brings an action to recover it would have to be brought by the Attorney General as attorney for the plaintiff, Edgar B. Sims, who filed that suit, or the action, if need be, be brought by his agents, the West Virginia State Court Receivers. I think the distinction should be made in the question that if it is for the purpose of collecting the assets of Fidelity, then under the statutes of West Virginia that suit would be instituted by the State Auditor, who is represented, as the record shows, by the Attorney General in this suit. However, if it should be a matter of getting something that was outside the State of West Virginia, there would have to be some other persons appointed to handle that suit and it couldn't be that an action could be brought by the West Virginia State Court Receivers outside the State of West Virginia, because of the territorial limits of the West Virginia court.

[fol. 3710] The Court: Well, that particular distinction is largely technical, because if the state line were all that prevented the receivers from bringing the suit, the receivers would certainly have to do some act to associate some ancillary receiver or to instigate a proceeding at the hands of some ancillary receiver.

Mr. Palmer: I agree with your Honor, but the point I was making was that there is a distinction between whether it was an asset of Fidelity that the Auditor should collect and the Attorney General should bring the suit, or whether it is something that the receivers should take into their possession, as to whether or not Mr. Koontz's firm or the Attorney General should instigate such a suit, and the question does not make that distinction.

The Court: I think that is close enough, in view of the facts that have been brought out as to the character of this proceeding and the close association between the Auditor's office and the receivers, and particularly the firm of Mr. Koontz.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Now, Mr. Koontz, will you answer the question yes or no and make such explanation as you [fol. 3711] care to make.

A. I would say yes, that I would have no hesitancy in advising what the rights are in connection with this receivership any more than a representative of the trustee would have a connection with the trusteeship, and if because of some personal relationship we couldn't go ahead and prosecute the suit fully, we would step aside and the Attorney General would certainly choose somebody to go ahead and prosecute the suit, and I don't say—mention that limitation—talk about personal association—I don't think of any personal association that would retard any affirmative action on our part.

Q. Or any business association?

A. Yes, personal or business.

Q. Or any association otherwise?

A. Yes, that is true.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Your Honor, I would like to introduce the minutes—oh, they have already been introduced; Exhibit 97. That is the minutes of April 7.

The Court: You say they have been introduced?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: It is so marked here.

The Court: Then all you have to do is to refer to them.

[fol. 3712] Mr. T. C. Townsend: I had not noticed that. I don't care to ask any questions about it. Yes, I will ask this question.

Q. That is one of the original letters you spoke to me about?

(No answer.)

Q. You received that letter?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that the first notice you had of your appointment as attorney to represent Fidelity?

A. It was, yes, sir.

The Court: I think you ought to let the record show what you are talking about.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I am talking about the resolution that is contained in this letter—the resolution of April 7, 1941, that purports to be contained in that letter.

Mr. Palmer: What is the date of the letter please?

The Court: You ought to identify the letter on the record so we will know what letter you are talking about.

[fol. 3713] Mr. T. C. Townsend: Have you got a copy of it?

A. No, I don't have. That is read in the record, however.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: This letter has been read into the record.

The Court: But your question doesn't show that that is the letter you are talking about.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I am aware of that. We will put it this way. On yesterday there was read into the record a letter dated April 10, 1941 addressed to the firm of Koontz & Koontz, Union Building, Charleston, West Virginia, and signed by F. J. McNulty, Vice-President and Secretary of Fidelity Assurance Association. That letter purports to contain a resolution passed by the board of directors of Fidelity with reference to employing your firm to represent Fidelity in the state court proceedings. My question was, is that the first notice you had of your employment?

A. It was, sir. With this verification from somebody—we were in touch with Wheeling quite often. Someone may have told us by phone that there had been such a resolution passed. But we received no notice after the [fol. 3714] passing of this resolution.

Q. You had talked about the state court proceedings to the board of directors prior to the resolution?

A. I talked to Mr. Foulk and Mr. Marshall, and, as I say, probably to Mr. Risley, and there may have been some other individuals. Mr. Townsend, remember, I had not been a member of the board for over a year, and I wasn't attending board meetings.

Q. Mr. Messick made the statement at that board meeting that on April 4, 1941 he had been informed that there was imminent danger of legal proceedings being instituted by the Auditor and Ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia, and that this meeting was called to inform the directors. Did you talk with Mr. Messick about it?

A. Oh, yes, a number of times.

Q. Did you talk to him on April 4th?

A. On April 4th or 5th Mr. Messick was in Washington, and I met him there and talked to him at some length.

Q. Then you told Mr. Messick when you talked to him at that time all about the understanding between yourself and the Auditor in reference to the institution of this pro[fol. 3715] ceeding in the state courts?

A. I told Mr. Messick what my advice had been, yes, sir.

Q. All right.

A. Yes, sir. I discussed it with him and discussed the various angles from a state court point of view and a federal court point of view.

Q. Mr. Koontz, did you attend the meeting of the board of directors in Pittsburgh on June 3, 1941?

A. Did I attend?

Q. Yes.

A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. Were you notified that they were holding a meeting?

A. I was notified that they were to hold one, yes.

Q. You were not a member of the board of directors at that time?

A. That is true.

Q. Did you attend the stockholders' meeting held in Wheeling last week?

A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. Were you notified of that meeting?

[fol. 3716] A. I heard about it. I am not sure a notice came. I don't believe I saw a notice, but that doesn't mean that one didn't come. I heard about the meeting to be held up there. Mr. Townsend, I am still a one share stockholder. I just assume the notice was mailed to all the stockholders. So far as I know I am a one share stockholder.

Q. That is all you ever held.

A. That is right. (Laughing.)

Mr. T. C. Townsend: That is all.

The Witness: Relative to some meetings in Washington which were talked about before, I desire to make the following statement relative to dates. The main and larger meeting was held March 17th in the office of Mr. Chester Lane. At the conclusion of that meeting it was decided that a smaller committee should work on plans briefly discussed at that meeting, and that there should be another meeting a little later on. The meeting set for later on was delayed, and the principals again met in Washington on the last day of March and the first day of April for further discussion.

[fols. 3717-3727] Cross-examination.

By Mr. Huwe:

Q. Mr. Koontz, as I understand it you favored a reorganization in the form of an insurance company—at least, that was your attitude prior to and during the state court receivership? Is that correct?

A. State the question again, please.

(The question was read.)

A. I felt that that was the only practical way to reorganize this company, in the insurance field or in some other field rather than in the face certificate field.

Q. Have you familiarized yourself, as attorney for Fidelity, with the insurance laws of the various states with respect to either administrative rules or provisions of law requiring a two year operation in the domestic state before being given permission to operate in the foreign state?

A. I know some states have that requirement. I think same have one year and some two years; I am not familiar with all of them.

. . . . . .

[fol. 3728] Q. Mr. Koontz, in the proposed SEC report of 1939, that is, the debtor's report prepared by your law firm, I think Mr. Ross Thomas performed the major part of that operation, did he not?

Mr. Palmer: I suggest that Mr. Huwe call it registration statement instead of debtor's report.

The Court: That would indentify it better, because that is what it has been called heretofore.

Mr. Huwe: Well, I stand corrected—call it the registration statement with the SEC. That was proposed and completed in 1939? Is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. What method of evaluation was used in that statement? Market?

A. Doesn't that speak for itself?

Q. Or West Virginia sound—do you know?

A. Well, I did know, but I forget.

[fol. 3729] Q. Is that in evidence, that registration——

Mr. Palmer: I don't think so.

Mr. Huwe:

Q. You wouldn't state from your own knowledge——

A. Market was in there, but I think some other methods were used too.

Q. You are sure you used market?

A. I feel sure——

Mr. Huwe: Mr. Thomas will verify that.

Mr. Thomas: The matter of valuation was a part of the accounting work on the report, which was prepared by Haskins & Sells. As I recall, the valuation was given both as to market, book and sound value.

Mr. Huwe: Thank you.

Q. Who drew the amended charter—your law office took care of that, did they not, the 1941 amended charter?

A. We took care of filing it.

Q. Changing it from an insurance——

A. Yes. We took care of filing it. As I recall, that was drawn by someone else.

Q. Oh, it was?

A. Yes.

[fol. 3730] Mr. Huwe: That is all.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Ray:

Q. Mr. Koontz, you have testified that during the years 1938, 1939 and 1940 you were in touch with some twelve or fifteen financial houses for the purpose of securing money with which to rehabilitate Fidelity. Is that true?

A. That is true.

Q. At the time you were engaged in these negotiations, were you of the opinion that Fidelity was a company which should be rehabilitated and which could be rehabilitated?

A. I was.

Q. I would gather from what you have testified here that during your conversations with Mr. Marshall, with Mr.

Messick, Mr. Fleming, Mr. Sims immediately prior to the institution of the state court proceedings, that you were still of the opinion that Fidelity was an organization which should be rehabilitated and reorganized and could be rehabilitated and reorganized. Is that true?

A. That is true. Explaining, however, that we had been converted into an insurance company, and it was a ques[fol. 3731] tion of going ahead in that field and carrying on the business that you already had on the books and putting more business of like kind on the books if it were profitable.

Q. Well, it was your opinion that there was a place in the economic life of this country for a business such as this? Were you not of that opinion?

A. I was more of that opinion a few months ago, Mr. Ray, than I am right at the present time.

Q. That is what I am asking you, about a few months ago.

A. That is true.

Q. My question referred to a time prior to the institution of the state court proceedings. That was your opinion then?

A. That this business on the books could be carried on profitably if we could get this coupon cut down. That was always our plan—scheme of things.

Q. And you thought it was a business which should be carried on?

A. The business on the books, yes, sir.

Q. I mean, you thought that this principle of selling thrift [fol. 3732] was a business which was for the public interest of the people of the country as a whole, did you not?

A. I always liked it very much if you could get it on a sound basis where you could earn what you promised to earn.

Q. And if it was properly managed and performed what it held itself out to perform, it was a good thing for the people as a whole, was it not?

A. I always felt that any thrift plan was a good thing if you put it on the right basis.

Q. And during your discussions with Mr. John Marshall, Sr., those discussions were solely with the view to reorganizing and rehabilitating this company, were they not?

A. That is true, yes, sir.

Q. And when the bill of complaint was filed in the state court, one of the prayers contained in that bill was "that all proper orders and decrees may be entered for the purpose of rehabilitating and reorganizing the defendant Fidelity Assurance Association"? Is that not true?

A. I assume it is. You are reading from it.

[fol. 3733] Q. You were familiar with the bill?

A. Yes, generally, yes, sir.

Q. Do you want to examine the bill?

A. No, not at all. I will say yes to the question, if it is all right.

Q. I would prefer that you do examine it here. (Handing witness paper.) Now, will you state on the record whether that is one of the prayers of the bill?

A. It is.

Q. I understood you to testify that prior to the institution of the state court proceeding you were unable to obtain any expressions of opinion from the Securities and Exchange Commission or from any member of the Commission or from any responsible department head of the Commission as to the court in which the reorganization of Fidelity should be attempted. Is that correct?

A. I think so. I never talked to any member of the Commission at all.

Q. Well, I say that was your testimony——

A. I think so.

Q. (Continuing.) And the only advice you could get over at the Commission from anybody was that that was a ques[fol. 3734] tion which the party which instituted the suit would have to decide.

A. That is right.

Q. Is that your testimony?

A. "You gentlemen will have to choose your forum."

Q. Mr. Koontz, it is in evidence here that Commissioner Healy, of the Securities and Exchange Commission, wrote a letter to Mr. John Marshall, Sr., in May 1941, and that Mr. John Marshall sent you a copy of that letter, and in that letter, which has been read into evidence here, is a statement to the effect that you were advised several weeks prior to the writing of the letter that it was the feeling of Mr. Healy, and not the official action of the Commission, but of those connected with the Commission, that the reorganization of Fidelity should be undertaken under the provisions of Chapter 10 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, I do not want to object to that question, but I think Mr. Ray has quoted as nearly as anyone could from memory the portions of the letter to which he refers, but I think that perhaps the exact parts of Mr. Healy's statement should be used rather [fol. 3735] than an attempt on the part of any counsel to try to remember what that was, because there has been some discussion heretofore as to the exact content and meaning of those particular phrases.

The Court: I see Mr. Koontz looking for the letter.

The Witness: I am not sure that I have it. I have not seen that letter for some time. I don't know Mr. Healy; I don't know that I have ever met him. I never talked to him about this matter. That could still state the absolute views, for this reason, that, as I said yesterday, after this proceeding was filed and for some time thereafter I saw a number of times Mr. Schencker in Washington, who was head of a particular division of SEC, and he did say that his idea was that we would get better results under Chapter 10, but that was after our state proceeding was filed.

Mr. Ray: I did not get to complete my question, Mr. Koontz.

A. Beg your pardon.

Q. I was going to ask you, did you receive a copy of the letter which Mr. Healy wrote to Mr. Marshall?

A. I did.

[fol. 3736] Q. When you received the letter, did you write Mr. Marshall and notify him that the statements contained in the letter about the information given to you with respect to the opinion of the Securities and Exchange Commission was incorrect?

A. I am not sure that I wrote him.

Q. Well, would you examine your file and tell us whether you have a letter to Mr. Marshall in which you advise Mr. Marshall that the statements made by Commissioner Healy are not correct?

A. I shall, but I don't remember any such letter, and I think if I were disputing a member of the Commission of the SEC I would certainly remember it. I did talk to Mr. Marshall a number of times, however, and did tell him exactly what Mr. Schencker had said. I told him also about the former discussions with which he was already familiar.

Mr. Ray: I would much prefer to ask the witness the exact language contained in the letter, but it has not been introduced in evidence. Certain portions were read into evidence, which it may take a long time to find. If counsel thinks I have materially misquoted it—— [fol. 3737] The Court: The question is fair enough to be propounded, I believe. It is not necessary to have the exact words.

Mr. Ray:

Q. Mr. Koontz, what authority is there in the statutes of West Virginia or under the chancery practice of West Virginia for the reorganization of a corporation in a state court proceeding?

A. We have no reorganization statute in West Virginia, of course, as you know, but under your general equity powers of the state court you can reorganize.

Q. Then when you recommended that this proceeding be brought into the state courts, you knew that the receivers of that court would not have any authority or control over the assets of the corporation which were situate without the boundaries of West Virginia, did you not?

A. That is right.

Q. And you knew that the total of those assets was approximately ten million dollars?

A. Yes.

Q. You knew when you recommended this state court proceeding that there could be no reorganization of Fidelity [fol. 3738] in that proceeding unless every holder of common stock, every holder of preferred stock, every holder of a contract and every creditor, both secured and unsecured, would agree thereto, did you not?

Mr. Palmer: Objection.

The Court: In my opinion that is not a fair question. It should contain something further, that is, the qualification that those who did not agree to it be paid off their full equities, with the consent of those who did agree.

Mr. Palmer: That is right. That is what I had in mind.

A. You would have a hundred per cent reorganization in the event you could carry out the suggestion made in your question, Mr. Ray, where you could have a reorganization that could be very effective without the consent of all the people you mention.

Mr. Ray:

Q. Will you explain how, in a state court proceeding, you could have a reorganization of a corporation without the consent of all the stockholders and all the creditors?

Mr. Palmer: If your Honor please, if the stockholders [fols. 3739-3742] are shown, as in this case, to have no equity, you need no consent from them, if they have nothing left in the corporation.

Mr. Ray: If you want to take the stand to answer the question I will be perfectly willing to call you in a few minutes.

Mr. Palmer: I will be glad to do that, Mr. Ray, but I was making an objection to the Court.

The Court: Mr. Palmer is just objecting to the questions, and I think the question fails to take into consideration the fact that the Court mentioned a little while ago that there may be a reorganization without the consent of everyone, if those who do consent are willing that the ones who don't consent be paid off.

Mr. Ray: I expected that was the answer the witness would give to the question. I asked him how it could be effected, and I presumed that is the only way it could be effected.

The Court: That is a legal conclusion.

[fol. 3743] The Court: Let's let Mr. Koontz explain that and get away from it. We are taking too much time. Go ahead, Mr. Koontz.

A. In 1940, after Rosset and Messick came in and became active and were having work assigned elsewhere, it was a question of settling with our firm, and discussion was had before the executive committee. As I remember, it was the executive committee, either the exeutive committee or directors' meeting in Wheeling; and a committee was appointed to check over and report back what fee they thought the firm of Koontz & Koontz was entitled to. On that com-[fol. 3744] mittee were Mr. John Marshall, Mr. Tom Foulk, and I am not sure but what another member or two; however, those were the active people. At our next meeting they did report back that they thought a fair fee would be a certain amount, as I remember that was $20,000, to finish paying the fee for all the work done. That was reported back to the next meeting and was accepted and approved, and some time after that was paid, but that is the way the final settlement on the larger payments was handled. That was the first half, I would say along about May or June, of 1940.

Mr. Ray: Q. You don't know whether that was ever adopted——

A. It was adopted——

Q. At a formal meeting of the executive committee——

A. It was adopted. It was; a committee was authorized in one formal meeting and the report made back to another formal meeting and passed.

Q. Well, the minutes don't show it, that I have been able to find.

A. I think that you will find that in an executive minute, and then that minute adopted later by your board of directors.

[fol. 3745] Q. After you leave the stand——

A. I will try.

(Q. (continuing): Find out if you can, and if you find it I would like to have it introduced in evidence. Mr. Koontz, before I took part in these proceedings, in reading through the transcript, I have seen that there were some references to the fees received by your firm during the years 1938, 1939 and 1940, and since I have been here the matter has been discussed on one or two occasions, and I would like to know whether Mr. Palmer reported to you what has taken place here at the hearing in that respect?

A. Generally that there was a report made in here showing the fees of our firm, and that those fees had been discussed from time to time.

Q. You had knowledge that the fees had been discussed here?

A. That is true. That is true.

Q. Do you not keep records in your firm showing each day what member works on a matter and how much time he spends on it?

A. We do. My secretary keeps my own record, and the [fol. 3746] bookkeeper keeps a general record.

Q. It is kept for every member and every associate of your firm, is it not?

A. That is true.

Q. Mr. Koontz, you were present in Washington at the meeting at which these plans prepared by Mr. Latta were discussed with the Securities and Exchange Commission were you not?

A. Yes, I was.

Q. Mr. Palmer produced two of these plans here a day or two ago in this hearing, and when asked where they came from he refused to answer. Did they come from your files?

A. Frankly, I don't know.

Q. You had copies of those plans in your files did you not?

A. You say "those plans". I have had copies of many plans—several plans of discussions and digests and what-not, from Latta, from Messick and from Risley.

Mr. Palmer: They came from associates of the firm of Koontz & Koontz and from their files. Mr. Ross Thomas and Mr. Goldsmith gave them to me to look at.

[fols. 3747-3748] Mr. Ray: The exhibits to which I refer are Exhibits Nos. 111, 112 and 113, are they not, Mr. Palmer?

Mr. Palmer: Yes.

. . . . . .

[fol. 3749] Q. Mr. Koontz, when you first went with the company as a director in 1932, there is no doubt about it that Fidelity was in some financial distress? Isn't that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. And you, not having any financial interest in the company, and being put on the board of directors presumably because of your experience and your ability as an attorney, used both your experience in financial matters together with your abilities as an attorney to aid in correcting that situation? Is that true?

A. I did.

Q. During the years from 1933 on, after Mr. Sims became State Auditor, did you from time to time have conferences with Mr. Sims?

A. I did.

Q. Did he more or less come to you as intermediary be-[fol. 3750] tween himself and the company?

A. Quite often he did, that is true.

Q. And did he discuss the various problems which he, as state auditor, felt that he had in relation to the company?

A. He did. I don't know whether that would be exclusive, but he did discuss the company's problems many times.

Q. As one of the problems, did he discuss with you the fact that in his opinion the salaries of the officers were too high, and ask you to bring that to the company's attention and take corrective steps?

A. Yes, he discussed that with me, and also that the officers—Senator Sutherland came down here and was present at Mr. Sims' office. He didn't confine that discussion to me, but various officers that represented the company.

Q. And did Mr. Sims, in his conferences with you, protest the amount or highness of the officers' salaries?

A. Oh, yes, he did, and there was a schedule of salaries agreed on at the time Mr. Sutherland was president.

[fol. 3751] Q. Did you convey that information to the company, that Mr. Sims demanded that salaries be decreased?

A. I don't remember that that was done with me personally. If it was, I conveyed it; but I think Senator Sutherland understood that direct and action was taken in accordance with a schedule that was set up.

Q. With reference to the National Sales company——

A. May I go a little further? Mr. Sims appeared before the board of directors a time or two and discussed these various matters you are talking about.

Q. With reference to the National Sales company, did you have knowledge that Mr. Sims appeared before the board of directors or before the officials of the company and ordered them either to close up the National Sales company or he would close Fidelity?

A. I have knowledge of his appearing before the board of directors one or more times, once in Washington, as I remember it, and I think probably once in Wheeling; and he never liked the side company handling the business of sales of Fidelity. I don't know just what statement he made about closing up the whole company if they didn't do it immediately or what that was, but his idea was that should [fol. 3752] be eliminated.

Q. In substance, National Sales company, in their contract, were to receive certain commissions for the selling of Fidelity bonds. Isn't that true?

A. It is.

Q. And in actual practice the company advanced them further moneys with which to expand their selling facilities. Isn't that true?

A. It is.

Q. After National Sales company was out of existence, or no longer played a part in Fidelity, isn't it true that the selling force which Fidelity itself gathered together not only received its commissions, but the company had certain expenses in connection with selling their contracts, advertising and so forth, which could be compared with advances made to National Sales for the same purposes?

A. Well, we had the expense no matter whether we sold through an agency outside or sold direct, of course.

Q. In other words, after Fidelity started selling direct, after Mr. Carroll Evans had a very handsome salary as head of the entire sales organization, they had Mr. Reed, Mr. Pulfer and various other ones who were partly on [fol. 3753] salaries and partly on commissions to handle the sales ends, you had selling literature prepared, you had offices to procure and furniture to buy? Isn't that all correct?

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, I don't know what this is cross-examination of, but it has certainly already been introduced heretofore.

The Court: Overruled.

A. That is correct.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. So that the amounts the company advanced to National Sales were, in the opinion of the company, necessary for aiding in the selling of Fidelity contracts, if you know, isn't that true?

A. Well, I would assume so. Most of those advances were made before my connection with the company.

Q. Now, with reference to Mr. Messick, didn't Mr. Messick get the advice of Mr. Weaver, of Chicago, an attorney who specialized in insurance matters, with reference to the transformation of Fidelity into an insurance company?

A. Oh, yes. That is where he got most of his advice, I understood.

[fol. 3754] Q. And with reference to the question asked by Mr. Huwe about the various state laws, isn't it true that Mr. Weaver, after considerable study, prepared a legal brief for Mr. Messick in which his conclusions were that Fidelity for some years had been an insurance company, and that therefore it could qualify immediately in the various states.

Mr. Huwe: I object to that.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Huwe: I object specifically to the legal conclusion that Fidelity had been an insurance company for a number of years.

The Court: He is not asking for that legal conclusion. He is just asking whether or not Mr. Weaver prepared a brief in which he said that.

A. A report was prepared by Mr. Weaver, and then some very long letters in the nature of a brief were prepared by Mr. Weaver, in which he did take the position that Fidelity had been in the insurance business for some years and was really conducting an insurance business because of the fact that it insured its contract holders.

[fol. 3755] Mr. Palmer: And that for that reason it could comply with the state laws and requirements that an insurance company should have been in existence for so long—was that his conclusion and advice to Mr. Messick?

A. I don't know what he advised Mr. Messick particularly. I think that was his argument. We had already been in the insurance business for some time. I am not saying we took that.

Q. And it was on the basis of that opinion or series of opinions that he arrived at the conclusion that it was felt by the officers and attorneys that Fidelity could go ahead and attempt to rehabilitate itself as a going life insurance company?

Mr. Ray: If it please your Honor, we object to the admission into evidence of some opinion which has not been offered or any testimony about it.

The Court: Overruled.

A. Well, Mr. Weaver, who was brought in by Mr. Messick as an attorney, was the prime mover along the line of promoting the insurance business for Fidelity, and he was the one that was in conference with them in Chicago many times, came down here and was here for several days and [fols. 3756-3760] went to Wheeling and stayed for some time.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 3761] Q. How active was Mr. John Marshall in getting you to go with Fidelity and getting you to stay with Fidelity?

A. Well, he not only asked me; he rather insisted on my going, and, as I said in my testimony yesterday, I refused to go in the beginning, and they elected me a director without my knowledge or consent and just notified me of it in the beginning, and then from time to time we would talk about whether I should stay on any longer, and especially was that true after the company had apparently been rehabilitated and had gotten up to where they said they were making money in 1937. I talked to him about resigning from the board of directors and he insisted that I should not.

Q. Did you attempt or desire to resign from the board of directors after having been with a more or less sick company that had become well and on its feet——

A. I did, and talked it over with him and talked it over with Colonel Thompson. They insisted on my not resigning.

Q. You told them that you had finished your job and that the company was well—is that correct—or substan[fols. 3762-3767] tially that?

A. That is it.

Q. Did you have any correspondence with Mr. Marshall indicating his desire to have you either stay on with the company or come back to it after you had resigned from the board of directors?

A. Yes, more conversation than I have correspondence, however. He requested me many times to come back to the company and give it more time.

• • • • • • •

[fol. 3768] Q. Did Mr. Marshall talk to you about the retention of his son Jack as an employee of the state court receiver?

A. Mr. Palmer, I am not sure that he did. A number [fols. 3769-3772] of these people employed there did. I am not sure that—I am sure that Jack never mentioned it. I am not sure that his father mentioned it. His father seemed disappointed after Jack was let out that he had been let out, but I am not sure that he ever asked me to retain him.

• • • • • • •

[fol. 3773] Mr. Palmer: Now, Mr. Koontz, you have talked with a number of persons of more or less high financial repute throughout the United States, and you have been a director in a bank and still are a director and vice-president of a bank, and you were a director on the various committees of Fidelity for some years. Have you reached a conclusion as to what can or should be done with Fidelity in the future?

The Court: You mean an opinion?

Mr. Palmer: An opinion would be synonymous with conclusion, your Honor.

A. Well, I should like—am I permitted to answer?

The Court: Yes, he wants to know if you have reached an opinion.

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, I object to this question being asked on rebuttal. That is a question which certainly should have been asked on direct examination and give opposing counsel an opportunity to cross-examine this witness on that question.

The Court: You are right about that, but I am not going [fol. 3774] to confide this very strictly, and therefore if something new is brought out you will be given the opportunity to cross-examine.

A. Of course, I should like very much to see this reorganization. I am of the opinion, however—and if I may be permitted to use the same wording that you say Mr. Marshall used, it is based on discussions with people who know much more about financial matters than I—I am of the opinion that it canot be reorganized and operate in the field which it has been heretofore operating solely.

Q. That field being face amount certificates?

A. That is right.

Mr. Ray: Show an objection, your Honor.

The Court: Overruled.

A. A reorganization must be accompanied by marking down the rate of interest for reserves and a change generally in the business in the future.

Mr. Palmer: Have you formed or reached an opinion or conclusion as to whether or not Fidelity could succeed by being reorganized into a going life insurance company?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Into a what?

[fol. 3775] Mr. Palmer: Going life insurance company.

Mr. Ray: Show an objection, your Honor.
The Court: Overruled.

A. Well, I would say under the present situation that that would be about the only chance of reorganization it would have.

. . . . . .

[fol. 3776] Mr. Palmer: "Charleston, West Virginia, the 11th, 11:35 A. M.

Honorable Allen G. Pflugradt, Chairman, Banking Commission of Wisconsin:

I have decided that my department should take over the affairs of Fidelity Assurance Association to administer same and work out sound rehabilitation and have filed suit in an appropriate state court asking for receivers and other relief. Reserve funds for contracts issued since 1932 seem solvent at market, and all funds as whole seem solvent at convention values or impairment is small, but association [fols. 3777-3779] is suffering overhead and other losses. My action will prevent impairment from becoming serious. Copy of bill being sent you by mail. I earnestly urge that you apply in your official capacity for ancillary receiver of assets in your states.

Edgar B. Sims, State Auditor, Insurance Commissioner."

And I think it already has been stated and agreed that that was sent out to some sixteen states. Am I correct in that, Mr .Townsend?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Well, I assume it was sent to all the states where there were deposits, but I don't know whether there was any agreement about it or not. I am not objecting to it.

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Townsend, I wonder if it might not have been sent to all states where Fidelity had assets, whether deposits or otherwise, such as Texas, or anything of that sort.

Mr. Townsend: I don't know. You might ask Mr. Sims.

Mr. Lauritzen: Mr. Sims advises that he believes it was sent to twenty some states.

. . . . . .

[fol. 3780] Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Koontz, what, if any, part in arriving at the decision of yourself and others, members of the board of directors of Fidelity to proceed in a state court did the fact that the company had for many years advertised the [fol. 3781] West Virginia law and advertised to the contract holders that they, if ever the need came, would be guided by their liquidation in that law—did that have on your decision, or did it play any part in your decision or preference between the federal and state court?

Mr. Townsend: The question was answered yesterday. That information was given by this witness in reply to questions I asked him.

The Court: I don't remember if it was. I overrule the objection.

A. It did. These statutes had been advertised in the selling campaign by putting the advertising in the literature from time to time and referred to, so I felt that as between the two, if everything else were equal, that you should follow your state statute because they had been used in your selling campaigns.

Mr. Palmer: Do you have any of the literature that was issued to the salesmen in that regard with you, Mr. Koontz?

A. Six booklets were put out some time ago as a sales course, and I have very little of the sales literature in [fol. 3782] my office, but I did have these books, this sales course, left over; and some references are made in book number five as to what the salesman should tell the prospect.

Mr. Palmer: I am going to ask the Court's permission to read one paragraph from page 28 of Book 5. I don't think it would be pertinent to introduce the entire book. The book is entitled, "How to Win the Final Decision," and shows a Fidelity subscription with two gentlemen shaking hands above it with a fountain pen, and it is entitled, "Training Course for Fidelity Career Men," and is copyrighted by Fidelity Investment Association.

Mr. Jaegerman: Before we have it read, could we have the approximate period when that book was used?

Mr. Palmer: It is copyrighted 1936.

Mr. Jaegerman: Does Mr. Koontz know?

The Witness: Sometime after that. I would say in 1937 was when it was used. It was when they were going pretty well. Copyrighted in '36—'37 and possibly '38—that is, sales training courses during those years. These came out periodically over several months.

Mr. Jaegerman: Would they be approved by the direc[fol. 3783] tors?

A. They had what is known as an advertising committee representing the directors. Somebody from Chicago, an advertising man, was head of that committee.

Q. Were you on that committee?

A. No, I was not.

Mr. Palmer: There was just a paragraph in the pamphlet which I deemed important. The first one is the first paragraph on page 28. "When the prospect has once again agreed to the second buying decision, you proceed by saying, 'In view of Fidelity's splendid record, together with the important legal safeguards which it provides, there can be no question in your mind as to Fidelity's absolute dependability and safety in fulfilling its share of the plan, can there?'"

Now, on page 55, next to the last paragraph, under the heading "Objections to Decision Three, the Institution Behind the Plan," the sub-heading "Is My Money Safe With Fidelity?" and the first paragraph in quotes begins, "Mr. Prospect", and the second paragraph, "Fidelity has always been guided by the soundest and most conservative principles of investment, safety, security and sound con[fols. 3784-3785] servatism have always been and always will"—the word "will" being emphasized—"be the first consideration in the investment policy of this institution. The loss of a single penny to any contract holder is a possibility quite remote, made doubly remote by the many rigid state laws and the departmental supervision under which Fidelity operates."

* * * * * * *

[fols. 3786-3788] Q. You didn't ever get any new capital in all your efforts?

A. That is right; that is right.

[fol. 3789] H. ISAIAH SMITH recalled, testified as follows:

Cross-exaination.

By Mr. Farmer:

Q. Mr. Smith, how many contract holders made payments to the trustee on contracts during the month of September, 1941? Have you that information by the various series of contracts?

A. Yes, I have.

Q. Will you give that, please?

A. I am advised by the office that the records show that the following payments were received on contracts for the month of September: Special Income contract account, 4 payments were made on contracts; special annuity contract account, 270 payments were made on 224 accounts; [fol. 3790] income reserve contract Series A account, 247 payments were made on 196 contracts; income reserve contract Series B account, 3,055 payments were made on 2,254 contracts; income reserve contract Series D account, 131 payments were made on 95 accounts, making a total of 3,707 payments on 2,773 accounts.

The Court: I would like to know, Mr. Smith, whether or not these contract holders have been advised by the trustee as to whether or not they should continue making payments and what, if any, effect that would have on their rights in this proceedings.

A. The contract holders have been advised by both the receivers—if I may include the receivers—and the trustee that none of their equities will be lost by failure to keep up the regular monthly payments.

Mr. Farmer: That advice that you spoke of, was that in one of these form letters—one or more of these form letters that has already been filed in the case?

A. I think those exhibits will contain that information.

Q. Do you remember which one?

[fol. 3791] (No answer.)

Q. Are you referring to the letter of July 3rd (handing witness paper).

A. No, a subsequent letter. I don't see it in this letter right off, but there has been a letter gone out from the trustees to the effect that no equities will be lost by reason of the failure to keep the monthly payments up, and also we have answered, I would say, thousands of letters individually, when they would write in and ask specifically what would happen to their contract if they didn't keep the payments up. In all cases we have told them that their equities were fixed as of the date of the appointment of the trustee.

Q. I want to get just exactly what that advice was in these circular letters.

A. Here is the paragraph in the receivers' letter. "One effect of the receivership has been to fix your status as a creditor as of the date of the receivership."

Q. What letter is that you are referring to?

A. That is the receivership letter.

Q. That is in Exhibit 32 you are referring to?

A. Yes.

[fol. 3792] Q. Well now, the sentence that you referred to is this in that exhibit, is it not?

A. That is right.

Q. "One effect of the receivership has been to fix your status as a creditor as of the date of the receivership, both as to the amount of your claim and with respect to the particular assets held to satisfy the same." Is that the sentence you are referring to?

A. Yes.

Q. Have you got there any communication from the trustee telling them that they didn't have to pay?

A. It is not in this exhibit. There has been a statement sent out by the trustee which gives a running narrative of all these proceedings. I don't happen to have one with me, but I could get one from the office.

Q. Is that a circular letter?

A. It was sent out in answer to inquiries.

Q. A prepared form for use in answering inquiries?

A. That is right.

Mr. Farmer: I would like for you to get that. I thought that we had all the circular communications.

A. It was sent out—prepared about a month ago.

[fol. 3793] Q. Do you find here a notice from the Central Trust Company, trustee, to the owners of Fidelity Assurance Association Series B contracts dated August 22, 1941?

A. No, I don't see that.

Q. That was apparently in among those notices that were filed at the previous hearing?

A. If I recall, these were filed during the first hearing in August.

Q. That is right. Yes. I hand you a notice dated August 22, 1941, and will ask you if that was a form of notice that was sent out by the trustee about that time to all contract holders?

A. It was sent to the owners of Series B contracts that had insurance protection.

Q. And I will ask you to file that copy as Exhibit No. 117.

Exhibit 117

(The paper referred to was filed, marked as above indicated, and is attached hereto as a part hereof.)

Q. That letter tells them, doesn't it, that it will be necessary for the owners of Series B contracts, where Section [fol. 3794] 6 is effective (providing for insurance protection) to make full payments if they want to keep their insurance in force? That sentence is in that letter?

A. That is true. That is correct, if they want to keep their insurance in force, but failing to pay would not affect the equity in their contract as it existed at the date of the receivership or the appointment of the trustee. The only feature that would be dropped on the Series B contract would be the insurance protection only.

Q. And that also tells them that in order for contract holders who have taken advantage of the previous three month grace period to have the opportunity to bring their contract payments to date, this requirement will become effective on August 31, 1941, by which time all payments now due or past due, including the payment for interest, must be made?

A. That is right.

Q. You were asked on the stand about the notice of deficiency assessment by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue?

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 3795] Q. (Continuing.) For income taxes. That assessment, you said, was for the taxable years 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938 and ten months of 1939?

A. That is right.

Q. And that was your income and excess profits taxes for those years?

A. That is right.

Q. You said that amount was approximately $260,000?

A. Approximately $265,000.

Q. Is this a copy of the notice of assessment dated May 20, 1941, to the receivers?

A. Yes, it appears to be.

Q. Will you file that as Exhibit No. 118?

Exhibit 118

(The paper referred to was admitted in evidence, marked as above indicated, and is attached hereto as a part hereof.)

Q. State whether or not there was a supplemental proof of claim filed with the receivers which brought the total claim for income and excess profit taxes for those years up to $289,616.56?

A. That is right.

[fol. 3796] Q. State whether or not notice was also given to the receivers, or rather whether proof of claim was filed with the receivers, for additional taxes, that is, social security taxes in the amount of $6,506.58?

A. That is right.

Q. Is the total claim for taxes filed by the federal government $296,123.14, including interest up to some date in May, 1941?

A. Yes, and there is—there was an overpayment for one of those years which will bring the net tax down to approximately $265,000.

Q. I will ask you to read this letter of May 27, 1941, and state whether or not you were in error in stating that that will bring it down.

The Court: Don't read it into the record.

Mr. Farmer: No, I am just refreshing him on it.

A. I am familiar with this. This increases it $30,130.14—increases this amount on the face of the claim—but subsequent to this—and I don't seem to find it in the files—we have already filed that, but we can't get the refund until we pay the tax—pay the Internal Revenue Department—[fol. 3797] but it has held that there is $30,000 refund due the association on some of the previous years, I don't recall which, making a net in the neighborhood of $265,000.

Q. Does this letter of May 27, 1941, to the receivers state that the total amount of the tax, with the notice attached, was $319,723.70, and then state that there was an over-assessment of $29,911.25, which would bring the amount claimed down to $289,616.56?

A. Yes, I am familiar with this, but I still state that there has been an overpayment which would bring the total down on the basis of this assessment to something in the neighborhood of $265,000 from that amount there.

Q. Have you got any supplemental notices that will substantiate that?

A. I don't seem to find them in the file, but the application was made, as I understand, by Haskins & Sells representing the trustee in the case. In order to protect the claim it had to be filed within a certain time, and that has already been done.

Q. Well, I believe I will have to ask you to file this copy of this letter of May 27, 1941.

[fol. 3798] The Court: I sustain an objection to that. I don't think it has anything to do with this.

Mr. Farmer: Well, I would like to ask for the letters or communications that will prove that, then.

The Witness: I can't find them in the files. I searched for them. I just recall from memory that there was a refund due the company and proper application was made.

Q. You mean in addition to this over-assessment of $29,911.25 that is mentioned in this letter?

A. Yes.

The Court: Mr. Farmer, if there were taxes of a million dollars claimed by the government, what bearing does that have on the case?

Mr. Farmer: If the Court please, the taxes, if they are liable for them, will be a preferred claim against the general assets of the estate, and I should say that a $300,000 preferred claim out of the general assets would point out the much greater difficulty of bringing about a reorganization.

The Court: I don't think that has any bearing on the issues involved, whether this company is 10 per cent insolvent [fols. 3799-3806] or 10½ per cent insolvent, in my opinion, can make no difference in the prospects of this reorganization.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. Mr. Smith, that additional assessment or deficiency assessment was due primarily to the government agent investigating and including all of the income from the various reserve funds with the income account of the general fund.

A. That is right.

The Court: Mr. Farmer, I have told you that I do not regard that as having any bearing on the case, and I am not going to permit the record to be stuffed with it.

Mr. Farmer: Well, I would not have asked it if I didn't think it was relevant and some Court might differ with your Honor on it.

The Court: I am not going to permit it to go on the record any further.

Mr. Farmer: I except to your Honor's ruling. I would like to go on with the evidence on it.

. . . . . .

[fols. 3807-3810] Mr. Eney: May I break in that point?

The Court: All right, Mr. Eney.

Mr. Eney: Your Honor held our motion should be heard at the close of the case, and I assume the purpose was that your Honor should consider all the evidence offered at this hearing in ruling on that motion. I want to have an understanding if that is the case.

The Court: That is correct.

Mr. Eney: All the evidence on this hearing is evidence on our motion?

The Court: Yes, that is correct.

. . . . . .

[fols. 1-4] Arlen G. Swiger, called as a witness by the Trustee, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Your name is Arlen G. Swiger?

A. That is right.

Q. Where is your residence?

A. New York City.

Q. What is your profession or business?

A. I am an attorney.

Q. Did you at one time practice law in West Virginia?

A. Yes, sir, I tried to.

Q. A native of this state?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever hold any public position in this state?

A. Well, a very small one.

Q. What was it?

[fol. 5] A. A member of the legislature.

Q. Mr. Swiger, how long have you lived in New York City?

A. Since 1919.

Q. I hand you herewith a letter signed by you, dated September 24, 1941, and addressed to the Central Trust Company. I will ask you to inspect the letter and state whether or not you wrote the letter and signed the letter.

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. I will ask you further to examine what purports to be a copy of that letter attached to the petition filed in connection with the subject matter of that letter and state whether or not that is a true copy of the original letter.

A. Yes, sir, that is a copy of the original letter of September 24, 1941.

Mr. Farmer: If the Court please, I hate to ask this question, because I ought to have heard what the Court said about it, but I didn't. Is this a part of the record in this, or not?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I will clear that up if you will [fol. 6] just let him put this testimony in.

Mr. Farmer: I didn't understand what the Court's ruling was.

The Court: It is to be heard as an independent proceeding, and then such parts of it as are pertinent to the questions involved in the general hearing, as I understand, will be offered as a part of the record by Mr. Townsend.

Mr. Farmer: Well then, we will have the liberty to offer other parts? Is that right?

The Court: That is right.

Mr. Townsend:

Q. Does this letter to which you refer contain the proposition of Pell, Ltd., with reference to buying the capital stock of Fidel, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Fidelity Assurance Association?

A. Yes, sir, that is an offer on the part of Pell, Ltd.

Q. Are you familiar with the financial affairs of Pell, Ltd.?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you in position to tell the Court whether or not [fol. 7] Pell, Ltd., is in a financial position to carry out and comply with this offer if it should be accepted?

A. Yes, sir, I will say that if this offer is accepted and in our opinion good delivery can be made of the stock, we will be prepared to accept and pay for the stock at that time in cash.

Q. In accordance with the terms of this letter?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Your Honor, for the benefit of, or in response to a request made by an attorney representing one of the defendants here, I think it might be well for me just to read this letter so they will know its contents. It is short.

The Court: All right. There is no use to put it in the record. It is a part of the petition, isn't it?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Yes. I don't mean to read it into the record.

(Mr. Townsend thereupon read the letter referred to to Court and counsel.)

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Mr. Swiger, in this offer made by you you refer to Fidelity Assurance Association to the effect that you are [fol. 8] prepared to give serious consideration to furnishing additional capital in connection with Fidelity Assurance Association if you are successful in acquiring Fidel, or the capital stock of Fidel. I wish you would explain to the Court, if you will, in your own way, what you mean by that statement.

A. A part of the directors of Pell, Ltd., are fairly well acquainted with Fidelity Investment Association. At least three years ago they made an examination into the financial affairs of Fidelity for the purpose at that time of reorganizing or investing new capital or both. At that time, at our own expense, we had Haskins and Sells prepare a special report for us on Fidelity. We had many conferences with the executives of the company, and the negotiations had, I would say, reached a serious stage. Those negotiations were interrupted by litigation in which Fidelity was involved, and we naturally didn't continue with our efforts to reorganize or to acquire an interest in the company.

Now as to Fidel, in our examination of the affairs of Fidelity we naturally looked into the Fidel company, be-[fol. 9] cause it is a New York corporation. I think one of my associates organized Fidel, and I believe he drafted the indentures under which Fidel now operates, so we—that is, my own office and my associates as directors of Pell, Ltd.—were and are fairly well acquainted with Fidel.

As a result of this investigation, which has continued over a period of years, and of our recent investigation of the Fidel Company, we are making this offer for the Fidel stock. We are also interested in working on a plan of reorganization for Fidelity. Now, from our standpoint that is a difficult job. It involves a lot of considerations. We don't know what the situation will be in reference to Fidelity when this litigation ends. We don't know what the general business conditions in the country may be at the time that this litigation ends and the proper time comes for the filing of a plan of reorganization. However, we want to make this point clear: we don't want to base our purchase of the Fidel stock on a promise to finance and reorganize Fidelity. If we purchase the Fidelity stock, at our own expense——

[fol. 10] The Court: You mean Fidel.

A. Fidel. If we purchase the Fidel Stock, at our own expense we propose to make this study and examination of Fidelity and see if we can work out some feasible plan. We have in mind that it has value if it could be reorganized and operated in a manner which would meet with the approval of the Securities and Exchange Commission and various other government and state agencies which might look into it.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Let me see if I understand just exactly what you mean by your answer. If you are successful in acquiring the capital stock of Fidel, then, as I understand you, it is your purpose to make an investigation of the affairs of Fidelity to the extent of determining whether or not you shall, in connection with these proceedings and at a later date, file or suggest a plan of reorganization?

A. Our group is seriously interested in working out a plan of reorganization for Fidelity.

Q. And of course whatever you did in that connection you would do at your own expense.

A. Yes.

[fol. 11] The Court: Let me ask Mr. Swiger a question in order to fully understand what he means. Do I understand that the consideration which you will give, as you say in your letter there, to the refinancing of Fidelity—does that contemplate that your group would, at the proper time if you determine that you want to go ahead, put in the money for a capital structure of a new or reorganized company, and that that money would come through Fidel?

A. I will answer that question this way, if I may. I don't think that money would come through Fidel. I think it might be new money. I couldn't naturally, say what form our plan or reorganization would take, but it would certainly require some additional money, which we would be prepared to furnish as a part of that plan. I see no way now by which the funds of Fidel could be used for that purpose, and there would be no desire on our part to use Fidel money for that purpose.

Q. What I meant was, would it through Fidel, by making your investment in Fidel and then having Fidel to put up the capital structure contemplated.

[fol. 12] A. It is quite possible that the order of Fidel and Fidelity might be reversed, and it might be possible, from our study of the situation, to make Fidel the top company and Fidelity the subsidiary. That might be worked out.

Q. Whatever you have in mind involves the creation of a capital structure which would be actually invested by your group, and does not contemplate simply a promotion whereby you would take that matter of getting the capital together to the general public in a sales campaign of any kind, does it?

A. We are not interested in attempting to revive Fidelity as such and to continue along the same plan it has been operated in the past. It is our judgment that something radical has to be done, probably a new plan. Probably it must have something new to sell that is a little different from what it has been selling.

Q. What I was more interested in in connection with the capital that may be put into a reorganized company, I want to know whether it is the idea that that capital stock be got together by any sort of promotion work with the general [fol. 13] public, or is it the idea that that will be capital advanced by your group of investors?

A. I would say that any plan of reorganization which we would offer to the court which involved new capital will be capital raised by our group. We don't anticipate selling securities to the public.

The Court: All right. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Just following up the question asked by His Honor, there is appended to this petition filed here a list of the directors of Pell, Ltd., quite a long list. Are you acquainted with these directors?

A. Yes, I know all of them.

Q. Do you know something about their financial responsibility?

A. Well, it is difficult these days, Tom, to know anything about people's financial responsibilities, but I will say this: they are all successful in their particular lines of business; they are considered men of good judgment and experience, men who meet their obligations.

[fol. 14] Q. Well, let's assume you became interested in Fidelity to the extent of venturing a plant of reorganization, and you could interest in Fidelity the same people who are listed as directors of Pell, Ltd., from that source do you feel that you could acquire the additional capital necessary to refinance Fidelity?

A. Well, we are of the opinion that it is easier to get the money than it is to get the management.

Q. Then you feel that you can get the money if you can get the management?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And in your group do you feel that you could get both management and money?

A. Yes, if it holds a chance of reasonable compensation for those who invest their money in it. And I mean to qualify that by saying, there is no one in this group that is looking for salaries, nor are they looking for quick profits, but they would hope to build this up so that eventually they would have something worthwhile.

Q. When you say "build this up", that answer relates [fol. 15] to both Fidel and Fidelity?

A. Yes, it does. I might also add that as far as Fidel is concerned, from our group we have designated three directors who would be the directors of Fidel if we were acquiring the stock. Those are Mr. Pell, Mr. Cecil Stewart and Mr. Rosenblatt. Those three would act as the officers and directors of Fidel without compensation.

Q. You stated that your group would not be looking for quick profits. Would you care to expand that a little and state over what period of years you would expect to act?

A. Well, of course, these plans are only tentative, and to this time there has been much discussion but nothing definite; but it is the idea of this group of men that is a situation out of which little or no profit should be taken for a period of probably eight or ten years.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I think that is all I want to ask this witness.

The Court:

Q. Mr. Swiger, I would like to inquire this of you. Your group understands, does it not, that at present the question [fol. 16] of the jurisdiction of the federal court to entertain this reorganization petition is in question here, that there is a hearing going on to determine that question of jurisdiction, and that it may be some time before that is determined? What I want to ask you is this: if that question of jurisdiction is not determined by the time this offer runs out, is there any expectation of a renewal or extension of time in connection with the offer?

A. Well, I want to make this clear. I am not coming here on behalf of this group of men to wage any fight for the stock of Fidel. If there is serious opposition to it, we don't want it. We don't propose to be involved in any controversy whatever. I think there is a situation that should be given consideration. I understand that a number of contract holders of Fidel have turned in their contracts for cash. I think that amount is about $600,000 since the first of July. Now, that raises the question as to whether that is going to continue or whether it may slow up. If it continues the corporation will in effect be liquidated by the contract holders, and there will not be much [fol. 17] left. If we acquired the stock we would hope to take some action to stop that, if we could. I will discuss with my clients the question raised by the Court about October 19th. I am inclined to think that if for some reason action is not taken on this matter at the time mentioned in the offer, that we will continue this offer, provided there is no radical change in Fidel. We don't want to precipitate this matter at all; we don't want to hurry anybody about it.

Q. Your offer itself contains the condition that you must be satisfied with the authority to deliver. I assume that you will not be satisfied of that until you know whether or not this Court has jurisdiction to authorize it?

A. There is a serious question in our minds just how we can get good title to the stock. We probably will have to engage most of counsel sitting around the court here to tell us the answer to that question.

The Court: All right. Does anyone wish to cross-examine Mr. Swiger?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I am sure those counsel around the table can never agree on it.

[fol. 18] Cross-examination.

By Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Swiger, for the purposes of this record, which may or may not become a part of the record of the other case, I would like to ask you some questions. Is Pell, Ltd., a corporation?

A. Yes, sir, a Delaware corporation.

Q. And would you mind stating into the record the type of business engaged in by Pell, Ltd?

A. Pell, Ltd. maintains an office at 60 East Forty-Second Street, New York, and its directors meet rather frequently for the purpose of discussing new and old business matters which may come to its attention. It might be a reorganization, it might be the sale of a utility in Central America, it might be a new process of making a chemical or some other matter which is of interest to this group of men.

Q. Do I understand by that that this group of men supply capital, money, to various enterprises?

A. Only to their own enterprises. If something is called to their attention and they think it is worthwhile financing and managing, they provide the finances, sometimes within [fol. 19] their own group and sometimes they will invite someone from the outside to come in and furnish a part of the capital.

Q. May I ask the capital structure of Pell, Ltd., that is, financially?

A. I should know that, but I don't, but I can say this to you. Pell, Ltd., had fifty thousand dollars not long ago in its treasury. It pays no salaries. The only employee is a secretary, a young lady. Its only other expense is the rent for the office and stationery and telephone calls and so forth; and it was never intended that the money of Pell, Ltd., itself would be used for these various matters, but if this group of men, after much discussion and much talk pro and con, decided that it was to their interest to go into a proposition, then they themselves with their associates would furnish the capital.

Q. Do you do in any sense of the word a brokerage business?

A. In no sense a brokerage business.

Q. Do you sell issues of stock to the public?

A. No sale of securities at all.

[fol. 20] Q. Am I to understand that this is more or less a partnership, but however, in a corporate form, whereby the gentlemen who are engaged in it, if a project is interesting to them, will go into that project, individually or as a group, and do what they feel is necessary in connection therewith?

A. Well, it does in many respects have the form of a partnership, although it is a corporation. I think all the stock of the corporation is owned by the directors, and naturally we consider many propositions. Most of them are turned down; we consider them bad and we don't enter into the particular matters pending before us.

Q. Let me ask you this. Suppose the Court would approve this proposition. At the present time, from what you have told us, there would not be enough cash in Pell, Ltd., to pay for it? Is that correct?

A. Yes, sir. There never is enough cash in Pell, Ltd. to pay for the propositions that we may enter into.

Q. That was my understanding. However, if the board of directors determines to go into it, then they advance [fol. 21] money into the treasury of Pell, Ltd., or what is the procedure?

A. Well, the procedure is rather a practical one. We know each other very well. We know where the money is coming from and in what amount; and probably if we worked out all the problems in connection with the purchase of this security, and I was advised that it was to be delivered in Charleston on Tuesday against cash, probably on Saturday or Monday I would call my associates on the phone and get the money and be here with the cash or a certified check.

Q. The point I am getting at is, however, that in the event the court should permit such a contract to be entered into by the trustee and Pell, Ltd. would later, after entering into the contract, for any reason whatsoever be unable or unwilling to carry it through, there would be no corporate libility to which the trustee could look for a breach of that contract.

Mr. Hillis Townsend: I don't know that there has been any proposal here to enter into a contract.

Mr. Palmer: Contract for sale of the stock.

Mr. Hillis Townsend: There isn't any——

[fol. 22] A. We don't expect to have the stock delivered to us until we pay for it.

Mr. Palmer: That was my understanding, but what I am trying to find out is this, sir, and I am only asking for the information of the record and the Court. Pell, Ltd. itself, as you have told us, has so much capital.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. The contract for the sale of the stock, or the acceptance of the offer made, would be made with Pell, Ltd., a corporation. If Pell, Ltd. were unable or unwilling to carry it through, the only liability to which the trustee could look would be the assets of Pell, Ltd.? Isn't that correct?

A. From a legal standpoint that is correct. However, you have coupled with that the integrity of a substantial group of men who I do not believe would negotiate on that basis with this Court.

Q. I understand that, and I am attempting to get the legal situation into the record here. Now, also, if Pell, Ltd. should buy this and there should be mismanagement—I am [fol. 23] not suggesting that there would be, but if there should be, by Pell, Ltd.—the only ones to whom the contract holders could look would be to the corporate liability of Pell, Ltd., and not to the individuals? Isn't that true as a legal situation?

A: I would think not. I would think if Messrs. Pell, Stewart and Rosenblatt become directors and officers of Fidel, I think they would be personally responsible for mismanagement.

Q. But the owners of the stock would, of course, again be Pell, Ltd.—is that correct—or would the stock be distributed among the directors of Pell, Ltd. individually?

A. Although the details of that are not worked out, I would think that the stock would be distributed, part of it going to directors and part of it to Pell, Ltd.; maybe some to one or two associates.

Q. Would it be fair to say that Pell, Ltd. is a holding company, or in this company would act as a holding company of the stock of Fidel?

A. No, it would not. I would say the arrangement would be rather a simple one; probably five, eight or ten people would provide the money. Pell, Ltd. would acquire the [fols. 24-32] stock, and at a later date it would transfer part of the stock to those who had provided the cash.

Q. In furtherance of the Court's question, would any of that be offered to the public generally or to certain individuals of the public whom you term associates, or are they already predetermined?

A. If there is anything I want to be positive about it is that there is going to be no public offering in connection with our negotiations in reference to Fidel or Fidelity.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 33] Mr. Palmer: Your Honor, I am not too familiar with these proceedings myself, and I am asking Mr. Swiger to help me on it, but my understanding is this, that in each Series B. Contract it is provided that the profits made by or through the lapsation and cash surrenders—we have discovered that Fidelity makes the same kind of profits—are kept in that series fund, and half of the profit on that goes to those contract holders who mature their contracts and half of it goes to the company. Now, if all of the contract holders lapse and cash surrender their contracts before maturity, then the company would get the whole of that profit.

The Court: You mean if they do that after these people take hold?

Mr. Palmer: Yes, that is what I am asking, and I think that can be done, although I don't know. As I say, Mr. [fol. 34] Swiger has studied this company and I have not, and I am saking his advice and opinion on that particular problem.

The Witness: Our minds have run along the other angle. We are somewhat disturbed because the contract holders are turning them back for liquidation, and we have not looked at it from the standpoint—your standpoint, Mr. Palmer.

The Court: You wouldn't expect, Mr. Palmer, that any prospective purchaser would be willing to pay some extra consideration on the possibility that there would be contracts lapsed or surrendered out of which they might derive a profit, would you?

Mr. Palmer: Yes, I would, Your Honor. That is just what the Court was asking one of the witnesses to consider yesterday, that experience had shown with these companies that that was what happened time after time and that was a legitimate source of profit to the company.

The Court: Yes, of profit, but not of present value.

Mr. Palmer: If that is the normal experience and it is [fol. 35] shown that that will be made and turned into a profit, all things being equal there should be some payment made for that.

The Witness: Well, I want to state for the purpose of the record that I think all interested parties should give serious consideration to our offer, and it may be possible that somebody will make a better offer. I will not be disturbed if they do; and I want all parties interested to feel that our offer is a fair and reasonable one and it is the best offer that you can obtain at this time, otherwise we would not want to buy this stock.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Swiger, may I ask this? Is it your plan to issue new certificates and sell them, such as Fidel had issued in the past?

A. Mr. Palmer, that question will not be decided until we have purchased the stock and have our money invested, and we will probably leave it alone as it is for a short period of time and make a very careful study of what we can do about it.

Q. Mr. Swiger, answer me this. Suppose that I am a contract holder of Fidel and I hear of this offer of yours. [fol. 36] Would you show me where I am going to be benefitted by your purchasing that stock?

A. Well, perhaps you might be pleased with the new management.

Q. Well, is that the only thing that you have to offer to the contract holders of Fidel, a new group of men to manage it for them?

A. I understand that their rights are pretty clearly defined in the contracts which they own and have bought and paid for, and I don't see anything we can do for them that would help their position more than to honestly, and I hope ably, administer the affairs of the corporation.

Q. You would have control of how many million dollars of funds for investment purposes?

A. I can't give you that figure. It is in the statement here. Whatever is there we would have control of.

(Mr. Palmer hands paper to witness.)

The Witness: I have to leave the hotel at 2:50. I can't miss that plane.

The Court: I think we ought to get through with him [fols. 37-41] then.

[fol. 42] Joseph R. Kelley called as a witness by the Trustee, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. T. C. Townsend:

Q. Will you please state your name?

A. Joseph R. Kelley.

Q. Where do you live?

A. 21 Allison Avenue, Yonkers, Westchester County, New York.

Q. What is your business?

A. I am attorney and counsellor at law of the State of New York.

Q. With offices in New York City?

A. 60 East 42d Street and at 120 Broadway, New York City.

Q. Were you ever at any time connected with S. E. C.?

A. For a period of months in the early part of 1939 I was temporarily connected with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Monopoly Study Division, part of the time as special counsel in one of the sections and part of the time as financial adviser in the same section of that [fols. 43-44] division.

Q. Are you connected with Fidel corporation in any respect?

A. At the present time I am a director of Fidel Association of New York, Incorporated; and for a period of years past, since the date of its incorporation, I have acted from time to time as special counsel to it, particularly in matters relating to the various indentures under which its collateral trust bonds are issued.

. . . . . .

[fol. 45] Q. Will you tell the Court why, in your opinion, it should be accepted?

A. The principal reason for my opinion is that I look upon Fidel as practically a wasting asset corporation, in this sense of the word. While Fidel was in the market selling or offering for sale its collateral trust bonds, it was replenishing its life stream of new income, so to speak; but since it discontinued selling new bonds it has all of the burdens of management of the collateral trust funds, it has to maintain offices within the State of New York and within the City of New York to receive subscription installments from bondholders and to pay to bondholders what [fol. 46] the bondholders are entitled to receive under the terms of their bonds; and that necessarily means, in turn, that Fidel Association has to keep at New York an agent or officer having at least some executive powers and functions; it must have the services of a consulting actuary at all times; and from time to time it has needed the services of a special counsel—by which I mean myself—because of problems that have arisen under the indentures, the latest of which, of course, was the necessity of finding a successor or substitute trustee within the City of New York to act in place of the Charleston National Bank, which desired to retire from the business.

Now, while the several bondholders continue to pay in their monthly or periodic subscriptions, it is my understanding that the gross income of Fidel will be sufficient to pay all of the costs of management and the fees of consulting actuaries and counsel and so forth; but little by little, as bondholders either permit their subscriptions to lapse or avail themselves of their cash surrender privilege, or borrow on the amount of the bond and then decide not to pay it back, it necessarily means that the income of Fidel is a [fol. 47] constantly diminishing thing. Furthermore, even if every holder of bonds continued to pay his subscription price, there will come a time in the future when the last bondholder will have paid the last installment and there will be no new income to Fidel from that source then, but there will be perhaps ten years of management ahead of it, and that management, I need hardly add, is almost a sacred trust, because this Fidel scheme comes very, very close to being an unofficial savings bank. They have a couple of million dollars there which represent the savings of several thousand people, most of whom are either poor people, or, to say the least, people who have to save, if they are going to save at all, in small amounts. The management of the trust is going to be supervised; there is no question about that. The Investment Company Division of Securities and Exchange Commission has a certain supervisory and regulatory jurisdiction in the matter, and the New York State Attorney General likewise has a certain supervisory jurisdiction; and that supervision and regulation takes time and money to comply with; it again requires the retention of counsel and consulting actuaries. That is why I say this Fidel looks to me like a wasting asset proposition [fol. 48] as of the date when it had to stop selling, or did stop selling, bonds; and therefore I think this offer to buy it at what is defined in the offer as its liquidating value is a favorable offer from the point of view of Fidelity and its trustee and receivers, and therefore, in my opinion, it should be accepted.

Q. How much, in your opinion, would be realized from this offer?

A. In answering that question I am basing my opinion on the last statement of Fidel Association that I have seen, which is as of June 30, 1941. In my opinion the amount realized on the sale of Fidel stock should be in the neighborhood of $125,000—perhaps a bit more. As I understand it, the liquidating value is to be determined by Haskins & Sells as of the date when the stock passes and the money is to be tendered for the stock, and of course three months have already elapsed since that June 30, 1941, determination date, but assuming that it is anything near the same that should be the price, in my opinion.

Q. What date did Fidel cease selling contracts in the State of New York?

[fol. 49] A. I have that only on information supplied by Mr. Young, Mr. Townsend, and I think it was as of the first of the year, but it may have been as of the first of December 1940; I am not sure. I may add that it had ceased selling for a considerable time before I found out that it had ceased to sell them.

The Court:

Q. Mr. Kelley, if Fidel is a wasting asset in the hands of Fidelity, is it also a wasting asset in the hands of a purchaser or prospective purchaser?

A. It is my honest opinion that that is exactly what it is going to turn out to be.

Q. Then do you know of any reason why the offer is being made?

A. I couldn't say, your Honor, that I know. I have heard certain discussions in connection with it, largely as pure conversation, which have led me to believe that there have been a numbr of groups of financiers in New York City who seem to think that if they acquire control of the stock of Fidel and thereby acquire control of its board of directors and thereby acquire control, within the framework of the indentures, of the collateral trust funds, that [fol. 50] with their superior knowledge of security values, market conditions, and so forth, that they could so invest and reinvest the collateral trust funds that both the bondholders and Fidel would benefit by virtue of the provisions in the several indentures which permit a division of the excess accumulations in the collateral trust funds as between the bondholders as a class and the corporation, as of the semiannual determination dates fixed in the indentures. Your Honor, I cannot say as a fact that that is the intention of anyone. It is my belief from conversations that I have heard incidentally over quite a period of time that that idea has been played with by more than one group of financiers; and it is quite possible that either Pell, Ltd. or the people with whom Pell, Ltd. may be associated in this deal, if they bring associates in, have something of the same idea; but, sir, that would not affect the opinion that I have already expressed that it is a wasting asset proposition and it is going to be that even in the hands of financiers, although I say that with due deference to their superior knowledge.

Q. If it were left in the hands of Fidelity, Fidelity would participate in the 50 per cent of thos- excess surpluses, or [fol. 51] whatever it was you called them, instead of the prospective purchaser?

A. That is correct.

Q. Do you have any idea what that would amount to?

A. I have not, your Honor. The only information I have on that point is information supplied to me by Mr. Young several months ago; and he told me at that time that the state of the account as between Fidel Association and the several collateral trust funds was such that there would be no more excess accumulations in the collateral trust funds in which Fidel could participate until something like thirty-eight or forty thousand dollars had been made up in that fund to equalize the credit to which the bondholders were entitled. Mr. Young has also told me—and here again I cannot express any opinion as to the fact myself—that during the years when Fidelity managed Fidel, Fidelity was never inclined to permit free trading, so to speak—investing, selling, reinvesting in the collateral trust fund for the purpose of making a profit. I might also add, your Honor, that I don't think that either the Federal Securities and Exchange Commission nor the State Attorney General [fol. 52] is going to look with favor on any scheme or plan on the part of anyone, no matter how honest it is, to do anything with those collateral trust funds except keep them invested in pretty high-grade things, and once having found high-grade things in which to invest to leave it that way, just to the extent that they have power to supervise and regulate under the circumstances. Again I revert to the thought of practically an unofficial savings bank; you have a fund that does not lend itself to playing with it, if I may use the expression.

Q. Is it your opinion from your knowledge and observation that this offer of the liquidating value is the best offer that can be obtained at this time from any source?

A. Yes, your Honor, I can answer that without qualification or hesitation. I honestly believe it is by far the best offer that can be obtained from any source. I might add in connection with that, your Honor, that there are other factors operative in the case of Fidel that, in my judgment, make it difficult to sell. Fidel was organized for the sole purpose of getting around statutory provisions in the law [fol. 53] of New York that prevented Fidelity from coming into New York on its own and doing business in New York, because Fidelity was and is, according to the banking law of New York, an investment company, and an investment company can't get into New York, be it domestic or foreign, without the permission of the Superintendent of Banks, and the Superintendent of Banks of the State of New York had years ago informally refused permission to let Fidelity in, on two grounds, the first was that he did not have the man power to supervise or regulate investment companies the way they should be, particularly those that were writing cumulative investment certificates of the kind Fidelity was offering, and, secondly, that Fidelity and companies like it came too much in competition with savings banks and savings and loan associations organized under the New York banking law, which offered a comparable service to investors without any load for sales expense.

Anyway, Fidelity couldn't get into New York; and when I was first retained by Fidelity it was for the purpose of seeing whether or not some way could be found to let Fidelity into New York. I tried to get it through the Insurance Department of the State first, and I couldn't, be- [fol. 54] cause it wasn't issuing any contract that had an insurable hazard in it, it was not an insurance company in New York. But there had been a 1929 amendment to the stock corporation law of New York, which controls the organization of ordinary business corporations, which provided that you could form, under the stock corporation law, a company for the purpose of acquiring the bonds, notes and choses in action of other persons, firms or corporations and issuing collateral trust bonds against the security thereof; and while it is pretty obvious that that statute was not intended to permit Fidelity to get into New York and do indirectly what the banking law prohibited it from doing directly, none the less the State Attorney General rendered, in 1932 I think it was, an opinion approving as being within the law the Fidel setup.

That arrangement was never acquiesced in—that opinion, rather, was never acquiesced in—by the Superintendent of Banks of New York, so that the way the thing stands at the moment, the Superintendent of Banks feels that Fidel does not conform to the statute, the Attorney General is on record with an opinion that it does, and there has never [fol. 55] been a determination as to whether it does or does not. When those facts, you see, are inquired into by any prospective purchaser, the tendency might be to scare them off, because even though Fidel doesn't offer bonds any more, there are provisions under the general business law of New York whereby the State Attorney General could, should he change his mind and become convinced that Fidel was an illegal method of doing business, move for the appointment of what is known in New York as a Martin Act receiver, which would simply take possession of all the assets, liquidate them, and put Fidel out of business, and whoever paid anywhere from a hundred to a hundred and twenty-five thousand for its capital stock would get nothing; the expenses of the liquidation unquestionably would eat up any equity it had.

It is for those reasons that I myself feel from the point of view of Fidel and Fidelity that this is a good offer and, frankly, should be grabbed at.

The Court: Anything else?

Mr. T. C. Townsend: We have nothing, your Honor.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Kelley, for what purposes are a consulting actuary needed?

[fol. 56] A. Under the indenture it is on the certificate of the consulting actuary furnished to the trustee from time to time, I think semiannually, that the amount of the required accumulations—in other words, the actuarial reserves—are determined. That becomes the first factor in your equation. Twice a year the trustee receives from the consulting actuary, who must be an independent actuary, although he may be selected by the company, a certification in which the consulting actuary advises the trustee as to the amount which should be in the collateral trust funds as a reserve for the protection of these bonds as they mature. Then values are ascertained in accordance with formulae set forth in some detail in the indenture and the two figures are compared; and it is by a comparison of the actuarial certification with the indenture appraisement that the trustee may know from time to time whether the collateral trust funds are adequate or whether they are in default to any extent.

Then the next job of the consulting actuary is to make the computations that are required from time to time to determine whether or not there are excess accumulations [fol. 57] in the reserves for division and allocation as between the bondholders as a class and the corporation; and in that connection I might point out that there is a little complication comes in there. When you value the collateral trust securities to determine whether or not the collateral trust fund is adequate in the light of the actuarial figure which has been certified by the actuary, you do not take—here at least—market value into consideration at all. You see, if you have securities in there that are not in default as to principal or interest and are otherwise in good standing, then you can return them at par; whereas when you come to the computation that has to do with the allocation of—no, let's not say allocation—has to do with the determination of whether or not there is an excess accumulation in the collateral trust fund, you shift your base, and you do not use the indenture formulae, but you use market or cost, whichever is lower, or, if there is not any market, book or cost, whichever is lower.

So you see that semiannually you have those three factors that have to be ascertained: (a) the amount of actuarial reserve required; (b) the values per indenture formulae; [fol. 58] and (c) values for determination of excess earnings or excess accumulations in the collateral trust funds.

Then there is another function that the consulting actuary has——

Q. Will you pardon me just a second before you go into that next feature?

A. Yes.

Q. The third one, which provides for division between contract holders and owners of stock, is based upon market value? Is that correct?

A. Market or cost, whichever is lower. At least, that is my unaided recollection of the provisions of the indenture.

Q. Now go ahead. I didn't want to interrupt you.

A. Now, there is a fourth job that a consulting actuary has to do within the framework of the indentures themselves, and that is that as the holders of bonds complete their subscription payments and the bonds become due, then a point of time is reached with respect to that particular bondholder when his right to share in that excess is no longer [fol. 59] provisional, it is definitive and absolute; and then there is another special formula in the indenture for the use of the actuary in working out the ratios and to the last penny the share in that accumulation that that particular bondholder should have.

Then the other respect in which I know that the services of a consulting actuary are needed is that, ordinarily at least, when you want to explain this scheme to anybody, you have to have an actuary, because there is a point beyond which I can't take you. I know the legal aspect of it fairly well, because I drew the indentures, but I would not even attempt to express an opinion about the actuarial complications of it, because I don't know.

I might add, too, of course if there is ever occasion to put out new indentures—and that seems to be out of the question now—you obviously need one then; he has to collaborate with you in getting the indenture.

Q. Mr. Kelley, at the end of any semiannual period, as I understand it, on market value there is determined whether or not there is an excess in the fund, and if there is an excess 50 per cent of it goes to the general or stockholders' fund and 50 per cent is retained in the fund for the benefit of [fol. 60] the contract holders. Am I correct in that?

A. It is correct with this one qualification. There is a further provision in the indentures which limits the right of Fidel to participate in that fund under certain circumstances. If you care to, I have that stuff here, and I will be glad to read to you that particular sentence which embodies that qualification.

Q. All right, sir.

A (Reading): "Provided, however, that the aggregate share of such excess credited to the account of the Association at any time shall not be increased by current allotment upon any determination date to an amount greater than the aggregate share of such excess provisionally credited to the account of the registered holders of such bonds as a class at the same time."

Q. What does that mean, Mr. Kelley?

A. I might say in the beginning that that was the language of the actuary, not the lawyer; but it is my understanding that that means this. If, on a given determination date, let us say January 1 in any year, it appears that the bondholders provisionally are entitled to x dollars and Fidel is entitled [fol. 61] to and takes x dollars, and in the ensuing six months something happens to the market value of the collateral trust fund, that the provisional credit for the benefit of the bondholders is either wiped out or diminished. Then Fidel can participate in the second ensuing determination date only after what the provisional credit for the bondholders lost in the first six months of the period has been made up in the second.

Now, that is my understanding. I can only say that is what I thought it meant when it was incorporated in the indenture; and my later discussions with Mr. Young have led me to believe that that also is his understanding of it. Otherwise, you see, it would be impossible to explain the fact that Fidel can't participate in this excess for some period of time to come until the provisional credit for the bondholders has been built up to the extent that he told me of $38,000.

Q. The legal interpretation of that key sentence would be on the determination whether or not anyone who bought it out could continually draw out their profits, even though the bondholders might not be getting a profit? In other words——

A. Yes, that is my understanding exactly.

[fol. 62] Q. And if your understanding of that key sentence would be wrong and it would be interpreted otherwise, then the stockholders could make a profit more or less even though the bondholders were losing money?

A. Oh, sure. In effect, then, you would be perpetrating a fraud on the public, because in my opinion you would have no right to take the money of the public without advising them in writing exactly the way you were going to run that fund and then let them buy it if they want to.

Q. But if the person who bought this out should obtain a legal decision that the interpretation you have given us is not correct and that they could continue to take out profits, then it would be a very advantageous thing for anyone who bought the stock of Fidel, wouldn't it?

A. Yes, but, again, there are qualifications to that, because, to begin with, the indenture trustee; whether it has the right under the indenture or not, has certain ideas of its own as to how these funds should be managed, and of course the indenture trustee is the one who has this property. If [fol. 63] the indenture trustee is not satisfied that the administration of the fund is in accordance with its construction of the indenture, it wouldn't do anyone a great deal of good to try to do something which they thought would be more advantageous to them, because the indenture trustee has too many powers. The indenture trustee would unquestionably under those circumstances apply to a New York court for instructions to determine the question. I haven't the slightest doubt that there would be both state and federal agencies who might interest themselves in it; and I honestly think it is impossible for anyone to make money for himself on the operation of these collateral trust funds, irrespective of any opinion of counsel you may get about the contract; there are too many people in existence to stop them; whether they have the right to or not they they will.

Q. What would prevent the new stockholders from getting a new indenture trustee who might be more to their own liking?

A. Well, theoretically, nothing. Actually there always has been serious difficulty in getting indenture trustees in New York City to act under these indentures for a variety of reasons. Back in 1932, when the first of these indentures [fol. 64] was written, Fidelity tried to interest three or four trust companies in New York City of Different sizes in the trusteeship, and the trust companies uniformly refused. Their reasons ran something like this: "We never saw anything like this indenture before, and have never been in this particular type of kind of business, and no matter what the State Attorney General says we are not sure about its validity or legality; and, secondly, we don't like to get into this installment contract business anyway; we are not geared for it;" and, finally, this scheme does unquestionably, you see, some directly into competition with the business of savings banks and savings and loan associations and the thrift departments of commercial banks, and for that reason, if for none other, it was not favored.

Anyway, we couldn't get a trustee in New York if we wanted to, and, fortunately, the Charleston National Bank examined into the business and found it acceptable and carried on for a number of years. Then, when it seemed desirable again to get the thing back in New York State, at the urging of state officials and others, Mr. Young was able to persuade the president of the Colonial Trust Company, [fol. 65] which is quite a small institution, to accept the business. The business was duly accepted, but it is far from easy to get a new trust company to take on a type of business of this kind, with which it is wholly unfamiliar, over and above all of which it is rather expensive, because, you see, every time you shift your trustee you have to pay a new acceptance fee to the trustee, you have to pay the fees of trustee's counsel, a lot of documents have to be prepared—It is quite a job, and there is plenty in it to discourage anyone that would try it, although theoretically there is nothing to stop them.

Q. Mr. Kelley, did I understand you to say that Mr. Young had told you that the Charleston Trust Company, when it was trustee, would not permit the manipulation of the securities in the portfolio for the purpose of trying to make a profit by buying and selling them?

The Court: Charleston National Bank.

Mr. Palmer: Yes; it was the trustee.

A. If I said the Charleston National Bank in that relation I was in error. I don't think I did. What I meant to say, and what I think I did say, is that Mr. Young has ad- [fol. 66] vised me from time to time that Fidelity would not permit the free investment and reinvestment there; unless it got good security in the collateral trust fund it wanted to freeze it there.

Q. And it came out solvent by doing that?

A. I am convinced that Fidel is comfortably solvent and I am also convinced that the conservative investment policy had a lot to do with it.

Q. Now, these gentlemen who want to purchase it, it is your understanding, would like to do what Fidelity would not permit to be done, buy and sell and exchange the securities in the hope of making a profit by manipulation whereby they can buy at one price and sell at a different price?

A. Well, I couldn't say that that was my understanding with respect to Pell, Ltd. specifically or about any specific group that might become associated with them. All that I can say in that connection is that over a considerable period of years I have heard conversation and discussions about the possibility of doing that. Of course, whenever I did hear it discussed, the point was always made by someone, [fol. 67] and I think rightly, that no one can make money out of the investment and reinvestment of that collateral trust fund over any period of time without making it for the benefit of the bondholders as well, because to the extent that it is made it means that you have an excess accumulation in the reserve from time to time in which Fidel and the bondholders share equally, the difference being that Fidel takes it out, whereas it provisionally remains in there for the bondholders, and the individual bondholder gets his share only as, if and when he completes his subscription payments.

Q. The $125,000 approximately that would be paid for the stock, would that include any of the undivided profits which existed at the time of the sale in the funds?

A. Well, it would certainly be my understanding that it would, if such existed. It is, however, my understanding that none such exists, and I paid no further attention to it for that reason. It is not theer, so I have not paid any further attention to whether it would pass it.

Q. The person who paid $125,000 for it would have ample security for his $125,000 by buying it at liquidating values? Isn't that correct?

A. Well, I think so, if my understanding of the nature of [fol. 68] the securities in which Fidel funds are invested is correct. I understand that they are conservative and reasonably high-grade securities, and barring some sort of financial debacle that would upset the whole nation I suppose that anyone who buys at liquidating value will certainly have reasonable security, subject always to this point, however, that as the years go on, unless he is able to make money either out of investment and reinvestment of the general fund or the investment and reinvestment of the collateral trust fund, or both, he is going to suffer from this wasting asset situation that I referred to earlier in my testimony.

Now, of course I realize I am under oath, and I am projecting myself into the future; I am expressing opinions. That is the way it strikes me.

Q. Mr. Kelley, it amounts to this, does it not: A group put up $125,000 which at the present time would be adequately secured, and with that, because they put up $125,000 which is perfectly secured to them, they are given two million dollars of someone else's money with which to gamble and hope to make money; the most they have to lose is [fol. 69] $125,000, and if they are successful in the years of gambling with other people's money, then they can make a very comfortable profit for themselves and those other people equally?

A. Of course, they do have to operate within the framework of the indenture. That being so, I don't know whether "gambling" is the word. You see, these indentures are not set up to permit of the inclusion in the collateral trust funds of common or preferred stocks, so that takes a couple of the choicest vehicles for gambling right out of the operation to begin with. You see, you are dealing with bonds, notes, and, for want of a better term, choses in action, because that is the term used by the New York stock corporation law, but I have from time to time definitely rendered opinions to Fidel and to others connected with it that, as used in the statute and as used in these indentures, the term "choses in action" does not include common or preferred stocks, guaranteed or otherwise.

Q. Mr. Kelley, whether you call it gambling or not, the only purpose that anyone could want to do this would be for the purpose of buying some form of securities low and selling them high and thereby making a profit which they would share equally with the contract holders? Isn't that [fol. 70] true?

A. For the immediate future that would not necessarily be true, because for the immediate future a person who took over Fidel now might reasonably expect to have the benefit of continued subscription payments by the holders of bonds; but you do reach a point in the future—and I honestly can't tell you how far distant that points looks to me at the moment; I don't know, but it is there—you do reach a point in the future where the income to which the general fund of Fidel would be entitled out of the periodic subscription payments would in all probability be insufficient to pay the expense of maintaining and managing Fidel and the collateral trust funds; so that it does seem to me that over the long term—over the long view here—the only chance that anyone has of making money out of a purchase of Fidel would be a pretty skillful operation of investing and reinvesting the collateral trust funds. I say it must be skillful because one mistake of a serious nature would have the enterprise insolvent at the next determination date, whereupon, of course, the indenture trustee would proceed immediately to liquidate immediately, either under the powers [fols. 71-76] reserved in the indenture or by application to a court for the appointment of a receiver.

[fol. 77] Q. Well, if, over a period of years, the contract holders cash-surrender their contracts, there is a theoretical or book profit set up in the fund by virtue of the difference between the reserve and the cash surrender value? That is correct, isn't it?

A. I think that is correct, Mr. Farmer.

Q. I am Mr. Palmer. Mr. Farmer is over here.

A. Oh, I am sorry. I think that is correct if the liquidation of those bonds by the several bondholders is done over a period of years and not as part and parcel of a general liquidation as of a given moment of time.

Q. If it is done over a period of years, so that every contract holder cash-surrenders, then the stockholders not only get the entire fund, because there are no contract holders to get 50 per cent of any appreciation profits, but they would also get the entire fund and have any profit made by the [fols. 78-81] difference between cash surrender and reserve? Isn't that true?

A. That sounds right to me, but again there is an adjusting factor that makes me qualify my answer because, you see, just to the extent that people come in with their bonds for cash surrender, and from theoretical—at least, the position of Fidel with respect to the surpluses in the collateral trust fund, Fidel is losing the benefit of the periodic monthly income from those same persons. That is why I find it hard to answer you, you see, categorically, yes or no. There are too many ifs and ands here, and I can only say I don't know.

. . . . . .

[fol. 82] Q. Now, by wiping out this liability, or the guaranty of Fidelity to Fidel, the bondholders of Fidel would gain nothing by letting that be wiped out, would they? They have something now, regardless of whether it is worth a little or worth nothing. They wouldn't gain anything by having it wiped out?

A. Completely discharged, you mean?

Q. Yes.

A. Without any quid pro quo at all?

[fol. 83] Q. Yes.

A. When I said that I really had in mind a wiping out by bankruptcy discharge after the failure of any attempted reorganization. I didn't mean a wiping out with their consent. When I spoke of a readjustment downward to a more or less nominal figure, I did have in mind the readjustment of a reorganization, either in this Court or a state court, which would require, in some manner, shape or form, the consent of the requisite number.

Q. So Fidelity, if it got $125,000 cash now, has the almost certain potential liability in the future of its guaranty to Fidel, because, as you have told us, Fidel is a wasting asset, and in the future will be a liability to someone, so if the guaranty remains Fidelity contract holders, although they get $125,000 for the general kitty, are going to have that potential liability in the future? Isn't that right?

A. Unless it is properly cared for in a plan of reorganization—oh, definitely.

Q. I notice you said when these bondholders of Fidel have taken their contracts and paid upon them, that there is an executed contract with Fidelity which puts this guaranty [fols. 84-90] into effect.

The Court: That is a legal conclusion, Mr. Palmer, which this witness, although he is a lawyer, is not qualified to answer in this proceeding.

Mr. Palmer: He has been giving, your Honor, as I understand him, legal conclusions.

The Court: There has been no objection up to now, but I cannot permit such a clear legal conclusion as that. That is a matter for the Court to determine.

. . . . . .

[fol. 91] The Witness: During the recess certain figures have been shown me by Mr. Palmer, and I have examined [fol. 92] them, and I have been asked to state these figures for the record and to make any comment in relation to the figures that is relevant to the opinion that I have expressed that it is to the best interests of Fidelity that the offer be accepted.

The statement was captioned, "Adjustments to bring book surplus of market surplus over net cash liability," the date being as of June 30, 1941.

Now, what follows is with respect to Series A bonds. It appears from this statement, which in turn appears to be correct as per the published financial statements of Fidel as of June 30, that the surplus per the books, based on book value of investments and actuarial reserve, is, for the unmatured bonds, $110,293.57, and for the matured bonds, $519.46, the total being $110,813.03; and the deficit represented by a comparison of market to book values of investments is shown as follows: in the unmatured fund the book value is $973,509.94 and the market value is $915,526.63, the indicated difference between book value and market value being $57,983.31, which is a deficit in the sense that market value is below book value by the amount indicated.

[fol. 93] With respect to the matured fund the book value is $6893.60 and the market value is $7315, so that with respect to the matured fund the market value exceeds book value by $421.40.

From the same source this statement indicates that the excess of the actuarial reserve over the net cash liability is made up as follows: actuarial reserve is $981,436.52, net cash liability is $954,098.03, the excess of actuarial reserve over net cash liability being, therefore, $27,338.49, and the market surplus over net cash liability is $80,589.61. Now, so much for Series A.

And referring again to the statement supplied by Mr. Palmer, now with respect to Series B bonds, the surplus per the books based on book value of investments and actuarial reserve is, for the unmatured bonds, $20,683.14, and for the matured bonds, $2163.15, the total being $22,846.29. With respect to the market value over book value of investments, the detail is as follows: in the unmatured fund the book value is $1,248,207 and the market value is $1,254,820, the excess of market value over book value being $6613. In the matured fund, the book value is $60,996.50 [fol. 94] and the market value is $50,537.50, the market value being less than the book value by $10,459, which is indicated here as a deficit in the sense just explained.

The excess of the actuarial reserve over the net cash liability with respect to the Series B bonds is stated as follows: actuarial reserve, $1,598,822.01; net cash liability, $1,548,703.59, the excess of the actuarial reserve over the net cash liability being $50,118.42; and with respect to these series B bonds the market surplus over net cash liability is $69,118.71.

Now combining the market surplus over net cash liability of the Series A and Series B funds, there is an aggregate market surplus over net cash liability as of June 30, 1941, of $149,708.32.

Now from my knowledge of the indenture and the figures—the correctness of which, incidentally, seems to be beyond dispute on the part of anyone, because they are taken from the published statement of Fidel—what I have read, after discussion with Mr. Palmer in the recess, amounts to this:

If every bondholder of Fidel should cash-surrender his bond under circumstances that would not entitle the sur- [fol. 95] rendering bondholder to actual participation in the surplus accumulated in the several collateral trust funds, and all other things remaining equal, there would be $149,708.32 of market surplus over net cash liability, which should be added to the stated net worth of Fidel Association as per the balance sheet of its own general fund, meaning the fund of free assets not subject to the collateral trust indentures.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Kelley, could I interrupt you a minute?

A. Surely.

Q. Then, under these circumstances, the particular offer should be approximately $125,000 as to surpluses of the general fund, plus $150,000, as you have given it, or a total of $275,000? Am I correct?

The Court: Let's wait, before that question is answered, till the witness qualifies what he has said. I think I can see several qualifications, and probably the witness knows a good many more than I do.

The Witness: Actually, your Honor, I think Mr. Palmer's question may have been designed to bring out a couple of [fol. 96] those qualifications, so that there may be no distortion of the picture one way or the other. The first qualification that I have to offer with respect to the picture made by the figures just read into the record is this, that just to the extent that bondholders of Fidel come in and surrender their bonds, the income which Fidel would expect, and might reasonably expect, to receive from those bondholders by reason of the continuance of their subscription payments in the future would become non-existent; so it would seem to me that that figure of $149,708.32 must be offset by some indeterminate amount which, if it could be determined, would be the present value of the prospective income that Fidel might normally expect to receive from the contributions made by its bondholders. By contributions of course I mean the installment payments under their subscriptions to their bonds.

In addition I think this qualification must be adverted to, that there is no way that I know of under this indenture in which bondholders could be required, under any circumstances, by any permissible action on the part of Fidel, to come in and accept their cash surrenders, so that the exist-[fol. 97] ence of this figure of $149,708.32 as an actually realizable addition to the net worth of Fidel is wholly contingent upon an accidental circumstance that within a measurable period of time in the foreseeable future every bondholder will come in and cash-surrender his bond, all other things reflected by the statements as of June 30, 1941, remaining substantially equal.

The Court:

Q. As I understood your answer, these values that go to make up the hundred and forty-nine thousand odd figure also include the difference between book values and market values of securities, don't they?

A. Yes, sir, those conditions are all reflected in that ultimate figure of $149,000 plus.

Q. So that, on a present day basis, if the securities were liquidated there would be no actual value in that difference that you have set up there which goes into the $149,000, insofar as the difference between the book value and the market value of securities was concerned?

A. Your Honor, that has already been taken into account in this way, you see, that in arriving at the two subtotals that go into $149,708.32, the deficit of market value in relation to book value has already been deducted, so you see that full effect has been given to that; so it is [fol. 98] true to say that if, within a measureable period of time in the future, everything else remaining substantially the same as it is per the statements of June 30, 1941, all Fidel bondholders came in and voluntarily cash-surrendered their contracts, $149,708.32 would be added to the net worth of Fidel; but as against that all of Fidel's income, its good will as a going concern, and all of the incidents to that status would vanish.

Q. Yes. Go ahead.

A. So that I shan't appear to be in the position of unduly favoring my own opinion that this offer should be accepted, I think I should add that if there is any chance of anyone paying anything for the stock of Fidel in addition to its net worth on the contingency that some—not that some but that all the bondholders will come in and do this, then if such an offer were before the Court I most certainly would recommend that it be accepted and that the Pell, Ltd. offer be rejected.

Mr. Palmer:

Q. Mr. Kelley, do you know that within the last six months, I believe it was testified to here, $600,000 of face amount certificates had been cash-surrendered?

[fol. 99] A. I didn't know the exact amount, but I did know that from time to time between the date of the institution of the state court proceeding in West Virginia which resulted in the appointment of the receivers and the present time there had been, on specific occasions, exceptionally large cash-surrender demands, but the amount, $600,000 or some other figure, I could not say.

Q. And if that present rate continued it would only take two or three years until this very contingency that we have been speaking of would happen and all of the policies would be cash-surrendered? Isn't that true?

A. If that rate continued?

Q. Yes.

A. Oh, yes.

Q. Would it be your thought, Mr. Kelley, that before the Court should accept this offer it should see if there are any other persons who might be interested, because of this figure of $150,000 approximately extra that might be made by anyone if this cash-surrender process continued?

The Court: Well, I can say, without the necessity of the witness answer- that question, that the Court would certainly do that. The Court would require the Trustee, before [fols. 100-116] accepting this offer, to ascertain by all possible means whether there could be any better offer secured from any source.

Mr. Palmer: I presumed that the Court would, naturally. That is all, Mr. Kelley. Thank you.

. . . . . .

[fol. 117] A. G. Swiger—Cross.

Mr. Farmer: That would be true if I could tell if those companies were investment companies.

The Court: This witness has said he doesn't know anything about it except what is on the sheet. Now you ask what is on the sheet. It is already in evidence. Let's get through with this. Objection is sustained to that question.

Mr. Farmer:

Q. Do you mean, Mr. Swiger, that you don't know which of those companies are investment companies?

A. No, I do not, and for this reason, Mr. Farmer. I presumed when I came to Charleston and when this offer was submitted that the Court and counsel would want to know who these parties are and something about their responsibility. I requested each of the directors of Pell, Ltd. to give me a list of their companies which they served as director and executive and so forth, and this, referring to Mr. Stewart's, is Mr. Stewart's own list, which he gave to me and which I have copied into this memorandum.

Q. Now, as to Mr. Pell, you don't know what companies [fols. 118-119] he has listed there are investment companies?

A. No, I wouldn't know.

Q. You didn't bring with you a balance sheet or financial statement of Pell, Ltd., did you?

A. No, I did not.

Q. Sir?

A. But I want to reiterate that Pell, Ltd. doesn't have sufficient money in its treasury today to buy and pay for the Fidel stock, but in the same way, with as much emphasis, if this offer is approved by the Court, Pell, Ltd. will keep its commitments.

Q. And it has not been decided which of these gentlemen would contribute towards the fund necessary to consummate this purchase or in what proportions?

The Court: It doesn't make any difference, Mr. Farmer.

. . . . . .

[fol. 120] Mr. Palmer: There was some controversy, your Honor, as to the question of fees—the size of his fees—your Honor, and this witness being intimately acquainted with him for twenty years and being a member of the bar of New York and knowing financial men, would have a very definite idea as to Mr. Koontz's worth to Fidelity and what he did with reference to it in a definite way in New York.

The Court: If he knows anything with reference to the immediate services for which the fees were charged, I will permit him to answer the question; otherwise I will sustain the objection.

Mr. Hillis Townsend: Your Honor, this question and answer are to become a part of the main record? Is that right?

[fols. 121-122] Mr. Palmer: Yes.

Mr. Hillis Townsend: It is not a part of the record on the Trustee's petition?

Mr. Palmer: No, not at all.

The Court:

Q. Do you know anything about these particular services that Mr. Koontz rendered to Fidelity?

A. Your Honor, I wouldn't know unless I would see his bills and see what services he had charged for. I do know this, in fairness to Mr. Koontz, I should say, that I saw him frequently in New York over a period of years. He was in my office many times. He conferred in my office with various people with reference to the affairs of the Fidelity Investment Association. He seemed active in that connection. From my opinion as a lawyer, I would say he did a very good job.

[fol. 1-62] Mr. Palmer: Here is the one I have, your Honor, which was made December 27th 1941, giving notice for Monday January 5th 1942 at ten A. M. "or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard," and the motions were brought up on the 5th and later set for hearing today.

That motion is this: "Comes L. H. Brooks, trustee, Frederic Leake and A. L. Goldberg, Jr., trustee and move the Court to order the Central Trust Company, trustee, forthwith to make and file a report in pursuance of Section 167 of the Bankruptcy Act as amended as to the desirability of the formulation of a plan of liquidation in accordance with the suggestion or suggestions copy of which is attached hereto and made a part hereof."

Then they have the plan of liquidation.

Then I have another motion here.

"Come L. H. Brooks, Trustee, Frederic Leake and A. L. Goldberg, Jr., Trustee, and move the Court to order the Central Trust Company, Trustee, forthwith to make and file a report in pursuance to Section 167 of the Bankruptcy Act as amended as to the desirability of the continuance of the Debtor's business, said report to be filed before the Court's decision on the issues now under advisement is [fol. 63] announced and order thereon rendered."

That was accompanied by a memorandum of authorities.

Then I have another motion here by the same persons moving the Court for an order restraining the Central Trust Company from sending out any notices to the policy holders until there has been a division of the creditors into classes, and further that no order be made with regard to filing the claims until there has been a hearing on the motion heretofore filed requiring the trustee to file a report in accordance with Section 167 and 169 of the Bankruptcy Act.

The Court: Before we take up those motions, let me reiterate what I said a few minutes ago, if it was not entirely plain, and that is that I don't propose that the administrative procedure in this case be carried on as a result of motions made by contract holders unless it has first appeared to me that the trustee is in some way lacking in the discharge of its duties; and so before we take up any of these motions I want the trustee to explain what procedure he has in mind, so that I will know whether or not these motions are in order.

Mr. Hillis Townsend: Your Honor, we are very glad to [fol. 64] have that opportunity, and had intended to speak at the proper time.

If the Court please, counsel for the state court receivers and Mr. Farmer have made motions which require more specifically than anything else that the trustee file a report expressing its opinion as to the desirability of the continuation of the debtor's business. The trustee does not believe that this act contemplates a report which contains an opinion on that point without submitting along with it the facts found by the trustee which would justify that opinion. There are several ways in which the administration of this estate might be proceeded with, and the trustee has had to consider a number of different things in formulating, in its mind, the proper plan to follow. Section 167 (1) provides that the trustee shall make certain investigations and report on them to the Court including an expression of the desirability of continuing the debtor's business.

The Court: The report is to the judge.

Mr. Hillis Townsend: To the judge. Section 167 (5) requires that the trustee make a similar investigation and send notice thereof to the contract holders in the form and [fol. 65] manner prescribed by the Court. I might clear up one of Mr. Farmer's motions and Mr. Lauritzen's objection here right away by saying that at the present time the trustee does not plan to ask the creditors to send in proofs of their claims, and before that is done these parties will be notified and have ample opportunity to present their objections to the Court, but they can dismiss that for the time being, because the trustee does not plan to do that immediately.

The Court: Just what is the plan of the trustee with reference to having the Court pass on these claims?

Mr. Hillis Townsend: This is it. I will be to that in just a moment.

The Court: All right.

Mr. Hillis Townsend: In order to file the report required by Section 167, or for that report the trustee has a great deal of the information required by it. Briefly, this is what the trustee plans to do. It would like to file, and it agrees with counsel who have raised this question that perhaps the time has now come when certain of this information should be filed with the Court and certain of this information should be sent out to the contract holders; but [fol. 66] we are trying to bear in mind that mailing notices to contract holders is expensive in this case, and as many of them are to be avoided as possible, and the trustee is in position, or will be within a very short time—and we would like for the Court to suggest a date, or perhaps we can agree on a date here—in which it can file a portion of the 167 report which will contain an expression as to the desirability of continuing the debtor's business and a great many other of the facts that are required by those sections.

Of course your Honor doubtless knows that the cloud that hangs over the administration of this trust is the appeal that is pending in the Circuit Court of Appeals. Some of this procedure is going to be expensive, regardless of exactly what form is adopted and regardless of when it is done. The trustee has been very mindful of the fact that if a lot of money is spent in an expensive procedure for the classification of claims and the determining of the rights of creditors, and then the jurisdiction of this Court is vacated by a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, that money is gone and no good will have been done; and we disagree with counsel that that would be information [fol. 67] which might be used by any other Court that took jurisdiction of this case. So the trustee, therefore, has not believed it advisable to enter into this claim procedure before or at the time of filing and submitting the greater part of the 167 report. It would like to do that first and can do that and will do it within any short time of a few weeks which might be settled on here today, and as I say that report will contain the trustee's opinion about the desirability of continuing the business; and if these gentlemen want to use that, and think they can get it into the record properly before the appellate court and want to use it, the trustee will certainly have no objection to it going into the record.

After this information is before the Court which is required by Section 167, it then becomes the duty of the trustee to send this information to the creditors, and they, as I understand the law, in the light of this information, are entitled to submit a plan. Obviously a plan can't be submitted until this 167 report is in and this information is sent to the creditors and they have had their opportunity to submit proposals for a plan. Therefore no plan can be [fol. 68] submitted by the trustee until that has been done, and we think that the classification of the creditors can more properly be decided by the Court in connection with the Court's approval of the plan, because if it is done that way it might obviate one more appeal in this case. We think that there will doubtless be an appeal from the decision of the Court on the question of the classification of creditors, and we think also there probably will be an appeal on the question of the adoption of a plan or approval of a plan by the Court. Now, if the trustee can proceed in such a manner as to get this question decided at the same time and in the same proceeding before this Court, then those appeals can be combined and decided at one time and whatever proceeding is ultimately adopted could go ahead from that point.

That, briefly, states the plan which the trustee has in mind, and we are willing to have the Court fix any time within say four to six weeks or so within which the most of this—two months would perhaps be better—for the balance of this 167 report, except as to the recommendations as to the formulation of a plan.

We can't help but have some feeling over the fact that [fol. 69] counsel have repeatedly stated here in court that the trustee has been ordered to do something which it has failed to do. We don't think that any orders have been entered directing the trustee to file this report or any part of it. Your Honor has expressed your opinion as to when those things should be done on two or three occasions; and I think it is proper to say that those expressions were made at a point in this proceeding where none of us knew the course that it would take.

Another thing which comes to our minds in this connection is this. This criticism comes from the state court receivers, who have filed an appeal from your Honor's decision taking jurisdiction of this case. They are the ones, and the only ones, that have voiced any criticism of the course that has been pursued by the trustee. None of the creditors have complained that I know about, and some of the creditors have promptly expressed their approval of the method. If any expensive procedure is engaged in by the trustee at this point, as they seem to think it should be, and they prevail in their appeal, then that will negate anything that is done at this time; and we can't quite appreciate [fol. 70] the position that they take in insisting that the trustee do something which they, by prosecuting the appeal, would undo if they prevail on their appeal. That, in brief, is our position at this time.

Mr. Warner: May I say a word, your Honor?

The Court: Yes, Mr. Warner.

Mr. Warner: On behalf of the creditors whom I represent, I think that the trustee should do nothing except routine work and administrative work. He would be subject to criticism by contractholders if he incurred extraordinary expense here for nothing. I am advised it will cost around $25,000 to have an audit made. It will certainly take a lot of time. It will take a lot of time of attorneys and plenty of expense to classify the creditors and formulate a plan; and it all may result in nothing at all if the Circuit Court of Appeals vacates the order of this Court. I think the trustee would be subject to criticism if it incurred any unnecessary expense without a specific order of this Court.

Mr. Eney: I have listened, your Honor, with a great deal of interest to what Mr. Townsend had to say. As I understand him, what he suggests is that the trustee will, except [fol. 71] for purely administrative matters, stay the proceedings pending the appeal. If that is the considered opinion of the trustee I won't quarrel with it, although I had rather anticipated that the Court, having decided the question of jurisdiction, would go ahead. There are two things, however, which occur to me as being questions which necessarily must be determined by the Court before any effective work can be done for developing a plan of reorganization or determining that any such plan can be developed. Those questions are a number, but they can be divided into two classes. First, the method or the manner in which claims of contract holders shall be computed. I don't feel that the trustee can possibly make any plan or formulate a plan, nor do I believe any creditor or creditors' committee could formulate a plan, without having some basis for the classifying of the claims. We have talked glibly of cash surrender values of the contracts. I, for one, think that is not a proper method of classifying the claims. I don't think cash surrender value is proper, because it cuts out a large number of creditors who had no cash surrender values, but who are in no wise in default.

[fol. 72] The Court: Who are they?

Mr. Eney: The people that paid less than eleven months.

The Court: They would have equity in the case of reorganization on the basis of a face amount certificate company, but would have no equity in case of liquidation, either sudden or slow and orderly. Is that right?

Mr. Eney: I don't think so. That is the view that has been talked about in the proceeding, but I don't personally believe it is right at all. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that that group of persons, people who have not broken their contracts, I don't believe it is equitable for the Court to say to them, "You are just out; you have no claim, because you have been contract holders and paid in for ten months, whereas someone else has paid in for twenty months." But whether I am right or somebody else is right, the Courts can determine whether it is on the basis of cash surrender values, on the basis of reserve values, on the basis of amounts paid in, either discounted or improved at the lawful rate or just flat amounts paid in, or what personally I think is an entirely different theory and [fol. 73] a proper one, which I have discussed with counsel for the trustee. I won't stop to go into it, but I think the Court must at some time in this proceeding determine, not for each particular contract holder, but all contract holders that their claims shall be computed in accordance with a certain formula, a uniform formula.

The Court: Do you believe that an order determining those things would be an appealable order?

Mr. Eney: I don't think an order determining that alone would necessarily be an appealable order, no, sir. I think that in connection with the other question I am about to mention it might be, and that is this. The act provides, and necessarily so, that the Court shall determine what creditors are secured and what are unsecured, and what creditors, who, while not secured, have priorities, as for instance, the United States Government tax claims and perhaps, others; and in addition to that the Court is required to fix a time for hearing and for determining whether or not certain creditors are or are not secured, and to value the amount of their security and determine the extent to which it is secured and the extent to which it is unsecured. In this particular proceeding, in view of the contentions made, that [fol. 74] seems to me to mean that the Court must say with respect to Maryland, for instance, "I am going to fix a day for a hearing to determine whether the Maryland law makes contract holders in Maryland secured creditors, and if I determine that the Maryland law does make them secured creditors to the extent of the deposit there, then I am going to value that deposit and determine the liabilities in Maryland and to say that creditor is to a certain extent secured and to a certain extent unsecured."

In doing that, in order to determine the liability side of that question, the Court would have, either at that time or prior thereto, to have fixed the manner in which the claims shall be calculated. That involves not necessarily a series of hearings; it can be done in one hearing; but it would involve a separate consideration as to each state. Your Honor might very well say that Wisconsin contract holders are secured and Maryland contract holders are not. In addition to that you have got the question of who are the Maryland contract holders who are secured by the Maryland statutes, if you determine that some are; are they the contracts that were sold in Maryland? Are they holders [fols. 75-81] of contracts who now reside in Maryland, or just who are they? I think those questions must be determined before the trustee can act, because in formulating a plan the trustee, under the case of Case v. Los Angeles and others, no plan can give a contract holder less than his legal right, so necessarily the Court must say what the legal right of the contract holder is, $x$ dollars, in order to guide the trustee as to the minimum that can be allowed that particular one individual in any plan of reorganization. Even though it is approved by every contract holder but one, that one contract holder could upset the plan if his contract is cut below its legal minimum.

What I had in mind is this. I understand that the trustee is about to mail out communications to contract holders at the present time. I don't know how much it costs to mail notices, but it certainly must cost twelve or fifteen hundred dollars in postage alone, plus other expenses.

. . . . . .

[fol. 82] Mr. Eney: One other thing I wanted to say, and that is I don't see how the trustee can make a report which would indicate the specific participation of each creditor or class of creditors in any reorganization, but the trustee has indicated its opinion, and it seems to me reasonable that the trustee could file a report indicating the possible framework of a plan, leaving to the determination of this Court on a hearing the specific participation that each creditor would have in that plan.

[fol. 83] Mr. Palmer: I think there is a difference of lan-
[fol. 84] guage. What I meant was the listing of creditors into classes, for instance, series classes or state depository classes. However, that is not so important as the 167 report. At that time there was a discussion as to the 167 report being filed in its entirety, and Mr. Townsend said there was no order entered on it, but the Court, in the record, stated.

"I did not remember an order had been entered requiring the filing of a report under Section 167 today, but by September 5th."

But the Court, in that same hearing on August 5th, went on to state,

"I am going to extend the time now for filing the 167 report to October 5th, and the time for the suggestions to be filed with the trustee on the plan to November 5th."

On October 5th there was a further discussion, and Mr. Farmer made an objection to extending the time. The Court, however, extended the time for filing the 167 plan to November 5th.

At the discussion on August 5th the trustee said they wanted six months. Mr. Reinhardt, Mr. Lauritzen and the Court said at that time, which was true and is still true, [fol. 85] that if this company was ever to be reorganized that time was of the essence, and the Court for that reason indicated that if there was to be a reorganization the trustee would, of necessity, have to get his 167 report in promptly, to be followed within one month by suggestions from the contract holders as to the formulation of a plan.

November 5th came and went by and December 5th came and went by, and the trustee was inquired of by me personally as to the filing of the 167 report. That 167 report is of vital importance in this appeal. If it shows that the debtor should not now continue its business, which I think is undisputed by anyone that it should not now continue its face amount securities business, although the court order of June 5th says it shall continue that business and that order has never been changed; the trustee is authorized to continue the debtor in business and there has never been any change in that order.

The Court: Continue the debtor how?

Mr Palmer: It just says to continue in business.

The Court: I would like to see that. I don't know what you refer to.

Mr. Palmer: I think I have the exact order here.

[fol. 86] The Court: I am sure there wasn't any order of this Court that the debtor continue to go ahead and sell contracts, if that is what you mean.

Mr. Palmer: In the second page of the order approving the debtor's petition, entered on June 6th, it was ordered that the trustee give bond, and so forth, and "subject to the authorization and control of this Court, shall carry on, manage, conduct and operate the business of the debtor in its usual course."

The Court: Well, we have never done that, and we have never had any idea that it was to be done, and if there was any question about that and it had been called to the Court's attention the Court would have long ago clarified it; but that didn't and doesn't mean that the business of this concern is to be carried on; they never have carried on any business under this Court except that there have been some payments received and segregated and many of them returned to the persons who sent them in.

Mr. Palmer: I think your Honor, the trustee and ourselves are in full accord on that. However, Mr. Farmer's point is this: that order was entered, and he has repeatedly asked that the trustee file a report stating that it is not [fol. 87] now desirable that its business be continued, which will then wipe out that order, and the trustee has consistently refused to do that.

The Court: That is a peculiar way to get at it. If that had been called to the Court's attention at the first hearing, the Court would have gladly clarified that by saying that it is not to be continued.

Mr. Palmer: I don't know why Mr. Farmer didn't call your attention to it.

The Court: There is no need for the trustee to file a report on that. I will just say, and enter an order, if you want it, that that did not mean and does not now mean that there is to be any business of an original nature carried on by this trustee on behalf of the debtor.

Mr. Palmer: That will dispose of one of Mr. Farmer's motions.

Now, Your Honor, with reference further to the 167 report, it is and has been highly desirable that that report come in as to the questions, and particularly the 169—well, that part may be what the Court says includes this, in 167(5), a report on the properties, liabilities, and financial conditions of the debtor, the operation of its business, [fol. 88] and the desirability of the continuance thereof. I presume what the Court has said will answer that request of Mr. Farmer as to the report to be made by the trustee as to the desirability of the continuance of the business.

The Court: I am frank to say that I don't understand that motion in the way it is being presented. If I have a misunderstanding of it I would like to be told now. Certainly you, Mr. Palmer, and Mr. Farmer as well, know as well as any of us know that the business of this company has never been carried on.

Mr. Palmer: Yes, sir.

The Court: And that, therefore, the only possible occasion for any such motion as is being made now is the fact that you found some language in the original order which you believe authorizes the business to be carried on, and you now, for the first time, point to that and say, "I want to make a motion for the trustee to come in with a report and say whether that is desirable or necessary." Now, I just don't understand that sort of procedure. The reason I say that is because, here is a matter that was open to all of us for more than six months, and certainly could [fol. 89] have been taken care of in some other way than this.

Mr. Palmer: I think here is the trouble, your Honor, that 167, and the entire Chapter Ten, does not specifically contemplate such an unusual type of company as Fidelity; that the ordinary report under 167(5) is for, say a concern making cotton stockings, and the trustee is to report immediately to the Court whether the company ought to go on and continue to make cotton stockings, or close up, and that report is desired. Because of the peculiar kind of company Fidelity is this language is hard to apply to the specific case. We all know, as the Court has said, that from the 1st of January 1941 no one attempted to sell any Fidelity contract, and the trustee, in taking over, and the Court, in authorizing it, did not contemplate that; but I think what Mr. Farmer has in mind—and I am speaking for him in this motion—is that he wants the trustee to go on record as saying that the business that Fidelity was doing is not a business such as the trustee would advise the Court ought to be continued in during the course of the trusteeship.

The Court: The Court is not going to require the trustees [fol. 90] to do that, so that motion is overruled now.

Mr. Palmer: All right, sir; that is one of the things Mr. Farmer wanted a decision on.

Mr. Reinhardt: May I interrupt a minute?

Mr. Palmer: Surely.

Mr. Reinhardt: This may be quibbling, but I don't like to let any possibility of misunderstanding go by. This business of Fidelity's is not so peculiar that it is hard to apply Section 167 to it. There have been other companies very similar to Fidelity that have operated under Chapter Ten and within the framework of 167. The part of 167 that requires the trustee to report on the operation of the debtor's business and the desirability of a continuance thereof, looks to the formulation of a plan of reorganization, as is evidenced by the following language, "And any other matter relevant to the procedure or to the formulation of a plan." Now, the kind of report that that contemplates is a report to the Court saying, "Judge, the business of the debtor should or should not be continued during the pendency of the proceeding, and should or should not be continued after the proceeding when the company is reorganized." The whole thing is the basis [fol. 91] on which the structure of the plan is erected, and for that purpose it seems to me that a report by the trustee as to the desirability of a continuation of the debtor's business is something that is called for under the statute.

The Court: I didn't mean to say that it wasn't. I say that I am not going, by special order, to direct this trustee to do anything about that.

Mr. Reinhardt: I wasn't addressing myself to your Honor's remarks, but rather to Mr. Palmer's, so as to avoid any possibility of confusion as to what the statute calls for. I do think the statute calls for that kind of report on the part of the trustee as part of a report as to what kind of plan, if any, might be feasible.

Mr. Palmer: I am glad of Mr. Reinhardt's explanation. I think it is well taken, and I know that that is what Mr. Farmer wanted the Court to order the trustee to do, which the Court has declined to so order.

The next report he wants is the Court to require the trustee to report under Section 169, which provides that "the trustee shall prepare and file a plan or report of its reasons why a plan cannot be effected, and shall fix a subsequent time for a hearing on such plan or report, and for the con- [fol. 92] sideration of any objections which may be made."

In behalf of that motion and the other part of Mr. Farmer's motions, your Honor, the Court, perhaps not by order, but by dictation into the record, did fix a time in which the desirability of continuing Fidelity should be determined, that is, as a going concern. The Court has indicated that there can be a reorganization without necessarily having Fidelity as a going concern. The trustee, Mr. Farmer feels, should give the Court and contract holders and interested parties under the requirements of Chapter Ten its ideas as to whether Fidelity should be again operated as a going concern or whether it should not be; and Mr. Farmer would like the Court to require, as the Court has already done in the record a number of times, that the trustee do what the Court ordered it to do, file a report.

The Court: Well, the remarks of Mr. Townsend, as attorney for the trustee, have indicated the reasons why the trustee has not gone ahead with that, the chief one being the fact that the state court receivers have been consistently fighting against the administration of the company's affairs in this court; and I am pursuaded by his remarks that the [fol. 93] trustee had good reason for not going ahead any faster than he has, and if the record is in such form that it shows any delinquency on the part of the trustee in failing to file this report, the Court will now extend the time and make it the sixty days from now that Mr. Townsend has said it will take.

. . . . . .

[fol. 94] Mr. T. C. Townsend: Your Honor, I would like to say a word, if Mr. Palmer is through.

[fol. 95] The Court: All right.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: I understood Mr. Palmer to say that the trustee, in all probability, had purposely delayed the proceedings in connection with the filing of the 167 report. This case has already been in the Circuit Court of Appeals on two different phases of it, both times taken there by Mr. Palmer, both times against the trustee. It is there now on the third appeal, and Mr. Palmer has changed his defendant now and proceeds against the debtor and leaves the trustee clear out of it. I want to say a word or two. We are representing the trustee and we are defending the trustee the best we can. From the beginning of the responsibility cast upon the trustee by the petition filed in this case he has done the best he could to comply with the provisions of Chapter Ten and to function under Chapter Ten, under great difficulties and, may I say, harassment on every hand.

Now, just to demonstrate to your Honor the situation that is here today. Mr. Lauritzen, representing his clients, doesn't want any notice sent out at all to the contract holders. I believe I understand him correctly.

Mr. Lauritzen: No, the notice I was speaking of, Mr. [fol. 96] Townsend, was a notice telling them to file their claims.

Mr. Townsend: All right, he doesn't want a notice sent out asking the contract holders to file their claims; it might embarrass the situation up in Wisconsin if it did that, his relationship to his client or the contract holders. Mr. Eney wants a classification of the creditors forthwith, and so does Farmer—or I will modify the term "forthwith" by saying at as early a day as he can get it he thinks that is the thing to do. Mr. Warner says that if anything is done in this case until the jurisdiction of the Court is settled, the contract holders will suffer. Just exactly what Mr. Palmer wants I must confess that I don't know now and for a long time I have not known.

Mr. Palmer: I will be glad to advise you, Mr. Townsend.

Mr. T. C. Townsend: Well, you have tried that for several months, and, it may be my stupidity, but I am not advised yet.

What the trustee has done is this, your Honor. The trustee complied literally with the report required under 164, and went further than that section provided in furnishing [fol. 97] information. Some of the information asked by motion filed here today is already in the 164 report. Some confusion did arise with reference to 167, but it is not necessary to go into that. It is only necessary to say that the trustee did file a partial report under Section 167, and the trustee is now ready and willing to proceed with all reasonable dispatch to file a further report under Section 167 within the time fixed by the Court.

Now, that is all the trustee can do. If there has been any delay in this matter, if it has been postponed beyond the time when these gentlemen think these reports ought to be filed, it is not the fault of the trustee. The position taken here today seems to me simply anomalous and remarkable and not understandable to me. There is an appeal pending in the Circuit Court of Appeals, prosecuted by the state court receivers and others. If that appeal is decided adversely to what this Court decided, all these questions we have been talking about here today are settled, and definitely settled. In other words, they are taking the position that this Court has no jurisdiction to do anything, the trustee has no jurisdiction to do anything, never has had [fols. 98-113] and doesn't have now, and "we are going to win this appeal and they won't have in the future"—that is the position they take. On the other hand they do this, they are asking this trustee to proceed to make reports and file them in this Court under a proceedings which these gentlemen say—some of them, at least; I don't say it is all of them—that this Court has no jurisdiction over at all.

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT.

To the Honorable the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Your petitioners, Fidelity Assurance Association, a corporation, Debtor, and Central Trust Company, Trustee for Fidelity Assurance Association, respectfully pray that a writ of certiorari issue to review a decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit entered on June 16, 1942, reversing an order of the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia which order had approved the petition of Fidelity Assurance Association for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, and remanding the proceeding to the said District Court with directions to dismiss the petition. An order staying the mandate has been entered by the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 398).

Opinions Below.

The opinion of the District Court is a part of the record (R. 3-38) and is reported in 42 Fed. Supp. 973. The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals is a part of the record (R. 363-388) and has not yet been reported.

Jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under Section 240(a) of the Judicial Code, as amended by the Act of February 13, 1925. (28 U. S. C. A. 347) and Section 24(c) of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 47(c)).

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals was entered on June 16, 1942, (R. 387) and a petition for rehearing was denied by order entered by said court on July 22, 1942 (R. 397).

Statutes Involved.

The issues involve the construction and application to the facts of this case of the Bankruptcy Act, particularly Section 4 of Chapter III and Sections 106(3), 144, and 146 of Chapter X, and of the Investment Company Act of 1940, particularly Sections 2(a)(15) and (17), 3(a)(2), 3(c)(3) and (6), 4(1), 28, 52, of Title I (15 U. S. C. A. 80(a)) and Sections 29(a) and (b) of Title I (11 U. S. C. A. 107(f), 72(a)). The most pertinent provisions of these statutes, not set forth in the Argument, are printed herewith as Appendix A. Article 9, Section 7 of Article 3, Stats., some of which are contained in the record (R. 40-59; 75-89; 203-209) are also involved.

Summary Statement of the Matter Involved.

The material facts are presented in some detail in the opinion of the District Court (R. 3) and in the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 363). Condensed for the purposes of this petition, the facts of the case and the nature of the proceeding are as follows.

Nature of the Proceeding.

This proceeding arises under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act and was instituted by the filing of a voluntary petition for reorganization by Fidelity Assurance Association, hereinafter sometimes referred to as "Fidelity", in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia on June 6, 1941.

Organization and Business of Fidelity.

Fidelity was incorporated under the laws of the State of West Virginia, on April 11, 1911, under the name of Fidelity Investment and Loan Association and was authorized by its charter to buy, sell, and deal in stocks, bonds, and real estate (C. C. A. Opinion, R. 364).

Fidelity's charter was amended in November, 1912, and its name was changed to Fidelity Investment Association. By the amended charter it was authorized to receive payments on annuity contracts in fixed installments or otherwise and to sell certificates, bonds, or other investment securities of any kind on installment or any other plan of payment (C. C. A. Opinion, R. 364). A copy of this charter is, for convenience, printed herewith as Appendix B.

Under these charter powers from November, 1912 until December 31, 1940, Fidelity was engaged in selling its own securities in the form of investment contracts variously known as annuities, income contracts, or, more recently, face-amount installment certificates, and in investing the funds received from the purchaser. This activity brought Fidelity within the scope of Article 9, entitled Annuity Contracts, of Chapter 33, entitled Insurance and Annuity Contracts, of the Code of West Virginia requiring a license from the Auditor of the State of West Virginia, ex-officio Insurance Commissioner, and by the provisions of Section 3 of said Article 9 (Appendix A herewith) the company was required to deposit securities with the State Treasurer as therein provided. Deposits in lesser amounts were also made with the statutory officials of some fourteen other states pursuant to the respective statutes, of the same general character as the West Virginia statute, of those States. Insurance companies are expressly excluded from the provisions of the said Article 9 of Chapter 33 by Section 1 thereof. Fidelity did business in fourteen other states which required no such deposits. A table of the deposits by States, as of the date of the filing of the petition in this proceeding, is found in the Opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 366), from which it will be noted that the deposits in West Virginia are substantially in excess of the liabilities to West Virginia creditors.

In the various States the activities of Fidelity were regulated by various officials or departments: in some, the securities department; in some, the banking department; and, in others, the insurance department (R. 330).

While the various types of investment contracts sold by Fidelity differ in some respects, they are all alike in providing for monthly, semi-annual or annual payments of specified sums, of which a sufficient portion was to be set aside in a reserve fund which was to produce the sum required to pay the purchaser the amount of money agreed upon in the contract. The earlier contracts contained no statement as to the basis of the reserve fund. Of the later contracts, some provided for reserves on a 4½% basis and some on a 4% basis. All provided that the reserve fund so set aside should "be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia" (R. 6-7). In each of the contracts there was a provision whereby, with slight variation in language as to each particular class or series of contracts, Fidelity agreed to create and maintain a reserve fund for such particular class or series from payments made on contracts of that particular class or series, which reserve fund was to be used for the discharge of its liabilities on that particular class or series of contracts; and on its books Fidelity kept these various series funds separate and distinct (R. 9). Some of these series funds, the later and larger ones, are solvent. As a whole Fidelity is about 90% solvent (R. 30-31). It has approximately 88,000 contract holders, whose individual claims are relatively small (R. 366).

About 1934 Fidelity issued a contract known as the "Income Reserve Contract Series B", commonly referred to as the "Series B Contract", the sale of which from that time on until December 31, 1940, constituted the major portion of its business. The Series B Contracts contained an optional provision, "Section 6", under the terms of which Fidelity had arranged with an insurance company for life insurance under the group and/or individual legal reserve life insurance policy covering the original registered holder of the contract, provided he be in good health and be accepted by the insurance company, the said life insurance policy providing that upon the death of the registered holder the insurance company would pay to Fidelity the amount required by Fidelity to declare the contract fully paid. This Series B Contract, when the said insurance feature option was exercised, called for the payment of larger periodic installments. Fidelity arranged with the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company to issue the said insurance policies (R. 6; 368; 357-361).

In December, 1938, the Securities and Exchange Commission filed a bill for injunction against Fidelity in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan alleging that Fidelity was engaged in acts and practices in the sale of its securities which constituted violations of the provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, and in that cause a consent decree was entered, among other things, enjoining Fidelity from failing to meet the deposit requirements of the several states. In the same month a suit for the appointment of receivers was brought by certain contract holders of Fidelity in the United States District Court for the Northern District of West Virginia based on the facts developed in the suit in Michigan; but the bill was dismissed by the District Court for the reason that insolvency was not established, and its action was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 369).

The Investment Company Act of 1940.

Congress enacted the Investment Company Act of 1940, effective as to face-amount certificate companies on January 1, 1941 (54 Stat. 789, 11 U. S. C. A. 80a-52) (R. 366), wherein Congress found that investment companies issuing face-amount installment certificates were affected "with a national public interest" (R. 366) and enacted regulations to govern the sale of face-amount certificates, with which it was immediately apparent that Fidelity could not comply (R. 367).

Attempted Extra Judicial Reorganization.

In a futile effort to meet the situation, on December 31, 1940, Fidelity's corporate charter was amended, and its objects and powers were stated to be, "to issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and connected therewith, and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities", and its name was changed to Fidelity Assurance Association (R. 367). Fidelity had not previously had charter powers to issue contracts of insurance.

Under the West Virginia statutes (Code 33-9-1 and 33-2-12, Appendix A herewith) Fidelity's license, under said Article 9, to issue face-amount installment certificates would not expire until April 1, 1941. The Auditor of West Virginia and ex-officio Insurance Commissioner issued Fidelity a license as an insurance company for the period from January 1, 1941, to April 1, 1941, but with the requirement on the part of the Auditor and the agreement on the part of Fidelity that no insurance would be sold and no new annuity contracts would be sold (R. 370). Except as it may be contended that the sending out of certain riders, hereafter mentioned under the subtitle "Proceedings in the Circuit Court of Appeals", to be attached to certain Series B Contracts, containing Section 6, already in existence, were in violation of the agreement, Fidelity observed the agreement and sold no insurance contracts, sold no new annuity contracts, did no business by virtue of this license, and no changes were made in the books of Fidelity, no transfers were made and no surplus was set up (R. 357).

State Suits.

Fidelity made application for a license as an insurance company for the year commencing April 1, 1941, but the Auditor of West Virginia withheld the license applied for and on April 4, 1941, directed Fidelity to discontinue business. On April 11, 1941, the Auditor, pursuant to Chapter 33, Article 2, Section 5 of the West Virginia Code, with a view to rehabilitation (R. 252-253), filed a bill in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County to take possession of the assets of Fidelity, and, without objection by Fidelity, receivers were appointed by said court. The Auditor of West Virginia notified corresponding officials in the other states in which Fidelity was doing business and corresponding proceedings were promptly instituted in eleven other states (R. 370-371).

Proceedings in the District Court.

On June 6, 1941, Fidelity filed its petition in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia alleging insolvency and praying for reorganization under the provisions of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. On the same day, by ex parte order, the petition was approved and your petitioner, Central Trust Company, was appointed trustee. On June 10, 1941, the District Court directed the various state officials and court receivers to deliver to the trustee all property of the debtor in their hands. On August 9, 1941, while the plenary hearing was in progress and after certain answers and motions of intervenors had been filed, the District Court modified the orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941, requiring the state officials and receivers to turn over to the trustee the assets of the debtor by realizing the turn-over requirements but enjoining state officials and receivers from disposing of such assets (R. 319-334). The West Virginia receivers, under protest, and the Ohio receiver, without protest, turned over to the trustee the property of the debtor in their custody, while the other state officials and receivers generally retained possession of the deposits in their custody (R. 371).

The Auditor of West Virginia, the receivers appointed in the state court proceeding in West Virginia, officials of other states, receivers appointed by other state courts, and others were permitted to intervene and file answers and motions controverting the allegations of the petition and denying the jurisdiction of the District Court for various reasons, among others, that Fidelity was an insurance company and not subject to the provisions of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the petition was not filed in good faith; and the intervenors moved that the petition be dismissed and the turn-over orders be vacated (R. 3-4; 16-17).

A protracted plenary hearing was had in the District Court after which the District Court found that Fidelity was not an insurance corporation, that the petition was filed in good faith, that the principal assets of Fidelity had been in the Southern District of West Virginia during the six months next preceding the filing of the petition, and that the filing of the petition, though not properly authorized originally, had been ratified by proper corporate action; and the District Court, by decree of January 5, 1942, approved the petition (R. 18-40).

During the hearing, many witnesses testified that Fidelity could and should be reorganized (R. 265-291). Some memoranda looking toward the formulation of plans were presented (R. 383), but no definite plan was acted upon by the District Court.

Proceedings in the Circuit Court of Appeals.

The respondents, other than the Securities and Exchange Commission, appealed from the decree of the District Court to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. The respondent, Edgar B. Sims, Auditor and ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia, filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals a petition for the remand of the case to the District Court and, for the first time, by said petition for remand, introduced into the record a showing that on December 31, 1940, Fidelity had sent out to the holders of Series B Contracts containing Section 6 a letter and certain riders in duplicate, one to be signed and returned to Fidelity and the other to be attached to the contract, by which Fidelity would assume the insurance obligations of such Series B Contracts (R. 339; 341; 342), and in the hearing in the Circuit Court of Appeals it was stipulated that 9,802 of these riders had been signed by the contract holders and returned to Fidelity (R. 361). Fidelity did not in fact assume such insurance obligations for the reason that Fidelity was never authorized by the Auditor of West Virginia to engage in the insurance business (R. 356), and the insurance obligations continued to be carried by the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company as before (R. 357).

The Circuit Court of Appeals found that Fidelity was an insurance company, not eligible for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the petition had not been filed in good faith, apparently on the grounds that it was unreasonable to expect that any plan of reorganization could be effected (Sec. 146(3)) and that the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the prior proceedings pending in the state courts (Sec. 146(4)), reversed the judgment of the District Court and remanded the cause with instructions to the District Court to dismiss the petition (R. 372-387).

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals reversing the decree of the District Court and remanding the cause with instructions to dismiss, was entered on the 16th day of June, 1942 (R. 387). The debtor, on the 13th day of July, 1942, presented its petition for a rehearing (R. 389) to the Circuit Court of Appeals, which petition was denied by order of July 22, 1942 (R. 397).

Upon application for a stay of the mandate, by assent of counsel, the Circuit Court of Appeals entered an order on July 22, 1942, staying the mandate upon the condition that this petition for certiorari be presented to this Court within thirty days, and modified the order of the District Court of August 9, 1941, so as to permit the various state officials and receivers to sell assets in their custody for the purpose of conserving the estate (R. 398). Learning that some of the respondents considered the modification of the order of August 9, 1941, by the order of July 22, 1942, as a license to sell the assets in their custody for liquidation, your petitioners, on August 7, 1942, filed a motion in the Circuit Court of Appeals for modification of the amendatory order of July 22, 1942, so as to make it clear that the consent to the sale or exchange of assets was for conservation only and not for liquidation (R. 401). The necessity of sending the record to this Court in time to permit the presentation of this petition within thirty days from July 22, 1942, prevented an opportunity for a ruling on said motion by the Circuit Court of Appeals, but, if your petitioners are informed that in disregard of the purposes and intent of the modification order of July 22, 1942, and pending action upon the motion for clarification of August 7, 1942, any of the respondents contemplate selling the assets in their custody for liquidation, these petitioners will ask for a hearing upon said motion.

Questions Presented.

(1) Is Fidelity Assurance Association an insurance corporation within the Bankruptcy Act and particularly within Chapter X thereof?

(a) Has not Congress by the Investment Company Act of 1940 definitely classified face-amount certificate companies, such as Fidelity (and, we may say, Fidelity itself (R. 366)) as investment companies subject to bankruptcy as distinguished from insurance companies excluded from bankruptcy?

(b) Under the Bankruptcy Act, and particularly Chapter X thereof, is the character of a corporation to be determined by its charter powers, or by the character of its business activities and its obligations sought to be reorganized?

(c) Under the Bankruptcy Act, and particularly Chapter X thereof, if a corporation is to be classified as within or without the Bankruptcy Act by its charter powers, is it to be classified by the charter powers under which it has done business, acquired and managed its assets, and incurred its obligations, or is it to be classified by recently acquired charter powers, sought for the purpose of extra judicial reorganization, under which it has done no business other than such acts as have merely carried on for a short time its previously established business, and has done no other acts except such as were incident to an abortive attempt to reorganize extra judicially?

(2) Does it appear from the record that the petition of the debtor has not been filed in good faith, as the term is employed in Section 146 of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act?

(a) In advance of the presentation of a plan of reorganization, the presentation of which has been rendered impracticable by litigation in which the basic jurisdiction of the District Court has been questioned, and in advance of consideration of any plan by the District Court, can it be said that the record shows that "it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected"?

(b) Does it appear from the record that the several twelve prior proceedings in the courts of twelve different States (R. 370-371), with their respective territorial limitations, will subserve the interests of the creditors better than a single proceeding, in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia, in which the court would have jurisdiction over the assets of Fidelity wherever they may be located? (Bankruptcy Act, Sec. 111; 11 U. S. C. A. 511.)

(c) Does it appear from the record that these several State court proceedings will afford the creditors the safeguards provided by the Investment Company Act of 1940 and Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, in a subject matter which the Congress has expressly found to be affected with a national public interest? (Investment Company Act of 1940, Title I, Sec. 1(a), 29(b).)

(3) Should not this Court, upon the record, reverse the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals and affirm the decree of the District Court approving the petition?

Reasons Relied On for the Allowance of the Writ.

(1) The Circuit Court of Appeals classified Fidelity as an insurance company contrary to the unmistakable classification of corporations of the type of Fidelity by Congress as face-amount certificate investment companies, and not as insurance companies, under the Investment Company Act of 1940 (Argument, p. 19 hereof).

(2) The Circuit Court of Appeals has decided an important question of federal law arising in the administration of the Bankruptcy Act, and particularly Chapter X thereof, which has not been, but should be, settled by this Court, namely, what is an insurance corporation within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. Indeed, there is no decision of this Court laying down the principles by which corporations excluded from bankruptcy, expressly or by implication, are to be classified (Argument, p. 24 hereof).

(3) The Circuit Court of Appeals has decided the federal question of what is an insurance corporation within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act in a way that is probably in conflict with applicable decisions of this Court. There is no decision of this Court deciding what is an insurance corporation, or laying down the principles of classification, within the meaning and purposes of the Bankruptcy Act; but in other situations and applications this Court has laid down the principle of classification by corporate activities. If this principle of classification be applicable under the Bankruptcy Act, then the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is in conflict therewith (Bowers v. Lawyers Mortgage Company (1931), 285 U. S. 182; U. S. v. Home Title Insurance Co. (1931), 285 U. S. 191), (Argument, p. 26 hereof).

(4) There is no decision of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia classifying Fidelity, or other corporations engaged in like activities, as or as not an insurance company, but it is believed that the statutes of West Virginia unmistakably classify Fidelity as a corporation other than an insurance corporation, and the Circuit Court of Appeals, in attempting to apply the state classification test to Fidelity, has classified Fidelity as an insurance corporation contrary to the plain West Virginia statutory classification as a corporation other than an insurance corporation (Argument, p. 28 hereof).

(5) In deciding that Fidelity is an insurance corporation, the Circuit Court of Appeals has laid down principles of classification which conflict with the principles of classification laid down by other Circuit Courts of Appeals in considering what corporations, including insurance corporations, are excluded from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

Since the amendment of the Bankruptcy Act in 1910 and in 1938, some Circuit Courts of Appeals have adopted what is called the "state classification" test or principle, but other Circuit Courts of Appeals seem to apply the "corporate activities" test or principle, and some decisions which purport to apply the "State classification" test or principle lean heavily upon the corporate activities factor (Argument, p. 29 hereof).

(6) If the meaning of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected is based upon the apparent holding that there can be no reorganization within the meaning of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act unless it be the rehabilitation of Fidelity as a going concern, and we believe that is the proper interpretation of the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, then the decision is in conflict with the decisions of other Circuit Courts of Appeals (Argument, p. 38 hereof).

(7) An inquiry into what facts and circumstances lead to a conclusion that the interests of creditors will be best subserved by the prior State court proceedings presents a Federal question for the determination of which the principles have not been, but should be, settled by this Court (Argument, p. 41, hereof).

WHEREFORE your petitioners respectfully pray that a writ of certiorari be issued out of and under the seal of this Honorable Court, directed to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, commanding that court to certify and send to this Court for its review and determination, on a day certain to be therein named, a full and complete transcript of the record and all of the proceedings in the case numbered on its docket No. 4923 and entitled "Edgar B. Sims, Auditor of the State of West Virginia, and Ex-Officio Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia; Ross B. Thomas and H. Isaiah Smith, West Virginia State Court Receivers; Banking Commission of Wisconsin; Chas. R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance and Permanent Receiver for debtor corporation in and for the State of Iowa; John B. Gontrum, Insurance Commissioner of the State of Maryland; Dewey S. Godfrey, Missouri State Court Receiver; and L. H. Brooks, Trustee, Frederic Leake and A. L. Goldberg, Jr., Trustee, Appellants, versus Fidelity Assurance Association, a corporation, Debtor, Appellee", and that the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit may be reversed and the decision of the District Court affirmed and that your petitioners may have such other and further relief in the premises as to this Court may seem proper.

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI.

A statement of the case has been given in the petition and, to avoid duplication, is not repeated.

Summary of Argument.

I.

Congress, by the Investment Company Act of 1940, has classified Fidelity as a corporation other than an insurance corporation.

II.

The Circuit Court of Appeals has decided an important question of Federal law arising in the administration of the Bankruptcy Act, and particularly Chapter X thereof, which has not been, but should be, settled by this Court; namely, what is an insurance corporation within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act.

III.

The Circuit Court of Appeals has decided the Federal question of what is an insurance corporation within the Bankruptcy Act in a way that is probably in conflict with applicable decisions of this Court. There is no decision of this Court deciding what is an insurance corporation, or laying down the principles of classification within the meaning and purposes of the Bankruptcy Act, but in other situations and applications this Court has laid down the principle of classification by corporate activities. If this principle of classification be applicable under the Bankruptcy Act, then the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is in conflict therewith.

IV.

There is no decision of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia classifying Fidelity, or other corporations engaged in like activities, as or as not an insurance company, but it is believed that the statutes of West Virginia unmistakably classify Fidelity as a corporation other than an insurance corporation, and the Circuit Court of Appeals has classified Fidelity as an insurance corporation contrary to the plain West Virginia statutory classification.

V.

In deciding that Fidelity is an insurance corporation the Circuit Court of Appeals has laid down principles of classification which conflict with the principles of classification laid down by other circuit courts of appeals in considering what corporations, including insurance corporations, are excluded from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

VI.

If the meaning of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected is based upon the apparent holding that there can be no reorganization within the meaning of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act unless it be the rehabilitation of Fidelity as a going concern, and we believe that is the proper interpretation of the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, then the decision is in conflict with the decisions of other circuit courts of appeals.

VII.

An inquiry into what facts and circumstances lead to a conclusion that the interests of creditors will be best subserved by the prior State court proceedings presents a Federal question for the determination of which principles have not been, but should be, settled by this Court.

ARGUMENT.

Except for specific references otherwise, we shall discuss Fidelity, as to both corporate powers and business activities, from the point of view of its business from 1912 to December 31, 1940, that being the period of its actively engaging in the business involved, confident that its character was not, in fact, changed by its efforts at extra judicial reorganization between December 31, 1940, and June 6, 1941.

I.

Congress Has Classified Companies Such as Fidelity as Face-amount Certificate Investment Companies Rather Than as Insurance Companies.

If the Congress has classified corporations of the type of Fidelity as companies other than insurance, rather than as insurance companies, then the judicial classification of Fidelity as an insurance company by the Circuit Court of Appeals is clearly erroneous.

Unquestionably, Congress has the power to classify corporations for the purpose of Federal legislation, and when Congress has made such classification, in the absence of constitutional objections, none of which is suggested by the record in this case, the courts should follow the classification made by the Congress. (In re Supreme Lodge of Masons, 286 F. 180, 183; In re Wisconsin Cooperative Milk Pool, 119 F. (2d) 999, 1002, Cert. Den. 314 U. S. 655.) Kansas v. Hayes, 62 F. (2d) 597, 599.

A reading of the Investment Company Act of 1940 (Aug. 22, 1940, Chap. 686, Title I, 15 U. S. C. A., 80a, 1-52), we believe, shows not only that Congress has classified

Fidelity as a face-amount certificate company under the Investment Company Act and as a corporation other than an insurance corporation, but that this Congressional classification was made for the purposes, among others, of the Bankruptcy Act (Aug. 22, 1940, Chapt. 686, Sec. 29 (a), (b); 11 U. S. C. A., 72 (a), 107 (f)).

Congress has defined a "face-amount certificate" as follows:

> "(a) When used in this subchapter and sections 72 (a), last sentence, and 107 (f) of Title 11, unless the context otherwise requires——
>
> " • • •
>
> "(15) 'Face-amount certificate' means any certificate, investment contract, or other security which represents an obligation on the part of its issuer to pay a stated or determinable sum or sums at a fixed or determinable date or dates more than twenty-four months after the date of issuance, in consideration of the payment of periodic installments of a stated or determinable amount (which security shall be known as a face-amount certificate of the 'installment type'); or any security which represents a similar obligation on the part of a face-amount certificate company, the consideration for which is the payment of a single lump sum (which security shall be known as a 'fully paid' face-amount certificate)."
> 15 U. S. C. A., § 80a-2 (a) (15).

Congress has defined an "investment company" as including the business of issuing face-amount certificates:

> "(a) When used in this subchapter and sections 72(a), last sentence, and 107(f) of Title 11, 'investment company' means any issuer which——
>
> " • • •
> "(2) is engaged or proposes to engage in the business of issuing face-amount certificates of the installment type, or has been engaged in such business and has any such certificate outstanding; or

"• • •"

15 U. S. C. A. § 80a-3 (a)(2).

In fact, the "face-amount certificate company" is one of the three principal classes of investment companies:

> "For the purposes of this subchapter and sections 72(a), last sentence, and 107(f) of Title 11, investment companies are divided into three principal classes, defined as follows:
>
> "(1) 'Face-amount certificate company' means an investment company which is engaged or proposes to engage in the business of issuing face-amount certificates of the installment type, or which has been engaged in such business and has any such certificate outstanding.
>
> "• • •"

15 U. S. C. A. § 80a-4 (1).

Congress has gone further. The Investment Company Act of 1940 expressly amended certain sections of the Bankruptcy Act in a way to make specific application of the Bankruptcy Act to face-amount certificate companies. It prescribed a particular method for the selection of the trustee in bankruptcy for face-amount certificate companies:

> "• • • If the bankrupt is a face-amount certificate company, as defined in section 80a-4 of Title 15, the court alone shall make the appointment; but the court shall not make such appointment without first notifying the Securities and Exchange Commission and giving it an opportunity to be heard."

Aug. 22, 1940, c. 686, Title I, § 29(b); 11 U. S. C. A., § 72a.

The Investment Company Act particularly amends the Bankruptcy Act with respect to deposits or transfers of securities by face-amount certificate companies (Aug. 22, 1940, c. 686, Title I, § 29(a); 11 U. S. C. A., § 107f (1) (a); (Appendix A), manifesting an unmistakable Congressional intent that face-amount certificate companies be within the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

In fact, counsel for the West Virginia respondents, in giving a summary of Federal legislation affecting Fidelity, say that Congress provided in § 29 of the Investment Company Act for "bankruptcy of face-amount certificate companies" (R. 162), we may add, anticipating the difficulties which such companies would experience when the Investment Company Act should become effective.

The Investment Company Act does not stop with these definitions of face-amount certificate companies but, for purposes of contrasting insurance companies with face-amount certificate companies and other investment companies and of exempting insurance companies from the provisions of the Investment Company Act and of bringing face-amount certificate companies within the provisions of the Investment Company Act and also within the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, defines an insurance company as follows:

> "(a) When used in this subchapter and sections 72 (a), last sentence, and 107 (f) of Title 11, unless the context otherwise requires—
>
> "• • •
>
> "(17) 'Insurance company' means a company which is organized as an insurance company, whose primary and predominant business activity is the writing of insurance or the reinsuring of risks underwritten by insurance companies, and which is subject to supervision by the insurance commissioner or a similar official or agency of a State; or any receiver or similar official or any liquidating agent for such a company, in his capacity as such."

15 U. S. C. A., § 80a-2 (a) (17).

Under this definition of an insurance company, even if the sending out by Fidelity of the riders to the Series B Contracts having the § 6 provisions were the making of insurance contracts as was concluded by the Circuit Court of Appeals, which we do not admit, yet, Fidelity would not be within the definition of an insurance company for the reason that, admittedly, the insurance features of the Series B Contracts were but incidental to the primary and predominant business of issuing face-amount certificate contracts.

The Investment Company Act (15 U. S. C. A., 80a-3 (c) (3)), excludes an insurance company from the definition of an investment company, but face-amount certificate companies not only are not so excluded but are expressly defined as investment companies and as one of the three principal divisions thereof (15 U. S. C. A. 80a 3(a) (2), 4 (1)).

Section 3 of the Investment Company Act (15 U. S. C. A., 80a-3 (c) (6)) shows that the issuing of face-amount certificates is one of the principal earmarks of an investment company.

In this particular case, Fidelity is not exempted from the provisions of the Investment Company Act or of the Bankrutpcy Act by Section 6 of the Investment Company Act (15 U. S. C. A., 80a-6 (a) (2)) for the reason there was no proceeding pending in a court of the United States or of a State in which a receiver was appointed for Fidelity, prior to the effective date of said Investment Company Act, which was, as to face-amount certificate companies, January 1, 1941 (Aug. 22, 1940, c. 686, Title I, § 53, 15 U. S. C. A., § 80a-52). The State court proceedings were not instituted until April 11, 1941 (R. 12).

For the purposes of discussion of some of the points hereinafter, it is significant to observe that by the very definition of an insurance company in the Investment Company Act (15 U. S. C. A., 80a-2 (a) (17)), the classification of a corporation as an insurance company, is made dependent upon the company's "primary and predominant business activity", which, in order that the company be so classified, must be "the writing of insurance or the reinsuring of risks underwritten by insurance companies, * * *", thus, by clear implication, excluding as tests or principles of classification the mere charter powers, or the nature or source of the charter of the corporation, even though to be so classified the corporation must be "organized as an insurance company". We do not mean to suggest that these factors might not, in proper cases, have some significance.

We earnestly submit that Congress has classified Fidelity as a face-amount certificate investment company and has, for the purposes of the classification, including the purposes of bankruptcy, excluded Fidelity from classification as an insurance company; and that any judicial consideration of the classification of Fidelity, beyond reference to and analysis of the Investment Company Act of 1940, is quite afield the scope of proper judicial inquiry.

A Federal Question Which Has Not Been, but Should Be, Settled by This Court.

In the administration of a Federal statute the meaning of the language used, in this case the meaning of the words "insurance corporation", whether the meaning be ascertained by Congressional classification, by a Congressional intent that the classification be determined by State laws, or otherwise, presents a Federal question. So far as this case is concerned, we are confident that the Investment Company Act and the amendments made to the Bankruptcy Act thereby make the question rather academic. Yet, it is a Federal question which this Court has not settled, but, we believe, should settle.

Considering the variety of powers that are contained in the charters of the many corporations organized under the varying laws of the several States, the multiplicity of activities frequently engaged in by a single corporation, the differences in the laws of the several States relative to the issuance of corporate charters, together with the expanding field of Federal legislation, it is inevitable that questions of this general type will recur frequently. We believe that the principles of classification of corporations within the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act and especially the reorganization provisions thereof, Chapter X, should be settled by this Court.

This general question has arisen frequently in the circuit courts of appeals and there seems to be appreciable confusion in determining the principles by which corporations should be classified, and even more confusion in applying the principles selected to the facts of the several cases. Some of the circuit courts of appeals, including that of the Fourth Circuit in the case at bar, have disclaimed the applicability of the principles for the classification of corporations laid down by this Court in administering tax statutes.

These considerations suggest the desirability of clarifying this question, particularly as it arises under the Bankruptcy Act and under the Investment Company Act of 1940.

III.

Decision of Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, Probably in Conflict with Applicable Decisions of This Court.

If, in order that it may be said that the decision of a circuit court of appeals is in conflict with an applicable decision of this Court, it is necessary that the decision of this Court relate to the same laws and the same subject matter as were considered by the circuit court of appeals, then it cannot be said that, with respect to the classifying of Fidelity as an insurance or other company, the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is in conflict with any decision of this Court, since there is no such specific decision of this Court.

This Court has decided what is, and what is not, an insurance company under the tax statutes. (Bowers v. Lawyers Mortgage Company, 285 U. S. 182; United States v. Home Title Insurance Company, 285 U. S. 191.) The classification in these cases was made by this Court on the basis of the activities of the corporations involved. We have already noted that the definition of an insurance company in the Investment Company Act requires that the classification of the company as, or as not, an insurance company be determined by the primary and predominant business activities of the company; although it is also specifically required that, in order to be an insurance corporation, the corporation be chartered as such.

In the Bowers and Home Title cases, the corporations involved were incorporated under the insurance laws of New York. Based upon their respective activities, the corporation in the Bowers case was held not to be an insurance company, while the corporation in the Home Title case was held to be an insurance corporation. In the case at bar Fidelity did not even have insurance charter powers until its charter was amended December 31, 1940, in an effort to effect an extra judicial reorganization.

We fully appreciate that there are differences in the purposes and objectives of the various tax statutes and of the Bankruptcy Act and that it may plausibly be insisted, as has been done (In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Company, 75 F. (2d) 984, 985, Cert. Den. 296 U. S. 594), that the principles of the Bowers and Home Title cases have no applicability when the interpretation of the Bankruptcy Act is under consideration. We may inquire, however, whether there is any real basis for such distinction. The question arises in each instance in substantially the same way, the application of a Federal statute using the phrase "insurance corporation" but providing no specific definition of the term. There would seem to be no more reason for excluding non-insurance creditors of Fidelity from the benefits of the Bankruptcy Act, even though upon petition of Fidelity itself, merely because Fidelity may have had, for a short while, insurance charter powers which it exercised only slightly, or not at all, than it would be to exclude the government from collecting taxes on certain business activities carried on by a corporation just because the corporation happened to have other charter powers, not so taxed, or engaged in the taxable business activities ultra vires.

We, therefore, believe that the corporate activities afford a sound and applicable basis for classifying corporations in bankruptcy, as well as in tax matters, and that mere incidental activities should be no more controlling of major activities in bankruptcy than in taxation, and that the Bowers and Home Title cases establishing the principle of classification by corporate activities are applicable decisions of this Court and that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, is in conflict therewith.

Especially would these principles seem to be applicable in this case where the question is whether Fidelity is an investment company or an insurance company and by the Investment Company Act, which seeks to make the distinction, the primary and predominant activities of the corporation are in the main made determinative, even though Fidelity may have had, for a short time, an insurance charter under which it did nothing except to try to effect an extra judicial reorganization. In enacting the Investment Company Act of 1940 definition of an insurance company, no doubt the Congress considered and adopted the principles of the decisions of the Bowers and Home Title cases. The definition adopted would so indicate.

IV.

Classification by State of West Virginia.

It is not questioned that from 1912 to December 31, 1940, Fidelity operated under the provisions of Article 9, Chapter 33 of the West Virginia Code (R. 364). Section 1 of said article (Appendix A) expressly provides:

> "* * * Provided, however, That this article shall not be construed as applying to persons, associations or corporations engaged in selling merchandise in installments, insurance companies, foreign or domestic, duly authorized to do business in this State, * * *"

If it can be said that the State classification of Fidelity is that Fidelity is an insurance company, then, by the very express terms of the article, enacted for the supervision and regulation of annuity companies, annuity companies are excluded as insurance companies from the operations of the statute, rendering the article, for all practical purposes, nugatory and without subject matter upon which to operate.

Again, the West Virginia statutes under which the State court proceeding was instituted in West Virginia (Code 33-9-10, 33-2-45, Appendix A) provides that the insurance commissioner shall have the same authority in this respect over annuity corporations as he has over insurance companies. If Fidelity were an insurance company, there would be no reason for the enactment of any statute to make specifically applicable to annuity corporations the statutory provisions already applicable to insurance companies. That activities of Fidelity were under the supervision of the insurance commissioner does not make Fidelity an insurance company (Capital Endowment Company v. Kroeger, C. C. A. 6, 1936, 86 F. (2d) 976. See also In re Prudence, 79 F. (2d) 77. Cert. Den. 296 U. S. 646.

In view of these statutes, how can it be said that the State of West Virginia has classified Fidelity as an insurance company? True, it is provided that life insurance companies may issue annuity contracts (West Virginia Code, 33-3-7; Appendix A), but that lacks much of saying that annuity corporations may issue life insurance or that annuity corporations are insurance companies. West Virginia has provided different statutes regulating life insurance (Chapter 33, Article 3) and annuity contracts (Chapter 33, Article 9). (Compare Gamble v. Daniel, C. C. A. 8, 1930, 39 F. (2d) 447.) Cert. Den. 282 U. S. 848.

We believe that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is in conflict with the plain classification of Fidelity as a corporation other than an insurance company by the State of West Virginia.

V.

Conflict with Decisions of Other Circuit Courts of Appeal and Inconclusiveness of Decisions of the Circuit Courts of Appeal.

The problem of classifying corporations as within or without the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act has arisen frequently in the several circuit courts of appeal. Without questioning the conclusions reached in the many cases, other than that reached by the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case at bar, we assert that these decisions are replete with conflicts and inconsistencies in their efforts to settle the principles by which corporations for the purposes of bankruptcy are to be classified and in applying the selected principles to the facts of the several cases. In some cases conflicting principles have been applied even in the same decision. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case at bar conflicts, in whole or in part, with decisions of other circuit courts of appeal.

Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, which provided that "• • • any corporation engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, mining or mercantile pursuits • • •" was subject to bankruptcy, the business activities of the corporation were looked to and were determinative in deciding whether or not the corporation was subject to the Act. Since the amendments of 1910 and 1938, specifically exempting municipal, railroad, insurance and banking corporations, and building and loan associations, the business activities rule, as such, has been affirmed in some cases (i. e.: In re Supreme Lodge of the Masons Annuity, D. C. Ga., 1923, 286 Fed. 180; In re Wisconsin Cooperative Milk Pool, C. C. A. 7, 119 F. (2d) 999, Cert. Den. 314 U. S. 658), and the business activities have been leaned upon heavily, we believe the rule applied in fact, in other cases nominally predicating the decision upon the "charter power" or "State classification" rules, as noted hereafter.

Some decisions, noting that these exempted corporations were not defined by the Act, have taken the position that the purpose of the amendment was to eliminate the factual uncertainties incident to a determination of the principal business of a corporation participating in more than one business activity, and to make the exceptions specific of certain corporations, which, in the absence of Congressional definition, should be selected according to the classifications given them by the States, noting also that the exempted corporations were generally regarded as "affected with a public interest" and regulated by the States, from which it was inferred that the Congress had determined to leave them for State administration as well as regulation. (Typical of these cases is: In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Company, C. C. A. 2, 1935, 75 F. (2d) 984, 985, quoted from at length in the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case at bar.)

This is a very plausible theory, not unsupported by some logic, and one which has received rather wide acceptance, at least in lip service, as a "State classification" rule, but one which has failed to eliminate many of the uncertainties attributable to the "corporate activities" rule, and one which we believe, if so far as it is based upon Congressional exclusion because of State supervision, certainly as to face-amount certificate companies, Congress has rejected by the enactment of the Investment Company Act of 1940.

In the State classification decisions sometimes a question arises as to whether the State classification is determined by the charter powers, the laws under which the charter was issued, or the character of the supervisory authority. Where the charter powers are harmonious with the general coverage of the laws under which they were issued and the supervision is by an official whose duties are well catalogued therewith, and the corporate activities are in keeping therewith, the State classification rule naturally works with precision; but, where a real question arises, most of the decisions have found it necessary to fall back upon the "activities" rule in fact, if not in name.

Detailed analysis and comparison of all of the pertinent decisions would unnecessarily extend this discussion. It is believed that a brief analysis of a few of the decisions will demonstrate the unsettled status of the principles and their applications, as well as the conflict of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case at bar with some of the other decisions.

In the Second Circuit, in the case, In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Company, 1935, 75 F. (2d) 984, of the corporation involved, it was said: "It was organized under the Insurance Law of the State of New York * * * and its business was to make loans secured by mortgages on real property which it sold to its customers with a guaranty." Applying the State classification rule, it was held to be excluded from reorganization under Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act, for the reason that its charter was issued under the insurance law.

In the same circuit, in the case, In re Prudence Company, 1935, 79 F. (2d) 77, of the corporation involved, actually engaged in the same business as the corporation involved in the Union Guarantee & Mortgage Company case, it was said: "The debtor was incorporated in 1919 under the article of the Banking Law (New York), relating to investment companies. * * * Its business has consisted in making mortgage loans on real estate and selling the mortgages to the public with its guaranty of payment." This corporation was held not to be a banking corporation and to be within the provisions of 77B. It was observed: "* * * it cannot be successfully contended that every corporation which may be formed under the New York Banking Law is a banking corporation * * *," pointing out that the Banking Law was entitled "An Act in relation to banking corporations * * * and corporations under the supervision of the banking department," and that under the various articles of the Banking Law may be formed "banks, trust companies, safe deposit companies, and investment companies," so, with respect to Fidelity, and the conflict of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, in the case at bar with this decision, even if all of Chapter 33 of the West Virginia Code, entitled "Insurance and Annuity Contracts" were regarded as "insurance laws," and although insurance and annuity corporations are under the supervision of the Insurance Commissioner, it cannot be contended that every corporation which operates under said Chapter 33 is an insurance company with any greater success than it was contended in the Prudence case that every corporation operating under the Banking Law of New York was a banking corporation. In Chapter 33 of the West Virginia Code there are different articles dealing with different types of corporations, particularly insurance corporations on one hand and annuity corporations on the other, just as under the New York laws there were different articles dealing with different types of corporations, including banks, trust companies, safe deposit companies, and investment companies; and Article 9 of Chapter 33 of the Code of West Virginia is the article under which annuity companies, defined by Congress as face-amount certificate companies, have operated. But the Prudence case goes further, and, turning to activities, said the corporation was not a banking corporation because it never did obtain the power to receive deposits, the criterion of a banking corporation. Again, the corporation was held not to be an insurance company (79 F. (2d) 77, 80), although the guaranteeing of mortgages was recognized as contracts of insurance (Bowers v. Lawyers' Mortgage Co., 285 U. S. 182, 189), because the corporation was not chartered under the Insurance Law and its guaranty of mortgages was "but incidental to its mortgage business," with which conflicts again the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, in the case at bar, in which, if Fidelity made any insurance contracts, which we do not admit, they were but incidental to the annuity contract business.

Thus, applying with reasonable consistency in legal principle the State classification test, the Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, has reached diametrically opposite conclusions with respect to two corporations engaged in what would seem to be almost identical business activities, holding one, Union Guarantee & Mortgage Company, to be excluded from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act because its charter was issued under the Insurance Laws of New York, and holding the other Prudence Company, not to be so excluded because, although its charter was issued under the general Banking Law of New York, it was not issued under the particular article dealing with banks of deposit, and was, therefore, not a banking corporation within the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act according to such State classification.

In the case of Empire Title and Guarantee Company v. United States, 1939, 101 F. (2d) 69, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reviews these two cases.

In the Fifth Circuit, in the case of Clemons v. Liberty Savings & Real Estate Corporation, 61 F. (2d) 448, the corporation was chartered by the superior court after the petition for incorporation had been amended by making the name "Liberty Savings & Real Estate Corporation" rather than "Liberty Banking & Real Estate Corporation," and granted, in addition to the real estate powers, among others, the powers "* * ; to buy, sell, and deal in stocks, bonds, promissory notes, and all kinds of choses in action; to advance or lend money to its stockholders or other persons, and to adopt a system of loans, advances, terms, and payments in installments in like manner, as to its interest charges and computations as may be done by building and loan associations under the laws of Georgia; to conduct a savings department for its members and other persons with the right to receive deposits not subject to check, and to pay interest thereon." The questions were whether the corporation was a banking corporation or building and loan association, or neither of them, under the Bankruptcy Act. Charters of banks could be issued only by the Secretary of State, while charters for building and loan associations could be issued by the Superior Court. The court observed: "the status of a corporation is fixed by its charter," and held that the corporation was not a banking corporation, observing, with respect to evidence that the depositors were permitted to make withdrawals from time to time, " * * If it occasionally engaged in banking transactions, those acts were ultra vires and could not operate to make it a bank within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Law; * * *." The source of the charter appears to have been accepted as the test. Were this test applied consistently, the corporation might have been a building and loan association, but the court, in disposing of this question, turned to the activities and observed: "There is no evidence whatever in the record that would indicate that appellee did the business usually conducted by a building and loan association."

See also Republic Underwriters v. Ford, 1938, 100 F. (2d) 511, also from the Fifth Circuit.

In the Sixth Circuit, in the case of Capital Endowment Company v. Kroeger, 1936, 86 F. (2d) 976, the debtor was incorporated under the general provisions of the Ohio corporations statute and authorized to engage in business as a bond investment company, originally subject to the supervision of the deputy inspector of building and loan associations and, later, by statutory revision, to the supervision of the superintendent of insurance. The debtor claimed to have abandoned the bond investment business before the supervision was transferred to the superintendent of insurance. The superintendent of insurance was empowered by statute to take over and liquidate domestic building and loan associations and prepared to take over two such associations, the assets of which were acquired by the debtor before the insurance commissioner could take effective steps therefor. Actions were instituted to avoid the transfers of the building and loan assets to the debtor. Disposing of the contention that debtor was an insurance corporation, the court, citing In re Prudence, supra, held:

> "* * * But the present debtor is not an insurance corporation. It was organized under the general incorporation law of Ohio, and while it later qualified as a bond investment company, it is not denied that it abandoned this field prior to the filing of its petition. The mere fact that bond investment companies were placed under the supervision of the Superintendent of Insurance could neither enlarge their powers nor alter their business * * *." 86 F. (2d) 976, 979.

It was also held that the debtor was not a building and loan association since it had been deprived of the building and loan assets. No more, in the case at bar, should Fidelity be considered to be an insurance company merely because it is subject to the supervision of the West Virginia State Auditor, ex officio Insurance Commissioner.

For the Sixth Circuit, see also In re Roumanian Workers Association of America, 1940, 108 F. (2d) 782, where the activities rule seems clearly to have been applied in holding that the debtor, chartered as a non-profit corporation, was a "moneyed, business or commercial corporation."

In the Eighth Circuit, in the case of Gamble v. Daniel, 1930, 39 F. (2d) 447, Cert. Den. 282 U. S. 848, the corporation involved, Peters Trust Company, was incorporated under the laws of Nebraska. It was held that the company was a trust company under Article 19 of Title V of the Nebraska Laws, rather than a banking company under Article 17 of said title, and not a banking corporation within the Bankruptcy Act, "• • • although section 8068 gives trust companies most, if not all, of the powers usually exercised by a bank or enumerated in sections 7983 and 7985 of article 17, except receiving deposits, section 8068 forbids any trust company 'to conduct the business of banking, as defined in Title V, Article XVII' • • • and section 7985 makes it unlawful (with exceptions not here material) to transact a banking business except by those complying with article 17."

It was contended that the trust company was a banking corporation if it were authorized to engage in any one of the classes of activities within the statutory definition of "business of banking" (39 F. (2d) 447, 451), but such contention was rejected. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, in the case at bar, if not in this respect in conflict with this decision, would have likewise rejected the contention that Fidelity was an insurance company because it sold annuity contracts, which is one of the powers of life insurance companies under the West Virginia statute (West Virginia Code 33-3-7; Appendix A).

Of interest in illustrating decisions in which no real differences between powers and activities were presented are: Security B. & L. Association v. Spurlock, C. C. A. 9, 1933, 65 F. (2d) 768, Cert. Den. 290 U. S. 678, and State of Kansas v. Hayes, C. C. A. 10, 1932, 62 F. (2d) 597.

We believe that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, in the case at bar, conflicts in principle with several of these cases. At least it can be said with assurance that there are many inconsistencies between the case at bar and these cases from other circuits;

there are inconsistencies between the decisions of some of the other circuits and even within the same decisions. It would seem to be highly desirable that this Court resolve these inconsistencies by settling the correct principles of classification of corporations for purposes of administering the Bankruptcy Act, and particularly Chapter X thereof, including a consideration of Congressional classification of face-amount certificate companies by the Investment Company Act of 1940.

VI.

Does the record show that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected?

There is in the record much testimony of qualified witnesses that in their opinions Fidelity can be reorganized (R. 265-291). The respondent Sims, West Virginia State Auditor and ex officio Insurance Commissioner, and the plaintiff in the West Virginia State court proceedings pursuant to which the respondents Smith and Thomas were appointed State Receivers, who had for more than eight years supervised the activities of Fidelity, thought that there could be reorganization (R. 272-273) and brought the proceeding in the State court for purposes of rehabilitation (R. 252, 253). An offer was made by Pell, Limited, a financial concern, for the common stock of Fidel, the New York subsidiary of Fidelity, and interest was expressed in investing additional capital for the purpose of reorganizing Fidelity (R. 291-292). Even now, counsel for the respondents are endeavoring to act in concert voluntarily for the sale of the assets of Fidelity (R. 409-413), recognizing in Fidelity's assets a value which would not survive forced and divergent liquidations.

Such reorganization in the State court could only be by voluntary reorganization since West Virginia has no applicable reorganization statute and does not have the territorial jurisdiction to reach all of the assets of Fidelity.

Fidelity's aggregate assets amounted to, in round figures, $21,100,000.00, or approximately ninety per cent (90%) of its aggregate liabilities, $23,476,000.00 (R. 366). The reserve funds of Income Reserve Contracts Series A, B, C and D are solvent (R. 252). From 1934 until the end of 1940 the Series B Contracts represented a very large part of Fidelity's entire business (R. 368-369).

This factual observation suggests an inquiry into what dispositions or administrations of Fidelity may be within the scope of reorganization wit' in the meaning of the term as used in Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.

We believe that an analysis of the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, in this case irresistibly leads to the conclusion that when the Circuit Court of Appeals considered that Fidelity could not be reorganized, the concept of reorganization entertained by the Circuit Court of Appeals was that Fidelity must be rehabilitated as a going concern, carrying on its business in substantially the same manner as that by which it had previously done business.

This concept of reorganization of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, as reflected by its opinion in the case at bar, is clearly not in harmony with the concepts entertained by other circuit courts of appeal. Rehabilitation as a going concern is not required. In re Central Funding Company, C. C. A. 2, 1935, 75 F. (2d) 256, 259; In re Mortgage Securities Corporation, C. C. A. 2, 1935, 75 F. (2d) 261; Capital Endowment Company v. Kroeger, C. C. A. 6, 1936, 86 F. (2d) 976, 979; Continental Insurance Company v. Louisiana Oil Refining Corporation, C. C. A. 5, 1937, 89 F. (2d) 333, 336; R. L. Witters Associates v. Ebsary Gypsum Company, C. C. A. 5, 1938, 93 F. (2d) 746, 748; In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Company, C. C. A. 2, 1940, 112 F. (2d) 655, 657.

It is not believed that this case, long drawn out in the consideration of basic jurisdictional questions, had reached the stage of critical examination of plans of reorganization. Continental Illinois Bank & Trust Company v. C. R. I. & P. R. Co., 294 U. S. 648, 685; R. L. Witters v. Ebsary Gypsum Company, 93 F. (2d) 746, 748; In re Julius Roehrs Company, C. C. A. 3, 1940, 115 F. (2d) 723, 724.

The trustee should have an opportunity to explore the possibilities of reorganization. In re Marine Harbor Properties, C. C. A. 2, 1942, 125 F. (2d) 296, 298, Certiorari granted 86 L. Ed. (Adv.) 729. It is obvious that the extended litigation relating to the basic jurisdiction of the reorganization court in the case at bar has not afforded a foundation upon which could be based any very practicable opportunity for the trustee to make any such exploration thus far.

Can it be said that it is unreasonable to expect that some insurance or investment company can be found to take over or buy the assets of Fidelity under a contract for the benefit of the Fidelity contract holders, to issue them investment certificates or insurance policies, of one or more kinds, of greater value than the dividends to such contract holders through the liquidation of Fidelity would buy? Such an arrangement would afford the contract holders the benefit, in whole or in part, of the original selling costs of insurance policies or investment certificates which are, comparatively speaking, high and which will have been lost to the contract holders of Fidelity unless some plan of reorganization is effected. The purchaser of the assets might give the contract holders an option of taking in cash their determined equities in liquidation or of accepting an insurance policy or an investment contract. A beneficial merger might be worked out with some other investment company or an insurance company. As suggested by the respondent

West Virginia State Auditor (R. 273), the organization of a mutual company to administer Fidelity's assets for the benefit of the contract holders is not beyond the realm of consideration. It should not be unreasonable to expect that at least the solvent funds or series of the Fidelity contracts might be reorganized and the solvent funds or series constitute a very material part of the assets and business of Fidelity (R. 368). These observations are something more than a mere suggestion of remote possibilities. They are suggestions supported by the record and thoughts which should not be relegated to the realm of mere possibilities as distinguished from probabilities until there has been some opportunity to transform them into realities.

But, as a last resort, even a slow, orderly, beneficial liquidation, which we do not believe to be inevitable in this case, is within the scope of reorganization. In re Central Funding Corporation, supra; In re Mortgage Securities Corporation, supra; R. L. Witters Associates v. Ebsary Gypsum Company, supra; In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Company, supra; Bankruptcy Act, Chapter X, Sec. 216 (10); 11 U. S. C. A. 616 (10).

The District Court had much upon which to base its conclusion that it was not unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization could be effected, and its finding in this respect should not have been reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. In re Mount Forest Fur Farms of America, C. ## VII.

Are the interests of creditors best subserved by the prior State proceedings?

There is not involved here a single proceeding in any State court to consider the affairs of Fidelity, but already twelve separate State proceedings have been instituted and there is the prospect of not less than three more such proceedings, should this proceeding be dismissed.

It does not appear that in any of the States in which proceedings have been instituted such proceedings have been instituted under reorganization statutes, if there are reorganization statutes in such States. The proceedings in the States in which they have already been instituted would, unless a voluntary reorganization be effected, liquidate the deposits held in the respective States and distribute the proceeds without regard to any relationship between the particular contracts held by the residents of such States to Fidelity's various funds, supporting the various series of contracts, invested by Fidelity in the assets held by the several State authorities. The prevalent theory of the States participating in this case is that the State deposits, except in West Virginia, are for the primary protection of the holders of the contracts sold in the respective States. This theory may, or may not, be sound. It should be judicially determined by a court having jurisdiction of all of the assets and of the persons interested before there is any distribution.

If there be some twelve or fifteen separate State liquidations, many creditors may be deprived of assets in which they are entitled to participate, even before their legal rights to participation are adjudicated. The adjudication of such rights may be in vain if the assets of Fidelity be administered by so many distinct and separate proceedings in as many separate States.

There is a substantial surplus of assets held in Wisconsin over contract liabilities to residents of that State, and small surpluses in Delaware, Iowa, Missouri, and Alabama (R. 366). The assets held in West Virginia exceed by some eight million dollars the liabilities to the residents of West Virginia. (In the table on page 366 of the Record the liabilities attributable to West Virginia include the liabilities to contract holders in all States which require no deposits.) The deposits in West Virginia, pursuant to the West Virginia law, have apparently been made for the benefit of the holders of contracts, wherever they are and wherever they bought their contracts to the extent that the State in which the contract was sold did not require any deposit or required insufficient deposits.

Whether or not, if there should be liquidation, the assets should be distributed according to the States in which they are held and to the contract holders residing therein, or according to the contract series funds for which Fidelity owned and held these assets, will be a real question which can be effectively determined only while the res is undistributed.

It may be, by way of illustration, that the interests of the Wisconsin creditors may be best subserved by a one hundred per cent liquidation in Wisconsin. What about the creditors in other States who own contracts of the same series and may be entitled to participate in the same assets from the standpoint of Fidelity's obligations? Were the deposits required in Wisconsin for the purpose of assuring the solvency of Fidelity or for the benefit only of the contract holders resident in Wisconsin? The same inquiry may be made with respect to the other States.

Can it be said that the interests of all the creditors are best subserved by any such program of liquidation by separate States? We believe, rather, that the very purpose of the Investment Company Act and of the amendments thereof to the Bankruptcy Act, was to avoid any such confusion and futility. In order to know that they are availing themselves of all possible remedies for the protection of their interests, is it to the best interests of the creditors of Fidelity that they be required to file claims in the courts of many States? The amounts of the claims of the several creditors of Fidelity are, for the most part, quite small.

We are not to answer or resolve these questions here but they are suggestions demonstrating the necessity of withholding any distribution until they are settled.

The Circuit Court of Appeals seemed to be of opinion that the interests of the creditors would be best subserved because many questions of State law will likely arise and may be better determined by the State courts. But questions under the laws of many other States also will arise in the courts of the several States. It would seem that the courts of one State would be in no better position to determine the laws of other States than is a Federal Court to determine the laws of the several States. Federal Courts have always been required to consider State laws and there is no reason to believe that the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia will not respect the laws of the several States involved when they become of importance in this proceeding.

The Circuit Court of Appeals, in concluding that the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the prior State court proceedings, also grounded its opinion upon the philosophy that " * * * Congress in excepting from the Bankruptcy Act those corporations, such as insurance, railroad and banking corporations, whose business during their active life and whose liquidation in case of insolvency are strictly regulated by State law. * * * " (R. 386) manifested an intent to abandon such corporations, so to speak, because of the allegedly conceded superiority of State supervision in these respects. If such ever were the Congressional policy, and it may have been at some earlier day, that Congressional policy was most certainly changed, in so far as face-amount certificate companies are concerned, by the enactment of the Investment Company Act of 1940 and the amendments thereof to the Bankruptcy Act.

The foregoing thoughts are expressed to suggest an inquiry of what are the considerations for determining when the prior State proceedings best subserve the interests of the creditors. This is an important question, and a Federal question since it arises under a Federal statute, Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, and one which this Court has not yet settled. It is presented by two other cases now pending before this Court, In re Marine Harbor Properties, C. C. A. 2, 1942, 125 F. (2d) 296, 298, Certiorari granted 86 L. Ed. (Adv.) 729, and In re Paloma Estates, C. C. A. 2, 1942, 126 F. (2d) 72, petition for certiorari filed. It is a question which should be settled by this Court and, since in the Marine Harbor and Paloma cases properties in more than one State are not involved, it is believed that the disposition of those cases will not necessarily determine the principles for consideration of far-flung activities within the territorial jurisdictions of several States, such as is presented by the case at bar. In these circumstances, the observations of United States District Judge Bryant in the National Surety Company case with reference to the obvious superior effectiveness of one Federal Court's having full jurisdiction of the subject matter, when compared to diverse actions in different States, is convincing:

> "It is with regret that I refuse to take jurisdiction. I say this because it is apparent that future administration could be more readily carried on under one control than under the limited jurisdiction of several state courts. It seems almost a travesty to have to deny to this company the benefits of sections 77A and 77B of the Bankruptcy Act while its principal subsidiary is being administered thereunder. However, to hold differently would be the taking of powers that Congress did not deem it wise to give." 7 Fed. Supp. 959, 961.

The conditions and considerations in the case at bar are not greatly different from those involved in the National Surety Company case, except that in the case at bar Congress has given the powers which were so desired to be exercised by the court in the National Surety Company case.

The record does not indicate that the safeguards considered by Judge Frank in his dissenting opinion in the Marine Harbor Properties case (125 F. (2d) 296) will be afforded by the State court proceedings considered in the case at bar. Can it be said that the interests of creditors are best subserved in the prior proceedings in the State courts in the absence of such safeguards or their reasonable equivalents.

Unless all hope for any reorganization is actually futile, and we do not believe that it is, if a reorganization, in whole or in part, or even by slow, orderly, beneficial, complete liquidation, which we do not believe to be inevitable, is for the benefit of the creditors, and we believe it is, it would seem that this interest of the creditors not only can best be subserved by the proceeding in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia, having jurisdiction of the entire subject matter, but that it can be secured only in that and in no other court, of all the courts in which proceedings have thus far been instituted with respect to Fidelity.

The Conclusion of the District Court on this consideration of good faith was not without much reason both in fact and logic, and should not have been reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals.

Conclusion.

It is respectfully represented that this is a case in which this Court, in its sound judicial discretion, may appropriately grant the writ of certiorari as prayed, and that the petition and the brief in support thereof present special and important reasons therefor.

APPENDIX A.

Federal Statutes.

11 U. S. C. A. 506, Section 106(3) of Bankruptcy Act:

(a) Any person, except a municipal, railroad, insurance or banking corporation or a building and loan association, shall be entitled to the benefits of this Act as a voluntary bankrupt.

(b) Any natural person, except a wage earner or farmer, and any moneyed, business, or commercial corporation, except a building and loan association, a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation, owing debts to the amount of $1,000 or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this Act. • • •

11 U. S. C. A. 506, Section 106(3) of Bankruptcy Act:

For the purposes of this chapter, unless inconsistent with the context—

(3) "corporations" shall mean a corporation, as defined in this Act, which could be adjudged a bankrupt under this Act, and any railroad corporation excepting a railroad corporation authorized to file a petition under Section 77 of this Act.

11 U. S. C. A. 544, Section 144 of Bankruptcy Act:

If an answer filed by any creditor, indenture trustee, or stockholder shall controvert any of the material allegations of the petition, the judge shall, as soon as may be, determine, without the intervention of a jury, the issues presented by the pleadings and enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith and that the material allegations are sustained by the proofs, or dismissing it if not so satisfied.

11 U. S. C. A. 546, Section 146 of Bankruptcy Act:

Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term "good faith," a petition shall not be deemed filed in good faith if—

(1) * * *
(2) * * *
(3) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected; or
(4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding.

11 U. S. C. A. 616(10), Section 216(10) of Bankruptcy Act:

A plan of reorganization under this chapter—(10) shall provide adequate means for the execution of the plan, which may include: the retention by the debtor of all or any part of its property; the sale or transfer of all or any part of its property to one or more other corporations theretofore organized or thereafter to be organized; the merger or consolidation of the debtor with one or more other corporations; the sale of all or any part of its property, either subject to or free from any lien, at not less than a fair upset price and the distribution of all or any assets, or the proceeds derived from the sale thereof, among those having an interest therein; the satisfaction or modification of liens; the cancelation or modification of indentures or of other similar instruments; the curing or waiver of defaults; the extension of maturity dates and changes in interest rates and other terms of outstanding securities; the amendment of the charter of the debtor; the issuance of securities of the debtor or such other corporations for cash, for property, in exchange for existing securities, in satisfaction of claims or stock or for other appropriate purposes.

11 U. S. C. A. 107(f):

(1) For the purposes of, and exclusively applicable to, this subdivision (f): (a) "debtor" shall mean a face-amount certificate company as defined in section 80a-4 of Title 15; (b) "face-amount certificate" shall mean a face-amount certificate as defined in section 80a-2 of Title 15; (c) "depositary" is a person or State agency with whom securities or other property of a debtor is deposited or to whom property of a debtor is transferred, in trust or otherwise, pursuant to the requirements of a State law or an agreement by the debtor providing for the distribution of such property or its proceeds to creditors or security holders of the debtor in the event of the insolvency of the debtor, or under other specified circumstances; (d) "deposit creditor" is a creditor who, under the provisions of a State law or agreement providing for a deposit with or transfer to a depositary, has rights as to the securities or property so deposited or transferred which exceed the rights of a general creditor; and (e) "State agency" is an official or agency of a State designated to act as depositary or to distribute property or the proceeds of property held by a depositary.

(2) Every deposit or transfer of securities or other property made by or on behalf of a debtor with or to any depositary for the benefit or protection of or to secure the holder of any security sold by or on behalf of the debtor on or after January 1, 1941, shall be voidable as against the trustee of such debtor if the property of the estate is insufficient for the full payment and discharge of all claims on account of all face-amount certificates sold by or on behalf of the debtor, and such deposit or transfer and every lien created thereby shall thereupon be avoided by the trustee subject to the provisions of paragraph 3 of this subdivision (f).

(3) In the event any deposit or transfer described in paragraph 2 of this subdivision (f) shall be avoided the trustee shall segregate the property received by the trustee from the depositary and charge the same with the costs and expenses of maintenance and liquidation and distribute the net proceeds thereof to the creditors who would have been entitled thereto under the provisions of the law or agreement providing for the deposit or transfer of the property, and each such creditor shall thereafter be entitled to dividends from the estate only after all creditors of the same rank shall have received the same percentage.

(4) The court shall have summary jurisdiction of any proceedings to hear and determine the rights of any parties under this subdivision (f) and to hear and determine the sufficiency of the property of the estate for the full payment and discharge of all claims on account of all face-amount certificates sold by or on behalf of the debtor. Due notice of any hearing in such proceedings shall be given to every depositary and State agency which is a party in interest.

(5) Where the provisions of subsection (c) of section 28 are not applicable, the provisions of this section will not apply.

15 U. S. C. A. 80a-3 (c) (3) and (6). Notwithstanding subsections (a) and (b), none of the following persons is an investment company within the meaning of this subchapter and sections 72 (a), last sentence, and 107 (f) of Title 11:

(3) Any bank or insurance company; any savings and loan association, building and loan association, cooperative bank, homestead association, or similar institution, or any receiver, conservator, liquidator, liquidating agent, or similar official or person thereof or therefor; • • •

(6) Any person who is not engaged in the business of issuing face-amount certificates of the installment type or periodic payment plan certificates, and who is primarily engaged in one or more of the following businesses: (A) Purchasing or otherwise acquiring notes, drafts, acceptances, open accounts receivable, and other obligations representing part or all of the sales price of merchandise, insurance, and services; (B) making loans to manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers of, and to prospective purchasers of, specified merchandise, insurance, and services; and (C) purchasing or otherwise acquiring mortgages and other liens on and interests in real estate.

State Statutes.

West Virginia Code, Ch. 33, Art. 9, Sec. 1:

(1) License from Insurance Commissioner Prerequisite to Engaging in Business.—No person, association or corporation shall engage in the business of soliciting or receiving deposits or payments on any annuity contract or certificate or annuity bond in fixed and stipulated installments, within this State, without first having obtained from the insurance commissioner a license to do business in this State: Provided, however, That this article shall not be construed as applying to persons, associations or corporations engaged in selling merchandise in installments, insurance companies, foreign or domestic, duly authorized to do business in this State, building and loan associations, national banks and banking institutions organized and authorized to do business under the laws of this State, fraternal insurance societies, or surety companies doing business under the laws of this State. Such license shall be issued for one year, or the fractional part of a year, and for issuing the same a fee of ten dollars shall be charged; and the provisions of section twelve, article two of this chapter shall apply to such license.

West Virginia Code, Ch. 33, Art. 9, Sec. 2:

(2) License Prerequisite to Negotiating Contracts.—No person, association or corporation shall sell or offer for sale or deliver within this State any contract, certificate or bond of any person, association or corporation required by this article to obtain a license from the insurance commissioner to transact business in this State until such license has been issued by said insurance commissioner.

West Virginia Code, Ch. 33, Art. 9, Sec. 3:

(3) Deposits to be Made with the Treasurer.—Before a license to transact business in this State shall be issued by the insurance commissioner to any person, association, or corporation within the purview of section one of this article, the insurance commissioner shall require the applicant to deposit with the state treasurer (in accordance with article five, chapter twelve of this code), in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders, bonds of the state of West Virginia, or such other bonds, and securities including bonds issued by the West Virginia bridge commission as may be approved by said insurance commissioner, or both, to the aggregate amount of one hundred thousand dollars, and, in addition to such deposit, such person, association or corporation shall maintain at all times a deposit with the state treasurer of bonds and securities approved by the insurance commissioner to an amount equal to the total amount which such person, association or corporation may be liable to pay in cash to the holders of all contracts under the terms thereof at the time of the deposit: Provided, That when, by the laws of any other state, any such person, association or corporation shall have been required to make and shall have made such deposit in such state, equal or greater in amount for the benefit of contract holders in such state, upon the filing of a certificate to such effect from the proper officer in such state with the insurance commissioner of this State, such person, association or corporation shall not be required to make such deposit with the treasurer of this State for the benefit of its contract holders in such other state; and when the laws of any other state require such deposit less in amount, such person, association or corporation shall file a certificate from the proper officer in such state with the insurance commissioner of this state showing the amount of the deposit made, and shall deposit with the treasurer of this state an amount which, together with the deposit made in such other state, shall make up the total amount required by this state to be deposited by such person, association or corporation, and such contract holders in such other state shall not be entitled to the benefit of the securities deposited with the treasurer of this State under this article, except so much of such deposit as may be made to complete the total amount required by this article where the law of any other state requires a lesser amount.

The insurance commissioner may require an independent appraisal, at the expense of the company, of any property on which it holds a mortgage or trust deed or any bond or other investment offered by such company for the purpose of complying with the deposit provisions of this article.

West Virginia Code, Ch. 33, Art. 9, Sec. 5:

(5) Revocation of License on Failure to Make Additional Deposits or Insufficiency of Assets.—On the failure of such person, association or corporation to deposit such additional bonds and securities with the state treasurer when so required by the insurance commissioner, the license to do business in this State shall be revoked by the insurance commissioner. Whenever the insurance commissioner, upon an examination of the affairs of any such person, association or corporation, finds that the liabilities of such person, association or corporation exceed the assets thereof, the insurance commissioner shall suspend the license of such person, association or corporation until he is satisfied that the assets of such person, association or corporation are increased to exceed said liabilities.

West Virginia Code, Ch. 33, Art. 9, Sec. 10:

(10) Authority of Insurance Commissioner; Control of Deposit Where License Revoked.—The insurance commissioner shall have the same authority over every person, association, or corporation engaged in selling annuity contracts, certificates, or bonds, as over insurance companies, and if in his opinion the assets are impaired or such person, association or corporation is not complying with the law, said commissioner shall have authority to revoke the license of such person, association, or corporation to do business in this State, and, if such license is so revoked, the deposit or a sufficient amount of same, shall remain under the authority and control of the insurance commissioner until the total liability of all the contracts, certificates or annuity bonds or contracts issued by such person, association or corporation of this State is redeemed or settled.

West Virginia Code, Ch. 33, Art. 2, Sec. 5:

(5) Issuance of License by Insurance Commissioner.—Upon receiving such certified copy and statement, the insurance commissioner may examine such company or association, and if he finds that it has complied with the terms of its charter or articles of association and the laws of this State, and with all the provisions in other sections of this chapter prescribing conditions precedent to the issuance of a license, or certificate of authority, and is satisfied that it is solvent (or if chartered or organized under the laws of any foreign country, is solvent in the United States), he may issue to it a license, or certificate of authority, stating such facts and authorizing it to issue policies, make contracts of insurance, and transact business in this State.

West Virginia Code, Ch. 33, Art. 2, Sec. 12:

(12) Time Licenses Shall Continue in Force.—All licenses, or certificates of authority issued by the insurance commissioner to insurance companies or associations, or agents, solicitors or brokers, shall continue in force until the first day of April next following their issuance, unless the same be sooner revoked.

West Virginia Code, Ch. 33, Art. 2, Sec. 45:

(45) Proceedings in Circuit Court of Kanawha County against Insolvent Company.—Whenever any company under the supervision and regulation of the insurance commissioner shall become insolvent or shall be in such financial condition as not to be able to pay its creditors in this State, the commissioner of insurance may file a bill in the circuit court of Kanawha county for the administering of the assets of such company as an insolvent, and for the purpose of taking possession of its property in this State and the distribution of its assets among those entitled thereto according to their respective right.

West Virginia Code, Ch. 33, Art. 3, Sec. 7:

(7) Annuities May Be Issued by Life Companies.—Life insurance companies chartered by and doing business in this State, and empowered to make contracts contingent upon life, may grant and issue annuities, either in connection with or separate from contracts of insurance based upon life risks, and all such annuities heretofore issued by such companies shall be valid.

Ch. 46 of Acts of 1941:

(1) Definitions.—For the purposes of this article the term "face-amount certificate" shall mean any certificate, investment contract, or other security which represents an obligation on the part of its issuer to pay a stated or determinable sum or sums at a fixed or determinable date or dates more than twenty-four months after the date of issuance in consideration of the payment of periodic installments of a stated or determinable amount; or any security which represents a similar obligation on the part of its issuer, the consideration for which is the payment of a single lump sum.

All other terms used herein shall have their respective meanings, as provided in section two, article one of this chapter.

(2) When Certificates Exempt from Registration.—Face-amount certificates issued by a person licensed and supervised by the insurance commissioner of this state shall be exempt from registration under the provisions of this article.

(3) Restriction on Sale.—No face-amount certificates, except those exempt under the provisions of section two hereof, shall be sold within this state unless such face-amount securities shall have been registered as hereinafter provided.

(4) Registration of Certificates.—Face-amount certificates shall be registered hereunder by the filing of an application with the commissioner by the issuer or by any dealer properly registered under the provisions of section twelve, article one of this chapter: Provided, That the issuer of such certificates is registered under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "Investment Company Act of 1940." Such application is to be in the form prescribed by the commissioner. With each such application there shall be filed a certified copy of the registration statement which was filed by the issuer of such certificates with the securities and exchange commission pursuant to the provisions of section eight of the said "Investment Company Act of 1940."

The commissioner may require that the applicant file with him such additional data and information respecting the issuer as he shall deem necessary and pertinent to registration hereunder.

The commissioner shall have power and authority to place such conditions, limitations and restrictions on any registration as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this article.

(5) Fees for Registration.—At the time of filing the application mentioned in section four of this article, the applicant shall pay to the commissioner a fee of one-twentieth of one per cent of the aggregate face-amount of the certificates to be sold in this state for which the applicant is seeking registration, but in no case shall such fee be less than twenty-five dollars, nor more than three hundred dollars.

(6) Expiration of Registration; Reregistration.—Every registration under this article shall expire on the thirtieth day of June in each year. New registrations for the succeeding year shall be issued upon written application, the applicant furnishing the commissioner, upon request, information as hereinbefore provided, and paying the commissioner a fee on the basis specified in section five of this article on the aggregate face-amount of the certificates to be sold in this state within the year to be authorized by registration. Applications for renewal registration must be made not less than thirty days before the first day of the ensuing registration year, otherwise they shall be treated as original application.

(7) Non resident Issuer to File with Application for Registration Written Appointment of State Auditor as Attorney in Fact; Service and Acceptance of Process.—When any issuer of face-amount certificates shall not be domiciled in this state, he shall file with every application for registration hereunder (whether such application be made by the issuer in person or by or through a registered dealer) his irrevocable written appointment of the state auditor, or his successor in office, to be his true and lawful attorney in fact, who may accept or upon whom may be served, any lawful process or pleading in any action or proceeding against him in any court of record in this state, and such filing shall constitute his consent that any such process or pleading against him, which is properly served upon the state auditor or is accepted by the state auditor, shall be of the same legal force and validity as process or pleading duly served upon said issuer in this state. In case any process or pleading is served upon the state auditor, or accepted by him, such service shall be made in duplicate, one copy of which shall be filed in the office of the state auditor and the other immediately forwarded by registered mail to the principal office of the issuer against whom such process or pleading is directed.

(8) Sales to Be Made Only by Registered Dealers.—Face-amount certificates shall be offered for sale and sold in this state only by dealers and salesmen registered with the commissioner under the provisions of section twelve, article one of this chapter.

(9) Violations; Penalties.—Any person subject to the provisions of this article, who shall sell or offer for sale any face-amount certificates within this state without complying with the provisions of this article, or who continues to sell or offer for sale any such certificates after his registration has expired, or has been revoked or suspended by the commissioner, or who shall otherwise neglect or refuse to comply with any of the provisions of this article, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

(10) Applicability of Sections.—Sections three, four, six, nine, and twenty-seven, article one of this chapter, shall not apply to this article. All other sections of this chapter shall apply fully to this article.

(11) Provisions Severable.—If any part or section of this act shall be declared unconstitutional or invalid by any court, such declaration shall not affect any other part or section hereof.

(12) Article Nine, Chapter Thirty-three, Repealed.—Article nine, chapter thirty-three of the code of West Virginia, one thousand nine hundred thirty-one, is hereby expressly repealed.

APPENDIX B.

State of West Virginia Certificate.

I, Stuart F. Reed, Secretary of State of the State of West Virginia, do hereby certify that a Resolution and New Agreement duly acknowledged and accompanied by the proper certificates and affidavits, have this day been delivered to me, which Resolution and New Agreement are in the words and figures following:

Whereas, It is deemed desirable by the stockholders of the Fidelity Investment Association, a corporation created and organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia, that the objects and purposes for which it was incorporated be enlarged; therefore be it

Resolved, By the stockholders of said corporation in stockholders' meeting assembled. That the objects and purposes for which said corporation was incorporated be enlarged, in accordance with and by virtue of the authority of Section ten of chapter fifty four of the Code of West Virginia, so that said objects and purposes hereafter shall be those set forth in the following new agreement, which new agreement is hereby adopted to-wit:

I. The undersigned agree to be and continue a corporation by the name of Fidelity Investment Association.

II. The Principal Place of Business of said corporation shall be located as heretofore at No. 1229 Main Street in the City of Wheeling, in County of Ohio, and State of West Virginia. Said corporation shall have no chief works.

III. The objects and purposes for which this Corporation is formed are as follows:

To purchase, acquire, buy, sell, own, hold, dispose of and deal in stocks, bonds, mortgages, debentures, obligations, and other securities of corporations and persons for its own account and for others on commission; to loan money on real estate security; to loan money on personal and other security; to acquire, own, deal in and sell real estate, to erect houses thereon, rent and sell the same, to lay out real estate into divisions and [illegible]s and to sell and dispose of same; to deal in real estate and to buy, sell and exchange the same for others for a commission or reward; to underwrite in whole or in part any issue of stocks, bonds or other securities; to transact as agents on commission the general business of real estate and insurance in all its branches; to transact on commission the general business of a fiscal agent; to transact any other business incident to any of the above named enterprises which a person, firm or partnership might engage in or do.

To carry on, by purchasing existing businesses, or otherwise, the business of soliciting or receiving deposits or payments on any annuity contracts, certificates or annuity bonds; in fixed and stipulated instalments or otherwise; to acquire and sell and offer for sale or delivery any contract, certificate or bond, of any person, association or corporation, now or hereafter engaged in this state in the business of soliciting, or receiving deposits or payments of any kind of annuity contracts, certificates or annuity bonds; and further to engage in the business of placing or selling certificates, bonds, debentures, certificates of interest, or investment securities of any kind on the partial payment, instalment, or any other plan of payment, and providing for the sale, redemption, or retiring of the same or any part thereof; and generally to carry on all lawful business necessary or incidental to all or any of the above mentioned objects.

The designation of any one of the objects and purposes aforesaid is not intended and shall not be taken to be a limitation or qualification upon any other of the said designated objects and purposes.

IV. The amount of the total authorized capital stock of said corporation will be Two Hundred Thousand ($200,000) dollars, divided into two thousand shares of par value of one hundred dollars each, of which authorized capital stock the amount of Ninety Seven Thousand Five Hundred dollars has been paid.

V. The names and post office addresses of all the stockholders and the number of shares of stock subscribed for by each, are as follows:

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA CERTIFICATE.

I, STUART F. REED, Secretary of State of the State of West Virginia, do hereby certify that J. F. Paull, President of Fidelity Investment & Loan Association, a corporation created and organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia, has certified to me under his signature and the corporate seal of said corporation, that, at a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation, regularly held in accordance with the requirements of the law of said State, at the office thereof, in the City of Wheeling, West Virginia, on the 30th day of November, 1912, at which meeting a majority of stock of such corporation being represented by the holders thereof in person or by proxy and voting for the following resolution, the same was duly and regularly adopted and passed, to-wit:

"RESOLVED, that the name of this corporation be changed from Fidelity Investment & Loan Association, its present name, to Fidelity Investment Association, by which latter name it shall hereafter be known."

WHEREFORE, I do declare said change of name to be authorized by law, and that the said corporation shall hereafter be known by the name of FIDELITY INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.

Given under my hand and the Great Seal of the said State, at the City of Charleston, this Seventh day of December, 1912.

MOTION AS TO RECORD.

To the Honorable the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Now come your petitioners, Fidelity Assurance Association, a corporation, Debtor, and Central Trust Company, Trustee for Fidelity Assurance Association, and respectfully move the Court that, for consideration of the petition for certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, the complete record in this case be not printed, and that the said petition for certiorari be considered by this Honorable Court upon the appendices to the briefs filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit and the proceedings had in the said Circuit Court of Appeals.

The complete record in this case, much of which is irrelevant to the questions presented by the said petition, consists of approximately 4,000 pages of testimony and several thousand pages of exhibits. The statement of facts contained in the opinion of the District Court and the statement of facts contained in the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals fairly state the pertinent facts of the case, and the questions presented by the petition for certiorari can be decided on the portions of the record embodied in the said appendices, supplemented by the proceedings in the Circuit Court of Appeals.

A transcript of the complete record, duly certified by the Clerk of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, has been filed with the Clerk of this Honorable Court, and if certiorari be granted by this Honorable Court as prayed by your petitioners, your petitioners will cause to be printed all of the record or so much thereof as counsel for the parties may by stipulation deem to be necessary.

Respectfully submitted,

ARGUMENT ..... 15-61

I. Circuit Court Erred In Holding That Fidelity Was Insurance Corporation ..... 15-39
Introduction ..... 15-16

(1) Congress by Investment Company Act of 1940 defined such companies as Fidelity as face-amount certificate companies and not insurance companies ..... 16-24

(2) By laws of West Virginia Fidelity is not an insurance company ..... 24-28

(3) Fidelity did not have charter powers to engage in insurance business prior to December 31, 1940, and did not engage in such business ..... 28-32

(4) The amendment of December 31, 1940, to Fidelity's charter was an abortive effort to effect a voluntary extra-judicial reorganization and did not result in transforming Fidelity into an insurance company ..... 32-39

II. The Circuit Court Erred In Holding That The Petition of Fidelity Was Not Filed in Good Faith ..... 39-61

(1) Fidelity was not precluded from filing voluntary petition under Chapter X because of assent to state court proceeding. 39-42

(2) It is reasonable to believe that a plan of reorganization can be effected. Reorganization need not be complete rehabilitation ..... 42-50

(3) No one state court has territorial jurisdiction over all assets or all persons interested. No state court proceeding is under a reorganization statute. There is no prior proceeding which will best subserve the interests of creditors ..... 51-61

BRIEF OF PETITIONERS

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the District Court is a part of the record (176), and is reported in 42 F. Supp. 973.

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, is a part of the record (238) and is reported in 129 F. (2d) 442.

JURISDICTION

The jurisdiction of this Court rests upon Section 240(a) of the Judicial Code, as amended by the Act of February 13, 1925 (28 USCA 347), and Sections 24(c) and 121, as added June 22, 1938, of the Bankruptcy Act (11 USCA 47(c) and 521).

STATUTES INVOLVED

Federal Statutes

The issues involve the construction and application to the facts of this case of the Bankruptcy Act, particularly Section 4 of Chapter III as amended (11 USCA 22) and Sections 106(3), 144, and 146 of Chapter X (11 USCA 506(3), 544 and 546), and of the Investment Company Act of 1940, Title I, particularly Sections 2(a)(15) and (17), 3(a)(2), 3(c)(3), 3(c)(6), 4(1), 6(a)2, 25, 28, 53 (15 USCA 80(a) with the same sections and subsections except that Section 53 of the Act is Section 52 in USCA) and Section 29(a) and (b) (11 USCA 107(f), 72 (a)).

Such pertinent provisions of these statutes as are not presented in the Argument are printed in the Appendix to this brief.

West Virginia Statutes

The issues also involve a consideration of the following West Virginia statutes:

Chapter 33 of the Code of West Virginia (West Virginia Code of 1937, Annotated, Michie):

Article 9, Sections 1 to 12, inclusive;

Article 2, Sections 5, 12 and 45;

Article 3, Sections 1 and 7.

Chapter 46, Acts of the Legislature of West Virginia, 1941 (1941 Cumulative Supplement to the West Virginia Code of 1937, Michie, Chapter 32, Article 3; Chapter 33, Article 9).

Such pertinent provisions of these statutes as are not presented in the Argument are printed in the Appendix to this brief.

Statutes of Other States

A table of statutes of other states comparable to Section 3 of Article 9 of Chapter 33 of the Code of West Virginia relating to the deposits required to be made with state officials by companies such as Fidelity is found on page 24 of the Transcript of Record.

Numbers in parentheses refer to pages of Transcript of Record unless otherwise indicated. Exhibits will be referred to by the abbreviation "Ex.", followed by the appropriate number or letter. Fidelity Assurance Association will usually be referred to as "Fidelity". The United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia will be referred to as the "District Court". The United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit will be referred to as the "Circuit Court". The proceeding in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, will ordinarily be referred to as the "State Court proceeding", and said court will be referred to as the "State Court". There being proceedings in state courts of twelve different states, the context will show when reference to the state court proceedings comprises proceedings in more than one state court. Edgar B. Sims, Auditor of the State of West Virginia and Ex Officio Insurance Commissioner, will frequently be referred to as the "State Auditor". Ross B. Thomas and H. Isaiah Smith, Receivers appointed by the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, will frequently be referred to as the "State Court Receivers" though that phrase may at times comprise receivers appointed in other states as well. Unless otherwise indicated, the "respondents" will refer to the respondents other than the Securities and Exchange Commission.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The material facts are presented in some detail in the opinion of the District Court (176) and in the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals (238). Condensed for the purposes of this brief, the facts of the case and the nature of the proceeding are as follows.

Nature of the Proceeding

This proceeding arises under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act and was instituted by the filing of a voluntary petition for reorganization by Fidelity (4).

Organization and Business of Fidelity

Fidelity was incorporated under the laws of the State of West Virginia, on April 11, 1911, under the name of Fidelity Investment and Loan Association and was authorized by its charter to buy, sell, and deal in stocks, bonds, and real estate. Fidelity's charter was amended in November, 1912, and its name was changed to Fidelity Investment Association. By the amended charter it was authorized to receive payments on annuity contracts in fixed installments or otherwise and to sell certificates, bonds, or other investment securities of any kind on installment or any other plan of payment (240; Ex. 20; 398). A copy of the charter powers of this charter is, for convenience, printed in the Appendix.

Under these charter powers from November, 1912, until December 31, 1940, Fidelity was engaged in selling its own securities in the form of investment contracts variously known as annuities, income contracts, or, more recently, face-amount installment certificates, and in investing the funds received from the purchaser (378). This activity brought Fidelity within the scope of Article 9, entitled Annuity Contracts, of Chapter 33, entitled Insurance and Annuity Contracts, of the Code of West Virginia requiring a license from the State Auditor, and by the provisions of Section 3 of said Article 9 (Appendix) the company was required to deposit securities with the State Treasurer as therein provided (178; 294-295; 365-366). Deposits in lesser amounts were also made with the statutory officials of some fourteen other states pursuant to the respective statutes, of the same general character as the West Virginia statute, of those States (Ex. C with Trustee's Report No. 2; 85; 347; 348). Insurance companies are expressly excluded from the provisions of the said Article 9 of Chapter 33 by Section 1 thereof (Appendix). Fidelity did business in fourteen other states which required no such deposits (348). A table of the deposits by states, as of the date of the filing of the petition in this proceeding, is found in the Opinion of the Circuit Court (242; Ex. 48), from which it will be noted that the deposits in West Virginia are substantially in excess of the liabilities to West Virginia creditors.

In the various states the activities of Fidelity were regulated by various officials or departments: in some, the securities department; in some, the banking department; and, in others, the insurance department (12-13; 348-373).

While the various types of investment contracts sold by Fidelity differ in some respects, they are all alike in providing for monthly, semi-annual or annual payments of specified sums, of which a sufficient portion was to be set aside in a reserve fund which was to produce the sum required to pay the purchaser the amount of money agreed upon in the contract (Ex's. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5; 305-316). The earlier contracts contained no statement as to the basis of the reserve fund. Of the later contracts, some provided for reserves on a 4½% basis and some on a 4% basis. All provided that the reserve fund so set aside should "be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia" (179). In each of the contracts there was a provision whereby, with slight variation in language as to each particular class or series of contracts, Fidelity agreed to create and maintain a reserve fund for such particular class or series from payments made on contracts of that particular class or series, which reserve fund was to be used for the discharge of its liabilities on that particular class or series of contracts; and on its books Fidelity kept these various series funds separate and distinct (180; 319; 331; 376; 380; Ex. 25). Some of these series funds, the later and larger ones, are solvent (Ex. 70, 751; 492-493; 632-633; Ex. 21, 398; 1215). As a whole Fidelity is about 90% solvent (196; 242). There are approximately 88,000 contract holders, whose individual claims are relatively small (242; 479; Ex's. J and L with Trustee's Report No. 2, 86-87; Ex. 34, 515).

About 1934 Fidelity issued a contract known as the "Income Reserve Contract Series B", commonly referred to as the "Series B Contract" (Ex. 4, 315), the sale of which from that time on until December 31, 1940, constituted the major portion of its business (312; 315; 680).

The Series B Contracts contained the following provision:

> "SECTION 1. Reserve Fund. The Association shall create and maintain a Reserve Fund, as a Special Fund, solely for the discharge of its liability upon its Income Reserve Contracts Series B and its paid-up contracts issued in lieu thereof. * * *"

The Series B Contracts also contained an optional provision, "Section 6", under the terms of which Fidelity had arranged with an insurance company for life insurance by a multiple life policy or equivalent individual policies (236A) covering the original registered holder of the contract, provided he be in good health and be accepted by the insurance company (1047), the policies providing that upon the death of the registered holder the insurance company would pay to Fidelity the amount required by Fidelity to declare the contract fully paid (178; 244; 313-315). Fidelity arranged with the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company to carry such insurance (230-231; 416). Approximately 67% of the series B Contracts contain Section 6, the insurance provision (681), and from the standard monthly payment of $7.50 but 50¢ per month for the first sixty months and 25¢ per month for the next sixty months was allocated to the insurance (683; 771).

In December, 1938, the Securities and Exchange Commission filed a bill for injunction against Fidelity in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan alleging that Fidelity was engaged in acts and practices in the sale of its securities which constituted violations of the provisions of the Securities Act of 1933 (328), and in that cause a consent decree was entered, among other things, enjoining Fidelity from failing to meet the deposit requirements of the several states

(612; Appendix X of Ex. 6, Report of the SEC on Investment Companies). In the same month a suit for the appointment of receivers was brought by certain contract holders of Fidelity in the United States District Court for the Northern District of West Virginia based on the facts developed in the suit in Michigan; but the bill was dismissed by the district court for the reason that insolvency was not established, and the decision was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals (Hutchinson v. Fidelity, 106 F. (2d) 431).

The Investment Company Act of 1940

Congress enacted the Investment Company Act of 1940, effective as to face-amount certificate companies on January 1, 1941 (54 Stat. 789, 15 USCA 80a-52), wherein Congress found that investment companies issuing face-amount installment certificates were affected "with a national public interest" (242; 15 USCA 80a 1(a)) and enacted regulations to govern the sale of face-amount certificates, with which it was immediately apparent that Fidelity could not comply (243; 630; 701).

Attempted Extra Judicial Reorganization

In a futile effort to meet the situation, on December 31, 1940, Fidelity's corporate charter was amended, and its objects and powers were stated to be, "to issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and connected therewith, and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities", and its name was changed to Fidelity Assurance Association (243; 405; 701). Fidelity had not previously had charter powers to issue contracts of insurance (Ex. 20, 398; Appendix).

Under the West Virginia statutes (Code 33-9-1 and 33-2-12, Appendix) Fidelity's license, under said Article 9, to issue face-amount installment certificates would not expire until April 1, 1941. The West Virginia Auditor issued Fidelity a license as an insurance company for the period from January 1, 1941, to April 1, 1941, but with the requirement on the part of the Auditor and the agreement on the part of Fidelity that no insurance would be sold and no new annuity contracts would be sold (227; 246; 406; 438; 701; 940-941). Except as it may be contended that the sending out of certain riders, hereafter mentioned under the subtitle "Proceedings in the Circuit Court of Appeals", to be attached to certain Series B Contracts, containing Section 6, already in existence, were in violation of the agreement, Fidelity observed the agreement and sold no insurance contracts, sold no annuity contracts, did no business by virtue of this license, and no changes were made in the books of Fidelity, no transfers were made and no surplus was set up (230-232; 406; 416; 438; 529; 541).

State Suits

Fidelity made application for a license as an insurance company for the year commencing April 1, 1941, but the Auditor of West Virginia withheld the license applied for and on April 4, 1941, directed Fidelity to discontinue business (231-232; 246; 406; 702). On April 11, 1941, the State Auditor, pursuant to Chapter 33, Article 2, Section 5 of the West Virginia Code, apparently in collaboration with Fidelity (944; 1190-1192), "for the purpose of rehabilitating and reorganizing" Fidelity (1204; Ex. 70, 751; 579), filed a bill (Ex. 21, 398) in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, to take possession of the assets of Fidelity, and, Fidelity consenting thereto, receivers were appointed by said court (1192). The Auditor of West Virginia notified corresponding officials in the other states in which Fidelity was doing business (1215) and corresponding proceedings were promptly instituted in eleven other states (246; Ex. 29, 489; 499; 108).

Proceedings in the District Court

On June 6, 1941, Fidelity filed its petition in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia alleging insolvency and praying for reorganization under the provisions of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (6). On the same day, by ex parte order, the petition was approved and your petitioner, Central Trust Company, was appointed trustee (1). On June 10, 1941, the District Court directed the various state officials and court receivers to deliver to the trustee all property of the debtor in their hands (11). On August 9, 1941, while the plenary hearing was in progress and after certain answers and motions of intervenors had been filed, the District Court modified the orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941, requiring the state officials and receivers to turn over to the trustee the assets of the debtor by revising the turn-over requirements and enjoining state officials and receivers from disposing of such assets (102). The West Virginia receivers, under protest (80-81) and the Ohio receiver, without protest (507-508), turned over to the trustee the property of the debtor in their respective custodies, while the other state officials and receivers generally retained possession of the deposits in their custodies (247).

The Auditor of West Virginia, the receivers appointed in the state court proceeding in West Virginia, officials of other states, receivers appointed by other state courts, and others were permitted to intervene and file answers and motions controverting the allegations of the petition and denying the jurisdiction of the District Court for various reasons, among others, that Fidelity was an insurance company and not subject to the provisions of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, though the respondent Sims, State Auditor, originally admitted under oath that Fidelity was not an insurance company and was a corporation which could be adjudged a bankrupt (59), thereafter amending his answer (127), and that the petition was not filed in good faith; and the intervenors moved that the petition be dismissed and the turn-over orders be vacated (31; 48; 58; 79; 91; 93; 96; 118; 176-177; 186).

A protracted plenary hearing was had in the District Court after which the District Court found that Fidelity was not an insurance corporation, that the petition was filed in good faith, that the principal assets of Fidelity had been in the Southern District of West Virginia during the six months next preceding the filing of the petition, and that the filing of the petition, though not properly authorized originally, had been ratified by proper corporate action (187-202); and the District Court, by decree of January 5, 1942, approved the petition (175-176).

During the hearing, many witnesses testified that Fidelity could and should be reorganized (706-710; 732-737; 630-633; 689-692; 700-705; 479-481; 486-487; 450-451; 457; 415; 421; 322-323; 336-338; 525; 528; 544-545; 1105; 896; 942; Ex. 90, 802). Some memoranda looking toward the formulation of plans were presented (259; Ex's. 111, 112, 1075; Ex. 113, 1077; 1069; 1067), but no definite plan was acted upon by the District Court.

Proceedings in the Circuit Court of Appeals

The respondents, other than the Securities and Exchange Commission, appealed from the decree of the District Court to the Circuit Court. The respondent West Virginia Auditor filed in the Circuit Court a petition for the remand of the case to the District Court (217) and, for the first time, by said petition for remand, introduced into the record a showing that on December 31, 1940, Fidelity had sent out to the holders of Series B Contracts containing Section 6 a letter and certain riders in duplicate, one to be signed and returned to Fidelity and the other to be attached to the contract, by which Fidelity would assume the insurance obligations of such Series B Contract (218-219), and in the hearing in the Circuit Court of Appeals it was stipulated that 9,802 of these riders had been signed by the contract holders and returned to Fidelity (237). Fidelity did not in fact assume such insurance obligations for the reason that Fidelity was never authorized by the Auditor of West Virginia to engage in the insurance business (230; 406; 416; 438; 529; 541), and the insurance obligations continued to be carried by the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company as before (231).

The Circuit Court found that Fidelity was an insurance company, not eligible for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the petition had not been filed in good faith, apparently on the grounds that it was unreasonable to expect that any plan of reorganization could be effected (Sec. 146(3)) and that the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the prior proceedings pending in the state courts (Sec. 146(4)), reversed the judgment of the District Court and remanded the cause with instructions to the District Court to dismiss the petition (248-264).

The decree of the Circuit Court reversing the decree of the District Court and remanding the cause with instructions to dismiss, was entered on the 16th day of June, 1942 (263). The debtor, on the 13th day of July, 1942, presented its petition for a rehearing (264) to the Circuit Court which petition was denied by order of July 22, 1942 (267).

Upon application for a stay of the mandate, by assent of counsel, the Circuit Court entered an order on July 22, 1942, staying the mandate upon the condition that petition for certiorari be presented to this Court within thirty days, and modified the order of the District Court of August 9, 1941, so as to permit the various state officials and receivers to sell assets in their custody for the purpose of conserving the estate (268). Learning that some of the respondents considered the modification of the order of August 9, 1941, by the order of July 22, 1942, as a license to sell the assets in their custodies for liquidation, your petitioners, on August 7, 1942, filed a motion in the Circuit Court for modification of the amendatory order of July 22, 1942, so as to make it clear that the consent to the sale or exchange of assets was for conservation only and not for liquidation (271). This motion was set down for consideration at the next term of the Circuit Court (285). The presentation to this Court of the petition for certiorari and the subsequent granting of the petition apparently made further pressing of said motion unnecessary.

Petition for writ of certiorari was granted by this Court on October 12, 1942 (286; 87 L. ed. (Adv.) 33).

SPECIFICATION OF ERRORS URGED

The United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit erred:

1. In holding that the debtor, Fidelity, was an insurance corporation within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, Section 4 of Chapter III, and, particularly, Section 106(3) of Chapter X thereof, and, therefore, ineligible to file a petition for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.

2. In holding that Fidelity's voluntary petition for reorganization was not filed in good faith as defined by Section 146 of the Bankruptcy Act.

3. In refusing to affirm the order of the District Court approving the petition and in reversing the judgment of said District Court and remanding the case with instructions to dismiss the petition.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I. THE CIRCUIT COURT ERRED IN HOLDING THAT FIDELITY WAS AN INSURANCE CORPORATION INELIGIBLE TO FILE A PETITION FOR REORGANIZATION UNDER CHAPTER X OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

(1) By the Investment Company Act of 1940, the Congress clearly and definitely classified companies engaged in business activities such as those engaged in by Fidelity as "face-amount certificate companies", one type of investment company, and as companies other than insurance corporations.

(2) By the laws of the State of West Virginia, the state of incorporation, Fidelity was definitely classified as an annuity company as distinguished from an insurance company, and as a corporation other than an insurance corporation.

(3) Fidelity did not have charter powers to issue insurance contracts prior to the December 31, 1940, amendment to its charter, and the business engaged in and carried on by Fidelity was that of selling and issuing annuity contracts, and not insurance contracts.

(4) The charter amendment of December 31, 1940, was procured as one step in an abortive effort to effect a voluntary, extra-judicial reorganization of Fidelity, and neither the procuring of the charter amendment nor the doing of any act thereafter by Fidelity transformed Fidelity into an insurance company within the meaning of the term as used in the Bankruptcy Act, as defined in the Investment Company Act of 1940, or in fact.

II. The Circuit Court Erred In Holding That the Petition of Fidelity, Filed Under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, for Reorganization, Was Not Filed In Good Faith.

(1) That Fidelity had assented to the West Virginia State Court proceeding did not preclude Fidelity from filing its voluntary petition for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.

(2) The record not only does not show that "it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected", but, to the contrary, does show that it is quite reasonable to believe that a plan of reorganization can be effected.

Reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act is not limited to, and need not be, the complete rehabilitation of Fidelity as a going concern.

(3) The assets of Fidelity are physically located in many states. Already there are pending twelve separate proceedings in the courts of as many states. None of the state proceedings is under a state reorganization statute, and there is no prior proceeding pending in which the interests of the creditors are provided the safeguards afforded by Chapter X or in which the interests of creditors would be best subserved.

ARGUMENT

I. The Circuit Court Erred in Holding That Fidelity Was An Insurance Corporation Ineligible to File a Petition for Reorganization Under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.

Introduction

It is believed that this point can be presented more clearly by first considering Fidelity and its activities during the period of its unrestricted operations prior to December 31, 1940, when it ceased seeking new business and confined its activities to the receipt of installment payments on face-amount certificate contracts previously sold, and to the management of its properties and investments (406), and when, by charter amendment, it first obtained charter powers to issue life insurance policies and was licensed by the State Auditor as an insurance company (227), but licensed only upon condition that it issue no contracts of insurance and no new face-amount certificate contracts (438; 940-941). We shall then present the reasons why we believe that the character of Fidelity —from the point of view of eligibility to file a petition for reorganization under Chapter X—was not thereafter changed from that of a face-amount certificate company, eligible, to that of an insurance corporation, ineligible.

By the Investment Company Act of 1940, the Congress Clearly and Definitely Classified Companies Engaged in Business Activities Such as Those Engaged in by Fidelity as "Face-amount Certificate Companies", One Type of Investment Company, and as Companies Other Than Insurance Corporations.

It cannot be doubted that the Congress may, by reasonable classification, select the persons and corporations eligible for bankruptcy, voluntary or involuntary. International Shoe Company vs. Pinkus, 1928, 278 U. S. 261, 265; In re Wisconsin Co-operative Milk Pool, 1941, C. C. A. 7, 119 F. (2d) 999, 1002; Kansas vs. Hayes, 1932, C. C. A. 10, 62 F. (2d) 597, 599-600.

In fact, in the history of bankruptcy legislation, the Congress has at different times changed the classifications of eligibles and ineligibles. (See In re Supreme Lodge of Masons, 1923, D. C. N. D. Ga., 286 F. 180, 183).

By the Act of 1867 all moneyed, business or commercial corporations were made eligible for bankruptcy (Section 37, Act 1867). Under that Act, banks, railroads, building and loan associations, and insurance companies were all eligible for bankruptcy. The Act of 1898 provided for the bankruptcy of corporations principally engaged in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, mining or mercantile pursuits. The amendment of 1910 restored the general eligibility of moneyed, business or commercial corporations of the Act of 1867, but made the specific exceptions of municipalities, banks, railroads, and insurance corporations. Under that amendment building and loan associations were eligible for bankruptcy. More recently, under the Act of 1932 building and loan associations were added to the list of ineligibles. Neither the amendment of 1910 nor the amendment of 1938 specifically defined any of the excluded corporations.

Prior to 1910, whether or not a corporation was an eligible or an ineligible was determined by the principal activities of the corporation. (Remington, First Edition, Section 87). No doubt, in enacting the 1910 amendment, the Congress thought and intended that the classification of a corporation as an eligible or ineligible would continue to be determined by the corporate activities. We believe that, as will hereafter be argued, the business activities of the corporation have, in fact, continued to be recognized as the test (Remington, Fourth Edition, Section 92), though some confusion has been introduced into some of the decisions of some of the Circuit Courts of Appeals by resort to a supposed principle of selection, frequently referred to as the "state classification" principle.

Be that as it may, the Congress, by omitting to define the designated ineligibles in the amendments of 1910 and 1938, did not estop itself from providing a definition by some later act and, so far as distinguishing annuity, face-amount certificate, companies from insurance companies, we believe the Investment Company Act of 1940 has provided in unmistakable terms the definitions of face-amount certificate companies and of insurance companies and that such definitions by said Act were made for the purposes, among others, of bankruptcy and reorganization, and that, under said definitions, Fidelity was clearly a face-amount certificate company and not an insurance company, not only prior to the charter amendment of December 31, 1940, but, as well, thereafter.

In this connection it is well to recognize that there is no occasion for any express provision or enactment that annuity companies or face-amount certificate companies, are or shall be eligible for bankruptcy. Such companies, unquestionably being moneyed, business and commercial corporations, are under the general and comprehensive provisions of the Bankruptcy Act and are eligible unless they be of one of the five types of corporations excluded: municipalities, banks, railroads, insurance, building and loan. It is not contended by the respondents that Fidelity is of any type of the ineligible corporations other than insurance.

So, if the Congress, with a view to bankruptcy, has said that face-amount certificate companies, such as Fidelity, are not insurance companies, Congress has, by implication, said that face-amount certificate companies are eligible for bankruptcy, just as clearly, effectively, and unmistakably as Congress might have done by adding to the Investment Company Act or to the Bankruptcy Act in express words a provision that face-amount certificate companies should be eligible for bankruptcy. Stated otherwise: the Investment Company Act of 1940 dealt with investment companies, and particularly with face-amount certificate companies, one type of investment company, defined such companies and expressly preserved with respect to investment companies the jurisdiction of the district courts for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (Investment Company Act of 1940, Section 25, Appendix); and, further, for the purpose of distinguishing and exempting insurance companies, defined insurance companies. Said Act further expressly amended the Bankruptcy Act and inserted therein provisions for particular application to face-amount certificate companies, named as such (Investment Company Act, Section 29(b)). Therefore, when the Congress so recognized face-amount certificate companies as being within the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act by expressly reserving the jurisdiction for reorganization under Chapter X and by enacting particular provisions for application to face-amount certificate companies in bankruptcy, Congress meant face-amount certificate companies as defined in that Act. And a face-amount certificate company, as defined in said Act, is not an insurance company as defined in said Act.

By the Investment Company Act of 1940, Congress has defined a "face-amount certificate" as follows:

> "(a) When used in this subchapter and sections 72 (a), last sentence, and 107 (f) of Title 11, unless the context otherwise requires—*
>
> "• • •
> "(15) 'Face-amount certificate' means any certificate, investment contract, or other security which represents an obligation on the part of its issuer to pay a stated or determinable sum or sums

*Sections 72(a) and 107(f) of Title 11, Bankruptcy, are the provisions of the Investment Company Act of 1940, which expressly amended the Bankruptcy Act as such and in the following language:

Sec. 29. (a) Section 67 of an Act entitled "An Act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

at a fixed or determinable date or dates more than twenty-four months after the date of issuance, in consideration of the payment of periodic installments of a stated or determinable amount (which security shall be known as a face-amount certificate of the 'installment type'); or any security which represents a similar obligation on the part of a face-amount certificate company, the consideration for which is the payment of a single lump sum (which security shall be known as a 'fully paid' face-amount certificate)."

(15 U. S. C. A., §80a-2 (a) (15)).

Congress has defined an "investment company" as including the business of issuing face-amount certificates:

"(a) When used in this subchapter and sections 72(a), last sentence, and 107(f) of Title 11, 'investment company' means any issuer which

"• • •

"(2) is engaged or proposes to engage in the business of issuing face-amount certificates of the installment type, or has been engaged in such business and has any such certificate outstanding; or

"• • •"

(15 U. S. C. A. §80a-3 (a) (2)).

In fact, the "face-amount certificate company" is one of the three principal classes of investment companies:

"For the purposes of this subchapter and sections 72(a), last sentence, and 107(f) of Title 11, investment companies are divided into three principal classes, defined as follows:

"(1) 'Face-amount certificate company' means an investment company which is engaged or proposes to engage in the business of issuing face-amount certificates of the installment type, or which has been engaged in such business and has any such certificate outstanding.

"* * *"

(15 U. S. C. A., §80a-4 (1)).

Congress has gone further. The Investment Company Act of 1940 expressly amended certain sections of the Bankruptcy Act for particular application to face-amount certificate companies. It prescribed a particular method for the selection of the trustee:

"* * * If the bankrupt is a face-amount certificate company, as defined in section 80a-4 of Title 15, the court alone shall make the appointment; but the court shall not make such appointment without first notifying the Securities and Exchange Commission and giving it an opportunity to be heard."

Aug. 22, 1940, c. 686, Title I, §29(b); 11 U. S. C. A., §72a.

The Investment Company Act particularly amends the Bankruptcy Act with respect to deposits or transfers of securities by face-amount certificate companies (Aug. 22, 1940, c. 686, Title I, §29(a); 11 U. S. C. A., §107f(1) (a); (Appendix), manifesting an unmistakable Congressional intent that face-amount certificate companies be within the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. And Section 25 (15 U. S. C. A. 80a 25(d)) expressly recognizes and reserves the jurisdiction of district courts over investment companies under Chapter X relating to reorganization.

Counsel for the West Virginia respondents, in their brief in the Circuit Court, recognized that the Investment Company Act of 1940 provided for "bankruptcy of face-amount certificate companies."

The Investment Company Act does not stop with the defining of face-amount certificate companies but, for the purpose of contrasting investment companies, particularly face-amount certificate companies which are within the Act, with insurance companies which are excepted from the Act, defines an insurance company as follows:

> "(a) When used in this subchapter and sections 72(a), last sentence, and 107(f) of Title 11, unless the context otherwise requires—
>
> "• • •
>
> "(17) 'Insurance company' means a company which is organized as an insurance company, whose primary and predominant business activity is the writing of insurance or the reinsuring of risks underwritten by insurance companies, and which is subject to supervision by the insurance commissioner or a similar official or agency of a State; or any receiver or similar official or any liquidating agent for such a company, in his capacity as such."
> (15 U. S. C. A., §80a-2 (a) (17)).

Under this definition of an insurance company, even if the sending out by Fidelity of the riders to the Series B Contracts having the §6 (insurance) provisions were the making of insurance contracts as was concluded by the Circuit Court, we believe without thorough consideration, yet, Fidelity, would not be within the definition of an insurance company for the reason that, admittedly, the insurance features of the Series B Contracts were but incidental to the face-amount certificate contracts, the issuance of which was the primary and predominant business activity of Fidelity.

The Investment Company Act (15 U. S. C. A., 80a-3 (c) (3)), excludes an insurance company from the definition of an investment company, but face-amount certificate companies not only are not so excluded but are expressly defined as investment companies and as one of the three principal divisions thereof (15 U. S. C. A., 80a 3(a) (2), 4 (1)).

Section 3 of the Investment Company Act (15 U. S. C. A., 80a-3 (c) (6)) shows that the issuing of face-amount certificates is one of the principal earmarks of an investment company.

In this particular case, Fidelity is not exempted from the provisions of the Investment Company Act or of the Bankruptcy Act by Section 6 of the Investment Company Act (15 U. S. C. A., 80a-6 (a) (2)) for the reason that there was no proceeding pending in a court of the United States or of a state in which a receiver was appointed for Fidelity prior to the effective date of said Investment Company Act, which was, as to face-amount certificate companies, January 1, 1941 (Aug. 22, 1940, c. 686, Title I, §53, 15 U. S. C. A., §80a-52). The State court proceedings were not instituted until April 11, 1941 (Ex. 70, 751).

In connection with some of the argument hereinafter, it is significant to observe that by the very definition of an insurance company in the Investment Company Act (15 U. S. C. A., 80a-2 (a) (17)), the nature of the organization of the company, including charter powers, and the character of the state supervision are but conditions precedent, so to speak, to acceptance of a company as an insurance company. The really determinative factor is made dependent upon the company's "primary and predominant business activity", which, in order that the company be so classified, must be "the writing of insurance or the reinsuring of risks underwritten by insurance companies, * * *."

The Circuit Court in observing

"* * * But this question need not be decided now, for, in our opinion, the scope of the provision by > which municipal, railroad, insurance and banking corporations are excepted from bankruptcy proceedings is to be determined in any case by the classification of the corporation under the law of the state of its creation rather than by the character of its predominant business activity." (Italics ours.) (248), apparently overlooked the definition of an insurance company under the Investment Company Act when that Court said that the "predominant business activity" was not determinative, whereas Congress, using substantially the same terminology, had expressly provided that the "primary and predominant business activity" must be the writing of insurance if a company be considered an insurance company, as distinguished from an investment company.

Whatever may have been the status of the law prior to the enactment of the Investment Company Act of 1940, it is believed that by that Act the Congress has expressly defined corporations such as Fidelity as investment companies, companies other than insurance companies, and that the Circuit Court erred in finding that Fidelity was an insurance corporation.

By the Laws of the State of West Virginia, the State of Incorporation, Fidelity was Definitely Classified as an Annuity Company as Distinguished from an Insurance Company, and as a Corporation Other Than an Insurance Corporation.

It is not questioned that from 1912 to December 31, 1940, Fidelity operated under the provisions of Article 9, Chapter 33 of the West Virginia Code. Section 1 of said article (Appendix) expressly provides:

"• • • Provided, however, that this article shall not be construed as applying to persons, associations or corporations engaged in selling merchandise in installments, insurance companies, foreign or domestic, duly authorized to do business in this State, • • •." (Italics ours.)

If it can be said that the State classification of Fidelity is that Fidelity is an insurance company, then, by the very express terms of the article, enacted for the supervision and regulation of annuity companies, annuity companies, as insurance companies, are excluded from the operation of the statute, rendering the article, for all practical purposes, nugatory and without subject matter upon which to operate.

Again, the West Virginia statutes under which the state court proceeding was instituted in West Virginia (Code 33-9-10, 33-2-45, Appendix) provide that the insurance commissioner shall have the same authority in this respect over annuity corporations as he has over insurance companies. If Fidelity were an insurance company, there would be no reason for the enactment of any statute to make specifically applicable to annuity corporations the statutory provisions already applicable to insurance companies.

A corporation is not necessarily a banking, building and loan, or insurance corporation merely because it is chartered under laws relating generally to the banking, building and loan, or insurance business, or to the governmental departments which supervise or regulate them.

In the case In re Prudence Co., Inc., C. C. A. 2, 1935, 79 F. (2d) 77, the corporation involved was formed under the article of the Banking Law of New York relating to investment companies, and was under the supervision of the superintendent of banking, but it was held not to be a banking corporation within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. The Banking Law of New York was entitled "An Act in relation to banking corporations * * * and corporations under the supervision of the banking department".

So, with respect to Fidelity, the chapter of the West Virginia Code under which Fidelity operated was entitled "Insurance and Annuity Contracts", and, although insurance and annuity corporations may be dealt with by the same chapter of the West Virginia Code and may be under the supervision of the Insurance Commissioner, it cannot be contended that every corporation which operates under said Chapter 33 is an insurance company with any greater success than it was contended in the Prudence case that every corporation operating under the Banking Law of New York was a banking corporation. In Chapter 33 of the West Virginia Code there are different articles dealing with different types of corporations—particularly insurance corporations on the one hand and annuity corporations on the other—just as, under the New York Banking Law, there were different articles dealing with different types of corporations, including banking, trust, safe deposit, and investment companies. Article 9, Chapter 33 of the Code of West Virginia is the article under which annuity companies, defined by the Congress as face-amount certificate companies, have operated.

Likewise, in the case of Gamble v. Daniel, C. C. A. 8, 1930, 39 F. (2d) 447, the corporation involved, Peters Trust Company, was chartered under Title V of the laws of Nebraska. Article 19 of said Title V related to "Trust Companies," while Article 17 of said title related to "Banks." Although trust companies were invested with most of the powers usually exercised by a bank, the striking exception being that of receiving deposits, it was held, and properly so, that the corporation involved was a trust company and not a banking company, and was subject to bankruptcy.

In Capital Endowment Company v. Kroeger, C. C. A. 6, 1936, 86 F. (2d) 976, 979, following the Prudence case, it was held:

> "* * * But the present debtor is not an insurance corporation. It was organized under the general incorporation law of Ohio, and while it later qualified as a bond investment company, it is not denied that it abandoned this field prior to the filing of its petition. The mere fact that bond investment companies were placed under the supervision of the Superintendent of Insurance could neither enlarge their powers nor alter their business * * *." (Italics ours.)

It is not without significance that the State Auditor, who, as ex-officio Insurance Commissioner, had supervised the activities of Fidelity for eight years, in his answer and controversion to the petition (59), which was duly verified by him (79), said:

>
> "Respondent admits that the debtor is a corporation which could be adjudged a bankrupt under the Federal Bankruptcy Act, and is not a municipal, insurance or banking corporation, or building and loan association, and is not a railroad corporation authorized to file a petition under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.
> "* * *"

As a matter of pleading this admission by the State Auditor was amended (127) upon motion of counsel for the State Receivers, assented to by counsel for Fidelity, but as a matter of evidence it may be questioned whether the force of the sworn admission is materially lessened by the unverified amendment by counsel.

Apart from the effect of the Investment Company Act of 1940, it is earnestly believed that by the laws and administrative practices of the State of West Virginia Fidelity has been classified as a corporation other than an insurance corporation.

(3)

Fidelity Did Not Have Charter Powers to Issue Insurance Contracts Prior to the December 31, 1940 Amendment to its Charter, and the Business Engaged in and Carried on by Fidelity was that of Selling and Issuing Annuity Contracts, and not Insurance Contracts.

If thought be given to the multiple and diverse powers that are found in the charters of many corporations, the different types of state statutory provisions under which corporations are chartered, the different agencies by which corporations of some types are supervised or regulated, and the many different businesses in which a single corporation frequently engages, it is immediately apparent that a practical and orderly administration of the law permits one and only one real rule of classification; that is, the rule of classification based upon the primary and predominant business activity, usually referred to as the "corporate activities" test.

That is the principle which has been applied by this Court in determining whether a corporation, even though chartered under state insurance laws, is or is not an insurance corporation under the revenue statutes. Bowers v. Lawyers Mortgage Co., 1931, 285 U. S. 182; United States v. Home Title Insurance Co., 1931, 285 U. S. 191.

That is the principle adopted by the Congress in enacting the Investment Company Act of 1940, distinguishing investment companies from insurance companies.

In the last analysis that is the principle which has been applied even in the cases in which lip service has been given to the so-called "state classification" principle.

In adopting the definitions of the Investment Company Act of 1940, beyond doubt the Congress accepted and adopted the principle or test laid down by this Court in the Lawyers Mortgage Company and Home Title Insurance Company cases and, recognizing the impracticability of the so-called "state classification" principle or test as reflected by the decisions of various of the circuit courts of appeals which had attempted to apply the so-called "state classification" principle, adopted the real and practical test of business activities.

The only remnant of the so-called "state classification" theory found in the Investment Company Act definitions is that which would restrict, rather than extend, the corporations defined and thereby classified as insurance companies by limiting an insurance company to that "which is organized as an insurance company, * * " and " * * which is subject to supervision by the insurance commissioner or a similar official or agency of a state; * * *" even though the primary and predominant business activity of the corporation might be "the writing of insurance or the reinsuring of risks underwritten by insurance companies". In other words, even though the primary and predominant business activity of the corporation might be the writing of insurance, it would still not be an insurance company, under the Investment Company Act definition, unless it were organized as such and subject to supervision by a state insurance commissioner. On the other hand, even though such company might be so organized and subject to supervision by a state insurance commissioner, it would, nevertheless, not be an insurance company unless its primary and predominant business activity were the writing of insurance.

The so-called "state classification" theory has been practicable for application only in those situations where the business activities were clearly harmonious with the charter powers, their statutory source, and the nature of the regulatory agency, if there were a regulatory agency (See Security B. & L. Association v. Spurlock, C. C. A. 9, 1933, 65 F. (2d) 768; Republic Underwriters v. Ford, C. C. A. 5, 1938, 100 F. (2d) 511; In re Pacific States Savings & Loan Co., D. C. S. D. Cal. C. D., 1939, 27 F. Supp. 1009; and State of Kansas v. Hayes, C. C. A. 10, 1932, 62 F. (2d) 597). On the other hand, where the nature of the charter powers and their statutory source have been debatable, the corporate activities have been actually relied upon even though lip service may have been given to the "state classification" theory. In re Prudence Co., Inc., C. C. A. 2, 1935, 79 F. (2d) 77; Clemons v. Liberty Savings, etc., C. C. A. 5, 1932, 61 F. (2d) 448; Capital Endowment Co. v. Kroeger, C. C. A. 6, 1936, 86 F. (2d) 976; Gamble v. Daniel, C. C. A. 8, 1930, 39 F. (2d) 447.

The "business activities" have been accepted as the true basis of classification when the inquiry was whether or not the corporation was a "moneyed, business or commercial corporation." In re Roumanian Workers Association of America, C. C. A. 6, 1940, 108 F. (2d) 782; Schuster v. Ohio Farmers Co-op. Milk Association, C. C. A. 6, 1932, 61 F. (2d) 337.

Where the Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, attempted to apply logically the "state classification" theory, the result was that the Union Guarantee & Mortgage Company (In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Company, C. C. A. 2, 1935, 75 F. (2d) 984, 985) was held to be an insurance corporation ineligible for bankruptcy and reorganization because that company was organized under the insurance law of the State of New York, while the Prudence Company (In re Prudence Co., Inc., 79 F. (2d)

77) was held to be neither an insurance company nor a banking company for the reason that it was not incorporated under the insurance laws and, though incorporated under the Banking Law, it was under the article of the Banking Law relating to investment companies rather than to banks, although the business of the Prudence Company was, for all practical purposes, identical with the business of the Union Guarantee and Mortgage Company. Of the business of the Union Guarantee and Mortgage Company in the opinion it was said: "* * * and its business was to make loans secured by mortgages on real property which it sold to its customers with a guaranty." Of the business of the Prudence Company in the opinion it was said: "* * * Its business has consisted in making mortgage loans on real estate and selling the mortgages to the public with its guaranty of payment."

With these decisions no doubt before the committees thereof, it is not surprising that the Congress, in enacting the Investment Company Act of 1940, did not adopt as the basis for classification in its definitions the so-called "state classification" rule.

Fidelity did not have charter powers to issue insurance contracts prior to December 31, 1940, and had never issued a single policy. Even after December 31, 1940, Fidelity did not have actual state authority to issue a single insurance policy (438). As another step in the abortive effort at voluntary extra-judicial reorganization, it sent to the holders of Series B Contracts, including Clause 6, the insurance feature, and received back, accepted by the contract holders, a number of offers to the contract holders to assume the insurance obligation carried by the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company incidental to some of Fidelity's annuity, face-amount certificate, contracts, at a time when Fidelity was not bona fide licensed to sell insurance contracts and when, and after which time, in fact, the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company continued to carry the risks incidental to such annuity contracts. But Fidelity has not incurred a penny's liability under said insurance riders, so-called, it not appearing from the record that the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company is not fully solvent and able and willing to meet all of the obligations of its insurance contracts.

Fidelity has not, in fact, at any time engaged in the insurance business at all. Much less has insurance been at any time the principal business activity of Fidelity.

The Charter Amendment of December 31, 1940, was Procured as One Step in an Abortive Effort to Effect a Voluntary, Extra-judicial Reorganization of Fidelity, and Neither the Procuring of the Charter Amendment nor the Doing of any Act Thereafter by Fidelity Transformed Fidelity into an Insurance Company Within the Meaning of the Term as Used in the Bankruptcy Act, as Defined in the Investment Company Act of 1940, or in Fact.

Counsel for the respondents, other than the Securities and Exchange Commission, in filing briefs in opposition to the petition, divided the legal points among themselves (Brief, Edgar B. Sims, etc., et al., in opposition to petition, p. 4). Counsel to whom the particular point was assigned stated:

> "The Respondents do not contend that investment companies or face-amount certificate companies are excluded from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. Likewise, the Respondents do not contend and the Circuit Court of Appeals did not hold that prior to December 31, 1940, the Debtor was an insurance company and not an investment company or face-amount certificate company. * * " (Italics ours.) (Brief, John B. Gontrum, etc., p. 9.)

" * * We have made no claim and make none here that Fidelity was an insurance company prior to December 31, 1940." (Italics ours.) Brief, Banking Commission of Wisconsin, et al., pp. 25-26.)

We do not know whether or not the same concession will be made by counsel for the respondents in the briefs upon the hearing in this Court, or in oral argument. Though the concession is but an inescapable conclusion, and a very proper one, it was not made in the Circuit Court.

The concession, if renewed, should also dispose of the contention previously made in the Circuit Court by counsel for the respondents and apparently accepted by the Circuit Court (255-256) that Fidelity was an insurance company for the reason that, under the statutes of West Virginia relating to life insurance companies (Code 33-3-7; Appendix) and under like statutes of many other states (see statutory references in footnote to Circuit Court Opinion (256)), life insurance companies are authorized to issue annuity contracts. This argument was that life insurance companies under the statutes of West Virginia and those of several other states were authorized to issue annuity contracts; Fidelity issued annuity contracts; Therefore, Fidelity was an insurance company.

The fallacy of such a contention is immediately apparent and was clearly exposed in the case of Gamble v. Daniel, C. C. A. 8, 1930, 39 F. (2d) 447, in which it was held that a trust company was not a banking corporation merely because it had many of the powers enjoyed and exercised by banking corporations. The corporation there considered, although it was invested with most of the powers usually exercised by banking corporations, did not have the authority to receive deposits. So, in the case at bar, life insurance companies may issue annuity contracts and annuity companies of course may issue annuity contracts, but the fact that the annuity company may exercise that one power which the insurance company also has, does not mean that the annuity company is an insurance company when the annuity company does not have the really determinative power, the power to issue insurance contracts, the criterion of an insurance company.

So, if, as we believe we have demonstrated and as counsel for the respondents have heretofore conceded, Fidelity was not an insurance company prior to December 31, 1940, let us see what Fidelity has done on and after December 31, 1940, to be transformed into an insurance company.

Fidelity did procure a charter amendment on December 31, 1940, which would have authorized it to issue life insurance contracts, had it been able otherwise to qualify under the laws of the State of West Virginia and of other states as an insurance company (West Virginia Code 33-3-1; Appendix).

The West Virginia Auditor issued Fidelity a license as an insurance company from January 1, to April 1, 1941—it is said, in order to enable Fidelity to continue to receive installment payments upon its annuity contracts previously sold—but upon the express condition, gentlemen's agreement, that Fidelity would not sell anything "until they got right" with the Auditor's Office (227; 438).

Fidelity already had a license as an annuity company to receive such installment payments up to April 1, 1941 (West Virginia Code 33-9-1, 33-2-12; Appendix). This license was not canceled or revoked, except as limited by the so-called gentlemen's agreement, and, if the installment payments were received by Fidelity under any license, it is more likely that they were received under the annuity company license already in effect than under the new insurance license which, in reality, was never effective.

Counsel for the respondents have contended, and no doubt will contend in this Court, that, after the effective date of the Investment Company Act, January 1, 1941, as an annuity company which had not qualified and could not qualify under the Investment Company Act, Fidelity could not legally receive through the United States mail such installment payments even on annuity contracts previously sold. If receiving through the mails such installment payments was illegal for Fidelity as an investment company, annuity company, its activities in this respect were not purged of their illegality by the mere procurement of the insurance company charter, because Fidelity could not become an insurance company under the Investment Company Act merely by amending its charter, but only in addition thereto by causing the issuance of insurance contracts to become its "primary and predominant business activity". Fidelity, in procuring from the West Virginia Auditor the license as an insurance company for the purpose of receiving such installment payments, had definitely agreed with the Auditor not to issue any insurance contracts (406; 438; 940-941).

Next, the respondents will insist, as they have heretofore done, that, in violation of the agreement with the West Virginia Auditor, Fidelity did write some 9,802 insurance contracts or reinsurance agreements to assume as many risks by sending out to the holders of Series B Contracts containing Paragraph 6, the insurance clause, some 14,626 in number, the letter and rider offering to assume the insurance responsibility which was carried by the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company, 9,802 of such riders being returned to Fidelity accepted by the contract holders (237-238). But even then the tail would wag the dog. Such insurance, even if assumed by Fidelity, which it was not in fact, was but an optional feature incidental to the annuity contracts sold by Fidelity, the selling of which—certainly, prior to its purporting to assume the insurance obligations to the contract holders, in fact carried by the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company—was the sole business of Fidelity, and the servicing of which, after such purported assumption, was the only business activity of Fidelity. Even if it should be conceded arguendo, which we do not do, that, by attaching these riders to these 9,802 annuity contracts, Fidelity entered into the identical insurance obligations which the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company had undertaken, still such life insurance undertaking would be but incidental to Fidelity's own annuity contracts and a minor phase of Fidelity's business activities. Disregarding the other series of contracts issued by Fidelity, this rider was accepted by only 9,802 of the 14,626 holders of Series B Contracts containing the insurance provision (237-238), and, of the typical monthly payment of $7.50, only 25 or 50 cents, depending upon the age of the contract, was attributed to the insurance feature (683; 771). So long as the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company continued to carry the insurance—as it did, in fact—the purported assumption by Fidelity, if it had any legal effect at all, would be nothing more than "additional security" for the contract holders as was observed in Bowers v. Lawyers Mortgage Company, 285 U. S. 182, 189, with respect to the activities of the company there under consideration which procured title insurance from a title insurance company but guaranteeed the mortgage loans.

As a matter of fact, all of these things done on and after December 31, 1940, did not change Fidelity's business activities or financial obligatons in the least. They were simply steps taken in an abortive attempt at voluntary extra-judicial reorganization (1188; 1087-1091; 941-943; 881; 895-896).

Fidelity could not continue as an investment company because of the Investment Company Act of 1940 (243; 866-867). An insurance company, as defined by the Investment Company Act, was exempt from the provisions thereof. Fidelity wanted to become such an insurance company. It was successful in the first step, the procurement by amendment of its charter of the charter powers to issue contracts of life insurance. Fidelity had no further success in its efforts to make the transition. It never did obtain the legal right to issue life insurance contracts. The license to operate as an insurance company issued to it by the West Virginia State Auditor was a pure sham. Fidelity had a writing purporting to be a license giving it the right to issue life insurance contracts, but the licensing authority, the West Virginia State Auditor, having the power to stop all of Fidelity's business activities—as, in fact, he did early in April, 1941—delivered the sham license to Fidelity only upon the condition and agreement that Fidelity would issue no insurance contracts and no new annuity contracts; and Fidelity accepted and agreed to the conditions (940-941).

Fidelity sent out and received back, accepted by many of the annuity contract holders, the rider to the annuity contracts by which it would have assumed the insurance obligations carried by the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company—when, if ever, Fidelity could clear with the West Virginia State Auditor and get the right to issue insurance contracts. That time never came. Fidelity continued to remit the insurance premiums to the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company, just as it had done before, and the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company continued to carry the insurance risks, just as it had done before (230-232).

These annuity contract riders—contended by the respondents to be life insurance policies—issued by Fidelity were but an aftermath of the hearing of this case. Their existence was never presented to the District Court, presumably because they were recognized as having no legal or factual significance, but they were first presented in the Circuit Court by the West Virginia State Auditor in a petition for a remand of the case to the District Court. The petition for the remand was not acted upon by the Circuit Court, but, without further development of the circumstance other than the procurement of a stipulation by counsel that 9,802 of such riders had been returned to Fidelity accepted by the contract holders and the filing of an affidavit by the secretary of Fidelity that Fidelity had issued no insurance contracts, the Circuit Court found that:

> "In the meantime (between December 31, 1940, and April 1, 1941), however, the company (Fidelity) had issued a substantial number of policies of insurance in the following manner, without requiring payment from the insured. * * *" (Parentheses ours.)

and, after reciting the history of the riders, concluded the observation by saying:

> "* * * The company continued to pay the premiums on the group policy issued by the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company so as to continue it in force." (246).

If these abortive attempts at voluntary extra-judicial reorganization changed the character of Fidelity and destroyed its eligibility for reorganization or bankruptcy, then any corporation, without the knowledge of its creditors, may avoid, and deny to its creditors, bankruptcy, including the benefits of reorganization, by having its charter so amended as to give it insurance, banking, or building and loan association powers, and the corporation will be excluded from reorganization or bankruptcy not only if it never issues a policy, receives a deposit, or makes a loan, but even if it never receives unencumbered state authority to engage in such business activities. It is hardly possible that such could have been the intent of the Congress.

The effort at voluntary extra-judicial reorganization failed and it is respectfully submitted that the abortive effort did not alter the character of Fidelity as a corporation other than an insurance corporation as counsel for the respondents have conceded Fidelity to have been prior to that effort.

II. The Circuit Court Erred in Holding That the Petition of Fidelity, Filed Under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, for Reorganization, Was Not Filed in Good Faith.

(1)

That Fidelity Had Assented To The West Virginia State Court Proceeding Did Not Preclude Fidelity From Filing Its Voluntary Petition For Reorganization Under Chapter X Of The Bankruptcy Act.

It is not disputed that Fidelity assented originally to the State Court proceeding.

No doubt, as matters have developed, it would have been wiser had Fidelity filed a petition under Chapter X prior to the effective date of the Investment Company Act without making the futile effort to escape the operation of said Act by attempting to convert Fidelity into an insurance company, or, probably, failing in the effort to convert, to have resisted the proceeding in the West Virginia state court and to have immediately filed the petition in the District Court for reorganization.

However that may be, there was no great delay upon the part of Fidelity in recognizing the insufficiency and confusion of the many proceedings in the several state courts and the futility of relying upon the state court proceedings for reorganization (542). There were already differences of opinion between the West Virginia receivers and the Wisconsin receivers with respect to the objectives sought to be attained and the procedure therefor (412; 500). West Virginia has no reorganization statute (1206) and the West Virginia proceeding was no more than an equity receivership. It does not appear that any of the other state court proceedings were under reorganization statutes, if there are any such statutes in the other states concerned.

Even if the assent of Fidelity to the West Virginia state court proceedings were prompted by other than the most commendable motives, which we do not admit, the filing of the petition for reorganization in the District Court by Fidelity was not estopped. The controlling consideration is not the motive which impelled the filing of the petition, but is the interests of the creditors and stockholders and, in this case, it being apparent that all interests of the stockholders are gone, the creditors. Even though the officers of Fidelity may have lost their investments as stockholders, and Fidelity's assets may be less than its debts, yet Fidelity and its officers have a reponsibility to its creditors and a duty to take such action as may best subserve the interests of the creditors, however many mistakes Fidelity and its officers may have previously made.

In the Marine Harbor case (1942, 87 L. ed. (adv.) 73, 76), the holding in the Rembaugh case (Brooklyn Trust Co. v. Rembaugh, C. C. A. 2, 110 F. (2d) 838) that a petition was not filed in good faith when the petitioner filed the same seeking to escape the jurisdiction of a state court to which it had voluntarily submitted its case, was disapproved; and it was held that the desire of the petitioner to escape the prior proceeding was immaterial and that the inquiry which Congress had prescribed by Section 146 (4), Chapter X, was whether "the interests of creditors and stockholders" would be better subserved by the prior proceeding or by the proceeding under Chapter X. In the Marine Harbor case it was found upon the particular facts there involved, the assets consisting of a single property and but one class of creditors being really interested, that the petition failed to show that the interests of the creditors and stockholders would be best subserved by the proceeding under Chapter X, but it was not because the petitioner had participated in the prior state court proceeding even though it was under the New York reorganization statute sometimes referred to as the Schackno Act.

The view of this Court in the Marine Harbor case presents a striking contrast to the estoppel doctrine which the Circuit Court would, at least by implication, apply to the case at bar in the observation that:

> "• • • Since the company deliberately assumed this new character to escape the requirements of the new federal and state statutes with respect to annuity companies, no weight should be given to the company's attempt to pose as an annuity company in the pending petition in bankruptcy. • • •" (255.)

If it appears from the record that the filing by Fidelity of the petition for reorganization will best subserve the interests of the creditors, the filing of the petition bespeaks good faith on the part of Fidelity and Fidelity's previous attitude towards reorganization under Chapter X or towards the state court proceeding is not material.

The Record Not Only Does Not Show That "It Is Unreasonable To Expect That A Plan Of Reorganization Can Be Effected", But, To The Contrary, Does Show That It Is Quite Reasonable To Believe That A Plan Of Reorganization Can Be Effected.

Reorganization Under Chapter X Of The Bankruptcy Act Is Not Limited To, And Need Not Be, The Complete Rehabilitation Of Fidelity As A Going Concern.

The scope of reorganization is very wide. It may include (1) "the sale or transfer of all or any part of its (debtor's) property to one or more other corporations theretofore organized or thereafter to be organized"; (2) "the merger or consolidation of the debtor with one or more other corporations"; or (3) "the sale of all or any part of its property, either subject to or free from any lien, at not less than a fair upset price and the distribution of all or any assets, or the proceeds derived from the sale thereof, among those having an interest therein". (Section 216(10), 11 U. S. C. A. 616(10).)

Obviously, and, as has been held in a number of cases* under this statute, as under 77B, reorganization is not lim-

*Slow, orderly, unified liquidation through another corporation. In re Central Funding Company, C. C. A. 2, 1935, 75 F. (2d) 256, 259. Group of stockholders eliminated. In re Mortgage Securities Corporation, C. C. A. 2, 1935, 75 F. (2d) 261. May be successor corporation. Capital Endowment Company v. Kroeger, C. C. A. 6, 1936, 86 F. (2d) 976, 979. Substitution of new debtor. Continental Insurance Company v. Louisiana Oil Refining Corporation, C. C. A. 5, 1937, 89 F. (2d) 333, 336. Not necessary that debtor present it-ited to the full and complete rehabilitation of the debtor as a going concern, as the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals would seem to indicate to have been the only concept of reorganization entertained by that court (259).

In the Marine Harbor case in the Circuit Court of Appeals (1042, C. C. A. 2, 125 F. (2d) 296, 298), it was observed in the majority opinion:

> "* * * But even if it be unreasonable to expect that new money will be forthcoming or that any plan can be effected which will provide anything for the debtor or its shareholders, we do not think clause 3 of section 146, 11 U. S. C. A. Sec. 546 (3), requires dismissal of the debtor's petition; the reorganization may still go on in the interest of such creditors as shall be found entitled to share in the debtor's assets. * * *"

Judge Frank, agreeing with the majority opinion in this respect adds (p. 301):

> "The majority opinion recognizes that it is not at all necessary in order to avoid dismissal of a petition pursuant to Section 146 (3), to show that 'it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization be effected,' in which the debtor or its stockholders will participate. In the instant case, for instance, where, as the majority opinion states, the claims of the certificate-holders exhaust the debtor's property and no equity remains for the stockholders, there is no reason why (unless the stockholders furnish needed new money or other needed new consideration) a plan cannot be effected by self as a going concern proposing to continue as such. R. L. Witters Associates v. Ebsary Gypsum Company, C. C. A. 5, 1938, 93 F. (2d) 746, 746. which, without the expense or delay involved in foreclosure, the property will promptly be turned over to a new company, having no debts, all of the stock being ratably distributed among the certificate-holders. That some such plan can reasonably be expected to be effected under Chapter X is, we all agree, sufficient to prevent a dismissal pursuant to Clause (3)."

---

There is much testimony of qualified witnesses that in the opinion of such witnesses Fidelity can be reorganized.

The witness D. A. Burt, a man of wide business experience and connections (706), is of opinion that Fidelity can and should be reorganized. Upon an actuarily sound plan he believes that new capital might be available. The plan might embody insurance in whole or in part (706-710). The witness Hubert F. Young, whose business is that of supervising investments (630), believes that Fidelity could and should be reorganized. The reorganization might be effected through merger with another company having adequate capital or by the organizing of a mutual company, and the reorganized activities might include both annuities and insurance (630-633). The respondent and witness Edgar B. Sims, State Auditor and Ex-Officio Insurance Commissioner, who had supervised the activities of Fidelity for some eight years (434), thought there could be a reorganization under a mutual insurance company (457). H. Isaiah Smith, one of the respondent State Court Receivers, who also has given his full time to the affairs of Fidelity as an employee of the Trustee, is of opinion that Fidelity can be reorganized (479-480). Allen G. Messick, former chairman of the board of Fidelity, believes that there can be reorganization upon the basis of creating reserves consistent with the returns upon the securities available (544-545). The witness Raymond Latta, who has had experience in insurance reorganization (1057-1058), says that it is possible to construct an actuarial plan of reorganization for Fidelity (1105) which might, if necessary, include a deferred liquidation (1123). Pell, Ltd., a financial organization, offered to buy the stock of Fidel, a subsidiary of Fidelity, and definitely expressed interest in Fidelity (1226). See also the testimony of Howard E. Reed (732-737).

There was and is much atmosphere or "color" about this proceeding substantiating the opinions expressed by these and other witnesses.

As has already been noted, the State Auditor who instituted the State Court proceeding and who, together with the receivers appointed in the State Court proceeding instituted by him (not depreciating the interests of the other respondents), may aptly be referred to as the principal respondents, was of the opinion that there could be reorganization and brought the suit for the purpose of rehabilitating and reorganizing Fidelity (457; 836; 1204). The State Auditor had even suggested the possibilities of resorting to "77B" (889; 1187). Counsel for the West Virginia receivers, among the principal respondents, states that he believes that there can be reorganization in the State Court (486; 624), but not in the Federal Court. In connection with this expressed view, it may be remembered that West Virginia has no reorganization statute and that reorganization in the State Court is necessarily limited to voluntary reorganization (1188; 1206), while the Federal Court has been invested by the Congress with jurisdiction to administer Chapter X, a very modern statute carefully drawn, after diligent study and research, for the very purpose of facilitating reorganization. The record shows many conferences among the Fidelity officers and representatives and by them with the State Auditor and with representatives of the Securities and Exchange Commission, all looking to reorganization (1190; 1087-1089; 1203; 895-896; 1155-1157). As was observed by the witness Risley, "Reorganization was the only thing that we were considering." "Reorganization is the only word that I heard mentioned in any of those conferences" (896). The possibilities of proceeding under Chapter X were considered (889; 950-952; 1184-1186) but resort was had to the State Court proceeding as a deliberate, though unwise, choice with full knowledge that the facilities of the reorganization court exercising jurisdiction under Chapter X might ultimately be necessary (704). The State Court receivers intended and were expected to present a plan of reorganization (689; 823-830).

Fidelity's aggregate assets amount to, in round figures, $21,100,000.00, or approximately ninety per cent (90%) of its aggregate liabilities, $23,476,000.00 (242; 196). The reserve funds of Income Reserve Contracts Series A, B, C, and D are solvent (1215; 632-633; 492-493; Ex. 21, 398). From 1934 until the end of 1940 the Series B Contracts represented a very large part of Fidelity's entire business (680; 685).

Upon the record the District Court concluded that Fidelity had met the burden of showing that it was not unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization might be effected.

The record shows very little with respect to the attitude of the creditors. The creditors have directly participated in the proceeding in only a most limited way. The only respondents who are creditors are L. H. Brooks, Trustee, Frederic Leake and A. L. Goldberg, Jr., Trustee. The other respondents are state officials, receivers or commissions. Though no point has been made thereof, it may be questioned whether they are persons who may controvert the petition (11 U. S. C. A. 544). Until the creditors have knowledge of the possibilities of reorganization, it could hardly be expected that they would be able to formulate their own opinions upon the merits of reorganization or upon any particular plan.

Not to anticipate the discussion herein of 146 (4) but rather to suggest that this proceeding has not yet reached the stage where the attitude of the creditors has any particular significance, it may be recognized that to develop such information and present it to the creditors in a fair and impartial way is one of the very important features of Chapter X and one of the safeguards to creditors provided thereby. The indifference of individual creditors towards their own interests or their inability to present them was one of the principal reasons for the enactment of Chapter X, to rescue the creditors from complete reliance and dependency upon the information supplied and recommendations made by interested reorganization committees in the equity receivership proceedings, and to place upon the reorganization court under Chapter X the duty and responsibility of assembling full information and of presenting it to the creditors with sufficient fullness to enable the creditors to exercise an informed judgment. It is, therefore, not surprising that the creditors have not yet been active in this case. They cannot act intelligently until they are informed of their rights and interests.

Upon this record, can it be said that it is unreasonable to expect that some insurance or investment company can be found to take over or buy the assets of Fidelity under a contract for the benefit of the Fidelity contract holders, to issue them investment certificates or insurance policies, of one or more kinds of greater value than the dividends to such contract holders through the liquidation of Fidelity would buy? Such an arrangement would afford the contract holders the benefit, in whole or in part, of the original selling costs of insurance policies or investment certificates which are, comparatively speaking, high and which will have been lost to the contract holders of Fidelity unless some plan of reorganization is effected (1103-1104). The purchaser of the assets might give the contract holders an option of taking in cash their determined equities in liquidation or of accepting an insurance policy or an investment contract which such equity would buy. A beneficial merger might be worked out with some other investment company or an insurance company. As suggested by the respondent West Virginia State Auditor (457), the organization of a mutual company to administer Fidelity's assets for the benefit of the contract holders is not beyond the realm of consideration. It should not be unreasonable to expect that at least the solvent funds or series of the Fidelity contracts might be reorganized and the solvent funds or series constitute a very material part of the assets and business of Fidelity (680). These observations are something more than a mere suggestion of remote possibilities. They are suggestions supported by the record and thoughts which should not be relegated to the realm of mere possibilities as distinguished from probabilities until there has been some opportunity to transform them into realities.

It is of course true that no plan of reorganization has yet been presented either to the Court or to the creditors, but it is also obvious that during all of this time, since the filing of the petition, when the basic jurisdiction of the District Court has been in controversy, no opportunity has been afforded for a determination of the rights and interests of the many classes of creditors, without which the formulation of a practical plan, for submission to the Court and then to the creditors, would be a patent impossibility.

Just as valuation data, including debts and their classification, is necessary to enable the court to approve the plan, so also must the trustee have this information in a far-reaching and complicated case such as the case at bar in order to prepare a plan. Chapter X contemplates a full accounting as a condition precedent to the approval of the plan (Consolidated Rock Products Co. v. du Bois, 312 U. S. 510, 520, 523; 11 U. S. C. A. 575). Obviously this information could not be had prior to the determination of the basic jurisdiction of the reorganization court.

Necessarily good faith may be found in advance of the submission of a plan. Ordinarily jurisdictional good faith must be considered before the time for the presentation of any plan.

It is not believed that this case, long drawn out in the consideration of basic jurisdictional questions, had reached the stage of critical examination of plans of reorganization (Continental Illinois Bank & Trust Company v. C. R. I. & P. R. Co., 294 U. S. 648, 685; Chicago T. & T. Co. v. Forty-one thirty-six W. Corp., 1937, 302 U. S. 120, 133-134; R. L. Witters v. Ebsary Gypsum Company, 93 F. (2d) 746, 748; In re Julius Roehrs Company, C. C. A. 3, 1940, 115 F. (2d) 723, 724). The trustee should have an opportunity to explore the possibilities of reorganization, with assurances of the jurisdiction of the court by which appointed and, when there is no controversy with respect to the basic jurisdiction, with knowledge and after the determination of the broad principles by which the nature and extent of the claims of the many creditors are to be determined (In re Marine Harbor Properties, C. C. A. 2, 1942, 125 F. (2d) 296, 298).

The foregoing observations have been made from the point of view of a reorganization by merger, or by the sale of assets to some other corporation with a contract by the purchaser to pay in cash or by an insurance or annuity contract the full value of the various claims of the creditors of Fidelity as determined by the value of the assets of Fidelity in which the several classes of creditors may participate, as ascertained in this proceeding, or by the organization of a new mutual corporation entirely for the benefit of the creditors, or some such practical device. But, as a last resort, even a slow, orderly, unified, beneficial liquidation, which we do not believe to be inevitable in this case, is within the scope of reorganization and would certainly seem to be more practicable and more beneficial to the creditors than the divergent liquidations and distributions in the distinct and separate state proceedings as hereinafter discussed (In re Central Funding Corporation, supra; In re Mortgage Securities Corporation, supra; R. L. Witters Associates v. Ebsary Gypsum Company, supra; In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Company, supra; Bankruptcy Act, Chapter X, Sec. 216 (10); 11 U. S. C. A. 616 (10)). The District Court was well within its proper powers and jurisdiction in considering this as a possibility of reorganization in the last resort, in the event more desirable plans of reorganization for any reason should not materialize or should not be approved by the creditors.

The District Court had much upon which to base its conclusion that it was not unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization could be effected, and its finding in this respect should not have been reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. (In re Mount Forest Fur Farms of America, C. C. A. 6, 1939, 103 F. (2d) 69, 71, Cert. Den. 308 U. S. 583; In re Equity Company, 115 F. (2d) 570, 572-3.)

The Assets Of Fidelity Are Physically Located In Many States. Already There Are Pending Twelve Separate Proceedings In The Courts Of As Many States. None Of The State Proceedings Is Under a State Reorganization Statute, And There Is No Prior Proceeding Pending In Which The Interests Of The Creditors Are Provided The Safeguards Afforded By Chapter X Or In Which The Interests Of Creditors Would Be Best Subserved.

Securities of Fidelity have been deposited in fifteen states and yet remain there. Twelve distinct proceedings have been brought in as many states (246). Should this proceeding be dismissed it is likely that there will be three more such suits in courts of additional states.

The first suit was brought in the West Virginia State Court and the suits in the other states shortly followed. Differences of opinion between the West Virginia court receivers and the Wisconsin officials with respect to the management and disposition of the assets held in Wisconsin arose immediately (500; 542).

There is no single prior proceeding having jurisdiction over any of the assets of Fidelity other than those found within the borders of the particular state in which the proceeding was instituted or over all of the creditors of Fidelity. These proceedings in the several state courts are not under any reorganization statute and, apart from the want of jurisdiction of any particular proceeding over either the property of Fidelity generally or the persons interested in the subject matter, any reorganization which might be hoped for through the State Court proceeding could be only by voluntary agreement (1206; 1100-1101; 1188).

The West Virginia State Court proceeding is only a proceeding in the nature of an equity receivership. The proceedings in the other states are equivalents thereof.

Section 77B was enacted to supply deficiencies in the old equity receivership proceedings and, later, Chapter X was enacted to supply deficiencies in both the old equity receivership proceedings and in the proceedings under Section 77B. One of the most striking of such deficiencies was the absence of any provision to inform fully the creditors and stockholders in order that they might intelligently consider the propos'ls of the corporate or reorganization management which of course had superior knowledge and occupied advantageous positions. In other words, Chapter X was designed to provide safeguards for the creditors and stockholders against the superior knowledge and advantageous position of the management.

In the Marine Harbor case, involving only one property and only one class of creditors really interested, the problem was a simple one, not necessitating the safeguards provided by Chapter X. However, the opinion in the Marine Harbor case clearly recognized the superiority of the Chapter X proceeding when the affairs of a corporation might be complicated. In the opinion it was observed > "• • • And it is asserted that comparable safeguards are wholly or largely lacking in proceedings under the Schackno Act. Those considerations would be highly relevant and persuasive if this was a case of the usual reorganization proceeding dealing with more than one class of securities under the older procedures which chap. X was designed to improve and supplant. See Securities & Exch. Commission v. United States Realty & Improv. Co., supra (310 US p. 448, 84 L. ed. 1299, 60 S. Ct. 1044, 42 Am. Bankr. Rep. (NS) 602) H.

Rep. No. 1409, 75th Cong. 1st Sess. pp. 37 et seq. Then the safeguards afforded by chap. X would have special significance in protecting the respective classes of investors against improvident, unfair or inequitable adjustments, compromises, and settlements—steps which are basic to the reorganization process but which in selfish hands led to much abuse. * * *" (Marine Harbor Properties, Inc. v. Manufacturer's Trust Co., 87 L. ed. (Adv.) 73, 77).

The opinion in the case of Securities & Exchange Commission v. United States Realty & Improvement Co., 1939, 310 U. S. 434, 448-450, presents the importance of the various safeguards of Chapter X.

The insufficiencies of the equity receivership proceedings are pointed out and the safeguards of Chapter X are considered and discussed by Judge Frank in his dissenting opinion in the Marine Harbor case, while that case was in the Circuit Court of Appeals (In re Marine Harbor Properties, Inc., 1942, 125 F. (2d) 296, 302-306).

Among other factors of the Chapter X proceeding which enable proceedings thereunder to better subserve the interests of creditors are: the advisory reports of the Securities & Exchange Commission on the feasibility of the plan, as well as upon the question of whether or not the plan is fair and equitable; the report to creditors under Section 175, showing the creditors' interests and the value thereof, the creditors otherwise having no independent means of obtaining impartial information and advice; the independent study by the Securities & Exchange Commission and the examination by the court exclude collusive programs; the plan to be submitted to the creditors must be approved by the court prior to the submission to the creditors, which eliminates the reluctance which the court might otherwise have about rejecting a plan after much work had been done to secure its approval; the independent appraisal of the assets of the debtor's estate by the Securities and Exchange Commission, an expert and disinterested agency, is of indispensable value to the proceeding—the importance of such an independent appraisal is fully shown in First National Bank of Cincinnati v. Flershem, 1934, 290 U. S. 504; the reorganization court has jurisdiction to retain supervision for the purpose of seeing that the plan is fully and fairly carried out.

No single one of the state courts is in a jurisdictional position to review all of the liabilities of Fidelity or to appraise its assets in order to give the creditors the information required by Section 175 of Chapter X. It does not appear that the state courts have the services of experts provided by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

It should be borne in mind that these various provisions or safeguards were adopted after long study by the Securities and Exchange Commission and were based upon the experiences of the equity receiverships and the proceedings under Section 77B and the needs demonstrated thereby.

If these safeguards do not better subserve the interests of creditors than do the procedures in the ordinary equity receiverships, then the work of Congress in causing the problems and necessities to be studied and in enacting Chapter X has been largely in vain. And if the Congress meant by Section 146(4) that the old equity receivership, from the standpoint of good faith, subserved the interests of creditors in a complicated and far-reaching case just as well as does the proceeding under Chapter X, then Congress impliedly recognized the futility of its own work.

To the contrary, Congress expressly provided by Section 256 that the petition for reorganization under Chapter X might be filed and approved notwithstanding the pendency of prior proceedings, thus recognizing that many such prior proceedings would likely be insufficient or inefficient as compared with the procedure as provided by said Chapter X, recognizing also that resort might have been had to prior proceedings collusively for the very purpose of avoiding or escaping the requirements of Chapter X for the protection of creditors (Judge Frank in the Marine Harbor case, 125 F. (2d) 296, 306) (1094; 1103-1105).

It is not a sufficient answer for the respondents to say that they will voluntarily do all of these things in the several state court proceedings which Chapter X requires to be done in the reorganization proceeding. In the first place, no one of the state courts has the territorial jurisdiction over the subject matter and persons to do these things in behalf of all the creditors. The Congress has found it to be necessary to provide these safeguards as statutory procedural requirements, having found the voluntary inclinations to do these things, in the absence of statute, to be insufficient for the protection of creditors scattered throughout the land and individually holding several claims ordinarily of the size not sufficient to sustain individual participation in the widely dispersed litigation sufficient to protect the interests of the individual creditors, even assuming, which would probably be contrary to the fact, that a few interested and active creditors would be able, in the face of the inaction of thousands of others relying upon the management, to protect even their own interests.

It may also be recalled that the Congress has declared particularly that the business of investment companies, face-amount certificate companies, meaning the business of Fidelity, is affected with a national public interest, strongly suggesting that such a business can be effectively administered only by a court having national jurisdiction, which national jurisdiction has been invested in the bankruptcy court by Section 111 of Chapter X (11 U. S. C. A. 511).

Could it be that the Congress intended by Section 146(4) that the interests of the creditors of a business affected with a national public interest, actually extending into twenty-nine states, would be subserved better by the administration by twelve distinct state courts of limited territorial jurisdiction than by a single national court having national jurisdiction including jurisdicton of all property involved and all persons concerned?

If Congress contemplated that the interests of such creditors would be best subserved by the several state proceedings conducted without the statutory safeguards found to be necessary by the Congress, then Congress did not accomplish much by providing the statutory safeguards or by conferring upon the national courts full jurisdiction to administer them.

If voluntary reorganization through the state proceedings be relied upon, it is obvious that the creditors—many individuals having relatively small separate claims—will be at the mercy of those having charge, so to speak, of the several state court proceedings, one of the shortcomings of the old equity receivership for the elimination of which Chapter X was adopted.

None of the state court proceedings is under a statute which requires that the plan of reorganiaztion be submitted to the creditors only after it has been approved by the court, as is provided by Chapter X. None of these state proceedings is under a statute having provisions comparable to those of Chapter X for participation and guidance by an informed statutory agency such as the Securities and Exchange Commission.

At this time we are concerned only with jurisdictional questions and not with the relative rights and equities of the various creditors of Fidelity. However, since whether the jurisdiction of the District Court or the several jurisdictions of the state courts will best subserve the interests of creditors is a jurisdictional matter as related to good faith, it would seem to be not inappropriate to observe that there are some real questions which sooner or later will have to be resolved by some court with respect to the relative rights and interests of the various creditors and classes of creditors.

It is a real question whether any or all, and, if not all, which ones of the several series of contracts have resulted in the creation of trusts in particular assets for the benefit of the creditors whose payments have been invested therein. If any one or more of the series of contracts has resulted in the creation of a trust for the benefit of the contract holders whose payments have been invested in particular assets, there is then the question whether these assets may be followed and impressed with the trust in the hands of the state officials with whom such assets have been deposited (606-607; 611-612; 635-649; 653-655; 1072; 1179).

It is obvious that these questions must be finally resolved before the various creditors and classes of creditors can know what their interests in the assets of Fidelity are and the value thereof. Certainly these questions must be finally resolved before there is any distribution of the assets of Fidelity.

The several state representatives, as well as the Tennessee creditors as represented by L. H. Brooks, Trustee, Frederic Leake and A. L. Goldberg, Jr., Trustee, apparently have proceeded upon the assumption that the several state deposits were made from free assets of Fidelity and should be applied upon the claims of the various creditors resident in the respective states (52; 94; 99-100) and, without regard for the claim that when such securities were deposited in such states, such securities were already, by the terms of such annuity contracts, held by Fidelity in trust for the holders of annuity contracts of the particular series, without regard for state lines, and under circumstances which might charge the state officials with knowledge of the trusts to which the securities accepted by them were subject (654-655).

The several state court proceedings at least threaten distribution of the assets held by the several states without the judicial determination of the possible rights and interests of the out-of-state creditors having interests or rights to participate in such assets. Obviously, these rights and interests must be determined before there can be any proper distribution of the assets and Chapter X (Sections 196 and 197) requires such ascertainment promptly after the petition is approved.

The question of the right of the contract holders to improve their contracts is also an important one. A contract does not have a surrender value until a substantial number of installments have been paid thereon (684). Do the contract holders who were not in default but who had not made sufficient installment payments to give their contracts a surrender value have the right to continue the payments and thus bring about a surrender value (1261-1262)? This question also should be definitely determined before there is any distribution of the assets of Fidelity.

There is a substantial surplus of assets in Wisconsin, and there appear to be small surpluses in Delaware, Iowa, Missouri, and Alabama. Can it be that the interests of the creditors are best subserved by imposing upon them the responsibility of presenting their claims in the courts of many states in order to preserve their rights to participate in the distribution of all of the assets of Fidelity in which they are legally entitled to participate, however great or small the particular group of assets may be?

We believe, rather, that the very purposes of the Investment Company Act, and of the amendments thereof to the Bankruptcy Act, and of Chapter X were to avoid any such confusion and futility.

The Circuit Court seemed to be of opinion that the interests of the creditors would be best subserved because many questions of state law will likely arise and may be better determined by state courts. But questions under the laws of many other states also will arise in the courts of the several states. It would seem that the courts of one state would be in no better position to determine the laws of other states than is a federal court to determine the laws of the several states. Federal courts have always been required to consider state laws and there is no reason to believe that the District Court will not respect the laws of the several states involved when they become of importance in this proceeding.

The Circuit Court, following the case In re Union Guarantee and Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984, accepted and approved the philosophy that "* * * Congress in excepting from the Bankruptcy Act those corporations, such as insurance, railroad and banking corporations, whose business during their active life and whose liquidation in case of insolvency are strictly regulated by State law. * * *" (262) manifested an intent to abandon such corporations, so to speak, because of the alleged conceded superiority of state supervision in these respects. If such ever were the Congressional policy, and it may have been at some earlier day, that Congressional policy was most certainly changed, in so far as face-amount certificate companies are concerned, by the enactment of the Investment Company Act of 1940, which found and declared that the activities of investment companies, including face-amount certificate companies, were affected with a national public interest and provided for their supervision and regulation by a federal agency, the Securities and Exchange Commission, during life, and also made available for their administration, upon their demise, the bankruptcy courts, with Securities and Exchange Commission participation.

In the Marine Harbor case the property was located in only one state and there was only one class of creditors that could, by any possibility, participate in the assets of the debtor. The proceedings in the case at bar involve assets in many states and creditors, obviously, of many classifications as holders of the several series of contracts issued by Fidelity and questions with respect to the assets in which the various classes of creditors are entitled to participate.

The situation in the case at bar is more like that considered by United States District Judge Bryant in the National Surety Company case (In re National Surety Company, 7 Fed. Supp. 959, 961), with respect to which the following observation in the opinion is convincing:

"It is with regret that I refuse to take jurisdiction. I say this because it is apparent that future administration could be more readily carried on under one control than under the limited jurisdiction of several state courts. It seems almost a travesty to have to deny to this company the benefits of sections 77A and 77B of the Bankruptcy Act while its principal subsidiary is being administered thereunder. However, to hold differently would be the taking of powers that Congress did not deem it wise to give."

The jurisdiction which Judge Bryant considered to be so needed in the National Surety Company case exists in the case at bar and its appropriateness and superior suitability is clear.

If there ever has been or ever will be a case in which a single court of competent jurisdiction is needed to take charge of the diverse and complicated affairs of a debtor corporation for the purposes of reorganization, even if that reorganization be no more than an orderly liquidation, we believe it is the case at bar; and, we further believe that Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act and the Investment Company Act of 1940 were tailor made, so to speak, to meet this situation, and that this is not a factual situation with respect to which there could possibly be a prior state court proceeding which would best subserve the interests of the creditors.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons aforesaid, it is urged that Fidelity is not an insurance company, that the voluntary petition of Fidelity for reorganization under Chapter X was filed in good faith, that the order of the United States

Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit should be reversed, and that the order of the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia should be affirmed.

FEDERAL STATUTES

Bankruptcy Act

CHAPTER III

Section 4, (11 U. S. C. A. 22):

(a) Any person, except a municipal, railroad, insurance or banking corporation or a building and loan association, shall be entitled to the benefits of this Act as a voluntary bankrupt.

(b) Any natural person, except a wage earner or farmer, and any moneyed, business, or commercial corporation, except a building and loan association, a municipal, railroad, insurance or banking corporation, owing debts to the amount of $1,000 or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this Act. • • •

CHAPTER X

Section 106(3), (11 U. S. C. A. 506):

For the purposes of this chapter, unless inconsistent with the context—

(3) "corporations" shall mean a corporation, as defined in this Act, which could be adjudged a bankrupt under this Act, and any railroad corporation excepting a railroad corporation authorized to file a petition under Section 77 of this Act.

Section 144, (11 U. S. C. A. 544):

If an answer filed by any creditor, indenture trustee, or stockholder shall controvert any of the material allegations of the petition, the judge shall, as soon as may be, determine, without the intervention of a jury, the issues presented by the pleadings and enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith and that the material allegations are sustained by the proofs, or dismissing it if not so satisfied.

Section 146, (11 U. S. C. A. 546):

Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term "good faith," a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if—

(1) • • •

(2) • • •

(3) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected: or

(4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding.

Section 216(10), (11 U. S. C. A. 616(10)):

A plan of reorganization under this chapter—(10) shall provide adequate means for the execution of the plan, which may include: the retention by the debtor of all or any part of its property; the sale or transfer of all or any part of its property to one or more other corporations theretofore organized or thereafter to be organized; the merger or consolidation of the debtor with one or more other corporations; the sale of all or any part of its property, either subject to or free from any lien, at not less than a fair upset price and the distribution of all or any assets, or the proceeds derived from the sale thereof, among those having an interest therein; the satisfaction or modification of liens; the cancelation or modification of indentures or of other similar instruments; the curing or waiver of defaults; the extension of maturity dates and changes in interest rates and other terms of outstanding securities; the amendment of the charter of the debtor; the issuance of securities of the debtor or such other corporations for cash, for property, in exchange for existing securities, in satisfaction of claims or stock or for other appropriate purposes.

Investment Company Act of 1940

Title I

Section 29(a), (11 U. S. C. A. 107 (f)):

Sec. 29. (a) Section 67 of an Act entitled "An Act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"f. (1) For the purposes of, and exclusively applicable to, this subdivision f (a) 'debtor' shall mean a face-amount certificate company as defined in section 4 of the Investment Company Act of 1940; (b) 'face-amount certificate' shall mean a face-amount certificate as defined in section 2 of the Investment Company Act of 1940; (c) 'depositary' is a person or State agency with whom securities or other property of a debtor is deposited or to whom property of a debtor is transferred, in trust or otherwise, pursuant to the requirements of a State law or an agreement by the debtor providing for the distribution of such property or its proceeds to creditors or security holders of the debtor in the event of the insolvency of the debtor or under other specified circumstances;

(d) 'deposit creditor' is a creditor who, under the provisions of a State law or agreement providing for a deposit with or transfer to a depositary, has rights as to the securities or property so deposited or transferred which exceed the rights of a general creditor; and (e) 'State agency' is an official or agency of a State designated to act as depositary or to distribute property, or the proceeds of property held by a depositary.

"(2) Every deposit or transfer of securities or other property made by or on behalf of a debtor with or to any depositary for the benefit or protection of or to secure the holder of any security sold by or on behalf of the debtor on or after January 1, 1941, shall be voidable as against the trustee of such debtor if the property of the estate is insufficient for the full payment and discharge of all claims on account of all face-amount certificates sold by or on behalf of the debtor, and such deposit or transfer and every lien created thereby shall thereupon be avoided by the trustee subject to the provisions of paragraph 3 of this subdivision f.

"(3) In the event any deposit or transfer described in paragraph 2 of this subdivision f shall be avoided the trustee shall segregate the property received by the trustee from the depositary and charge the same with the costs and expenses of maintenance and liquidation and distribute the net proceeds thereof to the creditors who would have been entitled thereto under the provisions of the law or agreement providing for the deposit or transfer of the property, and each such creditor shall thereafter be entitled to dividends from the estate only after all creditors of the same rank shall have received the same percentage.

"(4) The court shall have summary jurisdiction of any proceedings to hear and determine the rights of any parties under this subdivision f and to hear and determine the sufficiency of the property of the estate for the full payment and discharge of all claims on account of all face-amount certificates sold by or on behalf of the debtor. Due notice of any hearing in such proceedings shall be given to every depositary and State agency which is a party in interest.

"(5) Where the provisions of subsection (c) of section 28 are not applicable, the provisions of this section will not apply."

Section 3(c3 (3) and (6), (15 U. S. C. A. 80-a-3 (c) (3) and (6)):

Notwithstanding subsections (a) and (b), none of the following persons is an investment company within the meaning of this title:

(3) Any bank or insurance company; any savings and loan association, building and loan association, co-operative bank, homestead association, or similar institution, or any receiver, conservator, liquidator, liquidating agent, or similar official or person thereof or therefor; * * *.

(6) Any person who is not engaged in the business of issuing face-amount certificates of the installment type or periodic payment plan certificates, and who is primarily engaged in one or more of the following businesses: (A) Purchasing or otherwise acquiring notes, drafts, acceptances, open accounts receivable, and other obligations representing part or all of the sales price of merchandise, insurance, and services; (B) making loans to manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers of, and to prospective purchasers of, specified merchandise, insurance, and services; and (C) purchasing or otherwise acquiring mortgages and other liens on and interests in real estate.

Section 25(d) (15 U. S. C. A. 80a-25(d)):

(d) Nothing contained in this section shall in any way affect or derogate from the powers of the courts of the United States and the Commission with reference to reorganizations contained in the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, as amended.

STATUTES OF WEST VIRGINIA

Michie's 1937 Code

Chapter 33, entitled "Insurance and Annuity Contracts"

Article 2, entitled "General Provisions"

Section 5. Issuance of License by Insurance Commissioner.—Upon receiving such certified copy and statement, the insurance commissioner may examine such company or association, and if he finds that it has complied with the terms of its charter or articles of association and the laws of this State, and with all the provisions in other sections of this chapter prescribing conditions precedent to the issuance of a license, or certificate of authority, and is satisfied that it is solvent (or if chartered or organized under the laws of any foreign country, is solvent in the United States), he may issue to it a license, or certificate of authority, stating such facts and authorizing it to issue policies, make contracts of insurance, and transact business in this State.

Section 12. Time Licenses Shall Continue in Force.—All licenses, or certificates of authority issued by the insurance commissioner to insurance companies or associations, or agents, solicitors or brokers, shall continue in force until the first day of April next following their issuance, unless the same be sooner revoked.

Section 45. Proceedings in Circuit Court of Kanawha County against Insolvent Company.—Whenever any company under the supervision and regulation of the insurance commissioner shall become insolvent or shall be in such financial condition as not to be able to pay its creditors in this State, the commissioner of insurance may file a bill in the circuit court of Kanawha county for the administering of the assets of such company as an insolvent, and for the purpose of taking possession of its property in this State and the distribution of its assets among those entitled thereto according to their respective right.

Article 3, entitled "Life Insurance"

Section 1. Capital of Life Insurance Companies.—No life insurance company shall be admitted to do business in this State, or shall, directly or indirectly, enter into contracts of insurance, issue policies, take risks or transact business in this State, unless it has at least two hundred thousand dollars cash capital fully paid up or a like amount of cash surplus, securely invested: Provided, That this section shall not apply to fraternal benefit societies organized in pursuance of the provisions of article eight of this chapter.

Section 7. Annuities May Be Issued by Life Companies.—Life insurance companies chartered by and doing business in this State, and empowered to make contracts contingent upon life, may grant and issue annuities, either in connection with or separate from contracts of insurance based upon life risks, and all such annuities heretofore issued by such companies shall be valid.

Article 9, entitled "Annuity Contracts"

Section 1. License from Insurance Commissioner Prerequisite to Engaging in Business.—No person, association or corporation shall engage in the business of soliciting or receiving deposits or payments on any annuity contract or certificate or annuity bond in fixed and stipulated installments, within this State, without first having obtained from the insurance commissioner a license to do business in this State: Provided, however, That this article shall not be construed as applying to persons, associations or corporations engaged in selling merchandise in installments, insurance companies, foreign or domestic, duly authorized to do business in this State, building and loan associations, national banks and banking institutions organized and authorized to do business under the laws of this State, fraternal insurance societies, or surety companies doing business under the laws of this State. Such license shall be issued for one year, or the fractional part of a year, and for issuing the same a fee of ten dollars shall be charged; and the provisions of section twelve, article two of this chapter shall apply to such license.

Section 2. License Prerequisite to Negotiating Contracts.—No person, association or corporation shall sell or offer for sale or deliver within this State any contract, certificate or bond of any person, association or corporation required by this article to obtain a license from the insurance commissioner to transact business in this State until such license has been issued by said insurance commissioner.

Section 3. Deposits to be Made with the Treasurer.—Before a license to transact business in this State shall be issued by the insurance commissioner to any person, association, or corporation, within the purview of section one of this article, the insurance commissioner shall require the applicant to deposit with the state treasurer (in accordance with article five, chapter twelve of this code), in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders, bonds of the state of West Virginia, or such other bonds, and securities including bonds issued by the West Virginia bridge commission as may be approved by said insurance commissioner, or both, to the aggregate amount of one hundred thousand dollars, and, in addition to such deposit, such person, association or corporation shall maintain at all times a deposit with the state treasurer of bonds and securities approved by the insurance commissioner to an amount equal to the total amount which such person, association or corporation may be liable to pay in cash to the holders of all contracts under the terms thereof at the time of the deposit: Provided, That when, by the laws of any other state, any such person, association or corporation shall have been required to make and shall have made such deposit in such state, equal or greater in amount for the benefit of contract holders in such state, upon the filing of a certificate to such effect from the proper officer in such state with the insurance commissioner of this State, such person, association or corporation shall not be required to make such deposit with the treasurer of this State for the benefit of its contract holders in such other state; and when the laws of any other state require such deposit less in amount, such person, association or corporation shall file a certificate from the proper officer in such state with the insurance commissioner of this state showing the amount of the deposit made, and shall deposit with the treasurer of this state an amount which, together with the deposit made in such other state, shall make up the total amount required by this state to be deposited by such person, association or corporation, and such contract holders in such other state shall not be entitled to the benefit of the securities deposited with the treasurer of this State under this article, except so much of such deposit as may be made to complete the total amount required by this article where the law of any other state requires a lesser amount.

The insurance commissioner may require an independent appraisal, at the expense of the company, of any property on which it holds a mortgage or trust deed or any bond or other investment offered by such company for the purpose of complying with the deposit provisions of this article.

Section 5. Revocation of License on Failure to Make Additional Deposits or Insufficiency of Assets.—On the failure of such person, association or corporation to deposit such additional bonds and securities with the state treasurer when so required by the insurance commissioner, the license to do business in this State shall be revoked by the insurance commissioner. Whenever the insurance commissioner, upon an examination of the affairs of any such person, association or corporation, finds that the liabilities of such person, association or corporation exceed the assets thereof, the insurance commissioner shall suspend the license of such person, association or corporation until he is satisfied that the assets of such person, association or corporation are increased to exceed said liabilities.

Section 10. Authority of Insurance Commissioner; Control of Deposit Where License Revoked.—The insurance commissioner shall have the same authority over every person, association, or corporation engaged in selling annuity contracts, certificates, or bonds, as over insurance companies, and if in his opinion the assets are impaired or such person, association or corporation is not complying with the law, said commissioner shall have authority to revoke the license of such person, association, or corporation to do business in this State, and, if such license is so revoked, the deposit or a sufficient amount of same, shall remain under the authority and control of the insurance commissioner until the total liability of all the contracts, certificates or annuity bonds or contracts issued by such person, association or corporation in this State is redeemed or settled.

Chapter 46, Acts of 1941 (Michie's 1941 Cumulative Supplement to the West Virginia Code of 1937, Chapter 32, entitled "Speculative Securities and Fraudulent Sales", Article 3, entitled "Registration and Sale of Face-Amount Certificates")

Section 1. Definitions.—For the purposes of this article the term "face-amount certificate" shall mean any certificate, investment contract, or other security which represents an obligation on the part of its issuer to pay a stated or determinable sum or sums at a fixed or determinable date or dates more than twenty-four months after the date of issuance in consideration of the payment of periodic installments of a stated or determinable amount; or any security which represents a similar obligation on the part of its issuer, the consideration for which is the payment of a single lump sum.

All other terms used herein shall have their respective meanings, as provided in section two, article one of this chapter.

Section 2. When Certificates Exempt from Registration. — Face-amount certificates issued by a person licensed and supervised by the insurance commissioner of this state shall be exempt from registration under the provisions of this article.

Section 3. Restriction on Sale.—No face-amount certificates, except those exempt under the provisions of section two hereof, shall be sold within this state unless such face-amount securities shall have been registered as hereinafter provided.

Section 4. Registration of Certificates.—Face-amount certificates shall be registered hereunder by the filing of an application with the commissioner by the issuer or by any dealer properly registered under the provisions of section twelve, article one of this chapter: Provided, That the issuer of such certificates is registered under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "Investment Company Act of 1940." Such application is to be in the form prescribed by the commissioner. With each such application there shall be filed a certified copy of the registration statement which was filed by the issuer of such certificates with the securities and exchange commission pursuant to the provisions of section eight of the said "Investment Company Act of 1940."

The commissioner may require that the applicant file with him such additional data and information respecting the issuer as he shall deem necessary and pertinent to registration hereunder.

The commissioner shall have power and authority to place such conditions, limitations and restrictions on any registration as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this article.

Section 5. Fees for Registration.—At the time of filing the application mentioned in section four of this article, the applicant shall pay to the commissioner a fee of one-twentieth of one per cent. of the aggregate face-amount of the certificates to be sold in this state for which the applicant is seeking registration, but in no case shall such fee be less than twenty-five dollars, nor more than three hundred dollars.

Section 6. Expiration of Registration; Reregistration.—Every registration under this article shall expire on the thirtieth day of June in each year. New registrations for the succeeding year shall be issued upon written application, the applicant furnishing the commissioner, upon request, information as hereinbefore provided, and paying the commissioner a fee on the basis specified in section five of this article on the aggregate face-amount of the certificates to be sold in this state within the year to be authorized by registration. Applications for renewal registration must be made not less than thirty days before the first day of the ensuing registration year, otherwise they shall be treated as original applications.

Section 7. Nonresident Issuer to File with Application for Registration Written Appointment of State Auditor as Attorney in Fact; Service and Acceptance of Process.—When any issuer of face-amount certificates shall not be domiciled in this state, he shall file with every application for registration hereunder (whether such application be made by the issuer in person or by or through a registered dealer) his irrevocable written appointment of the state auditor, or his successor in office, to be his true and lawful attorney in fact, who may accept or upon whom may be served, any lawful process or pleading in any action or proceeding against him in any court of record in this state, and such filing shall constitute his consent that any such process or pleading against him, which is properly served upon the state auditor or is accepted by the state auditor, shall be of the same legal force and validity as process or pleading duly served upon said issuer in this state. In case any process or pleading is served upon the state auditor, or accepted by him, such service shall be made in duplicate, one copy of which shall be filed in the office of the state auditor and the other immediately forwarded by registered mail to the principal office of the issuer against whom such process or pleading is directed.

Section 8. Sales to Be Made Only by Registered Dealers.—Face-amount certificates shall be offered for sale and sold in this state only by dealers and salesmen registered with the commissioner under the provisions of section twelve, article one of this chapter.

Section 9. Violations; Penalties.—Any person subject to the provisions of this article, who shall sell or offer for sale any face-amount certificates within this state without complying with the provisions of this article, or who continues to sell or offer for sale any such certificates after his registration has expired, or has been revoked or suspended by the commissioner, or who shall otherwise neglect or refuse to comply with any of the provisions of this article, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Section 10. Applicability of Sections.—Sections three, four, six, nine, and twenty-seven, article one of this chapter, shall not apply to this article. All other sections of this chapter shall apply fully to this article.

Section 11. Provisions Severable.—If any part or section of this act shall be declared unconstitutional or invalid by any court, such declaration shall not affect any other part or section hereof.

Section 12. Article Nine, Chapter Thirty-three, Repealed.—Article nine, chapter thirty-three of the code of West Virginia, one thousand nine hundred thirty-one, is hereby expressly repealed.

CHARTER POWERS OF FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION UNDER 1912 AMENDMENT

III. The objects and purposes for which this Corporation is formed are as follows:

To purchase, acquire, buy, sell, own, hold, dispose of and deal in stock, bonds, mortgages, debentures, obligations, and other securities of corporations and persons for its own account and for others on commission; to loan money on real estate security; to loan money on personal and other security; to acquire, own, deal in and sell real estate, to erect houses thereon, rent and sell the same, to lay out real estate into divisions and lots and to sell and dispose of same; to deal in real estate and to buy, sell and exchange the same for others for a commission or reward; to underwrite in whole or in part any issue of stocks, bonds or other securities; to transact as agents on commission the general business of real estate and insurance in all its branches; to transact on commission the general business of a fiscal agent; to transact any other business incident to any of the above named enterprises which a person, firm or partnership might engage in or do.

To carry on, by purchasing existing businesses, or otherwise, the business of soliciting or receiving deposits or payments on any annuity contracts, certificates or annuity bonds; in fixed and stipulated instalments or otherwise; to acquire and sell and offer for sale or delivery any contract, certificate or bond, of any person, association or corporation, now or hereafter engaged in this state in the business of soliciting, or receiving deposits or payments of any kind of annuity contracts, certificates or annuity bonds; and further to engage in the business of placing or selling certificates, bonds, debentures, certificates of interest, or investment securities of any kind on the partial payment, instalment, or any other plan of payment, and providing for the sale, redemption, or retiring of the same or any part thereof; and generally to carry on all lawful business necessary or incidental to all or any of the above mentioned objects.

The designation of any one of the objects and purposes aforesaid is not intended and shall not be taken to be a limitation or qualification upon any other of the said designated objects and purposes.

REPLY BRIEF OF PETITIONERS

---

FOREWORD

Three briefs have been filed on behalf of various respondents. One has been filed on behalf of the Banking Commission of Wisconsin and the Commissioner of Insurance of Iowa, jointly, to which we shall refer as the "Wisconsin Brief". Another has been filed on behalf of Edgar B. Sims, State Auditor of West Virginia, and H. Isaiah Smith and Ross B. Thomas, West Virginia State Court Receivers, to which we shall refer as the "West Virginia Brief". A third has been filed on behalf of the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland, to which we shall refer as the "Maryland Brief". It had been expected that a Brief would be filed on behalf of L. H. Brooks, Trustee, et al., Tennessee creditors, but, although the time for filing respondents' briefs has long since passed, no such brief has yet been received. If such brief were filed, it would be referred to as the "Tennessee Brief". A brief purporting to be a "Joint Amici Curiae Brief" on behalf of the attorneys general of a number of states and some other counsel has been filed.

The appropriate state abbreviations, followed by numerals, will indicate page references to these state briefs. Otherwise, the terminology and references will be in general the same as those followed in the Brief of Petitioners.

SCOPE OF REPLY BRIEF

The number and volume of the several briefs of the respondents make impracticable, if not impossible, the preparation and printing of separate detailed reply briefs, or of a single brief replying in detail to the several briefs of the respondents within the time elapsing between the filing of the respondents' briefs and the day of argument. We shall present in this reply brief some of the fallacies common to the respondents' briefs and generally reply thereto, and, in addition, shall comment upon some of the more flagrant errors of the several briefs of the respondents.

ARGUMENT

The respondents take the position that nothing will constitute a reorganization of Fidelity except the complete rehabilitation of Fidelity as a going concern carrying on the same business that Fidelity carried on prior to December 31, 1940, in substantially the same manner; and, since it is obvious that there must be some readjustment of Fidelity's business, they argue that there is no alternative between such complete rehabilitation and immediate liquidation. Upon this fallacious premise the respondents then argue that, since nothing is to be done except immediately to liquidate and distribute the assets of Fidelity, the petition was not filed in good faith for the reason that under Sec. 146 (4) the state courts better subserve the interests of creditors than does the reorganization court under Chapter X.

We shall first demonstrate the fallacy of this false premise and then show that, even if the premise were sound, the conclusion would, nevertheless, be erroneous.

The Respondents' Contention that Reorganization Can Be Nothing Except Complete Rehabilitation of Fidelity as a Going Concern.

The respondents insist that there can be no reorganization of Fidelity other than complete rehabilitation (Wis., 98-99; W. Va., 46, 82; Md., 54). The respondents make this contention without reference to either statutory support from or judicial application of Chapter X. They (except in the Maryland brief and in that only as to the statute) make this contention without any effort to explain away the express provisions of Sec. 216 (10), or to differentiate or show the inapplicability of the many decisions of courts of competent jurisdiction holding otherwise. To reply to this contention of the respondents, other than to refer to Sec. 216 (10) and to the cases holding otherwise cited in the footnote to page 42 of Petitioners' Brief, would be mere repetition and would unduly extend this reply brief.

Petitioners Deny that They Have Conceded Impossibility of Rehabilitation

The petitioners emphatically deny that rehabilitation as a going concern is an impossibility or that they have at any time made any such concession. Unquestionably, complete rehabilitation is not a strong probability, principally for the reason that there are other likely methods of reorganization which would seem to be more available and which make it unnecessary that the petitioners rely upon complete rehabilitation.

Changes in interest rates and the extension of maturity dates with respect to the Fidelity contracts obviously would permit Fidelity to be rehabilitated.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Koontz, whose firm is now the attorneys for the West Virginia Receivers and speaks for the West Virginia State Auditor (836), and who for several years was a director of Fidelity and acted as an attorney for Fidelity, particularly in relation to financial matters, testified in the hearing of this case that during 1938, 1939, and 1940 he was of the opinion that Fidelity was a company which should be rehabilitated and which "could be rehabilitated." (1202-1204.)

Fred Risley, president of Fidelity, testified that Fidelity could operate under the Insurance Company Act of 1940 loading provision, and that the reserve requirement made it impossible for Fidelity to qualify. (866-867.)

The Contention of the Respondents that the Petitioners Rely Only on Slow Liquidation as a Plan of Reorganization.

The respondents argue from another false premise: that the petitioners rely solely upon a slow, orderly, and unified liquidation as a means of reorganization and insist that such liquidation is not within the scope of reorganization.

In both of these contentions the respondents err. The petitioners do not rely solely upon any such liquidation. From the record it would seem that among the most likely methods of reorganization would be the organization of a new mutual company, the sale of Fidelity's assets to a stronger company under a contract which would provide for the continuance of Fidelity's business for the benefit of the creditors, the annuity contracts to be so modified as to interest rates and maturities as the circumstances might require, or the merger of the Fidelity business with the business of some other corporation, insurance or annuity, in either case the Fidelity contracts to be continued as annuity contracts or replaced by insurance contracts where the contract holder is physically insurable, coupled also with the right of the creditor to receive within a reasonable time the payment of the value of his claim in cash in the event he should not desire to accept either an annuity or an insurance contract. Any such reorganization would eliminate in large measure the heavy overhead of Fidelity which has proven to be so disastrous.

However, from the standpoint of passing judgment upon good faith in filing the petition, a well-ordered, unified liquidation is within the scope of reorganization (See cases, Petitioners' Brief, 50; S. E. C. Brief, 47 and 48), and the District Court was well within its proper powers in considering such possibilities when that Court concluded that the petition was filed in good faith even though the court may properly have felt that there would not likely be an occasion to resort to this particular plan of reorganization. The petitioners and the S. E. C. may with perfect right rely upon this plan of reorganization, along with other more desirable plans, but, most certainly this possibility is not relied upon as the only available plan of reorganization.

When the respondents argue that a well-ordered, unified liquidation does not constitute reorganization and that liquidation, as distinguished from reorganization, is inevitable in this case (Wis., 113; Md., 58; W. Va., 82; 89), they again ignore the clear decisions of courts of competent jurisdiction because they know that they cannot escape the applicability of such decisions if they should undertake to discuss them.

Respondents' Contention that from the Factual Standpoint Liquidation Is Inevitable.

The respondents uniformly argue from an unestablished premise that, factually, speedy liquidation and distribution of the assets of Fidelity is inevitable. The Maryland Brief (Md., 46; 50) would belittle the testimony of qualified witnesses that Fidelity could and should be reorganized. This Honorable Court is again invited to look to the full testimony of said witnesses as it is referred to in Petitioners' Brief at pages 44-45, and then contrast that testimony with that of the witness Steussey (1005-1052), who was the only witness who testified that in his opinion Fidelity could not be reorganized. Steussey's opinion appears to have been based largely upon the fact that the Fidelity sales organization had been disbanded (1027-1028). Steussey was himself a former Fidelity salesman (1006) as well as a very versatile witness.

Not infrequently actions speak louder than words and so it is in this case. The state proceedings were originated by the West Virginia Auditor who with probable accuracy may be referred to as the principal respondent herein. Counsel for the West Virginia Receivers says that he also speaks for the West Virginia Auditor (836), and, in the hearing of this cause, stated in open court:

> "Mr. Palmer: I had that intention with this witness to develop that. Might I also state that I think, as stated before on the record, that it is the opinion of myself as counsel that while a life insurance plan is feasible in the State Court, it is not feasible in the Federal Court because of my own personal view of the law that this Court cannot reorganize Fidelity into or keep it as an insurance company for the reason that I think this Court has no jurisdiction to give birth or to help grow an insurance company where it cannot bring it its demise or obsequies." (1076-1077).

The earlier statement, likewise made in open court in answer to a question by the Court, was:

> "The Court: Mr. Palmer, there is one thing the Court would like to get straightened out in its own mind as to the position you are taking in this suit here. As I understand, you represented the receivers in the state court proceeding, and Mr. Smith as one of the receivers says that his whole thought in the matter was to try to effect a reorganization, and I presume that you as his attorney in that matter were one with him in that thought. Now, you are appearing here and from your questions it seems that you are endeavoring to prove that there is no possibility of any reorganization. That appears inconsistent to the Court and I would like to know what the explanation of that is, Mr. Palmer.
> "Mr. Palmer: I think that is a fair question and I will be more than glad to state my position on the record, your Honor. If the Court please, I understand this: that under this table just introduced in evidence as Exhibit No. 28 there are 15 different states which required deposits and 20 states where the debtor was required to obtain a license, (fol. 637) and there were some seven to nine different contract funds and series in these various states, so taking each one for one it adds up to a total of 117 classes of creditors. Now, it is my opinion that it is impossible at this time to obtain the consent of two-thirds of each of these classes of creditors to any plan of reorganization that can be presented. In the second place, it is my opinion that no plan can be formulated which this Court will approve which will have the approval of that number of creditors. However, I do feel that there are a large number of contractholders who would prefer, as Mr. Smith and others have said, some form of company whereby periodic installment savings can be made; that they like the idea and are willing to continue it, and it is my personal belief, as counsel, and having talked to some others about it, that if a group as large as, say, $10,000,000 or 40% would approve of such a plan, or 50% that in state court proceedings they voluntarily agree to that, that then an insurance company could be formed by their voluntary agreement which could do that; that, however, the Federal Court's hands are bound by Chapter 10 proceedings and unless two-thirds agree, even though 40% or 50% or 60% would agree, the Court would have to reject the plan; and I (fols. 638-660) sincerely feel and I think that the state court receivers feel that in state court, particularly prior to the bringing of this suit, there was every possibility and likelihood of a very substantial part, a large enough part to make it worthwhile, of these contractholders agreeing to some plan among themselves for voluntarily keeping this going and not having at the very last a forced liquidation.

"The Court: Did you then, and do you now, consider that such a reorganization on the part of any percentage of the contractholders is beneficial to them?

"Mr. Palmer: Yes, sir, I do.

"The Court: Then your only doubt, and your only question, is as to the possibility of getting a sufficient percentage to agree?

"Mr. Palmer: Yes, that is correct, your Honor." (486-487).

It will be recalled that the West Virginia proceeding was instituted for reorganization and the letter of the Judge of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County presented in the Appendix to the West Virginia Brief (W. Va., 128-130) shows beyond doubt that the Circuit Court of Kanawha County regarded the proceeding instituted by the West Virginia Auditor as one for reorganization.

In the Maryland Brief (Md., 62) it is stated that the Judge of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County was advised that such proceeding was for reorganization.

The president of Fidelity, who participated in the various conferences with the West Virginia Auditor, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and Fidelity's attorneys, states that the sole purpose of the West Virginia State proceeding was to hold the assets in statu quo while the company could arrive at some reorganization plan.

Though this particular testimony was referred to by record reference in Petitioners' Brief, we believe its significance in this connection warrants its reproduction here:

"Mr. Palmer: Isn't this true, Mr. Risley, that the company recognized that something must be done, and that they were not objecting to some sort of proceedings brought in order that the assets might be held in statu quo while the company could arrive at some reorganization plan?

"A. That was the sole purpose.

"Q. And that that is why there was no objection on the company's part to Mr. Sims suit? Isn't that correct?

"A. That is correct, yes, sir.

"Q. The company knew that there had to be something done, otherwise there might be a run on the company by cash surrenders which would give those who got there first their money and those who came last would not get (fol. 2606) any?

"A. That is correct.

"Q. So that the company had, through its officials, after this letter of Mr. Sims as well as before, discussed with Mr. Sims the possibility or need of such a suit, and also had discussed the possibility or need of a federal court suit? Isn't that right?

"A. That is right.

"Q. And it was only after a thorough discussion and weighing of all matters that the company decided that it preferred, if it had a choice, the state court proceeding?

"A. After weighing the matter it was the unanimous opinion of the board of directors that the state court method would be the best.

"Q. And isn't it further true that not only the sentiment, or the expressed sentiment, of the board of directors was that that state court proceeding would lead to a reorganization of the company rather than a liquidation of it?

"A. Reorganization was the only thing that we were considering.

"(fol. 2607) Q. There was no thought of any kind, either by Mr. Sims, by the SEC or by the company, of a liquidation, but only a thought of some sort of reorganization? Isn't that true?

"A. Reorganization is the only word that I heard mentioned in any of those conferences." (895-896)

When, we may ask, did the West Virginia State Auditor and counsel for the West Virginia Receivers conclude that liquidation was inevitable? The letter of March 21, 1941, from the West Virginia Auditor to Mr. Koontz, Attorney for Fidelity (W. Va., 126-127), indicates that, had Fidelity determined to file a petition under Chapter X prior to the institution of the West Virginia State Court Proceeding by the Auditor, the West Virginia Auditor would have been satisfied.

We think there is little doubt but that, had Fidelity presented a petition under Chapter X prior to the institution of the West Virginia State Proceeding, not only would it have not been asserted by anyone that it was unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization could be effected, but that the superiority of the bankruptcy court over the several state courts for these purposes would never have been questioned, and it would have never been suggested that Fidelity was an insurance company, as the State Auditor in his answer in this proceeding originally admitted that Fidelity was not an insurance corporation and was a corporation eligible for bankruptcy (59).

It may be that these various admissions by the West Virginia Auditor and counsel for the State Receivers are not binding upon the other respondents. On the other hand, the record shows that all of the state proceedings were, in reality, instigated by the West Virginia Auditor thinking that the other states would join in a program of holding the assets of Fidelity in statu quo pending a voluntary reorganization in the State Courts. The Wisconsin officials disagreed with the West Virginia State Court Receivers and proceeded to commence liquidation. It was then apparent to the directors of Fidelity that if there were to be any reorganization it would have to be under Chapter X, and the directors, with commendable foresight, proceeded to cause the petition to be filed.

The respondents would make much of the fact that Fidelity had not been financially strong for many years and that Mr. Koontz and Mr. Messick, on Fidelity's behalf, had made efforts to bring in new capital but had not been successful. It must be remembered that at no time prior to the filing of the petition under Chapter X had Fidelity sought any reorganization or recapitalization other than such as would preserve a corporate interest of value to the stockholders. In other words, Fidelity had not theretofore put its affairs in a position where the interests of creditors alone were to be considered. The Latta projected plans contemplated a voluntary reduction in the value of their contracts by the contract holders of about fifteen per cent (Exhibits 111, 112, pp. 1069 ff.; 1093; 1100; 1126), and Fidelity expected to rely upon salesmanship to put such a program over (1094). Under the standards of Chapter X such a reorganization would not have been fair or reasonable. That is probably the reason why Fidelity desired to go into the State Court rather than into the Bankruptcy Court (Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Co., 308 U. S. 106), but, when Fidelity's petition was filed in the reorganization court under Chapter X, Fidelity irretractably gave up any hope of preserving any value to the stockholders in the event it should prove, as would seem to be the case, that the assets of Fidelity were less than its debts (Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Co., supra).

The failure of Fidelity to enlist new capital under those circumstances is not surprising and does not refute the probability of reorganization upon a plan in which the interests of creditors only is to be considered. The earlier efforts made by Fidelity were not under reorganization statutes but were planned upon a basis purely voluntary.

The very nature of the Fidelity assets bespeaks probabilities of successful reorganization because of the facility by which new certificates or contracts might be issued according to the exact interests of the various creditors.

Good faith in the filing of the petition under Chapter X is a question of fact upon which the findings of the trial court should not be disturbed unless clearly erroneous (Wayne United Gas Co. v. Owens Illinois, 91 F. (2d) 827, 831; Seaboard Terminals v. Western Maryland, C. C. A. 4, 108 F. (2d) 911.)

The Respondents' Contentions that the Assets Deposited by Fidelity with the Various States Are Not Property of Fidelity, that the Chaper X Proceeding and the Injunction Issuing Therefrom Constitute a Suit Against the States Contrary to the Eleventh Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and Constitute an Interference with the Police Powers of the States Contrary to the Tenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

---

The respondents argue that inasmuch as Fidelity is insolvent, its assets heretofore deposited with the several states are no longer property of Fidelity, and for that reason cannot be reached in this proceeding, that even if such deposits are property of Fidelity this proceeding constitutes a suit against the sovereign states contrary to the Eleventh Amendment, and that to interfere in this proceeding in any way with such state deposits would involve federal action contrary to the Tenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution as an interference with the exercise of the police powers reserved to the states.

These arguments are presented by the respondents upon two theories. One theory is, that, since these deposits cannot be reached by the Chapter X proceeding, the reorganization court cannot control sufficient assets of Fidelity to make reorganization possible. The other theory is, that, since the bankruptcy court cannot deal in any way with such deposited assets, either by preserving their status by injunction or obtaining their possession by turn-over order, the petition has not been filed in good faith, for the reason that the prior court proceedings, in which the jurisdiction of the state courts is not questioned by the respondents, will better subserve the interests of creditors.

Deposits Are Property of Fidelity

Whatever may be the verbiage of the various state statutes requiring the deposits, the deposits are made for the benefit of the contract holders, the Fidelity creditors, and the states have no financial interest whatsoever in the deposits. Even the Maryland brief, which is based entirely upon the argument that the Chapter X proceedings cannot reach the state deposits, concedes that the states have no pecuniary interest in such deposits. (Md. 15.)

If for purposes of reorganization, pledged or mortgaged assets were regarded as assets of the debtor only when the value of the assets exceeded the amount of the debts, there would be very little subject-matter upon which Chapter X might operate.

The respondents apparently are unable to cite any authorities which sustain their argument in this respect.

In the Maryland brief, the cases In re Prudence Co., Inc., 82 F. (2d) 755; Warder v. Brady, 115 F. (2d) 89; and Seaboard Terminals v. Western Maryland Railway, 108 F. (2d) 911, are cited in support of the contention that the property is not that of the debtor unless an equity remain. None of these cases sustain such position. In the Prudence case, the property involved had previously been transferred by the Prudence Company to another company. In Warder vs. Brady, certain payments into a sinking fund had become the property of the beneficiaries of the sinking fund. Pledged or deposited property was not involved. In the Seaboard Terminals case, title, not only legal title but beneficial ownership in the property in question, had been conveyed to the Maryland Terminals Corporation. Seaboard Terminals had only a lease thereon which had been forfeited, and the Seaboard Terminals failed in its effort to establish that the conveyance to the Maryland Terminals Corporation was a mere mortgage in the form of a conveyance, rather than an outright conveyance.

On the other hand, there are many cases in which securities of less value than the debt secured are dealt with by the reorganization courts, and the case In re Central Funding Corporation, 75 F. (2d) 256, expressly holds that insolvency does not destroy the petitioner's interests in assets for purposes of reorganization. In that case it is observed:

> "It makes no difference whether the debtor has an equity of any value or not. * * * To restrict the Act to reorganizations where the debtor has an equity would be to deprive the section of much, if not most, of its usefulness."

Injunction Order Is Not Suit Against State

A suit is not a suit against a state contrary to the Eleventh Amendment to the Federal Constitution, unless some relief is sought against the state as such, or the control of political action is sought whether the defendant in name be a state or a state officer. Regan v. Farmers Loan & Trust Company, 154 U. S. 362,

The respondents concede that the states do not have any pecuniary interest in these state deposits. So far as we have been able to find, the decisions of the courts uniformly hold that such deposits are subject to court orders.

In the case of Hobbs, Commissioner of Insurance of Kansas, vs. Occidental Life Insurance Co., 87 F. (2d) 380, the insurance commissioner was required to deliver the deposited securities to the Occidental Life Insurance Company, which had reinsured the liabilities of the Federal Reserve Life Insurance Company, which had made the deposit, although Hobbs insisted that such suit was against the state. See also Kansas vs. Occidental Life Insurance Company, 95 F. (2d) 935 (certiorari denied, 305 U. S. 603).

In the case In re Bajardi, 8 F. (2d) 551, relied upon in the West Virginia brief (W. Va. 49) it was held that the Federal Court was competent to require the New York superintendent of banking to turn over to the trustee in bankruptcy securities deposited with the superintendent of banking pursuant to statute.

In Morrill v. American Reserve Bond Co., 151 F. 305, the treasurer of Missouri was required to turn over to a receiver appointed by the Federal Court securities deposited with him pursuant to a Missouri statute.

In U. S. vs. Knott, 298 U. S. 544, it was held that the deposit of securities by a surety company with the treasurer of Florida, pursuant to a Florida statute, for the benefit of Florida creditors did not divest the surety company of its title. See also Porter vs. Beha, 12 F. (2d) 513; Hayne vs. Metropolitan Trust Company, 67 Minn. 245, 69 N. W. 916; Prewitt, Insurance Commissioner vs. Illinois Life Insurance Co., 123 Ky. 36, 93 S. W. 633.

The respondents rely principally upon the cases of Lankford vs. Platte Iron Works Co., 235 U. S. 461, and Farish v. State Banking Board, 235 U. S. 498. These cases have no application whatever to the case at bar. The funds there involved were funds collected by the state for the purpose of carrying on the governmental function of insuring bank deposits. The funds there involved were, in fact, asse s of a governmental agency, not unlike state workmen's compensation or state unemployment compensation funds, and the state court in discussing this fund had said that it was "as much a fund of the state as the common school fund."

That the other cases relied upon in the Maryland brief on this point involved governmental funds or governmental property is too clear from a consideration of those cases to merit detailed distinguishment herein.

In the West Virginia brief, the case of Rollo, Assignee, v. Andes Insurance Company, 23 Gratt. (Va.) 509, is relied upon. That case involved an attempt to garnishee funds in the hands of the state treasurer. In Virginia and West Virginia a garnishment procedure seeks, and if prosecuted successfully, results in, a judgment against the garnishee. This was, of course, the equivalent of a suit against the Commonwealth of Virginia. In the West Virginia brief, State ex rel Stevenson v. Stephens, 136 Mo. 537, 37 S. W. 506, appears also to be relied upon. As a matter of fact, the funds there involved, deposited with the state trasurer, were held not to be state funds, and the treasurer of the State of Missouri was required by mandamus to pay the money out to the holder of a mortgage lien note on real estate which secured a $100,000 note deposited by an investment company with the state treasurer pursuant to state law requiring such deposits for the benefit of investors as a condition to the right of such company to do business in the state, without the necessity of complying with the state laws relating to the disbursement of state moneys.

The case of Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, also relied upon by the West Virginia brief, simply involved the constitutionality of a Tennessee statute which provided that the assets of a corporation admitted to do business in the State of Tennessee should be held for the payment of resident Tennessee creditors in preference to crditors residing in other states. This statute was held unconstitutional, insofar as natural persons were concerned, because it violated the privileges and immunities clause of the constitution. It was collaterally observed in the opinion that states may require insurance companies to make deposits on the security of claims of resident creditors.

We are certain that the Court is sufficiently familiar with the case of Ex parte Ayers, 123 U. S. 443, and its inapplicability to the case at bar to make any comment thereon here unnecessary.

The case of Mitchell vs. Lay, 48 F. (2d) 79, is also relied upon in the West Virginia brief. In reading this case petitioners' counsel had appreciable difficulty in identifying it with the case discussed thereunder in the West Virginia brief. In the West Virginia brief (W.Va., 68) it is said that a Federal Court proceeding was instituted in California ancillary to a Texas proceeding, and that in the California District Court the insurance commissioner of California was enjoined from interfering with "the Federal Court Trustee's possession of the Debtor's deposited assets." There was no Federal Court Trustee, and the case did not involve any bankruptcy proceeding. The California Federal Court proceeding was a diversity of citizenship proceeding actually instituted prior to the institution of the suit in Texas, to which it is said in the West Virginia brief that the action was ancillary. The plaintiff was a mere claimant against the insurance company, and had a special fund to which she had the right to look for reimbursement, but sought to have administered in the Federal Court in California all of the assets of the insurance company. The real reason for the dismissal was that the plaintiff had no standing to bring the suit in the first instance.

Argument Under the Tenth Amendment

We believe that the cases hereinbefore discussed, such as Hobbs v. Occidental Life Insurance Company and, In re Bajardi, in which moneys deposited with state officials have by the orders of Federal Courts been required to be turned over to the persons entitled thereto, sufficiently answer the contention that such deposits with state officials cannot be reached, even by the processes of courts of bankruptcy, without invading the reserved police powers of the states contrary to the provisions of the Tenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Much of the argument in the Maryland brief on this point relates to the so-called turn-over order entered by the District Court. The District Court amended nunc pro tunc the turn-over order and eliminated therefrom the turn-over requirements, but provided by injunction for the freezing or holding in statu quo of the state deposits.

In the Maryland brief, it is very frankly admitted that if the Maryland argument is sound, then the provisions of 67(f) of the Bankruptcy Act, as added by Section 29(b) of the Investment Company Act of 1940, would be unconstitutional.

Such impotency of the courts of bankruptcy, exercising a Federal power expressly conferred by the Federal Constitution, would indeed be a vast departure from all concepts heretofore entertained and judicially recognized with respect to the supremacy of the constitutional powers of the national government generally, and particularly as to bankruptcy. (See International Shoe Company vs. Pinkus, 278 U. S. 261; Continental Illinois National Bank v. Chicago R. I. & P. R. Co., 294 U. S. 648; In re Park Beach Hotel Corp., 96 F. (2d) 886 (Cert. Den., 305 U. S. 638); In re Merced Irrig. Dist., 25 F. Supp. 981, 114 F. (2d) 654 (Cert. Den., 311 U. S. 718).)

As we have observed above, we need not consider whether the turn-over order was pre-maturely entered or not. The cases above referred to clearly sustain the power of the reorganization court to issue such turn-over orders when appropriate to the exercise of the court's powers in bankruptcy, but at this time we are concerned only with the injunction order freezing the state deposits. In the Maryland brief, it is conceded that under the case of Continental Illinois National Bank vs. Chicago R. I. & R. R. Co., 294 U. S. 648, it is appropriate that the bankruptcy court preserve the debtor's assets by injunction in order to afford an opportunity for reorganization. In the Maryland brief, it is also conceded that the Central Funding Corp. case (75 F. (2d) 256), sustains a turn-over order entered against a state official when a plan of reorganization has resulted in the accomplishment of the purposes for which the deposit was provided.

In the case at bar, when reorganization is effected, certainly it will not be contended by the respondents that the reorganization court might not properly enter an order directing the proper disposition of such state deposits.

So far as the present status of this case is concerned, the case of Fischer vs. American Life Insurance Company, 314 U. S. 549, relied upon in the West Virginia brief, clearly holds that rights in the res of the suit may be adjudicated and determined even though the possession of the res is in another court and is not disturbed. Thus the Maryland brief concedes the power of the District Court to preserve the assets to afford an opportunity for reorganization and to direct the disposition of the assets upon reorganization; even though, for purposes of argument, it might be conceded that the possession of such deposits could not be disturbed prior to reorganization. Such a concession for purposes of argument would, however, be contrary to the established law.

Unquestionably, the District Court in exercising its jurisdiction under Chapter X has jurisdiction over all of the assets of Fidelity, and over all the creditors of Fidelity. When the District Court shall have adjudicated the rights of the creditors, certainly the purposes of the state deposits will have been accomplished, and no state would presume to retain such deposits after the purposes thereof had been accomplished. In the reorganization court, the dissenting creditors will be bound provided two-thirds of the creditors approve the plan of reorganization.

Statutory Receivership Cases Not Applicable

The respondents rely upon the case of Pennsylvania vs. Williams, 294 U. S. 176, and some other cases of the same general import, including the case of Picklesimer vs. Morris, 101 W. Va. 127, 132 S. E. 372. In Pennsylvania vs. Williams it was held that the District Court should relinquish jurisdiction of a suit based upon diversity of citizenship in favor of a statutory state receivership. In Picklesimer vs. Morris, the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia held that the West Virginia courts would not supersede a statutory receivership for the administration of an insolvent bank. Both decisions, of course, were predicated upon the sufficiency and the adequacy of the statutory receiverships. The principle of judicial relinquishment in favor of statutory receivership proceedings is not involved in this case. We have no statutory receivership in this case. In the West Virginia brief (W. Va., 95), it is said:

> "(12) It is true that the several States not only threaten but intend to distribute the assets held in those States, but it is not true that this is to be done without judicial proceedings. On the contrary, liquidation and distribution by the States will be made only in the State Courts thereof. * * *"

In the other briefs, it appears that the jurisdiction of the courts has been invoked with respect to all of the state deposits represented by any of the respondents.

The Auditor of the State of West Virginia, by way of illustration, has absolutely no powers of statutory receivership or liquidation. The auditor has no authority to disburse one cent of the deposits, or to accept a single proof of claim. All that the Auditor of West Virginia can do is to cause a suit in equity to be instituted in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, pursuant to the provisions of Section 45 of Article 2 of Chapter 33 of the Code of West Virginia (Petitioners' Brief, Appendix 69). There is nothing to indicate that the state auditor has the exclusive right to invoke the jurisdiction of the courts for the purpose of administering such deposits. Such simple provisions are not ordinarily held to be exclusive of the right of other interested parties to institute and maintain such suits. (See State ex rel. Hutchinson (S. C.), 189 S. E. 475.)

If the principle of judicial relinquishment to statutory receiverships were involved, then clearly such statutory receiverships would not be "a prior proceeding * * * pending in any court" within the meaning of Section 146(4) of Chapter X.

It is obvious that the case of Picklesimer vs. Morris, supra, has no application here. The West Virginia statutes provide for statutory receivership and liquidation of insolvent banks. (West Virginia Code, Chapter 31, Article 8, Section 32.) There is no such statutory provision with respect to corporations under the jurisdiction of the West Virginia State Auditor.

Respondents' Contention that Only State Courts Can Determine Questions of Law Involved.

In each of the respondents' briefs (Md., 68; Wis., 147; W. Va., 70) the respondents argue that the determination of the rights and interests of the creditors of Fidelity will necessitate the determination of many questions of state law, particularly the construction of the statutes requiring the deposits.

We would not suggest that as this cause proceeds some questions of state law, even some questions of state statutory law, may not have to be decided. Quite obviously one of the first questions to be decided will be the measure of the individual contract holder's participation in whatever assets he may be entitled to share, that is to say, whether upon the cash surrender value, the reserve value or the total amount of money paid in, including the rights of those who are in default to take advantage of the redating provisions. This is a question of the construction of the various contracts rather than of the construction of state statutes. Since the contracts were issued from Wheeling, West Virginia, upon applications from the purchasers therefor solicited elsewhere, and it was provided that payment should be made at the Home Office at Wheeling, West Virginia, it would seem that the law of West Virginia would be applicable (John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Yates, 299 U. S. 178), if in a Chapter X proceeding it should become material to apply the special law of any state.

Whether or not the deposits in the several states were of assets free of any prior obligations, trust or otherwise, or whether any part of any state deposit is of assets which the particular state might not lawfully hold for the benefit of the creditors resident in the particular state (Porter v. Beka, 12 F. (2d) 513), is not a question of statutory construction. When these questions are determined, it is likely that the participation of the various creditors entitled thereto in a particular state deposit will be relatively a simple matter and one not likely requiring any technical interpretation of the state depository laws.

Be that as it may, we do not understand that the rule of Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64, provides any iron clad rule of law applicable in bankruptcy proceedings.

In the case of Prudence Realization Corp. v. Geist, 1941, 316 U. S. 89, 95 it is observed:

> "Nothing decided in Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64, supra, requires a court of bankruptcy to apply such a local rule governing the liquidation of insolvent estates. The bankruptcy act prescribes its own criteria for distribution to creditors. In the interpretation and application of federal statutes, federal not local law applies. (Cases cited.) The court of bankruptcy is a court of equity to which the judicial administration of the bankrupt's estate is committed, Securities & Exchange Commission v. U. S. Realty & Improvement, 310 U. S. 434, 455-457, and it is for that court—not without appropriate regard for rights acquired under rules of state law—to define and apply federal law in determining the extent to which the inequitable conduct of a claimant in acquiring or asserting his claim in bankruptcy requires its subordination to other claims which, in other respects, are of the same class."

In the case of D'Oench, Duhme & Co. v. Federal Deposit Ins. Corp., 1941, 315 U. S. 447, in considering the question whether the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation authorized to sue or be sued in any court of law or equity, state or federal, could recover on a renewal note acquired by it as a part of the collateral securing a loan to a bank insured by it, the receipts for the originals of which contained a provision that they would not be called for payment, of which provision the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation had no notice, it was concluded that a federal question was presented and that a federal court was not bound to follow state law in deciding such question. In the opinion of the court referring to the principle of Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, supra, it was observed:

> "We held in the latter decision (Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Electric Co., 313 U. S. 487) that a failure of a federal court in a diversity of citizenship case to follow the forum's conflict of laws rules 'would do violence to the principles of uniformity within a state' upon which Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64 was based. The jurisdiction of the District Court in this case, however, is not based on diversity of citizenship. Respondent, a federal corporation, brings this suit under an Act of Congress authorizing it to sue or be sued 'in any court of law or equity, state or federal.' • • • Whether the rule of the Klaxon Co. Case applies where federal jurisdiction is not based on diversity of citizenship, we need not decide. For we are of the view that the liability of petitioner on the note involves decision of a federal not a state question under the rule of Deitrick v. Greaney, 309 U. S. 190."

In a concurring opinion, Mr. Justice Jackson raises the question whether the doctrine of Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins extends beyond diversity cases.

In the case of Sola Electric Co. v. Jefferson Electric Co., No. 45, 1942 Term, 87 L. ed. Adv. 150, it is held:

> "It is familiar doctrine that the prohibition of a federal statute may not be set at naught, or its benefits denied, by state statutes or state common law rules. In such a case our decision is not controlled by Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64, 82 L. ed. 1188, 58 S. Ct. 817, 114 A. L. R. 1487. There we followed state law because it was the law to be applied in the federal courts. But the doctrine of that case is inapplicable to those areas of judicial decision within which the policy of the law is so dominated by the sweep of federal statutes that legal relations which they affect must be deemed governed by federal law having its source in those statutes, rather than by local law. Royal Indm. Co. v. United States, 313 U. S. 289, 296, 85 L. ed. 1361, 1366, 61 S. Ct. 995; Prudence Realization Corp. v. Geist, 316 U. S. 89, 95, 86 L. ed. 1293, 1928, 62 S. Ct. 978, 48 Am. Bankr. Rep. (N. S.) 695; Jackson County v. United States, 308 U. S. 343, 349, 350, 84 L. ed. 313, 316, 317, 60 S. Ct. 285; cf O'Brien v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (C. C. A. 1st) 113 F. (2d) 539, 541."

In this case we are concerned with both substantive federal law and federal procedure, the subject of bankruptcy, particularly the reorganization feature thereof, comparable to which there is no state law, and in the procedural aspects of which no state counterparts are here available. Reorganization and the ordinary bankruptcy must inevitably be closely associated. Proceedings in state courts frequently precipitate bankruptcies. If the necessity of sometimes considering state laws may deprive or weaken federal jurisdiction in reorganization, or the mere fact that some state law, common or statutory, must be ascertained and declared by the bankruptcy court means that the state courts may better subserve the interest of creditors than the bankruptcy courts, then the salutory purposes designed by the reorganization statute must inevitably be seriously restricted.

If questions of state law are presented, and in view of the foregoing cases it would seem that the law of bankruptcy is not state law, we readily appreciate the desirability of having a definite determination of such state law by the state courts. However, it has ever been necessary that the federal courts in exercising their proper jurisdiction at times ascertain and declare state law, both common and statutory. (See Thompson v. Consolidated Gas Utilities Corp., 300 U. S. 55, 74; Railroad Commission v. Los Angeles R. Corp., 280 U. S. 145, 152; Concordia Ins. Co. v. School Dist., 282 U. S. 545, 553; Portneuf-Marsh Valley Canal Co. v. Brown, 274 U. S. 630; Edward Hines Yellow Pine Trustees v. Martin, 268 U. S. 458, 463.)

For the most part, the cases relied on in the respondents' briefs in which the federal courts declined to interpret and apply state law related to criminal statutes or ordinances of the states, questions of state taxation, or satutes relating to the official duties of state officials. For instance, the cases of Beal v. Missouri P. R. Corp., 312 U. S. 45, and Watson v. Buck, 313 U. S. 387, (Md., 71) involved criminal laws of the states. Chicago v. Fieldcrest Dairies, Inc., 316 U. S. 168, involved a municipal milk ordinance. Texas v. Donoghue, (302 U. S. 284) merely held that the Bankruptcy Court improperly denied the petition of the State of Texas to bring an action in the State Court against the debtor for the forfeiture of certain oil which the debtor had produced in violation of the conservation laws of the State of Texas. The decision of the Court pointed out that possession or control of the oil by the state court was not essential to its jurisdicion to entertain the suit proposed to be brought. The Texas statute was considered to be penal in nature. Mr. Justice Cardozo, with whom the present Chief Justice joined, dissented upon the ground that the Federal Court was not called upon to lend its aid to the enforcement of the penal laws of the state.

In the cases of Glenn v. Field Packing Company, 290 U. S. 177, and Lee v. Bickell, 292 U. S. 415, referred to in the West Virginia Brief at page 71, the state questions presented were determined by the judgments of the federal courts and were merely held open to permit modification if at some later time the state court of final jurisdiction should decide otherwise. Guaranty Trust Company v. Blodgett, 287 U. S. 509, and Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co. v. Nelson Mfg. Co., 291 U. S. 352, referred to in the West Virginia Brief on pages 70 and 71, respectively, merely announced the rule that federal courts are bound by the interpretation of state statute or constitutional provisions previously made by the state courts. The case of Knights of Pythias v. Miles, 255 U. S. 559, referred to on page 70 of the West Virginia Brief, we have been unable to find. We find in that book and at that page the case of Knights of Pythias v. Overton, which is a mere memorandum decision embodying no discussion of legal principles.

The West Virginia Brief (W. Va., 74) refers to Toucey v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 1941, 314 U. S. 118. This case involved the application of section 265 of the Judicial Code inhibiting injunctions from federal courts to state courts. It is most significant to observe, however, that the inhibition of said section 265 of the Judicial Code does not apply to injunctions arising out of bankruptcy.

The case of R. R. Commission v. Pullman Co., 312 U. S. 496, is referred to in each of respondents' briefs. This case involved the authority of the Railroad Commission of Texas to issue a certain regulation. It was contended that such regulation, if valid under state law, would deny certain persons the equal protection of the laws. The authority of the Railroad Commission to issue any such order was questioned and had not been determined by the state courts. The federal court properly declined to pass upon the federal question prior to the consideration of the state question by the state courts for the reason that should the court of last resort of Texas decide that the Railroad Commission had no authority to make such regulation, then no federal question would be presented.

The case of Thompson v. Magnolia Co., 309 U. S. 478, likewise is referred to in the Maryland and Wisconsin briefs. The question involved was one of Illinois Real Estate Law, whether a certain railroad right of way was an easement or fee interest carrying ownership of oil and gas. This Court concluded that the railroad's possession of the right of way afforded the basis for the exercise of the summary jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court to protect and control the estate and determine title, but that the case was of such a nature that it would be better for the Bankruptcy Court to consent to the submission of the question to the state courts for determination and to direct the Trustee to seek such adjudication in the state courts. Questions of real estate law are inherently questions of local law. Should any such questions arise in this proceeding, the precedent of Thompson v. Magnolia Co., might be followed and the decisions of the state courts be sought by the direction of the reorganization court. Certainly that is a more practical disposition of such a problem than would be the refusal of the federal court to exercise its essential federal jurisdiction in bankruptcy merely because some questions of state law might arise. It would not be logical or reasonable to say that the state courts would better subserve the interests of creditors in reorganization merely because the State Courts could decide such questions of state law as might possibly arise, when the State Courts have no jurisdiction to enforce the substantive bankruptcy laws, and in this case have no state reorganization statutes which would leave the proceedings in the state court in the status of equity receiverships, the flagrant inadequacy of which necessitated the enactment of Chapter X, and deny the creditors the salutory provisions of the federal law of corporate reorganization, Chapter X.

The foregoing observations, it is believed, make unnecessary any consideration of section 3 of the Wisconsin brief entitled "The Public Interest" (Wis., 148). Counsel know of no principle of law or practice which suggests that there is any public interest which requires a court of bankruptcy either to decline to take jurisdiction, or to yield jurisdiction taken merely because the assets of the bankrupt estate may at the time be or may previously have been involved in state litigation.

Segregation of Deposits by Contract Series

In the Maryland brief (Md., 9) it is said that the statement in the briefs of the petitioners and the Securities & Exchange Commission that Fidelity kept accurate and separate accounts for the reserve funds of each series of contracts issued by it, and that the books indicated what securities were purchased with the reserve funds of each series is misleading. In the Wisconsin brief (Wis., 27) it is said:

> "* * * no attempt was made to designate what particular funds the securities came from in forwarding the securities to the various states, nor did the states themselves make any such allocation."

The record sustains the statements in petitioners' and the Securities & Exchange Commission briefs, and refutes the statements in the respondents' briefs.

C. E. Smith testified that ever since the first deposit was made to the series B and to the series D, the securities deposited in West Virginia were even filed in separate chests (601-602).

Since approximately 1933 every deposit with or withdrawal from the State of West Virginia was accompanied by a schedule showing the name and description of the security, the par value, the interest rate, the date of maturity, the market value and the fund to which it belonged (599).

C. E. Smith also testified that:

> "Actually the securities were earmarked on our records, that is, for a particular fund, irrespective of the place of deposit." (611.)

Smith also testified that if Fidelity had purchased a bond ten years ago from the funds of class A Contract Fund, the serial number of the bond and the amount could be ascertained (617).

The West Virginia Auditor, Mr. Sims, required Fidelity to put into the series B contracts a provision that moneys received by the company from the contract holders of that contract would be held by the company separate and apart from all other funds (660).

The annual audits of Fidelity were sent to the officials of the several states in which Fidelity did business. (643; 756-757). F. J. McNulty testified: "On our annual audit report the segregation of funds was shown (761). C. E. Smith testified that the books of Fidelity were always open for inspection by the officials of the states in which Fidelity was selling contracts, and that from time to time representatives of those states came to Wheeling and made examinations of such records (616).

The testimony of J. H. Schellhase shows that the books of the company contained a complete record of the moneys received by the company from each contract fund, and a record of all securities purchased by the company from the moneys of each contract fund, and that each security was earmarked on the records (581-582). Exhibits 50 to 55 show compilations from the records of Fidelity with respect to the deposits in Illinois, Maryland, Missouri, Ohio, Tennessee and Wisconsin, and particularly the contract funds to which the securities deposited in each of these states belonged.

Exhibit 64-C (650), a letter from the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, shows clearly that the Wisconsin authorities knew and understood that the securities belonged to particular funds. In the letter it is stated:

> "It was our understanding, in the letter received from the Home Office, that this matter of adjustment of various trust accounts would have been completed prior to this date."

When, during the hearing of this case in the District Court, counsel for Wisconsin objected to the use of the term "trust funds" and was confronted with a telegram from the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, he recognized that the term "trust funds" was correctly used (653-654).

The witness H. F. Young testified that the state examiners and officials evidenced a knowledge that there were such trust funds as A, B, C, D, etc., and that the respective state officials, when they accepted the securities, knew that they were coming from specific trust funds (653-655).

Other testimony relating to these matters will be found in the record at pages 331-332, 581-582, 584, 593, 600, 606-609, 628, 633-635, 643 and in Exhibits 59 to 67, inclusive.

Respondents' Contention that Fidelity Officers Responsible for Institution of Chapter X Proceeding Seeking Some Benefit.

In the Wisconsin Brief (Wis., 116) and in the West Virginia Brief (W. Va., 28, 29, 33), it is insisted that the petition shows that Fidelity was seeking to carve an equity for itself out of the assets which belong wholly to the contract holders; and apparently base their contention upon the statement in the petition that it is necessary that the rights of the contract holders be modified to an extent so as to enable the debtor to meet "its reserve requirements" and be able to comply with the Investment Company Act of 1940. Respondents interpret this representation as manifesting the intent of the debtor that the contracts be modified so as to permit Fidelity to have the $50,000 clear capital. The phrase "reserve requirements" might just as well, and probably did, refer to the reserve requirements of the Fidelity contracts. But, be that as it may, when Fidelity filed the petition, it submitted to the reorganization court and could not retract therefrom even if it later desired to do so (Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Co., 308 U. S. 106). Certainly, even had Fidelity hoped to effect a reorganization which would enable it to have the requisite clear capital, such ambition would not invalidate the petition and, in view of the ruling of Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Co., supra, would not be approved by the court.

Additional Comment upon the Respondents' Briefs, Severally

The West Virginia Brief

On page 10 the West Virginia Brief refers to contract holders from West Virginia, Tennessee, Iowa, Michigan, and Ohio appearing in the District Court and objecting to the Chapter X proceeding. This reference purports to be supported by pages 287-288 of the record. These pages merely list the appearances, and the Tennessee creditors there named are the only creditors who yet participate in this cause. After investigation, the Ohio creditors reversed their position and supported the petition (832-833). The Wheeling, West Virginia, mass meeting has resulted in no active opposition to the petition (W. Va., 31).

The statement on page 27 of the West Virginia Brief that there is positive evidence that there can and will be no new capital is not correct. There is only evidence that thus far no offer of new capital has been procured.

The West Virginia Brief would argue that the decision in the Marine Harbor case is practically controlling upon the case at bar and would seek to draw a series of analogies between the two cases. In the Marine Harbor case the debtor had made previous efforts but the previous efforts there were under a state reorganization statute. Fidelity's previous efforts were purely voluntary and without the aid of a reorganization statute. It is said that in both instances state legislation was specially enacted to deal with the particular circumstances. There is no such special legislation in West Virginia and, if there is any applicable special legislation in any other state, it has not yet been brought to the attention of this Court. It is said that in the case at bar, as in the Marine Harbor case, there is only one class of creditors; namely, the contract holders. In the case at bar there are many classes of contract holders. The contention that those instituting the Chapter X proceeding in the case at bar were seeking some benefits, as a similarity to the Marine Harbor case, is not supported by the record. It is said that the need for prompt liquidation was seen in the Fidelity case. We have previously commented that West Virginia counsel in the hearing insisted that there could be reorganization in the State Court though not in the Federal Court. We are at a loss to see how counsel can assert that any need for prompt liquidation was seen.

In addition to the fact that in the Marine Harbor case resort had been had to a state reorganization proceeding where there are no state reorganization procedures other than ordinary equity receiverships available in the case at bar, the differences between the Marine Harbor case and the case at bar are so numerous and clear as to make impossible any logical comparison.

On page 41 of the West Virginia Brief it is stated that the Investment Company Act of 1940 was "definitely intended to cover Fidelity". A part of the Investment Company Act of 1940 is Section 25 which expressly preserved the jurisdiction of reorganization under Chapter X. Though the West Virginia Brief did not discuss the eligibility of Fidelity for reorganization, this assertion most certainly refutes any assertion in the other briefs of respondents that Fidelity is an insurance corporation ineligible for reorganization under Chapter X.

While Section 25 of the Investment Company Act of 1940 recognizes that there might be voluntary reorganization of investment companies and that some reorganizations might result from other judicial proceedings than Chapter X proceedings, we fail to find in said Section 25 of the Investment Company Act any manifestation of any congressional intent that the fact that the investment company might have deposits with some of the states should exclude such investment company from reorganization under Chapter X, the jurisdiction for which was expressly reserved and protected by Section 25.

It is argued on page 43 of the West Virginia Brief that the Congressional intent of Section 29 of the Investment Company Act, amending Section 67 (f) of the Bankruptcy Act, was designed for application only to straight bankruptcy rather than to reorganization. Section 102 of Chapter X makes the provisions of the other chapters of the Bankruptcy Law applicable to Chapter X where not inconsistent therewith.

On page 57 of the West Virginia Brief it is said that officials of six states are respondents and have requested this Court that they be permitted to continue their prior state proceedings to liquidate Fidelity. This proceeding is to reorganize Fidelity. The State Court proceedings, certainly so far as originally instigated in West Virginia, were for the purpose of reorganizing Fidelity. It is not believed that the desire of the states to liquidate Fidelity in the State Court proceedings, originated for the purpose of there reorganizing Fidelity, should appeal very strongly to this Court when the change from the desire to reorganize to the desire to liquidate seems to have been prompted solely by the fact that the only court, the reorganization court, which can effectively reorganize Fidelity has taken jurisdiction of its assets.

On page 80 of the West Virginia Brief it is said that in the various states, after the claims of domestic creditors are satisfied, a surplus of assets remaining will be remitted to the domiciliary receivers. Petitioners have not doubted this principle of law but petitioners still insist that, if there is any reasonable prospect of any such surpluses being remitted, if the creditors in other states entitled to participate therein are to receive the benefit of any such surplus, their interests will have to be represented in such states in order to make certain that such states do not so administer and distribute such assets as to consume all of them.

The West Virginia Brief would make much of the assertion that the proposed administrations in the various state courts are conducted by the Attorneys General of the several states. Although six states are actively participating as respondents in this cause, there is only one attorney general, the Attorney General from Wisconsin, actually actively participating. An examination of the record will show no active participation by the Attorney General of West Virginia beyond consent to the use of his name on briefs and pleadings.

On page 84 of the West Virginia Brief reference is made to the case of Reading Hotel Corporation v. Protective Committee, 89 F. (2d) 53, as sustaining the contention that liquidation should promptly ensue in the State Court proceeding. The Reading Hotel Corporation case was a case for reorganization in the Bankruptcy Court, and the reorganization was approved. The point in issue was the objection by the stockholders to their exclusion from participation in the reorganization plan.

On page 90 in the West Virginia Brief it is stated that on October 10, 1941, the Trustee prepared and submitted to the Court a partial report under Section 167, and on April 13, 1942, a further partial report,* and complaint is made that these reports have not been submitted in any form to the contract holders. It would hardly be expected that during the litigation relating to the basic jurisdiction of the reorganization court the expense of submitting any such reports to the creditors would be incurred or that the information thereof would be of any aid to the creditors. (See Continental Illinois, etc., Co. v. C. R. I. & P. R. Co., 294 U. S. 648.)

On pages 91 to 96 of the West Virginia Brief the points of superiority of the Chapter X proceedings over equity

(*) This report is not in the record before this Court. It has been filed in the District Court and is an official paper in this cause. In view of counsels' reference to this report it is printed in the Appendix hereto. Therein the Trustee reports that reorganization beneficial to the creditors can be effected.

receiverships raised in Petitioners' Brief are discussed by West Virginia counsel. We shall not re-discuss all of these points but note that under Point (1) the West Virginia counsel refer to the efficiency of the reorganization under general equity proceedings in State Courts. Some of these reorganizations may not have complied with the standards of fairness which Chapter X prescribes.

Under Point (2) West Virginia counsel say that the petition was filed at the instance of the "old management group" of Fidelity. It matters not by what management group the petition was filed. There is no management group for conducting the proceeding under Chapter X. The Court, with the aid of the disinterested Trustee, conducts the reorganization proceeding under Chapter X.

When the Petitioners' Brief was prepared, counsel for petitioners were not then aware of the order of the Circuit Court of Kanwaha County of May 26, 1941, directing that the form and manner of submission by the State Receivers to the contract holders of any plan of reorganization and rehabilitation of Fidelity should be submitted to the court for approval before such submission. The fact that such order was entered by the Circuit Court of Kanawha County does not change the observation of Petitioners' Brief, however. Such order was not issued pursuant to any state statute requiring such procedure comparable to Sections 174 and 175 of Chapter X, and the order relates only to the submission of plans by the Receivers. It does not exclude the submission of plans by some management group or creditors' committee prior to approval by the court, and the court might at any time rescind this order, even as it applies to the Receivers.

As was anticipated in Petitioners' Brief, counsel for the respondents would attempt to meet the insufficiency of the ordinary equity receivership by saying that they will cause to be done in the state courts voluntarily all that Chapter X requires by statute to be done.

With reference to Point (10) (W. Va., 94), Petitioners do not contend that Chapter X has made illegal voluntary reorganization without judicial aid or with the imperfect aid of courts operating without reorganization statutes. Petitioners do insist that the factual situation presented in the case at bar makes reorganization possible only through the Chapter X proceeding, and it is hardly consistent for the respondents to insist that there can be reorganization in the several state court proceedings while at the same time they insist that liquidation and distribution is inevitable and (W. Va., 57) are requesting this Court that they be permitted to continue their prior state proceedings to liquidate Fidelity.

Under Point (11) (W. Va., 95), West Virginia counsel say that those in charge of the state proceedings are state officials elected to their offices by the contract holders in the respective states. Nevertheless, the West Virginia State Auditor who instigated all of the State proceedings collaborated with representatives of Fidelity in endeavoring to hold assets of Fidelity in statu quo pending the accomplishment of voluntary reorganization, which, so far as the record shows, involved no plan other than one to sacrifice the interests of creditors in order to preserve some value for stockholders contrary to Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Company, supra.

The West Virginia Brief (W. Va., 96-100) and Appendix (W. Va., 116-125 and 130-134) contain references to and discussions of many matters and things which are not contained or referred to in any way in the record. Counsel for the petitioners are loathe to depart from the record, but these references demand some departure herein.

Counsel for the petitioners deny that the order of the Circuit Court of July 22, 1942 (268-270), contemplated liquidation of securities beyond such liquidation as was necessary for conservation. (See petition for modification and exhibits (271-285).)

At the informal hearing before Judge Parker upon the motion for the stay of the mandate to permit the filing of the petition to this Court for certiorari three of the counsel for respondents who represented themselves as a committee acting for all of the respondents' counsel complained of the delay in obtaining proofs of claims occasioned by the jurisdictional controversies and complained that under the order of the District Court the Trustee was not permitted to give to the various state officials the several lists of creditors by states. Judge Parker very correctly was of opinion that no harm would be done if proofs of claim were taken which might be utilized in the Federal Courts or in the several State Courts as the disposition of this case by this Court might make appropriate. Accordingly, paragraphs 5 and 6 of the order of July 22, 1942, were entered. Section 6, as well as Sections 1 and 3, was originally suggested to give the powers or rights to each state court having judicial supervision or control of cash or other securities deposited by Fidelity, but, upon the suggestion of one of the respondents' counsel that there were states in which there was no state court having jurisdiction but there were state officials having jurisdiction, there was added to these sections the phrase "or state official" having jurisdiction. The State Auditor of West Virginia has no statutory jurisdiction to give notice to contract holders or to accept proofs of claims. The Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, declined to approve any forms of proofs of claims or to enter any order of any character in the West Virginia State Court proceeding until the question of basic jurisdiction, now under consideration by this Court, should be determined. Counsel for the petitioners deny that the West Virginia State Auditor has any statutory authority to issue any such administrative order as is referred to at the bottom of page 133 of the West Virginia Brief in connection with the forms of proofs of claims. Counsel for the petitioners hope that these proofs of claims, not for liquidation and distribution of assets but for the determination of the interests of the several creditors, may be usable in the District Court for purposes of reorganization; or that, if this Honorable Court should be of opinion that jurisdiction under Chapter X has not been sustained, that such proofs of claims might be usable in the State Courts. Counsel for the petitioners deny that such proofs of claims have been sent out by the Auditor of West Virginia in keeping with the order of the Circuit Court of July 22, 1942, for the reason that said order contemplated the submission of such proofs of claims only through action of the State Courts in states in which there were State Court proceedings and not by administrative officials invested with no powers to adjudicate claims in states in which there were such State Court proceedings.

Counsel for the petitioners are not advised of the various activities engaged in by representatives of the several states as discussed in the several paragraphs in the Appendix to the West Virginia Brief dealing with the "digest of depository laws and trust indentures of the fifteen states where Fidelity made a deposit and status of state court proceedings pending therein" (W. Va., 116-125).

West Virginia counsel say (W. Va., 99) that no objection to the procedure of taking proofs of claims has been made by any contract holder. Naturally, no contract holder has complained because the letter by which said proofs of claims were sent out, as well as said proofs of claims (W. Va., 130), show, in keeping with the understanding had from Judge Parker, that "should it finally be held that the Federal Court has sole jurisdiction of the proceedings all proofs of claim received will be turned over to the proper officials thereof."

Said proofs of claims are prepared for filing with "H. Isaiah Smith and Ross B. Thomas, West Virginia State Court Receivers, as such, and as agents of Edgar B. Sims,' Auditor and Ex Officio Insurance Commissioner • • • ." (W. Va., 131.) Whether or not H. Isaiah Smith and Ross B. Thomas have undertaken to act as agents of Edgar B. Sims, Auditor, counsel for the petitioners do not know, but counsel for the petitioners do know that said Smith and Thomas, West Virginia State Court Receivers, are not agents of Edgar B. Sims, Auditor, etc., by virtue of their appointment as receivers. In the hearing in the District Court H. Isaih Smith testified that he regarded himself as an arm of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County (822; Rep. Tr. 2356).

The Wisconsin Brief

On page 40 of the Wisconsin brief, it is said that Mr. Fleming, the Debtor's attorney who presented the petition, "withdrew during the course of the trial and was replaced by Mr. John Ray on September 17, 1941." Page 662 of the Record is referred to as the authority for this observation. Counsel for the petitioners see nothing whatever on page 662 which would even lend color to such statement, and say that there is nothing in or outside of the record substantiating this statement. It is true that Mr. Fleming was taken ill during the hearing, and that Mr. Ray was engaged principally for that reason. It is also true that Mr. Fleming has not participated actively in court proceedings since that time. Mr. Fleming is, however, yet counsel for the Debtor, and after the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, but prior to the presentation of the petition for rehearing therein, Mr. Holt was also engaged on behalf of the Debtor. The order of the District Court approving the employment of Mr. Ray and the order of the Circuit Court approving the employment of Mr. Holt are printed herewith in the Appendix. Mr. Fleming has conferred with other counsel for the Debtor as late as the day upon which petitioners' brief was filed herein, and even thereafter has conferred with counsel representing the S. E. C. On page 140 of the Wisconsin brief, observations, wholly without record support, are made which would at least carry implications imputing doubt with respect to the employment of Messrs. Ray and Holt. These implications may be discussed in argument.

On page 41, it is said that the State Auditor renewed Fidelity's license as an insurance company on April 1, 1941, to expire March 31, 1942. The affidavit of F. J. McNulty (231-232) shows that Fidelity applied for such license and sent its check to the State Auditor for that purpose, but that the application was returned by the Auditor, the check was not cashed but was returned by the Auditor, and said license was not issued. This is further confirmed by the stipulation of counsel made in the Circuit Court (237).

On page 45, it is stated that licenses were issued to twenty salesmen of Fidelity as life insurance salesmen. The statement of the State Auditor (462) refutes this statement, as does the testimony of A. L. King (701).

On page 46, it is said that Fidelity, in fact, issued life insurance policies and assumed insurance risks. The only record basis for any such statement is that provided by the references to the riders to be attached to the Series B contracts containing the insurance features made in the petition to the Circuit Court for remand (219), and in the stipulations of counsel entered into in the Circuit Court (237). Even if for purposes of argument it be assumed that such riders constituted the assumption of life insurance risks, which counsel for the petitioners do not admit, there is no evidence whatever that Fidelity issued life insurance policies.

Though the letter to the Banking Commissioner of Wisconsin, of December 21, 1940, stated by way of recital that the proposed amendments to the Fidelity charter would enable Fidelity to write insurance contracts, there is no statement that Fidelity had otherwise qualified, and no effort was made to qualify Fidelity as an insurance company in Wisconsin.

Counsel invite particular attention to the concession on page 64 of the Wisconsin brief that Fidelity was not an insurance company prior to December 31, 1940. This concession if acceded to by all respondents greatly simplifies the question of Fidelity's eligibility for reorganization, and makes that question rest solely upon the effectiveness of the attempted transformation on and after December 31, 1940.

In this connection, on page 96 of the Wisconsin brief, it is conceded that Fidelity could not change its classification for the purpose of avoiding an involuntary petition. Following the philosophy of the Marine Harbor case, petitioners' counsel most earnestly insist that the unsuccessful efforts of Fidelity to transform itself into an insurance company do not estop it from filing a voluntary petition.

The references in the Wisconsin brief to Fidelity's "unconditional license" as an insurance company are astounding (Wis., 67 and 69). Even the Wisconsin brief (Wis., 65) states that such license "was issued pursuant to an informal understanding with the Insurance Commissioner that it would enter into no new contracts of any kind until he had advised the company that it might do so", and that the West Virginia Auditor had testified that he had issued the license "in order that the Debtor would have authority to receive payments under its outstanding contracts." The record is clear and undisputed that this so-called license was but a sham. (See Record References, page 9, Petitioners' Brief.) In this same connection, it is interesting to observe that in the West Virginia brief (W. Va. 33) it is argued that Fidelity could never comply with the Investment Company Act of 1940, because the company was required to have a clear capital of $50,000 in order to so qualify. It is also true that in order to qualify as an insurance company in West Virginia, and to become entitled to have a license as an insurance company from the State Auditor under Section 1, Article 3, Chapter 33 of the West Virginia Code (Petitioners' Brief, Appendix, 69), it was necessary that Fidelity have "at least $200,000 cash capital fully paid up or a like amount of cash surplus * * *." This requirement, undoubtedly, made the actual qualification by Fidelity as an insurance company at the time impossible. It may seriously be questioned whether, even had the State Auditor issued Fidelity a license as an insurance company without qualification, Fidelity would in reality have been a licensed insurance company. The Auditor had no power or authority to issue any such license unless Fidelity was so qualified, and Fidelity knew of these requirements as well as did the Auditor.

On page 68, it is argued that it cannot be questioned that the so-called riders relating to the Series B contracts constituted insurance contracts. In the absence of the development of a more complete record with respect to these riders, petitioners' counsel need not express an opinion as to whether or not the form and substance of these riders were such as to occasion the assumption of some character of insurance responsibility if such riders were legally issued. On the other hand, it may seriously be questioned whether public policy permits the giving of validity to purported insurance undertakings by a company not in fact licensed. Furthermore, for purposes of reorganization, the determination of the rights and interests of creditors, even though some technical legal obligation may have been incurred, it is very doubtful whether such undertakings amounted to engaging in the insurance business in any practical sense, in view of the fact that the existing plan of carrying the insurance with the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company was not in any manner changed.

The Wisconsin brief concedes the power of Congress to provide that corporations now ineligible for bankruptcy be eligible therefor (Wis., 77). The brief also concedes that face-amount certificate companies are amenable to bankruptcy, and that it was not necessary for the Bankruptcy Act to make them so amenable (Wis., 88). The brief (Wis., 85-89) also recognizes that the definitions of investment companies as provided by the Investment Company Act of 1940 would include all life insurance companies were it not for the express exception of life insurance companies from said definitions made by the Investment Company Act, Section 3(c) (3) and Section 2(a) (17). The brief also concedes that, had face-amount certificate companies been excluded from bankruptcy prior to the enactment of the Investment Company Act, then said Act would have made such face-amount certificate companies amenable to bankruptcy (Wis., 89). The inescapable conclusion from these concessions is, therefore, that even if Fidelity prior to the enactment of the Investment Company Act of 1940 might have been classified as an insurance company rather than as an investment company, Fidelity is, nevertheless, an investment company, a face-amount certificate company of the installment type, unless it comes within the exclusionary definition of an insurance company as provided by the Investment Company Act, Section 2(a) (17). It is obvious that the activities of Fidelity Assurance Association, even after the charter amendment of December 31, 1940, and even if it be conceded for purposes of argument that Fidelity's license as an insurance company was valid and unconditional, do not bring Fidelity within the definition of an insurance company as provided by the Investment Company Act.

Despite the foregoing concessions and the inescapable conclusion, the Wisconsin brief would argue that there was no congressional intent on the part of Congress that the definitions of investment companies and insurance companies, as found in the Investment Company Act of 1940, should have any bearing on the previously established judicial definitions of an insurance company for purposes of bankruptcy within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act. In view of the express amendments to the bankruptcy law made by Section 29 of the Investment Company Act, and the express reservations of powers of courts of the United States with reference to reorganizations as contained in the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, as amended, made by Section 25 (d) of the Investment Company Act, this contention is plainly unsound, indefensible and untenable.

The Wisconsin brief (Wis., 92) correctly says that Fidelity procured the charter amendment as an insurance company in an effort to avoid the Investment Company Act. Had Fidelity become in fact an insurance company, it would have avoided the Investment Company Act. If then Fidelity did become an insurance company as the respondents insist, why did it not immediately resume its annuity contract business as it had formerly been conducted, since no one denies that life insurance companies in many states may issue annuity contracts! Neither the $50,000 capital requirement nor the 7% loading charge provisions of the Investment Company Act would have been applicable to Fidelity as an insurance company, excluded from the provisions of the Investment Company Act, and these were the provisions of the Investment Company Act which it is said made it impossible for Fidelity to operate thereunder.

The Wisconsin brief (Wis., 84) concedes that if a corporation engages in more than one activity, each of which is within its charter powers, it is proper that the court look to the business actually done in determining the character of the corporation.. This is a flat concession by Wisconsin counsel of the correctness of petitioners' position.. Two charter powers of Fidelity were involved, one the issuance of annuity contracts, which power Fidelity not only had but exercised for many years and retained under the charter amendment of December 31, 1940; the other, the power to issue contracts of insurance, which was not had even formally prior to December 31, 1940, and which was not had in fact even thereafter, and which was not exercised. Admitting for purposes of argument, that Fidelity had both of these powers after December 31, 1940, by counsels' own concession it is necessary and proper that the Court look to the business activities in order to determine the proper classification.

The Wisconsin brief (Wis., 109) suggests that if an orderly liquidation of the Debtor's assets is to be considered reorganization, such must be limited to cases where the debtor can make some showing of "going concern value." Fidelity has a large number of customers, it has a well selected portfolio of investments, it has good will (632), and the respondents even after the decision in the Circuit Court by their activities have recognized the value of the assets of Fidelity as a whole as distinguished from the value which they would have if they were liquidated by lots or parcels through independent activities and without concerted management (281, 282; W. Va., 97; Md., 68, note 11).

The Wisconsin brief (Wis., 113) says that the cases In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Company, 112 F. (2d) 655, and Continental Insurance Company v. Louisiana Oil Refining Corporation, 89 F. (2d) 333, and other cases cited in petitioners' brief (Page 42), are not helpful on the issue of good faith. The respondents argue that good faith is lacking because there cannot be complete rehabilitation. These cases show that complete rehabilitation is not the only legal method of reorganization. If it be assumed, which petitioners' counsel deny to be the fact, that there could be no rehabilitation, but these other methods of reorganization are available, most certainly the existence of such other methods of reorganization strongly support the probability of reorganization and tend to rebut the contention of the respondents that there was want of good faith because there was no probability of reorganization.

On page 121 of the Wisconsin brief, it is insisted that it is unreasonable to expect that there can be reorganization because the field offices of Fidelity have been closed and its sales force has been completely dissipated. It must be remembered that the purpose of reorganization of an insolvent company is not to maintain the organization of such company unless it be required for the best interests of the creditors, but is to protect and promote the interests of the creditors however that may be done.

The statement of the Wisconsin brief that no witness was able to give a hint as to the manner in which reorganization could be effected (Wis., 122-125) is incorrect. The West Virginia State Auditor suggested the organization of a mutual company. The witness D. A. Burt thought that upon a proper set-up new capital might be available. The witness Hubert F. Young suggested the possibilities of merger with another company or organization as a mutual company, the activities of which might include both annuities and insurance. The witness Latta referred to the possibilities of deferred orderly liquidation. (See Record References, pages 44 and 45, Petitioners' Brief.)

On Page 126 of the Wisconsin brief it is stated that if Fidelity was not an insurance company on the day the petition was filed "it seems obvious that it could not reorganize itself as such under Chapter X." Petitioners' counsel know of no provision of Chapter X or of any other principle which would prevent the reorganization court in a Chapter X proceeding from approving a plan of reorganization which would result in the reorganized company's becoming an insurance company. That insurance companies are not eligible for reorganization certainly does not argue that a company eligible for reorganization may not be reorganized into an insurance company.

That some courts have criticized the methods by which Fidelity previously operated, as stated in the Wisconsin brief (Wis., 129), certainly does not mean that the former methods of Fidelity which were criticized must be embodied in the plan of reorganization. The court and the independent trustee, with the assistance of the Securities and Exchange Commission, formulate the plan of reorganization, not the debtor.

On page 131 of the Wisconsin brief, it is argued that the state authorities would not likely permit the operation of the Fidelity plan in their several states hereafter. Yet, in endeavoring to show that Fidelity was a life insurance company because life insurance companies may issue annuity contracts, the respondents do not question the fact that sound and legal annuity contracts can be made and executed.

On Page 139 of the Wisconsin brief, it is charged that the Trustee is not disinterested because the Trustee has been active in assisting in the defense of the basic jurisdiction of the District Court and is one of the petitioners in this Court. That the trustee must be disinterested refers to its business and financial interests at the time of the trustee's appointment and during the course of the proceeding. Most certainly the qualification of disinterestedness does not mean that the trustee must be indifferent towards a proceeding which the trustee believes to be for the best interests of the creditors whose rights and interests the trustee has been appointed to preserve and protect. The mere fact that the trustee may expect to receive, and may receive, reasonable compensation for its services, certainly does not take the trustee out of the classification of disinterested persons.

The Maryland Brief

The Maryland Brief (Md., 14) says that the statement in Petitioners' Brief (Petitioners' Brief, 6) with respect to the creation of a reserve fund for the particular class or series of contracts from payments made on contracts of that particular class or series is incorrect. Counsel for the petitioners have taken said statement almost verbatim from the findings of the District Court (180). It is believed that the statement is fully sustained by the record. Be that as it may, the Maryland Brief (Md., 14) concedes that such particular reserve funds were to be kept separate and solely for the discharge of liabilities under contracts of Series B and D and, even if it be granted for purposes of argument that the contract provisions of other series were not quite so explicit, the legal results with respect to Series B and D cannot be ignored. The reserve funds of Series B and D represent a very substantial part of Fidelity's assets. The Maryland Brief (Md., 65 and 66) suggests that the state laws do not expressly require segregation by series funds and would imply that the state laws exclude the creation or recognition of more than one fund. Petitioners' counsel do not believe that any statute involved can be reasonably argued to make improper the segregation of the deposits by contract series if the contracts so contemplate or provide.

The Maryland Brief (Md., 9) says that the contention of the petitioners and the Securities and Exchange Commission that on its books Fidelity kept accurate and separate accounts for the reserve funds of each series of contracts issued by it and that the books indicated what securities were purchased with the reserve funds of each series is misleading. Counsel have heretofore presented some of the many statements in the record demonstrating the accuracy of the statement that on the books of Fidelity the funds and investments were kept separate. Of course the actual bonds were not despoiled by writing upon the face of the securities the funds to which they belonged. That is not the customary way for the identification of securities. The Maryland Brief (Md., 9) does concede that during the latter years and after the entry of the injunction order in December, 1938, Fidelity made efforts to segregate its state deposits by series. Even if it be admitted for purposes of argument that Fidelity's segregation of funds was not perfect, that fact should not make it unnecessary that the segregation in so far as perfect should be recognized in this proceeding.

In the Maryland Brief (Md., 13) it is stated that the petitioners erred in saying that the reserve funds of contract Series A, B, C, and D are solvent. Maryland counsel may not be bound thereby but the authority for this statement by petitioners' counsel is the statement of the respondent West Virginia Auditor as contained in his telegram to the Banking Commission of Wisconsin (1215, 311), a telegram similar to which was sent to some sixteen states on the 11th day of April, 1941, the day on which the West Virginia State Court proceeding was instituted.

Counsel for the petitioners recognize that there may be many different modes or bases by which the solvency or insolvency, and the degree of insolvency, of Fidelity may be computed. Counsel for the petitioners adopted the basis recognized generally during the hearing of this cause. Various computations and adjustments are made in tables presented in the West Virginia Brief, and the Maryland Brief insists that Fidelity is less than 90% solvent. The basis adopted by the Circuit Court of Appeals and used by counsel for the petitioners may be said to be as typically illustrative as any other basis that might have been selected. Upon any basis, from the common knowledge of the general appreciation of securities for the past two years, it may safely be assumed that the securities of Fidelity have materially increased in value between the dates as of which the various figures in the record were taken and the present time.

CONCLUSION

In the foregoing argument counsel for the petitioners have not undertaken to reply in detail to all of the arguments and contentions in the several briefs of the respondents. Counsel have not even mentioned some of the arguments and many of the errors and inconsistencies thereof. Counsel have endeavored to correct some errors in statement, some errors in interpretation of cases, and to demonstrate the fallacies of the principal arguments in the several briefs of the respondents.

The fact that there are three briefs on behalf of the respondents has made it impracticable for counsel to present their reply argument in a manner as orderly and well arranged as counsel would otherwise have desired.

It is believed that this Reply Brief has demonstrated the unsoundness or the inapplicability of the principles relied upon by the respondents, and it is again urged that the order of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit should be reversed and that the order of the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia should be affirmed.

Part II of Trustee's Report, April 13, 1942

FIDELITY ASSURANCE ) Corporate Reorganization.
ASSOCIATION, Debtor.) No. 4514.

REPORT OF CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY, TRUSTEE, AS PROVIDED BY ORDER OF FEBRUARY 25, 1942, DESIGNATED AS "PART II" OF TRUSTEE'S REPORT UNDER SECTION 167, CHAPTER X.

To the Honorable Ben Moore, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of West Virginia.

The Central Trust Company, Trustee, respectfully reports to the Court as follows:

The Court's attention is directed to the report of the Trustee filed herein on October 6, 1941, (designated as Part One) which was filed pursuant to the requirements of Section 167, of Chapter X, which contained, among other things, information concerning the following:

A. Nature and history of the debtor's business.

B. Statement of assets and liabilities of the Company as of June 6, 1941, broken down as to the several contract funds.

*This report is not a part of the Record. It is referred to at Page 90 in the West Virginia brief. For that reason it is presented herewith.

C. Schedules showing the location and value of the Company's assets. Also schedule showing assets on deposit in the various states and the liabilities to contract holders by states.

D. Schedules showing rating by classification of securities owned by the Company.

E. Various tables, charts, and brief statements concerning numerous other matters such as tenure of office of officers and directors, the method employed in making investments, detailed information concerning investment securities sold by the Company, and a list of other items on which the Trustee would report after a detailed examination and audit.

The Court's attention is also directed to the report filed herein by the Trustee on August 5, 1941, which contained, among other things, the following:

A. A list of securities delivered to the Trustee.

B. A list of the holders of the common stock of the debtor.

C. A list of the holders of the preferred stock of the debtor.

D. A list of the contract holders which contains the following information:

(a) Contract number.

(b) Name and last known address of the contract holder.

(c) Actuarial reserve. (This figure supports the reserve as shown on the balance sheets.)

(d) Cash liabilities.

(e) Loans to contract holders.

(f) Additional credits. (This applies only to Series "B" contract holders.)

E. Balance sheets showing the assets and liabilities of the debtor as of June 6, 1941.

F. A schedule showing the par value, book value, and market value by funds of all securities owned by the debtor as of June 6, 1941.

Although your Trustee has refrained from incurring the expense of an audit which will be necessary before a full and complete report can be made on the items set forth on Page 64 of the Part One Report, your Trustee submits the following as a continued partial report under Section 167 of Chapter X.

1. Your Trustee is of the opinion that during this proceeding it is desirable to continue the operation of the debtor's business to the extent and in the manner followed by the Trustee since the commencement of the proceeding; i. e., servicing the securities in the possession of the Trustee, servicing the portfolio, with recommendations, as they appear proper, to the state custodians of assets; the conservation of the estate in the manner and according to the established rules for managing trust estates; maintaining and operating the home office to the extent necessary for preserving and caring for the records of the company with the view of having such office and records readily available to any plan of reorganization that may be effected; collecting the payments made by contract holders under the order of June 14, and maintaining the escrow accounts therefor; making refunds, upon receipt of proper applications, to contract holders of payments made by them since June 6, 1941.

2. The method adopted and followed by your Trustee for servicing the investment portfolio of the debtor is described in considerable detail, with examples, in the Trustee's application for interim allowances filed herein on March 10, 1942. Briefly, the method is as follows: In collaboration with the firm of Standard and Poor's Corporation, nationally recognized authority on statistical analysis, forms were designed and prepared for statistical reports on each security in the portfolio. In the beginning the said Standard and Poor's prepared an analysis of each security in the portfolio and these analyses are kept up to date by a revision of the analysis each time the issuing company releases a statement. Copies of the analyses are furnished to your Trustee and to Hubert F. Young, former investment officer of the debtor, now employed by the Trustee, who in turn presents to the Trustee his report and opinion concerning the security, based upon the said Standard & Poor's report and upon such other information as the said Young gathers at his New York office. With the reports of the said Standard and Poor's and the said Young before it, your Trustee then decides, through its investment committee consisting of Messrs. Dickinson, Picklesimer and Payne, whether the security in question should be held, sold, exchanged or converted, or whether any other action should be taken with respect thereto such as giving consent or filing objection to plans of corporate reorganizations, etc. Immediately after reaching a decision the Trustee notifies all state depositories holding said security in question of its decision and recommendation.

After making this detailed analyses of the securities portfolio the Trustee is of the opinion that the best interest of the contract holders and other parties in interest can be best served through some form of reorganization or by slow and orderly liquidation.

The estate of the debtor may be divided generally into four classes of property:

(1) Securities having a ready market value and convertible into cash immediately,

(2) Securities for which there is only a limited market, but which can be sold without great difficulty or delay,

(3) Securities which can be sold only in small blocks and which must be sold with considerable caution in order to prevent depressing the market therefor,

(4) Real estate.

The analyses by your Trustee of the securities contained in the portfolio disclose that only approximately fifteen per cent of the securities can be classified as having a ready market. This does not necessarily mean that there is no market for the remaining securities, but as a group they would require careful handling, and if sold should be offered in small blocks on a favorable market in order to prevent a depression of the market with consequent loss in prices realized. A study is being made of the real estate owned by the debtor, and recommendations regarding the same will be made as soon as such study is completed.

Your Trustee feels that in view of the character of the investments in the securities portfolio that any procedure requiring rapid liquidation such as would be required in straight bankruptcy would tend to dissipate the assets of the Company, thereby causing needless loss to the creditors.

3. Your Trustee at this time is unable to present any details of a plan of reorganization due to the fact that there are certain important matters that must be decided upon from a legal standpoint before a plan can be worked out and submitted. Your Trustee reports, however, that there has been several suggestions made as to the kind of business into which the Company may be reorganized into a going concern. Some of these suggestions were made during the hearing before Your Honor beginning August 5, 1941 and concluded October 10, 1941, together with additional suggestions made to your Trustee. Among the suggestions are, (a) insurance company, (b) investment trust company, (c) mutual savings and loan company, (d) face amount certificate company with insurance provisions.

Your Trustee reports as one possibility that will lend itself for consideration for reorganization is that the assets could be placed in a management trust. This, your Trustee believes, would be profitable to the general interest, irrespective of the interest of the individual beneficiaries (present contract holders) as the same may be ultimately determined. Such a trust could be managed in a way so as to dispose of securities in an orderly manner with the income in the form of dividends and interest derived from the securities accruing to the benefit of the creditors. A feature could be incorporated in the trust whereby beneficiaries (the present contract holders) could borrow a designated percentage of the amount of their equities which could be adjusted from time to time as changing conditions would warrant. This would give some relief to contract holders who are in immediate need of cash, and at the same time provide a means of keeping surplus cash invested. The present securities portfolio has a number of securities that have a high interest yield with safety of the principal being somewhat questionable. In such instances certainly a management trust would be beneficial to the creditors as by careful management these securities could be gradually sold and the proceeds reinvested in other securities of a type conforming to the kind usually purchased and owned by trust estates.

4. Your Trustee is not able to report in detail as to alleged irregular practices of the former management which may render those participating therein liable to debtor in damages. Counsel for the Trustee is now engaged in making a detailed study of this question.

5. Before the rights and priorities of contract holders can be determined, and before the details of a plan of reorganization can be perfected, it will be necessary, among other things, to have questions such as the following adjudicated by the Court:

While the Company was operating, loans were made from one contract series fund to another. This created a situation of setting up on the Company's books debtor and creditor funds. Will these loans between contract funds be considered as a prior claim on the assets of the particular debtor fund? Or, will they be considered as sharing on the same basis as other creditors? Or, will they be considered as common creditors and repaid only after all other creditors are paid? The decision on these important questions will be far reaching in its effect upon the contract holders in the funds involved.

A very complicated situation exists in the matter of the Company's deposits with the various states. The clearest presentation of this condition can be achieved through a combination of the following explanation and illustrations:

As pointed out in the Part One Report, there is no uniformity in the statutory requirements of the various states with regard to requiring deposit of securities to be held by designated state agencies to insure the liabilities to contract holders in each particular state, or as prerequisites for qualifying to do business in the states.

As was also pointed out in Part One of this report, the Company has outstanding six series of contracts: (1) Special Income; (2) Special Annuity; (3) Income Reserve (Usually referred to as Series "A"); (4) Series "B"; (5) Series "C"; and (6) Series "D".

The Company maintained separate records for each of the six series. Money collected from the contract holders of any one particular series was used to purchase securities as investments specifically intended for that series fund, and were so recorded on the books of the Company. Your Trustee has found, however, that in many instances situations like the following occurred:

An increase occurred in the liability to Series "B" contract holders in State "X". For one reason or another, acceptable securities which had been purchased for that fund were not immediately available. The Company thereupon deposited securities purchased for the Series "A" fund because they were on hand at the time. It is important to remember that the securities deposited were purchased with money collected from Series "A" contract holders everywhere and not solely with money collected from contract holders in State "X". This is but an example of similar occurrences which have involved all series of contracts in one manner or another, with the possible exception of Series "C".

Summing up, the following involved condition exists:

Certain securities purchased with money collected from the contract holders of one or another series everywhere have found their way into the hands of one or another particular state; and frequently to cover the liability in an entirely different series.

The questions growing out of this situation are:

1. Shall the assets, owned by the Company, be considered as securing the contract liabilities of all contract holders alike without regard to the series of contracts owned and also without regard to the fact that the assets were deposited in the various states?

2. Or, shall the assets, as carried on the books of the Company by contract series, be considered as securing the contract liabilities to all contract holders of that series everywhere, without regard to the fact that the assets have been deposited in the various states?

3. Or, shall the assets on deposit in any particular state be considered as securing the contract liabilities of only the contract holders of that state? And, if so:

(a) Shall the assets be regarded as covering the over-all liability to contract holders in that state, regardless of contract series?

(b) Or, shall the separate assets be regarded as belonging only to the contract holders of the series for which the assets were deposited?

(c) Or, shall the separate assets be regarded as belonging only to the contract holders of the series for which the assets were purchased?

(d) The Statute of the State of West Virginia requires, as a prerequisite for securing a license to do business, a deposit of $100,000.00 plus additional deposits equal to 100% of the Company's contract liability everywhere (due allowance being made for deposits in other states). How shall the securities deposited with the Treasurer of West Virginia be administered? Will they first be looked upon as securing, in full, the liabilities to West Virginia contract holders? Or, will the West Virginia contract holders share on the same basis as contract holders in other states? In either event, how will the excess over the liabilities to West Virginia contract holders be administered? This question can be of far reaching importance as, on the basis of present market values, the securities on deposit with the Treasurer of West Virginia exceed by approximately $8,000,000 the liabilities to West Virginia contract holders. What will be the equitable basis in using any part of this excess, for example, to secure claims of contract holders in states where the market value of securities may be only 50%, 35%, 28%, 16% and 10% of the liabilities?

(e) In which state shall the liability to the contract holder be established in a situation like the following: The contract holder purchased the contract in a state which required a deposit of securities equalling 100% of the liability in the state, and at a later date moved either to a state which required a lesser deposit in proportion to liabilities there or to a state requiring no deposit, or a fixed deposit without regard to liabilities.

To summarize this statement your Trustee again refers to the Part One Report which pointed out that the business presents many complex problems, and we have attempted to present some of them. Your Trustee believes that as soon as possible, following the decision of the appeal now pending in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, a decision should be had on the status of the separate funds and the priorities, if any, of the holders of contracts in each fund. Your Trustee is of the opinion that it can best be done in connection with and as a part of whatever claim procedure is decided upon.

Taking into consideration all facts and circumstances relating to debtor's property and financial conditions, your Trustee is of the opinion that a reorganization, within the objects of Chapter X, can be worked out which will be of benefit to the contract holders.

Respectfully submitted,

CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY,

Trustee.

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

In the District Court the Securities and Exchange Commission became a party to the present proceeding for the reorganization of Fidelity Assurance Association under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act,[1] participated as an appellee before the Circuit Court of Appeals, and is named a respondent by petitioner here.

This memorandum is filed in support of the petition.

[1] The Commission appeared at the court's request pursuant to the provisions of section 208 of the Bankruptcy Act, as added by section 1 of the Act of June 22, 1938, 52 Stat. 894 (U. S. C., title 11, sec. 608).

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 363–387) is reported in 129 F. (2d) 442. The opinion of the District Court (R. 3–38) is reported in 42 F. Supp. 973.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals was entered June 16, 1942 (R. 387–388). A petition for rehearing (R. 389–393) was denied July 22, 1942 (R. 397). Jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under section 240 (a) of the Judicial Code, as amended by the Act of February 13, 1925.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether petitioner association was an "insurance corporation" within the meaning of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act when it filed a petition for reorganization as a corporate debtor.

2. Whether the court below erred in holding that the petition had not been filed in good faith within the meaning of section 146 (3) and (4) of the Bankruptcy Act.

STATUTES INVOLVED

Section 4 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended (U. S. C., title 11, sec. 22 (a)), provides:

> Any person, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation or a building and loan association, shall be entitled to the benefits of this Act as a voluntary bankrupt.

Section 141 of the Bankruptcy Act, as added by section 1 of the Act of June 22, 1938, 52 Stat. 887 (U. S. C., title 11, sec. 541), provides:

> Upon the filing of a petition by a debtor, the judge shall enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it if not so satisfied.

Section 146 of the Bankruptcy Act, as added by section 1 of the Act of June 22, 1938, 52 Stat. 887 (U. S. C., title 11, sec. 546), provides, in part:

> Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term "good faith", a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if— * * *
>
> (3) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected; or
>
> (4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding.

STATEMENT

Petitioner Fidelity Assurance Association is a West Virginia corporation with its principal place of business in Wheeling, West Virginia (R. 5, 363–364). From November 1912 to the end of 1940, under the name of Fidelity Investment Association, it was engaged exclusively in the business of selling its own securities in the form of investment contracts (recently known as face-amount certificates) and in investing and reinvesting the proceeds of such sales (R. 5, 364). It sold 6 different series of contracts at various times in 29 states and the District of Columbia (R. 7, 365–366, 368).[2] Some of the contracts carried insurance features, but the insurance risks were carried by an insurance company to which Fidelity paid premiums, and not by Fidelity (R. 6, 19, 368–369, 370). Fidelity contracted to segregate the proceeds of contracts of each series (less expense deductions) for the benefit of contract holders of that series. It kept books showing the status of the several series separately, and particular securities acquired were allocated to the various funds (R. 9).

The State of West Virginia required Fidelity to deposit, as security for its obligations to contract holders, property of a value equal to $100,000 more than the company's net cash liability on all its outstanding contracts, less the amount of similar deposits required by other states. West Virginia Code, c. 33, Art. 9, sec. 3. Fourteen other states require some sort of deposit (R. 7–8, 365). The property thus deposited by Fidelity constitutes about 95 per cent of its assets (R. 366). The state depositaries did not segregate the deposited securities according to series even where they had notice of the particular series of contracts to which the deposited securities belonged (R. 9). In five states the local statute excludes nonresident contract holders from participating in the local deposit; in other states it is not clear that nonresidents have no interest.[2] The statutes do not expressly indicate whether the measure of claims against the deposits is the amount paid in at the cash surrender value, the reserve value of the contracts, or some other amount.

At least as early as 1940 Fidelity was insolvent. It could not meet the reserve requirements for face-amount certificate companies contained in section 28 of title I of the Investment Company Act of August 22, 1940, 54 Stat. 829 (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 80a–28) (R. 11, 367, 369). On December 31, 1940, the day before that statute was to become effective and its reserve requirements become applicable to Fidelity, it amended its charter so as to obtain insurance powers, at the same time changing its name to Fidelity Assurance Association; this amendment was designed to avoid the requirements of the Investment Company Act, which do not apply to insurance companies (R. 11, 19–20, 340–341, 367, 369). Fidelity received a license to do business as an insurance company from January 1, 1941, to April 1, 1941, upon an understanding with the Auditor of West Virginia (ex officio Commissioner of Insurance) that it would engage in no business until he gave it permission to do so (R. 11–12, 369–370).[4] Subsequently, without an authorization from the Auditor, it sent out riders to its series B contract holders assuming direct liability on the insurance provisions of the series B contracts, continuing, however, to pay premiums to the insurance company which had theretofore carried these risks (R. 341–343, 370). It wrote no new investment contracts after December 31, 1940, but it continued to service existing contracts (R. 11–12).

The insurance license expired March 31, 1941. Application for a renewal of the license was made, but no renewal was granted. The Auditor of West Virginia on April 4, 1941, directed Fidelity to discontinue the transaction of all business. On April 11, 1941, the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, appointed receivers for Fidelity on a petition filed by the Auditor with a view to reorganization. (R. 12–13, 249–258, 370.) One of the receivers is a member of the law firm which represented Fidelity, and this firm now acts as attorneys for the receivers (R. 32, 139–140, 314).[3] Other receivership proceedings were begun in eleven other states (R. 13, 370–371).

On June 6, 1941, Fidelity filed a voluntary petition under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of West Virginia. The court then appointed a trustee, enjoined the various state receivers and others from disposing of Fidelity's property in their hands, and ordered the receivers to deliver to the trustee the property of Fidelity which they held. The court later ordered state officials holding deposits of Fidelity's property to deliver them to the trustee. The state receivers and depositaries were permitted by the court to intervene and file answers controverting the allegations of Fidelity's position. Extended hearings were held, during which the court rescinded its turn-over order with respect to state depositaries (R. 3–4, 319–334, 371).

At the conclusion of the hearing the District Court approved Fidelity's petition and overruled motions to rescind its standing turn-over and freezing orders (R. 38–40). The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, holding (1) that Fidelity was an insurance corporation and therefore not eligible for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, and (2) that the petition had not been filed in good faith; rehabilitation of Fidelity not being reasonably possible, continuation of the prior state-court receiverships for liquidation purposes would serve the interest of creditors better than proceedings under Chapter X (R. 363–388).

ARGUMENT

I

Fidelity's business before December 31, 1940, was unquestionably that of an investment company selling face-amount certificates, and not that of an insurance corporation. Clearly, if it had then sought Chapter X reorganization it would have been held eligible. The fact that at the end of 1940 it changed its name from Fidelity Investment Association to Fidelity Assurance Association, procured a charter amendment conferring insurance powers, and obtained a license to do insurance business with the understanding that it should do none except with specific permission from the state licensing official should not alter Fidelity's status. Its sole business of substance continued to be investment contracts. Such insurance business as it later purported to transact, without the West Virginia Auditor's authorization, was insubstantial; its assumption of liability on the insurance features of some of its contracts was only secondary, so that it incurred no real risks, since Lincoln National Life Insurance Company continued to insure these contracts on a policy maintained by Fidelity.[3]

The Circuit Court of Appeals, however, held that Fidelity's status for purposes of the Bankruptcy Act was to be determined not by its predominant business activity (pursuant to which it had acquired all its assets and incurred all its substantial liabilities) but by its charter powers and classification under state law, although this status on which the court relied was assumed only after Fidelity had gone virtually out of business (see R. 372–373, 376, 379). The court believed that under the laws of West Virginia (and of most of the states in 1910, when Congress inserted the present excepting clause in section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act) Fidelity was an insurance corporation with incidental annuity powers at the time of filing its petition for reorganization. The rule that classification of a company for purposes of state regulation is determinative of its status under the federal Bankruptcy Act was rested by the court on the theory that Congress had excluded "insurance corporations" from federal corporate reorganization because companies in such a category were comprehensively regulated during their active existence by state laws and should be similarly administered in case of rehabilitation or dissolution; to determine whether a particular company fell within the class it was necessary to inquire concerning its classification under the applicable state law (see R. 374–378). The soundness of this rationale in the present case disappears when it is noted that face-amount certificate companies in West Virginia were subject to regulation similar to and as comprehensive as that applied there to insurance corporations and were subject to identical liquidation procedures (see R. 124–130; Pet. 52–56). Unquestionably, an investment company under state law is eligible for reorganization under Chapter X.

The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that Fidelity's charter powers and classification under West Virginia law govern its eligibility for reorganization conflicts with the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit In re Roumanian Workers Educational Ass'n of America, 108 F. (2d) 782. The view of the Sixth Circuit, that the character of activity actually carried on is the important criterion, is the view taken by legal writers. Finletter, Law of Bankruptcy; Reorganization (1939) 107; Note, Bankruptcy; Corporate Reorganization: Survey of

In addition, the first question presented by this case is one for certiorari because of its importance in the administration of federal statutes. It involves the eligibility for and amenability to corporate reorganization under Chapter X of face-amount certificate and other investment companies which procure incidental insurance powers, making insubstantial use of them. Fidelity alone has in excess of $20,000,000 of assets; other similar companies are also large financial institutions which have attracted the savings of large numbers of persons throughout the United States for investment.[*] As we endeavor to point out in part II of this memorandum (infra, pages 14–16), it is a matter of considerable consequence whether such companies are reorganized in a single federal proceeding or their affairs are settled piecemeal in numerous state proceedings.

[1] The court below referred to cases in other circuits as supporting its rule (see R. 375–379). Those cases contain statements that charter power and state classification constitute the controlling consideration. E. g., In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984, 985 (C. C. A. 2); Woolsey v. Security Trust Co., 74 F. (2d) 334, 335, 337 (C. C. A. 5); Security B. & L. Assn. v. Spurlock, 65 F. (2d) 768, 771 (C. C. A. 9); Kansas v. Hayes, 62 F. (2d) 597, 599–600 (C. C. A. 10); Clemons v. Liberty Savings & Real Estate Corp., 61 F. (2d) 448, 450 (C. C. A. 5). It is to be noted, however, that in most of the cases the decisions were equally consistent with the view that business actually done should be the controlling factor. Woolsey v. Security Trust Co., supra; Security B. & L. Assn. v. Spurlock, supra; Kansas v. Hayes, supra; Clemons v. Liberty Savings & Real Estate Corp., supra. Charter power and state classification have in fact been determinative in only two situations: (1) where there is the possibility that activities carried on ultra vires affect the corporation's amenability to bankruptcy (Gamble v. Daniel, 39 F. (2d) 447 (C. C. A. 8)), and (2) where the activities carried on do not fall within an easily recognized category (In re Prudence Co., 79 F. (2d) 77 (C. C. A. 2); In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., supra). Clearly, neither of those situations exists in Fidelity's case.

The decision below, by pointing out a way in which face-amount certificate companies may avoid bankruptcy, also interferes with the applicability of section 67 (f) of the Bankruptcy Act, as added by section 29 (a) of title I of the Act of August 22, 1940, 54 Stat. 835 (U. S. C., title 11, sec. 107 (f)), providing for the avoidance in certain cases, by the trustee in bankruptcy, of deposits made with state officials by face-amount certificate companies and providing for the distribution in bankruptcy of such deposits. This section is applicable to face-amount certificate companies as defined in section 4 of title I of the Act of August 22, 1940, 54 Stat. 799 (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 80a–4 (1)). Section 3 (c) (3) of title I of the same act excepts insurance companies from the category. 54 Stat. 797 (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 80a–3 (c) (3)). Thus the holding of the Circuit Court of Appeals reaches so far as the coverage of the Investment Company Act of 1940.

[*] It is significant that the Investment Company Act defines an insurance company as one "whose primary and predominant business activity is the writing of insurance or the reinsuring of risks underwritten by insurance companies." Section 2 (a) (17) of title I of the Act of August 22, 1940, 54 Stat. 790 (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 80a–2 (a) (17)).

II

The court below held also that Fidelity's petition was not filed in good faith within the meaning of section 146 of the Bankruptcy Act. It adverted to the unlikelihood that a plan of reorganization of Fidelity as a going concern could be effected (R. 382–384). If the court's ultimate conclusion that the petition lacked good faith is to be construed as embodying a holding under section 146 (3) of the statute, we think that this Court should grant review of that question. The apparent view of the Circuit Court of Appeals that rehabilitation of the debtor must be in prospect (see R. 383, 384) conflicts with decisions that a plan for slow and orderly liquidation meets the requirements of section 146 (3). In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Co., 112 F. (2d) 655 (C. C. A. 2); R. L. Witters Associates v. Ebsary Gypsum Co., 93 F. (2d) 746 (C. C. A. 5); In re Central Funding Co., 75 F. (2d) 256 (C. C. A. 2).

The Circuit Court of Appeals clearly held that the petition lacked good faith because the pending proceedings in various states would best subserve the interests of creditors. The statutes governing those proceedings (see R. 40–57, 203–209; Pet. 52–56) are liquidation and receivership statutes of the type customarily applicable to banks, insurance companies, and other financial corporations. In general the receivers would have jurisdiction over only the assets in the states of their respective appointment, and would have no power to bring suit to secure assets and surplus deposits in other states. Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 321, 339; Great Western Mining Co. v. Harris, 198 U. S. 561; Lion Bonding Co. v. Karatz, 262 U. S. 77. Nevertheless the court below concluded that continuation of the state proceedings would best subserve the interests of the creditors because (1) it did not clearly appear that there would be any surplus in any state other than West Virginia; (2) the manner of distribution of funds in each state had to be determined in any event according to state law; and (3) creditors could as well file claims for the West Virginia surplus in a West Virginia state court as in the federal court for West Virginia having jurisdiction of these proceedings.

In reaching this conclusion the court below failed to give due weight to circumstances which should be controlling:

(1) There is need in this case for the impartial investigation, into the acts of the management, by an independent trustee (as required by section 167 of the Bankruptcy Act), looking to recoveries for the benefit of creditors. The past history of Fidelity is marked by extravagance and other serious mismanagement. Many of its officers are now under indictment. The general advantages of Chapter X as a reorganization statute have been pointed out by this Court in Securities and Ex- change Commission v. U. S. Realty & Improvement Co., 310 U. S. 434. These advantages are particularly clear as against the state procedures in this case, where one of the West Virginia receivers is a member of the law firm which has been counsel to Fidelity, and is a law partner of one of the Fidelity officers under indictment.

(2) The difficult problems of distribution in this case can best be settled in a single administration. Concededly if the respective state deposits were distributed to local creditors there would probably be no surplus in any state other than West Virginia (with the possible exception of Wisconsin, where the assets appear to be worth more than the cash value of the contracts held by Wisconsin residents). But, before there can be any conclusion that no part of the assets in any state is available to contract holders not resident in that state, the following difficult questions must be settled:

(a) It must first be determined whether the state deposits are solely for the benefit of local residents, and not for the benefit of all contract holders. In West Virginia, where clearly nonresidents have an interest in the deposit, it must be determined whether West Virginia creditors have a preferential interest.

(b) It must be determined whether the local deposit is for the benefit of contract holders who resided in the state when their contracts were sold, who resided there when the deposits were made, or who now reside in the state.

(c) It must be determined whether the measure of claims is the cash value of the contracts, the reserve value, the amount necessary to mature the contracts, the amount paid in, or some other amount.

(d) It must be determined whether states which accepted deposits from Fidelity to secure contracts in a particular Fidelity series, with knowledge that the securities deposited constituted a fund belonging by contract to another series, may keep such assets.

It is obvious that security holders from states without deposits or states with inadequate deposits, must litigate these questions in each of the fifteen states having deposits unless there is to be a central administration in a court of bankruptcy. The facile distributions mentioned in the briefs in opposition filed by respondents (W. Va. Br. 34, 37; Tenn. Br. 16–19) would be effected only by disregarding these questions. We think there should be a central administration even though the questions must be determined according to state law, as remarked by the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 386).[10]

[10] Federal courts are frequently called upon to determine questions of state law in cases arising because of diversity in citizenship of the parties. Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64. The coordinate constitutional jurisdiction of the federal

The question of the weight to be given to factors such as those set out above in determining whether the interests of the creditors will be best subserved by the continuation of prior state proceedings is one of importance. This Court recently granted certiorari in a case presenting similar problems. Marine Harbor Properties, Inc., v. Manufacturers Trust Co., No. 24, October Term, 1942, certiorari granted, 315 U. S. 794.[11] Unlike the situation in the Marine Harbor and Paloma Estates cases, the property of the debtor here is not all located in a single jurisdiction, but is spread through many.

CONCLUSION

The Circuit Court of Appeals erred in holding that the petition for reorganization should be dismissed. Its decision conflicts with the decisions of other circuit courts of appeals in holding that petitioner Fidelity Assurance Association was an insurance corporation in 1941 and that the petition was not filed in good faith. The questions presented are important and warrant consideration by this Court. It is therefore respect-courts in bankruptcy cases should not remain unexercised under a permissive statute merely because questions of state law are raised. The nature of Chapter X and of other Bankruptcy Act proceedings is such that these questions are normally raised.

No. 319

FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION AND CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY, PETITIONERS,

v.

EDGAR B. SIMS ET AL.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

The Securities and Exchange Commission became a party in the District Court to the present proceeding for the reorganization of Fidelity Assurance Association under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act,[1] participated as an appellee before the Circuit Court of Appeals, and is named a respondent here. On the points which the court below found to be dispositive, the Commission's position here is, in general, aligned with that of petitioners.

This brief is confined to the two issues decided by the court below—whether the debtor is an insurance company and whether its petition under Chapter X was filed in good faith. Respondents in their several briefs in opposition have indicated an intention to urge here a number of other matters collateral to these main issues. Some of these issues (W. Va. Br. in Opp., Addendum, pp. 53–57) raise no substantial questions and were not passed upon by the court below; we shall therefore not treat them in our main brief. Other issues, such as those relating to the legality of the Debtor's meetings and elections (W. Va. Br. in Opp., pp. 20–21; 41–45), largely arise from a conflict among private interests formerly connected with the management involving efforts to control the administration of the company's affairs.[2] Except to the extent that they may indicate the necessity for Chapter X proceedings, we think it inappropriate for us to argue these questions of internal corporate management.[3]

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 238–263) is reported in 129 F. (2d) 442. The opinion of the District Court (R. 176–202) is reported in 42 F. Supp. 973.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals was entered June 16, 1942 (R. 263–264). A petition for rehearing (R. 264–266) was denied July 22, 1942 (R. 267). A petition for a writ of certiorari was filed August 20, 1942 and granted October 12, 1942. Jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under Section 240 (a) of the Judicial Code, as amended by the Act of February 13, 1925.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether petitioner association was an "insurance corporation" within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act when it filed a petition for reorganization as a corporate debtor.

[3] Those issues do not involve issues of good faith within the meaning of Section 146; in so far as they may be thought to reflect on the debtor's motives in filing a petition under Chapter X, they are immaterial to the statutory tests of Section 146. Cf. Marine Harbor Properties, Inc. v. Manufacturer's Trust Co., No. 24, this Term, decided November 9, 1942.

2. Whether the petition was filed in good faith within the meaning of Section 146 (3) and (4) of the Bankruptcy Act.

STATUTES INVOLVED

Section 4 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended (11 U. S. C. § 22 (a)) provides:

> Any person, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation or a building and loan association, shall be entitled to the benefits of this Act as a voluntary bankrupt.

Section 141 of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended (11 U. S. C. § 541) provides:

> Upon the filing of a petition by a debtor, the judge shall enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it if not so satisfied.

Section 146 of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended (11 U. S. C. § 546), provides, in part:

> Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term "good faith", a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if——

>
> (3) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected; or
>
> (4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding.

The relevant state statutes governing deposit requirements and receivership or liquidation proceedings are set out in Appendix D, Appendices, pp. 10–74.

STATEMENT

The facts as found by the District Court in its opinion and as shown by the evidence may be summarized as follows (other facts bearing on the issues whether petitioner is an insurance company and the relative advantages of state and Chapter X proceedings are set out in the Argument, infra).

1. The Debtor's Business, History, and Financial Condition.

Fidelity Assurance Association, the petitioner, is a West Virginia corporation with its principal place of business in Wheeling, West Virginia (R. 4, 612). From November 1912 to the end of 1940, under the name Fidelity Investment Association, it was engaged exclusively in the business of selling its own securities in the form of investment contracts (called "annuity contracts" under the West Virginia statute, and recently known as face-amount certificates) and in investing and reinvesting the proceeds of such sales (R. 177–178, 240).

At various times, Fidelity sold six different series of contracts in 29 states and the District of Columbia (R. 304–316, 479).

There are outstanding contracts in the face amount of $181,948,026.70, representing a net cash liability of $23,475,668.67 owed to approximately 88,000 holders (R. 242; Ex. 48). Holders of such contracts now reside in each of the 48 states, the District of Columbia, and foreign countries (R. 242; Ex. 48).

The several series of contracts differ only in detail. In general each series provides that the contract holder is to pay a fixed sum monthly for a named period, e. g., ten years, in return for which Fidelity is obligated to pay a fixed sum on a named date (three to thirteen months after the contract holder's last payment), or at the option of the contract holder, to pay the principal sum in ten annual installments (R. 178; Ex. 1–5). Each series of contracts embodies loan and cash surrender provisions under which monthly payments must be made by the purchaser for a period of at least nine months before the contract has any cash surrender value and, depending upon the contract series, for a period of six and a half to nine years before that value is as much as the amount paid in, without interest (R. 178; Ex. 1–5). The monthly payments, after fees and charges are deducted, are required by the contracts to be set aside in reserve funds, which the later contracts required to be segregated by contract series, to assure that Fidelity will be able to discharge its liabilities under the contracts at maturity (Ex. 4, 5).[4]

[4] The terms of the contracts and the manner in which the company conducted its business are described in detail in the Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission on Com-

In addition, the Series B contract which Fidelity sold from 1935 to 1940 permits the contract holder to avail himself of a blanket insurance policy issued by Lincoln National Life Insurance Co., an Indiana corporation which has no connection with Fidelity (R. 416, 783; Ex. 4). The premium for this insurance is deducted by Fidelity from the contract holder's periodic payments and is remitted by Fidelity to the insurance company (R. 783–784). If an insured contract holder dies before completing his payments, the insurance company pays Fidelity the discounted value of the remaining payments so that the certificate will mature as originally issued (R. 681–682; 783–784). At least until the 1941 events described below (pp. 12–13), Fidelity assumed no insurance liability under this form of contract or otherwise (Ex. 4; R. 377–378).

In accordance with its undertaking, embodied in its contracts, to segregate the assets by contract series, Fidelity kept books which show the status of the several series separately, and which further show the particular securities allocated to the various funds reserved for the respective contract series (R. 180, 331–332; 342–344; 367–368, 379–381, 581; Ex. 25). In keeping with this theory of segregation, securities were "sold" and moneys panies Issuing Face Amount Installment Certificates, submitted to Congress March 13, 1940, pursuant to Section 30 of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 (H. Doc. 659, 76th Cong.). See especially pages 200–204, 222–224. This report is in evidence in this proceeding (Ex. 6, 12) and copies have been filed with the Clerk of this Court.

were "borrowed" on open book account between the separate series funds (R. 333, 409, 658–660). Since securities were carried on the company's books at cost, interfund "sales" above cost increased the book value of the company's portfolio and created paper profits which the stockholders shared with the contract holders (R. 658). Interfund "loans" made the total corporate cash freely available in making payments to contract holders of any series, so that the corporation could avoid liquidation of that series' securities, resultant realization of losses, reduction in the book value of the portfolio, and decrease or elimination of income available for stockholders (R. 381–382). The funds which have interfund accounts payable appear to be insolvent, and the solvency of other funds depends on the extent to which their interfund accounts receivable are collectible assets (R. 492–493; Ex. 26, 82).

The domiciliary State of West Virginia required Fidelity to deposit as security for its obligations to all contract holders, wherever located, property of a value equal to $100,000 more than the company's net cash liability on all its outstanding contracts, less the amount of similar deposits required by other states. West Virginia Code, c. 33, art. 9, sec. 3, (Appendix D, Appendices, pp. 63–65). Of the 28 states other than West Virginia in which the company sold its contracts, only 14 required a deposit, the nature and amount of which varied from state to state.[5] The property thus deposited by Fidelity constitutes about 95 percent of its assets (R. 242; Ex. 25).

Beginning with the Series B and D contracts in 1934, when Fidelity deposited property in the states which required such deposits, it made efforts to maintain segregation by series (R. 601–612, 644, 660; Ex. 60, 61, 72, 73). But some of the state depositaries refused to segregate the securities deposited with them with respect to the particular funds of Fidelity to which the securities belonged (R. 592–593, 633–636; Ex. 60, 62). The state depositaries were aware that Fidelity was contractually obligated to segregate the Series B and D funds, and that in many instances they were holding securities to secure contractual liabilities relating to series other than those to which the securities belonged (R. 654–655, 609, 628, 760–761, 768; Ex. 72–79).

Appendix A, Appendices, pp. 1–2, shows the market value of securities deposited in the various states segregated by series as compared with the net cash surrender liabilities in those states broken down by series.[6]

---

[5] The states which required deposits are Alabama, Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, and Wisconsin (R. 241, 347–373). Their statutory requirements relating to deposits are set out in Appendix D, Appendices, pp. 10–74.

[6] Appendix A was compiled from the Chapter X trustee's report filed pursuant to Section 167 of the Bankruptcy Act, filed October 10, 1941 (not printed).

2. Events Which Led to the Filing of the Petition Under Chapter X.

Except for a brief period in 1937, Fidelity has been insolvent continuously at least since 1933 (R. 440–443). Its assets have been dissipated by advances to salesmen, margin trading in speculative securities, disastrous investments, and extravagant non-income-producing expenditures (R. 440–476). A suit by the Securities and Exchange Commission in 1938 to enjoin violation of the fraud provisions of the Securities Act of 1933,[7] and a stockholder's suit in 1939 for a receiver and other relief,[8] also marked Fidelity's recent history and had an important impact on its business.

Fidelity made efforts to solve its financial difficulties by reorganization and procurement of new capital almost continuously from 1932 (R. 1136–43).[9] The enactment of the Investment Com-[7] For the complaint, affidavits, and decree in this case see Report, supra, note 4, at 197–245, 257–258.

[8] See McCammon v. Fidelity Investment Assn., 26 F. Supp. 117 (N. D. W. Va.), affirmed, Hutchinson v. Fidelity Investment Assn., 106 F. (2d) 431 (C. C. A. 4).

[9] From 1936 "on back to the early thirties" the directors, the executive committee, and the finance committee did "talk about trying to get new capital and how we might recapitalize and whatnot" (R. 1136). From 1938 through 1940 (R. 1136–7) Arthur Koontz, a director and member of the finance committee (R. 1167) personally endeavored to reorganize, or procure new capital for, the company from investment banking and commercial banking sources, insurance companies, investment trusts, and finance companies (R. 1136–43). Finally, in 1940, Allen G. Messick and Ber-pany Act on August 22, 1940, 54 Stat. 789 (15 U. S. C. § 80a (1)–(52)), however, seriously complicated these reorganization efforts. Fidelity was subject to the Act, which, as a condition precedent to the sale of new contracts, required the maintenance of specified reserves and imposed expense loading limitations (Sec. 28). Fidelity's financial condition precluded its satisfying these reserve requirements and its scale of expenses exceeded the income it could expect under the expense loading limitations (R. 404, 630, 669, 796–797, 864–877). But if it could not sell new contracts, it could nard Rosset, of Chicago, entered into a contract to invest $500,000 in a new company which would assume certain of Fidelity's contract liabilities (R. 1142–4). This contract was never performed and Koontz's efforts to secure new capital for the company ceased when Messick became chairman of the board in 1940. Messick continued the efforts to secure new capital. (R. 1144.)

In December 1940, Koontz resumed his efforts to reorganize the company (R. 1144–5). He did some work "with a view of preparing the company to go into the business of life insurance if the [company's financial] statement, in the Auditor's judgment, showed that it should be permitted to write life insurance" (R. 1146, 1157) "but they were never able to get the green light from the Commissioner" (R. 1146). During this period the company "was not doing business—it was not permitted to do business, and Mr. Sims [Auditor and ex officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia, see infra, p. 12] had stated to them that he wasn't going to permit them to do business unless there was a change in the situation" (R. 1156). Thus, the beginning of 1941 was characterized by continuous efforts to work out a voluntary recapitalization plan (R. 1147–9) to forestall involuntary proceedings (R. 1150, 1184–6).

become a liquidating enterprise. Consequently, in an attempt to gain time to devise a permanent solution for Fidelity's difficulties, its board of directors adopted the expedient of amending its charter on December 31, 1940, to change its name to "Fidelity Assurance Association" and to enlarge its objects and purposes by the addition of life insurance powers (R. 541; Ex. 20). Fidelity did not, however, abandon its existing charter power to continue the annuity contract business in which theretofore it had been exclusively engaged. Instead, in order to be able to continue receiving payments on contracts previously sold and to make payments on contracts which matured or were surrendered for cash (R. 669), Fidelity filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission the notification of registration as an investment company required by Section 8a of the Investment Company Act (R. 667).[10]

After Fidelity amended its charter, the respondent Edgar B. Sims, Auditor and ex officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia, issued a license to Fidelity to do business as an insurance company from January 1, 1941, to March 31, 1941, upon the express condition that it would engage in no business except the servicing of its outstanding face amount certificates until he gave it permission to do so (R. 406, 438, 701; Ex. 24). In spite of this condition, Fidelity transmitted to its Series B contract holders riders which when signed by them purported to make Fidelity an insurer (R. 237–238; Appendix B). Upon expiration of its insurance license on March 31, 1941, Fidelity applied for a renewal which was executed but never delivered (R. 237).[11] On April 4, 1941, Sims directed Fidelity to discontinue the transaction of all business (R. 246, 702). On April 11, 1941, the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, appointed receivers for Fidelity on a petition filed by Sims (R. 246; Ex. 21). Shortly thereafter independent actions were begun in eleven other states (R. 246–247). Most of these were liquidation proceedings begun by state officials in the state courts, some were equity proceedings in state or federal courts, and some were purely administrative. The statutory provisions under which these proceedings were instituted in the various states are set out in Appendix D, Appendices, pp. 10–74. None of the state proceedings made substantial progress toward the collection of assets and determination of claims, except in Wisconsin where approximately half of the local deposit was liquidated and proofs of claim were received."[12]

[11] Fidelity's investment company license also expired on March 31, 1941. On March 8, 1941, the statute providing for such licenses (West Virginia Code, c. 33, art. 9, sec. 1) was repealed and replaced by a statute which is integrated with the Investment Company Act of 1940 (W. Va. L. 1941, c. 46, March 8, 1941). Fidelity never qualified under the new West Virginia statute.

3. The Chapter X Proceeding.

On June 6, 1941, Fidelity filed a voluntary petition under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of West Virginia (R. 4). The court appointed a trustee, enjoined the various local receivers and others from disposing of Fidelity's property in their hands, and ordered the local receivers to deliver to the trustee the Fidelity property which they held (R. 1). The court later ordered state officials holding deposits of Fidelity's property to deliver them to the trustee (R. 11). The local receivers and depositaries and various creditors were permitted by the court to intervene and file answers controverting the allegations of Fidelity's petition (R. 15–20, 29, 31, 48, 58, 79, 88–96, 118–161). Extended hearings were held on the question of approval of the petition. In the course of these hearings, the district court rescinded its order on state depositaries to turn the deposits over to the trustee, but left the turn-over order in effect as to the local receivers (R. 102–114).

On January 5, 1942, the District Court approved the petition and overruled motions to rescind its standing turn-over and freezing orders (R. 175).

[12] After the decision of the court below certain of the states called for the filing of proofs of claim, pursuant to that court's order on the stay of its mandate (R. 268–270).

The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed (R. 263) on two separate grounds: (1) that Fidelity was an insurance corporation and therefore not eligible for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act; and (2) that the petition had not been filed in good faith, since rehabilitation of Fidelity was not reasonably possible and therefore continuation of the prior pending proceedings for liquidation purposes would better serve the interest of creditors than proceedings under Chapter X (R. 238–263).[13]

SPECIFICATION OF ERRORS

The court below erred:

1. In holding that petitioner Fidelity Assurance Association is an "insurance corporation" within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, and so is ineligible to receive the benefits of the Act as a voluntary bankrupt.

2. In holding that the petition was not filed in good faith.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I

Since the facts establish that Fidelity is not an insurance corporation, it is not disqualified under Section 4 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act from the benefits of that Act as a voluntary bankrupt. For 28 years and until December 1940, Fidelity was licensed only to sell annuity contracts under a provision expressly inapplicable to insurance corporations; it was, therefore, not authorized to do an insurance business and it did not engage in such business.

The amendment of its charter in December 1940 to include insurance powers, and its issuance of riders purporting to assume liability under the insurance provisions of its Series B contracts, were insufficient to make Fidelity ineligible under Section 4 (a). All of the $23,000,000 liabilities of Fidelity were incurred in its sale of investment contracts prior to its charter amendment. The enlarged license to do insurance business was merely an artificial device to achieve other purposes and it was expressly ineffective. Nor, in fact, did the issuance of the riders result in any insurance liability since the actual consequence was only the continuance of an arrangement under which an insurance company unconnected with Fidelity insured the contract payments on a group basis.

Even if the issuance of riders may be considered to be the doing of insurance business contrary to its actual licensed powers, the controlling test is the nature of the principal pursuit of the company; the touchstone is what the company actually does, not what it is empowered to do. Plainly here Fidelity's insurance business, if any, was of negligible significance for purposes of determining its eligibility under Section 4 (a).

II

A. Whether Fidelity can be reorganized on a going concern basis or whether only some form of liquidation is in order for it, there is no lack of good faith within the meaning of Section 146 (4). That the interests of the creditors will not be subserved better by the various state receivership and liquidation proceedings than in a Chapter X proceeding appears from three separate factors establishing the desirability of a central administration which provides a machinery for effective marshalling of assets and equitable and precise distribution to creditors who are legally entitled to such assets.

1. The facts relating to Fidelity's course of business and its reorganization efforts show that there is a necessity for the impartial and expert investigation which Chapter X affords. The record indicates that extravagance and mismanagement mark Fidelity's business. Fidelity and its officers and directors have been enjoined from violations of the fraud provisions of the Securities Act. Whatever the actual facts may ultimately be disclosed to be, investigation of possible civil actions on behalf of Fidelity's estate is appropriate. Yet the state proceedings give no promise of vigorous investigation comparable to that which may fairly be expected in Chapter X proceedings. Thus, in states other than West Virginia, there are obstacles of venue and jurisdiction, while in respect of the West Virginia proceedings, the record establishes interlocking relationships among the receivers, their counsel, and Fidelity's officials, which would at the least indicate divided loyalities standing in the way of thorough exploration of the facts.

2. The task of marshalling assets and of distribution presents a number of difficult issues which can best be settled in a single administration under Chapter X, rather than by separate administration in a dozen state proceedings. In order to assure that there be distribution of the assets in the proper amounts to legally entitled creditors, the assets of the various series of contracts must be disentangled, and distribution must depend upon the determination of complex issues presenting questions both of identity of the creditors and of amount due. The state officials, however, propose immediate distribution without awaiting litigation of such issues. Unless there is a single forum which is available for the presentation of all these issues, the contract holders will be likely, as a practical matter, to be deprived altogether of the opportunity to litigate their claims, for there are many classes of contract holders scattered throughout the country, with claims on the basis of net cash liability, averaging only $273.

3. A single administration under Chapter X furnishes a superior vehicle for liquidation of Fidelity's assets. Fidelity's portfolio is such as to require skillful and orderly disposition for fullest realization upon the securities. The several state proceedings are not such as to afford appropriate machinery for such a task.

B. There is no lack of good faith within the meaning of Section 146 (3). Even assuming that Fidelity could not be rehabilitated as a going concern, there are other methods of disposition of the assets which appear to be appropriate here and which satisfy the requirement of Section 146 (3) that it be not unreasonable to expect that a "plan of reorganization" can be effected. For example, the creation of a new corporation or other device to liquidate assets (which respondents now insist is the only feasible course) is a "plan of reorganization" under the Act. Accordingly, it cannot be said that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization may be effected.

ARGUMENT

I

FIDELITY IS NOT AN INSURANCE CORPORATION AND CAN BE A BANKRUPT

Section 4 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act (supra, p. 4) withholds the benefits of that Act from "insurance corporations." We submit that this exclusion is inapplicable here since Fidelity was not an insurance corporation within the meaning of that section.

The facts relating to this issue are undisputed. They establish that Fidelity cannot be regarded as ineligible for the benefits of the Bankruptcy Act.

For 28 years, until December 1940, Fidelity was licensed only for the purpose of selling the "annuity contracts" described at pp. 6–7, supra (Ex. 20). It is clear that the sale of these contracts did not constitute doing an insurance business. It sold these contracts pursuant to its license as an investment company under West Virginia Code, c. 33, art. 9, sec. 1, which was expressly inapplicable to insurance companies.[14] Fidelity, therefore, was not authorized to engage in the insurance business during this period; and it did not so engage (R. 377–378, 416).

The events of December 1940 and thereafter did not transform Fidelity into an insurance corporation. Recognizing that it was unable to qualify under the Investment Company Act of 1940[15] for the sale of new investment contracts, and in order to avoid the requirements of that Act, which are [14] C. 33, art. 9, sec. 1, provided in pertinent part:

> No person, association or corporation shall engage in the business of soliciting or receiving deposits or payments on any annuity contract or certificate or annuity bond in fixed and stipulated installments, within this State, without first having obtained from the insurance commissioner a license to do business in this State: Provided, however, That this article shall not be construed as applying to * * * insurance companies, foreign or domestic, duly authorized to do business in this State * * *.

This section was repealed by W. Va. L. 1941, c. 46, March 8, 1941.

[15] 15 U. S. C., § 80a (1)–(52). The Act became effective on January 1, 1941.

inapplicable to insurance companies (sec. 3 (b) (3)), Fidelity resorted to the device of amending its charter, as of December 31, 1940, so that it would have power "To issue insurance on the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and connected therewith, and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities." (R. 541; Ex. 20.) The added power which it thus procured was not of practical significance. It not only retained its power to deal in annuities, but in fact that continued to be the full extent of the exercise of its charter powers. While after December 31, 1940, Fidelity sold no new annuity contracts (being precluded from doing so under the Investment Company Act of 1940), it continued to make payments on contracts which matured or were surrendered for cash and to service outstanding contracts and collect payments thereon (R. 406), and registered with this Commission under the Investment Company Act for these purposes (R. 667). On the other hand, despite the charter amendment, Fidelity at no time was permitted to engage in insurance business, for its license to engage in such business for the period ending March 31, 1941, was granted by the West Virginia Auditor on the express condition that it would engage in no new business of any kind (R. 227, 406, 438, 701). On March 31, 1941, Fidelity's license to do an investment business and its license to do an insurance business expired together, and renewal was refused (R. 246, 237). By April 4, 1941, its corporate functions of all kinds were suspended (R. 702).

It is apparent, therefore, that when the West Virginia receivership and the instant proceedings were instituted, Fidelity was not licensed to engage in any business whatever, and the only substantial business in which it had ever engaged or for which it had ever been effectively licensed was that of selling annuity investment contracts. And, significantly, all of Fidelity's liabilities of over $23,000,000—the discharge of which is the concern of the Bankruptcy Act—were incurred in doing the business of selling its investment contracts before Fidelity's charter contained any insurance powers.

The conclusion that Fidelity did not function as an insurance company is not affected by the fact that on December 31, 1940, it sent to the holders of its Series B contracts riders which purported to assume liability under the insurance provisions of those contracts (R. 237; see supra, p. 13).[16] The Series B contract holders signed and returned 9,802 of these riders to Fidelity. This circumstance, however, is insufficient to warrant treating Fidelity as an insurance company. If this be an insurance transaction,[17] it was in direct violation of [16] The riders and accompanying letter appear in Appendix B, Appendices, pp. 3–5.

[17] In its dealings with the Virginia Corporation Commission and the Banking Commission of Wisconsin Fidelity specifically stated that it had issued no insurance policies, pointing out that the riders sent to Series B contract holders created no insurance risks (R. 223–226).

Fidelity's agreement with the West Virginia insurance commissioner that it would write no insurance under its insurance charter and license (supra, p. 21). But in any event, it is plain that the transaction was lacking in important elements characteristic of the usual insurance business. As the court below recognized (R. 246), Fidelity continued to transmit the contract holders' premium payments to the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company, which had issued the group insurance policy protecting the Series B contract holders (R. 783 ff). In addition, the issuance of these riders resulted in no insurance liability which Fidelity is being called upon to discharge, since Lincoln National is able to respond on the contract. And, it is to be noted, the court below in reviewing Fidelity's liabilities (R. 241–245) did not refer to insurance liabilities at all. Especially as it relates to the instant question, therefore, the issuance of the riders wrought no significant change from the situation which had originally obtained in respect of the insurance features of the Series B contracts, for Fidelity incurred no real risks and Lincoln National continued to be liable on these contracts under the group insurance policy.

We submit that in these circumstances Fidelity's illegal gratuitous assumption of a liability without risk on outstanding insurance cannot be regarded as having put it into the insurance business.[18]

[18] Essentially, the change in debtor's charter and subsequent developments were but steps in an attempted extra-

Even assuming that Fidelity's activities after January 1, 1941, constituted the doing of an insurance business, no liability or liquidation problems were created, and the business remained that of an investment company, which has been carried on for nearly 30 years. "Where a corporation is engaged in two or more distinctive lines of business, one of which would subject it to the Bankruptcy Law, while the other would not, the decision of its amenability to the involuntary Bankruptcy Act will depend on the nature and character of that business which, under all the facts and circumstances, constitutes its chief or principal pursuit. Cate v. Connell, * * * 173 F. 445 * * * In re Interstate Paving Co. (D. C.) 171 F. 604." In re Wisconsin Co-operative Milk Pool, 35 F. Supp. 787, 789–90 (E. D. Wis.). See also In re Dairy Marketing Association of Ft. Wayne, Inc., 8 F. (2d) 626 (D. Ind.). The principle would seem to apply equally to voluntary bankruptcy.

judicial reorganization of the debtor corporation which had been in progress for some years, supra, pp. 10–12. Hence the classification of the debtor's business should be determined by the nature of the business before the changes. Cf. Capital Endowment Co. v. Kroeger, 86 F. (2d) 976 (C. C. A. 6). The fact that it ceased to sell its investment contracts before the institution of these proceedings is immaterial. In re Peoria Life Insurance Company, 75 F. (2d) 777 (C. C. A. 7); In re National Surety Co., 7 F. Supp. 959 (N. D. N. Y.); In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984 (C. C. A. 2); In re New York Title and Mortgage Company, 9 F. Supp. 319 (N. D. N. Y.).

The court below, however, held (R. 248) that in any event Fidelity's status for purposes of the Bankruptcy Act was to be determined not by its predominant business activity (pursuant to which it had acquired all its assets and incurred all its substantial liabilities), but by its charter powers and its classification under state law. Accordingly, despite the fact, as we have noted, that Fidelity's status as an insurance company was purely formal, that it was acquired only after Fidelity had virtually gone out of business, and that there was no significant exercise of insurance powers, the court below held that Fidelity was ineligible for bankruptcy under Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act.[19]

[19] This decision may have consequences going beyond the exclusion of this particular corporation from the Bankruptcy Act. Section 28 of the Investment Company Act was expressly enacted to regulate Fidelity and one or two similar face amount certificate companies, in reliance on the report of the Commission dealing with such companies by name (supra, note 4). See S. Rep. No. 1775, 76th Cong., 3d Sess., pp. 6, 10–11, 19–20; Hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, 76th Cong., 3d Sess., on S. 3580, Part 1, pp. 301–2, 134. A face amount certificate company is defined in Section 4 (1) of the Act as "an investment company which is engaged or proposes to engage in the business of issuing face-amount certificates of installment type, or which has been engaged in such business and has any such certificate outstanding." An insurance company is defined in Section 2 (a) (17) of the same Act as "a company which is organized as an insurance company, whose primary and predominant business activity is the writing of insurance * * * and which is subject to supervision by the insurance commissioner * * * of a State * * *." Under Section 3 (b) (3) of that Act no insurance company is an investment company. Thus the decision of the court below that Fidelity is an insurance company, to the extent that it is influential on the construction of these provisions of the Investment Company Act of 1940, might leave Fidelity immune both from the Bankruptcy Act and from regulation under the Investment Company Act.

We submit that this conclusion overlooks the underlying basis of the exclusions of Section 4. In that section, Congress excluded from the Bankruptcy Act as voluntary bankrupts municipal, railroad, insurance, and banking corporations, and building and loan associations. The essential feature common to these categories of enterprises was recognized by Congress to rest in their "responsibilities to the public" flowing from their performance of a public service. See H. Rep. No. 511, 61st Cong., 2d sess. (1910), p. 5.

If, as we submit, the touchstone is the public interest in maintaining these enterprises as going public services, eligibility for the benefits of the Act as a voluntary bankrupt under Section 4 should rest not upon accidental or formal classification of the debtor but upon the actual nature of its activities. In re Columbia Ry., Gas & Electric Co., 24 F.

Moreover, Section 29 (a) of the Investment Company Act amends Section 67 of the Bankruptcy Act by adding provisions applicable to the bankruptcy of face amount certificate companies. The effect of the decision below is to leave Section 29 (a) with no sphere of operation as applied to face amount certificate companies which choose to resort to the devices adopted by Fidelity.

(2d) 828 (E. D. S. C.), affirmed, 27 F. (2d) 52 (C. C. A. 4). That the debtor may have acquired an insurance charter under state law cannot be controlling unless the powers so granted were exercised to such an extent that the public interest requires their continuance. The character of the activity carried on is the basic criterion; whether a corporation "can be adjudged a bankrupt depends upon what it actually does, not what it is empowered to do." In re Kingston Realty Co., 160 Fed. 445, 446 (C. The court below, however, referred to other cases as supporting its rule of state classification (see R. 249–253). These cases contain statements that charter power and state classification constitute the controlling consideration. E. g., In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984, 985 (C. C. A. 2); Woolsey v. Security Trust Co., 74 F. (2d) 334, 335, 337 (C. C. A. 5); Security B. & L. Assn. v. Spurlock, 65 F. (2d) 768, 771 (C. C. A. 9); Kansas v. Hayes, 62 F. It is to be noted, however, that in most of the cases the decisions were equally consistent with the view that business actually done should be the controlling factor. Woolsey v. Security

Fidelity was not an insurance company ineligible to become a voluntary bankrupt.

II

THE PETITION WAS FILED IN GOOD FAITH

As a separate ground of its decision, the court below held that Fidelity did not file its petition for reorganization under Chapter X in good faith (R. 257–263). While the court concluded that "there appears to be no reasonable hope of a reorganization of the business as a going concern, but only the immediate need of a liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of the contract holders" (R. 259), we do not understand that this was a holding that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan can be effected so that good faith is lacking within the meaning of Section 146 (3) of the Bankrutcy Act (supra, p. 4). Rather, the court below appears to have held only that for the purposes of Section 146 (4) the respective merits of pending state procedures and the bankruptcy procedure must be tested in the light of the fact that liquidation, not reorganization as a going concern, was the realistic probability. Nevertheless, since the question of good faith under Section 146 (3) was argued below, we shall examine that question as well as the issue of good faith arising under Section 146 (4) in the course of the following argument. We submit that whether Fidelity is to be reorganized or whether it is to be liquidated, the creditors' interests will not be best subserved by the state proceedings and that Chapter X affords a more adequate machinery.

A. The interests of Fidelity's creditors will not be best subserved by the pending local proceedings

The court below held that the pending proceedings in various states are superior to the proceedings available under Chapter X for purposes of liquidation, and that, therefore, the instant petition lacked good faith since the local proceedings would best subserve the interests of Fidelity's creditors. None of the statutes governing those proceedings (see Appendix D, Appendices, pp. 10–74) appears to vest title in state liquidators as statutory successors, and, in general, the state receivers would have jurisdiction over only the assets in the states of their respective appointment, and would have no power to bring suit to secure assets and surplus deposits in other states (R. 1206). Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 321, 339; Great Western Mining Co. v. Harris, 198 U. S. 561; Lion Bonding Co. v. Karatz, 262 U. S. 77. Cf. Clark v. Williard, 292 U. S. 112. Nevertheless, the court below concluded that continuation of the state proceedings would best subserve the interests of the creditors because (1) it did not clearly appear that there would be any surplus in any state except West Virginia; (2) the manner of distribution of funds in each state must be determined in any event according to the state law; and (3) creditors could as well file claims for the West Virginia surplus in a West Virginia state court as in the federal court for West Virginia having jurisdiction of the instant proceedings.

The issue upon this branch of the case is, ultimately, whether there should be separate liquidations and distributions by the several local receivers, or whether there should be a centralized administration which offers a forum for scrutiny of the history and management of this enterprise and for the resolution of the complex problems involved, and provides a machinery for a more effective and precise distribution. In reaching its conclusion that the local proceedings best subserve the interests of Fidelity's creditors, the court below failed to give due weight to a number of factors which establish the superiority of Chapter X proceedings, which should be controlling, and which led the District Court to sustain the Debtor's petition (R. 194–199).

1. The necessity for impartial investigation.—The history of Fidelity and the course of its efforts to reorganize establish that it is peculiarly salutary in this case to utilize the provisions of Chapter X, which makes administrative assistance available to the court (Sec. 208 of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U. S. C. § 608) and which provides for impartial investigation into the acts of the management by an independent trustee with independent counsel looking to recoveries for the benefit of the estate, and ultimately of the creditors. See Secs. 156–158, 167; 11 U. S. C. §§ 556–558, 567.

There are strong indications in the record that extravagance and other serious mismanagement mark Fidelity's history (R. 440–473): Both the district court and the court below found "unsoundness in Debtor's methods of management" and referred to its "extravagant sales and promotion expenses; useless expenditures for lavish offices * * *; overexpansion, * * * poor judgment in selection of the personnel * * *;" (R. 195, 258–259). Auditor Sims, in the course of his testimony, stated that there was "stealing" of the company's assets (R. 441, 459), that the officers were guilty of "reckless squandering and spending" (R. 442), of "kiting salaries, making advances to salesmen in large sums, which they had not earned" (R. 472), that the officers of Fidelity were "incorrigibles" (R. 474), that he had called them "thieves and a bunch of brigands" (R. 476), and that "this is the roughest bunch I ever got hold of. You can't save them from their own folly, in wasting their own money" (R. 477). Further, Fidelty consented, upon complaint filed by the Commission in December 1938, to a final judgment enjoining it, its officers, directors, and employees, from violations of the fraud provisions of the Securities Act of 1933.[21] And in the courts below, bitter recriminations and charges of personal self-seeking and of improper activities have characterized the course of this proceeding (see, e. g., R. 69–72, 472–473).

Whatever the validity of these charges, involving the bona fides and legality of the actions of Fidelity's management, their existence establishes the desirability of investigation of possible civil actions on behalf of Fidelity's estate against the officers, directors, and perhaps others. The investigatory processes and impartial trustee provided by Chapter X are particularly appropriate to fulfill this function as against the local procedures in this case, for the record indicates that the conflicting interests in the latter proceedings are such as to lack assurance of the thorough exploration which appears to be demanded. Problems of venue and jurisdiction would seem to be major, if not insuperable, obstacles to civil suits at the instance of the state officials in every state but West Virginia. In that state, the receivership proceedings were instituted by respondent Sims, after friendly consultation with, and with the consent of, Fidelity's officials (R. 410–412, 458, 603, 1187; Ex. 94). Although the firm of Koontz & Koontz, Fidelity's regular counsel (R. 574, 1136), appeared for Fidelity in the West Virginia proceeding instituted by Sims (R. 604, 690); Koontz & Koontz thereafter became, with Sims' acquiescence, the attorneys for the West Virginia receivers (R. 574). Indeed, one of the receivers, Ross Thomas, is an associate of the firm of Koontz & Koontz (R. 574, 1135), although Arthur Koontz, senior member of the firm, had long been a director of Fidelity, is one of the officers under indictment (R. 1167), and might be subject to liability if there is substance to these charges.

We submit that the interlocking relationships among the officials of Fidelity and the receivers and their counsel create divided loyalties which establish that the West Virginia receivership does not promise as adequate investigation and prosecution of causes of action against Fidelity's management as may be expected from the disinterested trustee appointed under Section 156 of the Bankruptcy Act, represented by a disinterested attorney appointed under Section 157, and assisted by a distinterested administrative agency under Section 208. The superior possibilities afforded under Chapter X for pursuing, on behalf of Fidelity's estate and the creditors, the remedies which appear prima facie to be appropriate alone warrant the conclusion that the Chapter X proceedings will subserve the creditors' interests better than the state proceedings, and justify the finding of the district court (R. 198) that it is not "reasonable to suppose" in the "light of all the facts and circumstances in connection with the state court receivership" that the directors' liabilities will be "diligently sought out and pursued," and that therefore the "best interests of creditors" would not be subserved in the prior proceedings. Since these findings were plainly supported, and since the persons involved were before the District Court as witnesses and participants, the findings should not have been rejected by the court below.

2. The necessity for a single administration to settle problems of marshalling assets and of distribution. The instant case presents complex and difficult problems of the respective rights of competing creditors. In contrast to the situation which obtained in Marine Harbor Properties, Inc. v. Manufacturer's Trust Co., No. 24, this Term, decided November 9, 1942, there is here not a single class of local creditors with identical interests, but many classes of creditors with competing interests in the funds.[22] Fidelity has outstanding six different series of contracts which were sold in 29 states and the District of Columbia (R. 179, 241). There are 88,000 contract holders residing in every state and in foreign countries (R. 242), and the net cash liability to each of these holders averages less than $273.[23]

The nature of these different claims presents a complex problem of creditors' rights involving the marshalling of assets and the determination of a number of doubtful legal issues. In the light of the great number of scattered creditors with these small claims, it appears plain that their interests will be best subserved by a single unified administration in which all the groups can settle the problems of marshalling, and distribute assets in an equitable and orderly manner, rather than by piecemeal, hasty, and inconsistent administration by a dozen sets of state officials and courts.

(a) The problem of marshalling assets. Preliminary to the problems of an equitable distribution there is the complex task of disentangling the assets of each of the several series in order that they may be properly and effectively marshalled. As we have described above (p. 6), the later series of contracts required Fidelity to segregate for the benefit of contract holders of the particular series the money paid by the holders of that series and the assets acquired by the use of such money. Although Fidelity maintained such segregation on its books, assets were transferred from series to series in order to increase the book value of Fidelity's portfolio. Similarly, money was transferred from series to series, when needed to pay contract holders, for the purpose of avoiding the realization of loss on assets held by the borrowing series. These transfers were made on open book account. No series for which cash was borrowed has sufficient assets to pay both its contract holders and the lending series. Accordingly, before distribution can be made to Fidelity's contract holders, the accounts of the various funds inter sese must be settled. Unless this is done, assets which Fidelity was contractually obligated to segregate for one group of contract holders will be appropriated on behalf of another group of holders.[24]

The respondent state representatives take the position, in general, that the several states may apply their respective deposits among all of the contract holders secured thereby, without regard to the contract series to which the liabilities pertain or to which the deposited assets belong. But we believe that there is a problem whether states may retain securities accepted in disregard of [24] Long before the present proceeding, Fidelity's officers and counsel indicated their own belief that the assets in the several contract series funds were in the nature of "trust funds" which had to be kept segregated and could not be used to meet the liabilities of other funds. See the excerpts from testimony and opinions of counsel in one of the affidavits in the injunction suit brought by this Commission, reprinted in Report, supra, note 4, at 225–228.

knowledge or notice that the assets deposited belonged to particular series funds and were deposited to secure liabilities of other series (supra, p. 9). Should this issue be decided adversely to the states in question, these states might not be able to retain their entire deposits even though some of their local security holders remained unpaid. Thus, these problems of marshalling assets are not dissipated, as the court below assumed (R. 261) merely by the fact that there would be little or nothing for nonresident creditors if the local deposits were distributed to local creditors without regard to series. The problems involved should be faced, not evaded by hasty distributions.[25]

We submit that the several prior proceedings, some judicial and some administrative, do not provide suitable fora for marshalling assets or for an accounting between funds. No state has power itself to marshall the corporation's aggregate assets, and determine the nation-wide liabilities of the several funds. It is obviously not feasible to do so by joint action of the several sets of state officials, nor likely that they would cooperate in view of their rejection of the "fund theory" of marshalling the assets (reply brief filed below on behalf of West Virginia, p. 41; brief in opposition filed by L. H. Brooks, et al., p. 23). In contrast, the bankruptcy procedure, providing a single administration with all groups and all participants before it, and with the assets under its control, is better suited for the task of restoring the assets to the proper funds in accordance with Fidelity's contractual obligations.

(b) The problems of distribution.—Similarly, the difficult problems of conflicting creditors' rights can best be settled in a single administration.

There is a conflict of interests not only among the several series of contract holders (supra, pp. 35-38) but also between the resident and nonresident contract holders in respect of deposits in each state. These conflicts give rise to the following difficult questions which must be settled before there can be an equitable distribution:

(i) It must first be determined whether the state deposits are solely for the benefit of local residents and not for the benefit of all contract holders. Under the laws of some of the states, the answer to this question is by no means clear,[26] e. g., the [26] This question seems to turn largely on the language of the local statutes (Appendix D, Appendices, pp. 10-74). The law has been stated as follows (23 Am. Jur. 468):

> Where, however, there is no expression in the statute which limits the benefit of the deposit to resident shareholders and creditors, nonresident creditors of such an insolvent company may be held entitled to statutes of Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, and Virginia, Appendix D. In the domiciliary state of West Virginia, where the deposit is clearly intended to secure all creditors (R. 436–437, 1151) (Appendix D, Appendices, pp. 63–65), it must be determined whether West Virginia creditors have a preferential interest. We understand that the West Virginia authorities contend that such a preference exists, but we find no justification therefor on the face of the statute.

(ii) If the local deposit is for the benefit of local contract holders, it must be determined whether the critical date of residence is (1) at the time of the sale of the particular contract; or (2) at the time of the deposit, or (3) the present time. Since the local deposits are conditions precedent share in the distribution equally with resident creditors.

In the following cases resident creditors were denied preferential recourse to local deposits. Davis v. Life Assn. of America, 11 Fed. 782 (S. D. Ala.); Holloway v. Federal Reserve Life Ins. Co., 21 F. Supp. 516 (W. D. Mo.); Parsons v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co., 31 Fed. 305 (S. D. Iowa); American Bonding and Casualty Co. v. Chicago Bonding & Insurance Co., 251 Ill. App. 549 (1929); Morrell v. Colonial Security Co., 101 Tex. 309, 107 S. W. 524 (1908). See also Taylor v. Life Assn. of America, 13 Fed. 493 (W. D. Tenn.). Cf. People v. Granite State Provident Assn., 41 App. Div. 257, 58 N. Y. Supp. 510 (1899). In Irwin v. Granite State Provident Assn., 38 Atl. 680 (Chancery Court of N. J. 1897), the court held that the statute dedicated the deposit to payment of local creditors but only to the extent of the proportionate dividend received by all other creditors as computed by the domiciliary receiver.

to the privilege of selling securities within the states, it is arguable that they are for the benefit of local purchasers, and some of the statutes require deposits to secure contracts sold in the state, rather than resident holders. But Fidelity for the sake of uniformity computed its periodic deposits in the various states according to the residences, at the time of the deposits, of its contract holders, as shown by the books (R. 757–758).

(iii) In addition, it must be determined whether the measure of the claims is (1) the cash value of the contracts, which is the only amount the contract holders could demand prior to the maturity of their contracts if Fidelity were a going concern, and the contractual minimum of the various contract funds and of most of the state deposits; or (2) the actuarial reserve liabilities under the contracts, which would be the amounts that ought to be on hand in order to pay the contracts according to their terms; or (3) the amounts which the contract holders actually paid in, which is the only measure which would give recognition to new contracts;[27] or (4) some other amount. The measure of damages not only determines the amount due to any individual but affects the amount of deficiencies to be satisfied elsewhere if possible, and thus affects as well the whole inter-relationship of resident and nonresident creditors in each state. In Wisconsin, for example, it appears that there may be a surplus over deposits if cash surrender value is the measure (Appendix A, Appendices, p. 2). There, as elsewhere, however, there are contract holders whose contracts have not yet achieved cash surrender value.[28] Thus, even were it assumed that residents are entitled to the local deposits, in the Wisconsin situation certain resident contract holders might receive nothing, and nonresidents may still be partially satisfied out of the Wisconsin deposit.

[27] It has been held, in the case of a contract somewhat similar to Fidelity's, that the creditor is entitled to recover the amount he has paid, with interest. In re Bankers Mortgage Co. of Topeka, Kans., 83 F. (2d) 50 (C. C. A. 10). Cf. Lovell v. St. Louis Mutual Life Insurance Co., 111 U. S. 264. In a case involving a fully paid endowment policy in an insolvent insurance company in liquidation, it was assumed that the policy holder's claim was the maturity amount discounted to present value. Carr v. Hamilton, 129 U. S. 252, 257–258.

The presence of these questions, each with an impact upon the others, and all bearing upon the ultimate problem of making an equitable distribution to the persons legally entitled to satisfaction of claims and in the legally correct amount, underscores the inadequacy of the existing state proceedings. The course of this case establishes that there is little inclination among the state officials to litigate their conflicting rights inter sese, or to withhold distribution until contract holders can litigate the questions.

The state officials who appear as respondents in opposition to the bankruptcy proceedings are those representing states which are in a relatively good position in respect of their own deposits. These, therefore, are the states with an interest in keeping deposits for the benefit of local creditors, and with little incentive to establish possible rights of their own residents in the deposits held by other states (Appendix A, Appendices, pp. 1–2). The frank purpose of these depositaries is to avoid litigation of these questions and to make immediate distribution (supra, note 27).

But such a course would not only leave unsettled the conflicting rights among the states but, as a practical matter, would be likely altogether to deprive the contract holders from states with little or no deposited security of a forum in which they could litigate the questions presented. The intention, if realized, of the state representatives to proceed at once to distribute the assets without regard to the inherent problems might well result in the disposition of the assets before the contract holders even have time to begin the litigation of their rights. But even assuming that the contract holders can reach the courts while the assets are intact, other grave obstacles block the effective determination of the conflicting rights. The contract holders from states without deposits and states with inadequate deposits must take the burden of obtaining the litigation of these questions in each of the states with sizable deposits. The geographical difficulties, the multiplicity of suits in different fora, the small size of the claim of each separate contract holder (supra, p. 3[illegible]), and the multitude of possible conflicts of interests among contract-holders which impede formation of large groups, strongly indicate that those who may be entitled to satisfaction of their claims, and who, at the least, are entitled to litigate these questions, will be eliminated by default unless an orderly central administration is provided. The issue on this branch of the case, is not, as stated by some of respondents,[29] whether the contract holders "would rather get 80% of their claims now than 85 or 90% ten years from now," but rather whether the assets are to be immediately distributed to those who may not be entitled to them, or whether the distribution is to be deliberate enough to permit a determination as to who is entitled to what amounts.

3. The necessity of orderly procedure to liquidate the assets.—A third separate factor establishing the desirability of Chapter X proceedings stems from the nature of the task of liquidation which would be presented. Fidelity's assets are such that there is serious peril to a maximum realization upon them if each state depositary separately proceeds to immediate liquidation without regard to the over-all effect of simultaneous sale. The situation is plainly one which requires well-timed and skillful liquidation (R. 799–800), and the district court so found (R. 196–197). The trustee's report under Section 167 of the Bankruptcy Act (Report, pp. 29–30, see supra, note 6) shows that a substantial part of Fidelity's portfolio falls below the standard of high-grade and readily marketable securities. The analysis of Fidelity's portfolio in terms of ratings used by standard investment services shows:

| Rating | Amount, book value | Percent, book value |
|---|---|---|
| AAA–A [1] | $6,200,000 | 29 |
| BBB–B [2] | 8,500,000 | 39 |
| CCC–DD [3] | 2,355,000 | 11 |
| Not rated | 4,484,000 | 21 |
| Total | $21,539,000 | 100 |

[1] High grade.
[2] Good, medium, uncertain.
[3] Default threatened or existing.

Thus prime securities comprise less than one-third of the debtor's portfolio; medium and low grade issues, some of which are in default, constitute half of the total; and more than one-fifth are not rated. In addition the estate has a large office building in Wheeling, valued at $450,000 (R. 612), and other real estate (R. 612–614, 619).

With respect to certain securities, blocks held by the estate are so large and the market so thin (R. 799–800, 196–197) that throwing the securities on the market might greatly depress the price. For a maximum realization upon these assets, the portfolio must be liquidated in an orderly fashion unhampered by pressure for immediate liquidation and by competition by various state depositaries to exhaust the available demand. The process requires time and skill, and most of all freedom to exercise discretion as to the timing of sales and the selection of issues and quantities to be sold. After the decision below, the states attempted to meet the clear need by informal agreement for cooperative action of the officials involved (R. 279, 282). But the Chapter X proceeding is obviously superior to the several separate state proceedings for this purpose.

Summary.—We submit, therefore, that in the light of the facts indicating the need for independent trustees and an independent investigation, of the facts showing the desirability of an orderly marshalling and distribution, and of the facts establishing the need for a central administration, the District Court properly concluded that the interests of the creditors will not be best subserved by a continuation of the pending state proceedings. That many of the questions which must be litigated in the bankruptcy court may primarily be questions of state law should not affect this conclusion. Federal courts are, of course, frequently called upon to determine questions of state law, especially in bankruptcy proceedings. Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64; Fischer v. American United Life Ins. Co., 314 U. S. 549. See In re Chicago & Northwestern Ry. Co., 127 F. (2d) 1001 (C. C. A. 7); cf. Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20. In this case, where the issues involved present a conflict between resident creditors and out-of-state creditors, it is particularly appropriate that the federal courts should resolve the conflict.

B. It is not unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization may be effected

That, as the court below assumed, Fidelity is insolvent and the possibilities of its rehabilitation as a going concern may be negligible does not establish the unreasonableness of an expectation that a plan of reorganization may be effected within the meaning of Section 146 (3) of the Act (supra, p. 4).[30] On this issue, Fidelity's insolvency is not material, since Chapter X is expressly applicable to insolvent corporations. See Sections 130 (1), 179 (11 U. S. C. §§ 530 (1), 579); Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., 308 U. S. 106, 131; In re Central Funding Corporation, 75 F. (2d) 256

[30] No question would be raised, of course, if Fidelity can in fact be reorganized as a going concern. Some of the respondents have stated that when the petition was filed Fidelity could have been reorganized on a going concern basis (R. 486; see reply brief filed below on behalf of West Virginia, pp. 34–36). If this be so, there clearly is no issue of good faith under Section 146 (3) and our discussion in the text becomes irrelevant.

(C. C. A. 2); In re Julius Rockrs Co., 115 F. (2d) 723 (C. C. A. 3).

Nor would resort to Chapter X be foreclosed even on the assumption that the debtor may not be susceptible of reorganization on a going-concern basis. Other methods of disposition of assets would satisfy the requirements of a reorganization plan. And even if we accept the respondents' current contention that only liquidation is possible—a contention inconsistent with their earlier position (supra, note 30)—such a result is not fatal to good faith under Section 146 (3). For frequently a reorganization is appropriate to provide the machinery for liquidation and to take the debtor out of court. Liquidation cannot proceed indefinitely under the aegis of a court; yet the assets may be, as they are here (supra, pp. 4[illegible]), such as to require a deliberate and orderly liquidation without pressure. Cf. In the Matter of Reynolds Investing Co., 6 S. E. C. 639 (1940). In contrast to ordinary bankruptcy or equity proceedings, Chapter X provides the means for creating a new corporation or other device charged with the duty of liquidating the assets as slowly as necessary and as expeditiously as is possible under the circumstances. This type of plan is a "plan of reorganization" under the Act. Cf. In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Company, 112 F. (2d) 655 (C. C. A. 2); In re Central Funding Corporation, 75 F. (2d) 256 (C. C. A. 2); In re Mortgage Securities Corporation, 75 F. (2d) 261 (C. C. A. 2); R. L. Witters

Associates v. Ebsary Gypsum Co., Inc., 93 F. (2d) 746 (C. C. A. 5); Continental Insurance Company v. Louisiana Oil Refining Corporation, 89 F. (2d) 333 (C. C. A. 5). And such a plan may be the means of compromising the difficult problems of distribution pointed out above. Cf. Consolidated Rock Products Co. v. Du Bois, 312 U. S. 510.

We submit, therefore, that if other methods of reorganization be impracticable, then liquidation in an orderly fashion becomes important in this situation; that provision of the machinery for such liquidation constitutes a plan of reorganization within the meaning of Section 216 of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. § 616); and that, accordingly, good faith is not lacking within the meaning of Section 146 (3).

[1] Liabilities are stated at cash-surrender values as of Apr. 10, 1941, the day before Fidelity's receivership. These liabilities are based on obligations to present residents of the states. Fidelity's practice was to make deposits on the basis of liabilities to contract holders residing in the various states when the deposits were made (R. 758-759). Thus deposits have been made with respect to contract holders who no longer reside in the particular states, and some contract holders may now reside in states with substantial deposits, but which received little or no deposit with respect to liability to these contract holders.

Assets are stated at market values on June 6, 1941, the date of the petition under chapter X.

APPENDIX B

Covering letter and rider circulated by Fidelity in respect of insurance

1.

Covering letter (R. 218–219)

DECEMBER 31, 1940.

DEAR CONTRACT-OWNER:

It is with pleasure and confidence that we direct your attention to the change in our name and the widening of the scope of our business to that of issuing insurance on the lives of persons. In the future, the company will be known as Fidelity Assurance Association and will offer a complete line of life insurance policies of all types and classes, including life annuities.

These changes enable us, as a qualified legal reserve life insurance company to assume the risks and obligations provided in Section 6 of your contract. As you know, this Section makes available to you insurance covering all monthly payments not yet made in event of your death. Such insurance protection has, in the past, been procured from a legal reserve life insurance company, but was subject to cancellation, upon due notice, at any time. With the making of your regular monthly payments and the Association assuming the insurance, this condition has been eliminated.

By resolution of the Board of Directors and by the rider enclosed in duplicate, the Association assumes and itself agrees to fulfill and pay the risk and obligations of the insurance policy and of the insurance company mentioned in Section 6 of your contract. The original of the rider is to be signed and attached to your Income Reserve Contract, Series B and the other (the blue one) signed and returned to the Association in the enclosed envelope.

Rider (R. 219)

FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION

ASSUMPTION OF RISK AND RIDER ATTACHED TO AND A PART OF INCOME RESERVE CONTRACT SERIES "B" NUMBER

The Association, having so amended its charter as to authorize it to issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and to grant and dispose of annuities, and to change its name to Fidelity Assurance Association, in consideration of the monthly payments, provided for in the above numbered contract hereby assumes and does itself hereby agree to fulfill and pay all the risks and obligations of the insurance policy and the insurance company mentioned in Section 6 of said contract.

It is hereby agreed between the Association and the contract holder that this insurance agreement shall become and be a part of said contract and the original shall be attached thereto.

Executed in duplicate at Wheeling, West Virginia this 31st day of December, 1940.

APPENDIX C

Summary of allegations in the complaint and affidavits filed by the Commission in its action to enjoin Fidelity from violating the fraud provisions of the Securities Act of 1933 (see n. 21 of Brief)

The following is a partial summary of the allegations in the complaint and affidavits in the action instituted against Fidelity by the Commission.[1]

1. At least since September 6, 1934, Fidelity has had to devise means of concealing on its books the fact that one of its assets is a worthless indebtedness to it of approximately $1,000,000 from National Sales Agency, Inc. From August 12, 1913, to September 6, 1934, the latter company had been exclusive sales agent for Fidelity's contracts. It was owned by Fred M. King. The indebtedness in question resulted from this corporation's practice of obtaining large monthly advances from Fidelity in excess of actually earned commissions. On September 6, 1934, Fidelity established its own "Agency Division". National Sales Agency, Inc.,

[1] The summary does not include allegations concerning fraudulent sales tactics by Fidelity's agents (see Report, n. 4 of Brief, pp. 211–218), but relates to allegations concerning Fidelity's financial practices.

thereby lost its only substantial source of income. Its principal assets were unsecured loans to Fred M. King, who was later discharged in bankruptcy. To maintain a semblance of value for the National Sales Agency, Inc., loans and to avoid recognition of the loss, Fidelity's "Agency Division" undertook to perform its sales functions for the account of National Sales Agency, Inc., and the "commissions" so "earned" were credited in payment of the note. (See Report, p. 236.)

2. (a) The National Sales Agency, Inc., note was transferred by Fidelity to two wholly-owned subsidiaries, Paull Company and Marston Corporation, at par.

(b) Fidelity also transferred to Paull Company and Marston Corporation foreclosed real estate and defaulted real estate securities at Fidelity's book carrying value, which was substantially in excess of market values.

(c) Paull Company and Marston Corporation issued to Fidelity their collateral trust bonds in face amount equal to the amounts at which Fidelity had transferred to them the securities referred to in (a) and (b) above.

(d) Fidelity deposited the collateral trust bonds of its subsidiaries with the insurance commissioner of West Virginia at face amount. By this device it was enabled to make deposits, although some of the assets underlying the collateral trust bonds were not acceptable for deposit under the West

Virginia law, and others of the assets were not acceptable for deposit in amounts equal to their book values. (See Report, pp. 206, 228–230, 239.)

3. Fidelity organized another wholly-owned subsidiary, Marietta Corporation, which built Fidelity's home office building. The funds were provided through the purchase by Fidelity of Marietta Corporation's preferred stocks and bonds. Fidelity was thus enabled to carry the bonds and preferred stock of its subsidiary as investments in securities, thereby concealing the fact that it had a large investment in home office real estate. It represented to the public that it had less than $50,000 worth of real estate investment. (See Report, pp. 207, 231, 232, 240.)

4. Fidelity speculated in the stock market on a margin trading account, using for that purpose monies "borrowed" by its General Fund from specific contract funds. (See Report, p. 241.)

5. Fidelity used the monies of contract funds and of the General Fund to purchase securities in so-called "special situations", in which its officers, directors and members of the investment committee were privately interested, and, in at least one instance, to the personal benefit of officers and directors. (See Report, p. 244.)

6. Fidelity purchased speculative securities at prices substantially below par. Under Sims' system of "sound value" (n. 23 of Brief), those which were not in default were accepted for deposit at par by the West Virginia Insurance Commissioner. (See Report, p. 240.)

7. By "inter-fund sales" of securities at prices above book value, Fidelity created fictitious paper profits which enabled it to divert money from the various contract funds to the General Fund, and thence to stockholders as dividends. (See Report, pp. 207, 243.)

8. Fidelity's "Special Annuity Fund" had approximately $400,000 of "gains", representing the difference between the actuarial reserves and the cash surrender values paid out on lapsed Special Annuity contracts. Until 1937, these "gains" had been recognized as being part of the surplus of the Special Annuity Fund, to which contract holders of that fund were entitled when surplus was apportioned. In 1937, Fidelity withdrew this amount from the Special Annuity Fund and credited it to the General Fund, part being allocated to surplus and part being treated as income for the year. In addition to withdrawing the actual amount of these gains, Fidelity charged the Special Annuity Fund with interest at 4½% compounded semi-annually on each item of gain from the time it accrued until the funds were withdrawn. The legal and accounting fees and other expenses paid for computing these gains and interests, amounting to approximately $7,200, were also charged to the Special Annuity Fund. (See Report, pp. 242–243.)

STATE STATUTES WITH RESPECT TO DEPOSIT REQUIREMENTS AND TO RECEIVERSHIP AND LIQUIDATION, TOGETHER WITH RELATED TRUST AGREEMENTS

ALABAMA

Code (1940) Title 53, Securities

§ 1. (9878) Definitions.—When used in this title the following terms shall, unless the text otherwise indicates, have the following meanings: (1) "Security" shall include any * * * investment contract, income contract (which investment contract or income contract is issued for public offering as one of an issue of several like contracts), annuity contract unless issued by an insurance company, * * * investment trust debentures, units, shares, bonds and certificates in, for, respecting or based upon any form of securities or collateral, subscriptions and contracts covering or pertaining to the sale or purchase on the installment plan of any security as herein defined; * * * or any right to subscribe to any of the foregoing; or any instrument of any kind commonly known as a security.

§ 9. (9884) Application for authority to sell filed with commissioner.—The commissioner shall receive and act upon applications to have securities admitted to record in such register of qualified securities; * * *.

§ 12. (9887) Hearing on report to commissioner.—After the report of investigation has been made upon any application, the commissioner shall examine such application and report of investigation, and shall give the applicant a public hearing, if he so desires. (1) If the commissioner shall report favorably to the applicant, he shall issue an order directing that such securities be admitted to record in the register of qualified securities, hereinafter provided for. The commissioner shall keep a permanent record of all its proceedings, findings, judgments and orders. In granting to an applicant the privilege of offering securities to the public in the State of Alabama, the commissioner may impose such reasonable conditions, either precedent, concurrent or subsequent thereto, as in the judgment of the commissioner may be necessary or advisable and may fix a time limit for compliance with such conditions or any of them. As one of such conditions precedent, the commissioner may, in his discretion, require that all or any part of the securities of the issuer, which have been or are to be issued for property or assets, either tangible or intangible, be deposited in escrow under such terms as the commissioner may prescribe. The securities deposited under such escrow agreement shall be released from such escrow agreement only at such time as the commissioner may deem just and equitable; and in any event such escrowed securities shall be released therefrom when the issuer's earnings shall equal those prescribed by paragraph (j) of section 4[1] of this title for the same class of securities. (2) [Grounds for refusal to admit securities to record in the register of qualified securities]. (3) But, no securities shall be admitted to record in the register of qualified securities until the applicant or applicants therefor have entered into a bond for not less than one thousand dollars, nor more than one hundred thousand dollars, and in no event for more than ten per cent of the aggregate selling price of the securities to be admitted to record. The amount of said bond shall be fixed by the commissioner in his order admitting said securities to record. Said bond shall be payable to the State of Alabama and be conditioned upon the truthfulness of the statements set forth in the application filed with the commissioner and of the written evidence or other probative matter filed with the commissioner in connection with such application and for the faithful compliance by said applicant and his agents with the provisions of this title and of any lawful condition or requirement made by the commissioner in granting such application. Said bond shall be made with a surety company authorized to do business in the State of Alabama and shall be filed with and approved by the commissioner. Any original purchaser of such securities or other person injured by a breach of any condition in said bond shall have a right of action upon said bond for the amount of damages suffered thereby, but such right of action shall be barred unless suit be instituted thereon within one year from the time such cause of action arises. One or more recoveries upon such bond shall not vitiate the same; but no recoveries thereon shall ever exceed the full amount of such bond. Upon suits being filed in excess of the amount of such bond, the commissioner shall require a new bond; and if same is not filed with and approved by the commissioner within thirty days thereafter, the commissioner shall revoke the registration of the securities involved. All liability upon any such bond shall be extinguished upon the expiration of one year from the date of the last original sale by the issuer, or his agent, of any of the securities registered and authorized to be sold pursuant to the application on account of which such bond has been required by the commissioner.

§ 16. (9891) Powers of commissioner to enforce provisions of Alabama securities law: examination and examiners: revocation of registration of securities. * * *

(3) The commissioner shall revoke the registration of any security by entering an order to that effect, with his findings in respect thereto, if upon examination into the affairs of the issuer of such security as provided by subdivision (2) hereof it shall appear to the commissioner, and he shall find (a) that the assets of any issuer, whose securities have been granted registration in the register of qualified securities, are impaired to such an extent that such assets do not equal seventy percent of its total liabilities, including its total stock liabilities reckoned upon the price at which such stock has been sold by such issuer to, or subscribed for by, the subscribers thereto; or (b) that the issuer has violated any of the provisions of this title or any orders of the commissioner or any term or terms thereof, or has failed to comply with any condition or conditions contained in any order of the commissioner within the time limit therein prescribed; or (c) that the issuer has been or is engaged or is about to engage in a fraudulent transaction or fraudulent transactions relating to or in connection with the sale of any securities; or (d) that the issuer is in any other way dishonest or has made any fraudulent representation or representations in any prospectus or in any circular or other advertising or literature that has been distributed concerning the issuer or its securities; or (e) that the issuer is insolvent; or (f) that said issuer has declared or paid dividends out of anything except the net earnings of said issuer actually received or accrued at the time of the declaration thereof, or out of accumulated surplus. * * *

Collateral Trust Agreement

This agreement made this 23 day of March, 1939, by and between Fidelity Investment Association, * * * party of the first part, and the First National Bank of Montgomery, * * * authorized to do a trust business in the State of Alabama, hereinafter referred to as the Trustee, party of the second part.

Witnesseth

WHEREAS, the Association has issued and sold pursuant to applications heretofore received from residents of the State of Alabama, certain certificates and contracts in form and substance in accordance with exhibits filed with the Securities Commission of Alabama, constituting all forms of contracts or certificates heretofore issued and sold.

And, whereas, the Association is now authorized to accept applications from residents of the State of Alabama, for its contracts and certificates, in form and substance in accordance with exhibits filed with the Securities Commission of Alabama.

And, whereas, the Association agrees to keep and maintain securities in the manner and to the extent hereinafter provided, and said Trustee agrees to accept and hold in trust said securities under the terms and conditions hereinafter set out:

NOW THEREFORE, in consideration of the premises, it is agreed as follows:

505126—43——3

ARTICLE I

That in order to further secure the contract and certificate holders of the Association whose contract and/or certificates have been issued and sold and are to be sold by the Association to residents of the State of Alabama, and in consideration of the sum of Five Dollars ($5.00), paid by the Trustee to the Association at or upon the delivery of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the Association has assigned and transferred and by these presents does assign and transfer to the Trustee, certain securities as hereinafter defined.

TO HAVE AND TO HOLD, in trust, for the holders of all contracts and all certificates issued and to be issued by the Association to residents of Alabama, and in accordance with the terms and conditions herein provided, the trust securities transferred and assigned and to be transferred and assigned to the Trustee, under the provisions of this agreement, shall constitute a separate and exclusive trust fund for the holders of the contracts and certificates, and for none other, and shall not be available to general creditors nor to any creditors of the Association, except as provided herein.

The securities, as the term is used herein, shall constitute the trust fund, and shall consist of: (1) cash, (2) bonds of the State of Alabama, (3) U. S. Government bonds, (4) bonds or debentures guaranteed or secured both as to principal and interest by the United States Government, (5) mortgage and deeds of trust insured by the Federal Housing Administrator under the provisions of the National Housing Act as the same is now in force or as the same may hereafter be amended, and (6) first mortgages on improved real estate located within the State of Alabama which improved real estate shall have been first appraised and valued by the Alabama Securities Commission or its agent and approved as to title by Alabama attorneys selected by the Securities Commission of Alabama. In no event shall the value of first mortgages on improved Alabama real estate exceed the appraised value placed on the property covered by sue mortgage by an appraiser selected and designated by the Alabama Securities Commission.

The Association covenants and agrees that the contracts and certificates mentioned above constitute all forms of contracts and certificates issued by the Association prior to the date of this trust agreement, pursuant to applications from residents of Alabama, and that the spirit of this agreement is that it shall also cover all contracts and certificates issued in the future.

Except as provided hereinabove in this article (subsection 6) for the purposes of this agreement, the trust securities assigned and to be assigned shall have the following value:

The value of promissory notes representing obligations secured by duly recorded first mortgages, or first deeds of trust on improved real property, shall be the unpaid balances thereon, less all payments made on account of principal and interest, and plus accrued and unpaid interest thereon.

The value of all government bonds, government debentures, and state bonds, shall be the purchase price of such bonds, or debentures, that is, the cost to the Fidelity Investment Association of such bonds or debentures, provided, all bonds or debentures in the trust fund shall be purchased at the current market price (on the date of purchase), and the said price shall be reported to the State Securities Commission at the time such bonds are transferred by the Association to the Trustee.

The total value of the securities held in trust by the Trustee shall be not less at any time than the liability of the Association upon all the certificates and contracts issued by the Association to residents of the State of Alabama, and the first installment of securities placed with and transferred to the Trustee shall be in amount not less than $21,988.96 as shown by the statement heretofore filed by the Association with the State Securities Commission of Alabama.

Article II

[Provision for delivery of supplemental documents of title]

When transferred and assigned to the Trustee, the securities and related papers and documents shall be held by the Trustee subject to the provisions of Article VI and other applicable provisions of this trust agreement, so long as liability of any kind on the part of the Association exists, upon any of the contracts or certificates issued or to be issued or sold to residents of the State of Alabama. It is not the intention of this agreement to require the Association to transfer to the Trustee at any time securities in amount and value in excess of the amount and value provided on page three of Article I hereof. Substitution of and withdrawal of securities shall be done in the manner provided hereinbelow.

Interest coupons, if any, shall be surrendered by the Trustee to the Association on written request of the Association, not more than fifteen (15) days prior to their respective maturities.

Article VI

If either of the following events hereinafter called "events of default", shall happen, that is to say:

[Specification of "events of default"]

Then, on the happening of either event, except default number three, specially provided for in this Article (VI) hereinbelow, the State Securities Commission shall demand and shall receive from the Trustee the securities transferred under this trust agreement without court action of any kind. The Association and the Trustee hereby agree that upon the happening or occurrence of either event, except event number three,[2] the Trustee will deliver the securities held hereunder to the State Securities Commission, upon written demand to the Trustee, pointing out the default, and the fact that notice of such default has been given as required hereunder, and it is agreed that the State Securities Commission shall forthwith administer and liquidate the securities received from the Trustee, for the benefit of Alabama investors, irrespective of the rights of any Trustee in Bankruptcy or Receiver for the Association. It is the intention of this instrument that in the event of the happening of either of the defaults enumerated in this Article (except number three), the State Securities Com-

[2] Event of default number three is as follows:

"(3) Should the Association fail in any of its covenants and agreements contained in this trust agreement and should said default continue for a period of fifteen (15) days, after notice in writing from the State Securities Commission or Trustee to the Association, calling attention to such default or defaults. (See special provision of Article VI.) : or," mission shall take possession of the securities held by the Trustee under this agreement, and administer and liquidate the same, to the extent necessary to insure full protection for the Alabama investors, and independently of any rights of a Trustee in Bankruptcy or any receiver for the Association. The State Securities Commission is also hereby expressly given the right to administer and liquidate the securities received from the Trustee, for the benefit of all of the Alabama contract holders of the Association, as an adverse claimant, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. If, however, the default should occur under subsection three of this Article (Article VI), then and in that event the State Securities Commission shall select $10,000 in value and amount of such securities, as a penalty for the failure on the part of the Association to carry out the terms of this trust agreement, and the State Securities Commission shall reduce such securities to cash and place the same in the general fund of the Alabama State Treasury, to the credit of the State Securities Commission, and such money shall be used by the State Securities Commission for carrying on, administering and enforcing the securities laws of the State of Alabama. But such penalty shall not be exacted until the Circuit Court of Montgomery County, Alabama, in a proper suit, has decided that the Association has failed, after due notice, to comply with the covenants and agreements contained in this trust agreement.

Revised Code (1935) ch. 66, art. 7—Banks, Savings Societies and Trust Companies

Receiving Deposits or Payments on Income Contracts, Certificates or Bonds

2360. SEC. 103. Unlawful to Solicit or Receive Deposits or Payments on Income Contract, &c.; Without License From State Bank Commissioner; Not to Apply to Certain Business:—No person, co-partnership, association or corporation shall engage in the business of soliciting or receiving deposits or payments on any income contract, annuity contract or certificate, or annuity bond, in fixed and stipulated installments, within this State, without first having obtained from the State Bank Commissioner a license to do business in this State. * * *

2362. SEC. 105. Deposit Must Be Made With State Bank Commissioner Before License is Issued; Amount of Deposit; Additional Deposit May Be Required.—Before any license to engage in the business described in the first clause of Section 103 hereof shall be issued the State Bank Commissioner shall require the applicant for such license to deposit with the State Bank Commissioner, in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders (or if such applicant be a non-resident person, co-partnership or association, or a foreign corporation, then for the benefit of its contract holders resident in the State of Delaware) interest-bearing bonds or other income-producing securities, satisfactory to the State Bank Commissioner, to the market value of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00); provided, that if at any time the State Bank Commissioner shall, in his discretion, determine that such deposit is insufficient for the protection of the contract holders, having regard to the obligations of the licensee, such licensee shall, on demand of the State Bank Commissioner, forthwith deposit with him such additional securities as he shall require, not exceeding in amount one hundred percent of its obligations (or if such licensee be a non-resident of this State or a foreign corporation, then it shall deposit with him such additional securities as he shall require not exceeding one hundred percent of its obligations to contract holders resident in the State of Delaware).

Should any person, co-partnership, association or corporation to whom such license shall have been granted cease, for any reason or cause whatever, to do business in this State, such deposit or deposits shall be returned to such licensee; provided, however, that retention may be made of a portion of said deposits, equal to obligations or liabilities outstanding to contract holders, until the State Bank Commissioner shall have been satisfied, by such evidence as he shall deem sufficient, that all obligations to contract holders shall have been fully paid and discharged (or, if such licensee be a non-resident of this State or a foreign corporation, then that all obligations to contract holders resident in this State shall have been fully paid and discharged). * * *

2363. SEC. 106. State Bank Commissioner to Examine Affairs of All Licensees; Commissioner Shall Have Like Authority As in Case of Banks, &c; Copies of Books, &c.; May Be Required, When; Expenses to Be Paid by Licensee:—The State Bank Commissioner shall, at least once in every year, examine the affairs of all persons, co-partnerships, associations and corporations to whom he shall have issued a license to do business under this Article, and shall certify to such licensee so examined the result of such examination. * * *

2365. SEC. 108. Upon Failure to Comply With Provisions, State Bank Commissioner May Revoke License After Five Days Notice to Licensee—Upon the failure of any person, firm, association or corporation to whom a license shall have been issued under Section 103 hereof, to comply with any of the provisions of this Article, or if the State Bank Commissioner shall determine that the affairs of any such person, firm, association or corporation are in an unsound condition financially, the State Bank Commissioner is authorized to revoke or suspend the license theretofore granted by him to such a person, co-partnership, association or corporation, provided, however, that not less than five days' notice has been given said licensee of such intended revocation, and opportunity for hearing afforded.

ILLINOIS

Jones Illinois Statutes Annotated (1942 Cumulative Supplement, Volume 2)

SECTION 13.07. Investment Contracts Defined—Liquidation of Securities by Secretary of State. § 6a. * * * No such investment contracts shall be sold or issued in this State unless the issuer shall deposit and maintain with the Secretary of State of this State, for the benefit of the holders of such investment contracts a deposit of securities in which life insurance companies organized under the laws of this State are permitted to invest their funds in an amount not less than fifty thousand dollars ($50,000), and at no time less than the issuer's current contract liability on all such outstanding investment contracts as defined therein, heretofore or hereafter sold in the State of Illinois, * * * The State Treasurer of this State shall hold as custodian for the Secretary of State, the securities deposited with the Secretary of State for the benefit of the holders of the investment contracts coming within the provisions of this Section 6a.

* * * * *

Upon the insolvency of the issuer or appointment of a receiver or trustee in bankruptcy, the Secretary of State or his successors in office may apply to the Circuit Court of Sangamon County, or any other court of competent jurisdiction, for authority to proceed with the liquidation of such securities held for the benefit of the holders of such contracts in his office. The Secretary of State is hereby authorized to deal with such securities on deposit in this State for the benefit of the holders of such investment contracts, in his name, or, if the Court shall so order, in the name of the issuer. The Secretary of State may, subject to the approval of the Court, sell or otherwise dispose of the securities so deposited or any part thereof. He shall as soon as may be conveniently possible, give notice by publication as provided by law, and as the Court may direct, to all contract holders who may have claims against the issuer under such investment contracts and for whose benefit such deposit is held, to file and prove their claims in the manner and within the time the Court shall direct. In order to preserve so far as possible the rights and interests of the holders of contracts of such issuer sold in Illinois, he may liquidate such securities on deposit in this State by entering into contracts with any issuer or person able to buy such securities in whole, or in part. Upon receiving an offer or offers for the purchase of such securities in whole, or in part, the Secretary of State shall submit such offer or offers to the court, and if, after a full hearing upon the petition filed by the Secretary of State, the court shall find that the Secretary of State endeavored to obtain the best contract price for the benefit of said contract holders, and if the court shall find that the best contract price in the interests of said contract holders has been obtained, and that it is for the best interests of said holders of such contracts that such securities be sold, the court shall, by written order, approve the acts of the Secretary of State and authorize him to dispose of such securities. Upon the conversion of such securities to cash, the Secretary of State may then proceed to dispose of the sum received for such securities among the respective holders of such contracts as their interest may appear. Upon the liquidation and distribution of such funds, the Secretary of State may make proper application to the court for final approval of his action in the liquidation of such securities and the distribution or disposition thereof or of the proceeds therefrom as herein provided. * * *

INDIANA

Burns Indiana Statutes (1933) Volume 6, Chapter 38—Foreign Investment Companies

25-3801 (8032). License required.—It shall be unlawful for any corporation, association or society organized under the laws of any state (other than the state of Indiana), or of any government foreign to the government of the United States, to conduct or engage in the business of a trust or investment company for the purpose of issuing its stocks, bonds, contracts or agreements to its members or other persons, upon which payments are to be made in instalments, or for the purpose of receiving deposits or payments of money for any purpose, without first procuring a certificate of authority from the auditor of state, which certificate shall be renewed annually.

25–3803 (8034). Deposit of Securities.—Every such corporation, association or society, before the auditor of state shall issue his authority to do business, shall deposit with said auditor of state stocks or bonds, approved by said auditor, in a sum not less than twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000), which amount shall remain in possession of said auditor for and during the first year that said corporation, association or society shall do business. At end of said first year, said corporation, association or society shall deposit with said auditor of state stocks or bonds approved by said auditor equal to the amount of its liabilities to citizens of this state and shall keep such deposit at all times equal to such liabilities.

25–3804 (8035). Revoking authority.—Any time such corporation, association or society, shall fail to make such deposit, as required by section three (§ 25–3803), or shall become insolvent or fail to carry out its contracts or agreements with citizens of this state, then said auditor of state shall revoke its authority to do business in said state, and shall ask the proper court of this state to appoint a receiver to take charge of such deposit for the benefit of its creditors in said state.

Note: Sections 25–3801, 25–3813 were repealed by Acts 1935, ch. 179, § 18. Acts 1935, ch. 179, § 18 was repealed by Acts 1937, ch. 120 § 23.

IOWA

Code (1939) Chapter 392, Sale of Stock on Installment Plan

8517. Terms defined.— * * * The term "stock" shall mean * * * or other investment securities or agreements of any kind or character issued upon the partial payment or installment plan.

8521. Bonds or securities deposited.—Before any association shall be authorized to transact business contemplated by this chapter, it shall deposit with the commissioner of insurance a bond approved by the commissioner of insurance, guaranteeing the faithful performance of all contracts enfered into by such association or securities of the kind designated in subsections 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of section 8737,[a] or such other securities as shall be approved by the commissioner of insurance in the amount of twenty-five thousand dollars, which amount shall remain in possession of the commissioner of insurance until the end of the calendar year in which the association shall first be authorized to transact business. At the end of such calendar year, such association shall deposit with the commissioner of insurance securities of the kind above provided in an amount equal to all its liabilities to persons residing within this state and shall keep such deposit at all times equal to such liability; provided that at no time shall such deposit be reduced below twenty-five thousand dollars except at such time as such association shall be by law closing out its business and its liabilities shall have been reduced below twenty-five thousand dollars.

8520. Annual report.— * * * If at any time it shall appear that such association is doing an unsafe business or is insolvent the commissioner of insurance may revoke its certificate of authority authorizing it to transact business within the state until the first day of March of the following year. If at any time it shall appear that such association is doing an unsafe business or is insolvent the commissioner of insurance may revoke its certificate of authority to transact business and having revoked the certificate of authority of an association organized under the laws of this state, he shall report his action to the attorney general who shall at once apply to the district court or a judge thereof for the appointment of a receiver to close up the affairs of such association, and an injunction may issue in the same proceeding enjoining and restraining the association from transacting business in this state.

Corrick's General Statutes Annotated (1935) Ch. 17, Art. 10

17–1033. Foreign associations permitted to do business in state; certificate of authority, prerequisites.—Foreign building and loan associations doing business in this state shall conduct their business in this state in accordance with the laws of the state governing domestic associations, and no such association shall do any business in this state until it shall procure from the bank commissioner a certificate of authority to do so. To procure such authority, such association shall comply with the following provisions: 1st. It shall deposit with the bank commissioner fifty thousand dollars, either in cash or in bonds of the United States or of the state of Kansas, or of some county or municipal corporation in the state of Kansas, of par value, which has never defaulted upon its interest, or it may enter into a bond annually to the state of Kansas, to be approved by the bank commissioner, for the benefit of the parties doing business with said association, in the sum of fifty thousand dollars, with ten or more sureties, to be approved by the bank commissioner, or with an approved surety company as surety, conditioned for the performance of its subsequent contracts with its members in this state. * * *

17–1037. Securities liable for claims; release.—The deposit made with the bank commissioner shall be held as security for all claims of residents of this state against said association, and shall be liable for all judgments or decrees thereon, and subject to the payment of the same, in the same manner as the property of other nonresidents. Should any association cease to do business in this state, the bank commissioner may release securities, in his discretion, after one year's notice of the fact, retaining sufficient to satisfy all outstanding liabilities.

17-1047. Construction of term "building and loan associations"; submission of bylaws and plans for approval; penalty for failure to comply.—That the term building and loan association, as used in the statutes of Kansas, shall be construed to include: * * * Second, corporations, associations, companies, copartnerships and individuals transacting the business of issuing or selling bonds, debentures, certificates, shares of stock or other papers by whatever name said instruments may be designated, whether said instruments are issued for money paid in advance or for money to be paid in installments, but with an intent either implied or expressed, that the proceeds or accumulated installments thereof and thereon or any part thereof are to be withdrawable or repayable with accumulated profits at some future fixed or indefinite date or maturity; Provided, That all payments made in advance or in installments, or otherwise, on any of the foregoing instruments shall be subject to the same provisions for withdrawal or repayment as payments on building and loan association stock. All of the laws and regulations prescribed by the statutes of this state for the government and regulation of the business and affairs of building and loan associations shall apply to all such corporations, associations, companies, copartnerships and individuals. All such concerns shall come within the supervisory jurisdiction of the building and loan supervisor, and be subject to examination and supervision as provided by the laws of the state of Kansas for building and loan associations. All such corporations, associations, companies, copartnerships or individuals, who have not already done so, shall submit their bylaws and plans for the transaction of business to the bank commissioner of the state of Kansas for his approval within thirty days from the passage of this act, and from and after said date such corporation, association, company, copartnership or individual shall not transact any business until their bylaws and plans of doing business are approved by the bank commissioner. * * *

17-1032. Insolvency; receiver; special deputy, bond.—If upon examination of such association made by the building and loan supervisor or his deputy, or from any report made to the supervisor, it shall appear that any such association is insolvent, it shall be the duty of the supervisor, with the approval of the bank commissioner, to immediately take charge of such association, its business and all property and effects thereof. Upon taking charge of any such association, the supervisor shall as soon as possible ascertain by thorough examination into its affairs, its actual condition. And whenever he shall become satisfied that such association cannot resume business or liquidate its indebtedness to the satisfaction of all its creditors, he shall report the fact of its insolvency and condition to the attorney general, who shall immediately upon the receipt of such notice, institute proper proceedings in the proper court for the purpose of having a receiver appointed to take charge of such association, and to wind up the affairs and business thereof for the benefit of its creditors and stockholders. The supervisor may appoint a special deputy to take charge of the affairs of an insolvent association temporarily until a receiver is appointed. Such deputy shall qualify, give bond and receive compensation the same as a regular deputy; such compensation to be paid by such association or allowed by the court as costs of the appointment of a receiver: Provided, That in no case shall any association continue in charge of such special deputy for a longer period than sixty days.

KENTUCKY

§ 2223a–1. Reserve fund to be provided; deposit with state treasurer; statement to be filed.—Every corporation of the character generally known as investment companies, organized, or which may be hereafter organized, under the laws of Kentucky, for the purpose of conducting the business of placing or selling certificates, bonds, debentures, certificates of interest, or other investment securities of any kind, on the partial payment, installment or any other plan of payment, and providing for the redemption and retirement of same, or any part thereof, and every company, partnership or association conducting such business in this state shall provide a reserve and redemption fund of not less than seventy-five percent (75%) of amount collected in premiums, for the benefit and protection of its investors, and so much of said fund as shall not be immediately distributed to investors shall be invested as hereinafter provided, and every such company, corporation, partnership, association or individual now doing such business in this state within ninety days after the passage of this act shall deposit with the state treasurer the total amount of its paid-up capital stock, and if said paid-up capital stock shall not amount to fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000.00), shall deposit in addition thereto enough of the reserve fund to make fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000.00), in cash, or in [List of approved investments]. Said fund so deposited shall be for the protection of investors in such certificates, debentures and other investment securities, wherever residing. Said company, corporation, partnership or association shall within ninety days after the passage of this act also file with the treasurer of the Commonwealth a statement verified by its president and secretary, showing its assets and liabilities as fixed herein, its income for the preceding twelve months, the total amount passed to its reserve fund now on hand, the number of certificates or parts of certificates redeemed or paid, and the amount of money used therefor. And at the same time such corporation, company, partnership or association shall deposit with the treasurer in cash, or in bonds or such other securities as hereinbefore provided for, the amount passed to the reserve fund, as shown by said statement, which deposit shall be made each year until the total amount of the deposit with the treasurer shall be of the actual value of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00).

§ 2223a–2. License to do business; when to issue.— * * *

§ 2223a–9. Examination of company; when to be declared insolvent.—The governor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky shall have the power, at any time that he may deem proper, to appoint expert accountants at the expense of any company, corporation, partnership or association operating under provisions of this act, to make an examination of its affairs, and if it shall be ascertained by said expert accountants that any company, corporation, partnership or association operating under the provisions of this act shall not have assets sufficient to equal in value the reserve fund contributed by every contract in force, plus the interest at three and one-half percent (3½%) per annum compounded annually, said company shall be declared insolvent and its license revoked.

§ 2223a–10. Conditions upon which it may begin business; retaliatory laws; deposits with treasurer.—Every such corporation, company, partnership or association organized under the laws of any other state, which shall have made deposit with the proper authority of such state, or of any other state of the United States, either in cash or in acceptable securities, for the benefit and protection of all its investors, wherever residing, or which shall comply with the laws of this state upon the following conditions, to-wit: It shall file with the secretary of state of this Commonwealth a certified copy of its charter or articles of incorporation and a statement giving the location of its office or offices in this state and the name or names of its agents upon whom process can be served; and shall file with the treasurer a certificate from the proper authorities of the state in which it may have been organized, or had made such deposit, showing that the deposit aforesaid has been made; such corporation shall also, on or before the fifteenth day of January in each year, make an annual statement as required by this act, which shall be published as aforesaid; and shall furnish to the treasurer a certificate from the proper officer of the state where it shall have been organized or have made such deposit, showing that the deposit herein required of companies organized under the laws of this state for the preceding year has been made with the authorities of such state for the protection of its investors; and upon so doing, it shall be entitled to a renewal of its license for one year from the expiration of that already held by it * * * and provided further, that where any such corporation, company, partnership or association organized in any other state shall have made a deposit in any other state of the United States for the protection of holders of its certificates, bonds, debentures, certificates of interest or other investment securities, wherever residing, less in amount than that required by the laws of this state, it shall, before doing business in this state, file a certificate of such deposit as herein required, and shall deposit an amount with the treasurer of this state which, together with the amount so deposited in such other state, shall make up the total amount required by this act to be deposited by said companies in this state; and provided, that when, by the laws of any other state, any such company shall have been required to make, and shall have made, a deposit in such state for the security of holders of its certificates, bonds, debentures, certificates of interest, or other investment securities in such state alone said company shall not be required to make a deposit in this state of its reserved fund accruing from its certificates, bonds, debentures, certificates of interest, or other investment securities which, under the laws of such other states, are secured by special deposit in such state, and the holders of said bonds shall not be entitled to the benefit of the securities deposited with the treasurer of this state under this act.

Agreement

THIS AGREEMENT, made and entered into this 5th day of November, 1935, by and between FIDELITY INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION, * * * as party of the first part, and the FARMERS DEPOSIT BANK, of Frankfort, Kentucky, a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the State of Kentucky, party of the second part:

Witnesseth

WHEREAS it is necessary, in compliance with the requirements of the Securities Department of the State of Kentucky, for the purpose of doing business therein by the party of the first part, that certain deposits of securities be made and subject to the approval of the Securities Commissioner of the aforesaid State of Kentucky; and

WHEREAS, it would be more convenient and advantageous to the party of the first part to make deposit of securities with the party of the second part to the satisfaction of such regulation; and with the consent and approval of the said Securities

Commissioner of the State of Kentucky, now, therefore,

IT IS AGREED that the party of the second part shall entertain and undertake custodianship of said securities, as more particularly described in Schedule "A" attached hereto and made a part hereof, in the total sum of $10,000.00 face amount, and any additional amounts which may hereafter and from time to time be deposited hereunder, such securities being a part of the Special Fund created by the Fidelity Investment Association for the specific purpose of maturing and/or paying the amounts due or to become due, under the terms of the Income Reserve Contract, Series "D". It being understood and agreed between the parties hereto that any and all such securities so deposited hereunder, and the coupons pertaining thereto, shall be held for the Securities Commissioner of the State of Kentucky, and shall be delivered to the party of the first part only under the advice and directions of the Securities Commissioner by written order addressed to said second party. * * *

The foregoing agreement for deposit and custody of securities is consented to and approved this 12th day of November, 1935.

EVELYN C. CLIFTON,
Securities Commissioner, State of Kentucky.

[Supplementary Agreement dated November 2, 1938, is immaterial for present purposes]

Flack's Annotated Code, Volume 2—Article 48 A—Installment Accumulation Contracts

219. (Licenses.) No company shall hereafter engage or continue, either directly or indirectly, in the business of issuing, negotiating, offering for sale or selling any contract payable on the installment plan, with or without definite maturity dates, which contracts contemplate the accumulating of money or funds for making loans or investments and undertaking or agreeing to pay or deliver at any future time any sum of money, contract, or other thing of value, without first having obtained a license as provided in this sub-title.

222. (Deposits Required.) No company licensed under the provisions of this sub-title shall at any time offer, negotiate, or sell contracts in the State of Maryland, unless and until such company shall have assigned to and deposited with the Treasurer of the State of Maryland or with some independent bank or trust company approved by the Insurance Commissioner, in trust, as security for all the holders of contracts or other obligations heretofore or hereafter sold, negotiated, issued or accrued in said company in the State of Maryland, bonds, coin or treasury notes of the United States of America, or interest or dividend paying bonds or stocks of this or any other State of the United States or of any county, incorporated city or other corporation of this or any other State having legal authority to issue the same and not in default, or other securities approved by the Commissioner, having a market value of not less than $25,000, and at no time less than the aggregate contract liability of the company under all contracts heretofore or hereafter sold in the State of Maryland; provided, however, that all such securities shall have been approved in writing by the Insurance Commissioner before the same are deposited with the Treasurer of the State of Maryland or with such independent bank or trust company, and further provided that in the case of a non-resident company which shall annually produce a certificate of the insurance commissioner or other proper financial officer of the State in which such company is organized, setting forth that such company has deposited with him securities having a market value of not less than $25,000 and not less than the aggregate contract liability of the company to the holders of all contracts or other obligations heretofore or hereafter sold, negotiated, issued or accrued by said company in the United States, and that he holds said deposit in trust and on deposit, under and by the laws of the State in which he resides for the benefit of all the contract holders of such company in the United States, and that he is satisfied that the securities so deposited by such company and held by him are worth not less than $25,000 and not less than the aggregate contract liability of the company to the holders of all contracts or other obligations heretofore or hereafter sold, negotiated, issued or accrued by said company in the United States, then in such case such company shall be excused from making the deposit hereinbefore required. When the value of said securities shall depreciate so that the market value of the deposit shall be less than hereinbefore required, additional securities shall be deposited in order that the deposit shall at all times be maintained in the amount of not less than that hereinbefore required.

229. (Liquidation of Insolvent or Illegally Conducted Companies.) Whenever the Commissioner shall have reason to believe that any company is insolvent, fraudulently conducted, or that its assets are not sufficient for carrying on the business of the same, or during any non-compliance with the provisions of this sub-title, it shall be his duty in addition to revoking the license of such company, to proceed against it as provided by Sections 52 to 63, both inclusive, of this Article, for the liquidation of insolvent or fraudulently conducted insurance companies.

52. (Liquidation of Insolvent or Illegally Conducted Companies.) Whenever the Insurance Commissioner shall have reason to believe that any insurance company doing business in this State is insolvent, or fraudulently conducted, or that its assets are not sufficient for carrying on the business of the same, or during any non-compliance with the provisions of this Article, it shall be his duty to forthwith cause proper proceedings to be instituted in the name of the State of Maryland against any such company in a court of competent jurisdiction, for the purpose of obtaining an injunction suspending the business of said company and having the said court assume jurisdiction over the property and business of said company for final liquidation, and the court in which said proceeding is instituted shall be authorized to appoint the Insurance Commissioner or the Deputy Insurance Commissioner, Receiver of such company, provided, however, that no such Receiver shall receive any additional compensation for his services as Receiver, but shall be allowed clerical, traveling and legal expenses, subject to the court's order, and shall furnish such bond as the court may require.

61. The Commissioner may, subject to the approval of the court, sell or otherwise dispose of the real and personal property of the company, or any part thereof, or any interest therein, or any other assets of the company against which a proceeding is pending under Section 54 of this Article, and may sell or compound all doubtful or uncollectible debts or claims owing to such company, including but not limited to claims based upon assessments levied against members of mutual insurance companies.

Revised Statutes 1929, Ch. 32, Article 13—Bond Investment Companies

§ 5060. Bond Investment Companies Required to Deposit Cash or Bonds With State Treasurer to Protect Investors.—Every corporation doing business in this state as a bond investment company, or company to place and sell bonds, certificates or debentures on the partial payment or installment plan, shall and the same is hereby required to deposit with the state treasurer, in cash, United States or Missouri state bonds, or bonds of any county, municipal township or school bonds, or mortgage bonds secured by deeds of trust on unencumbered real estate which, together with the improvements thereon, shall be worth at least double the amount of said notes, or such parts of each of the above mentioned securities, so that the whole deposit will be equal to the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, and whenever the liabilities of such bonds, certificates or debentures in force on the books of the company shall exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, said company shall make an additional deposit on the first day of January and July of each year a sum sufficient in amount to cover the excess liabilities accrued during the preceding six months, for the protection of the investors in such bonds, certificates or debentures.

§ 5065. Attorney-general shall conduct proceedings—fees.—Proceedings instituted under the provisions of this article shall be conducted by the attorney-general of the state, and in the name of the state of Missouri as plaintiff, at the relation of said supervisor. The jurisdiction of the circuit court and processes, pleadings and proceedings had in the cases instituted under this article, shall be the same as are now provided by law for the winding up and dissolution of insurance companies, so far as such provisions of law are applicable. * * *

In reference to insurance companies § 5937 provides:

Distribution of deposits.—Whenever any company has been or shall be adjudged insolvent, or shall be or has been dissolved, if a distribution of its assets among its policyholders and creditors is or shall be decreed, it shall be the duty of the superintendent of the insurance department to hold all securities on deposit for the benefit of all policyholders in such company, whether the claims of such policyholders are in judgment or not, to reduce such securities to money, and when so reduced, to apply the same, less the expenses herein provided for, to the liquidation of policy claims pro rata; in case there should be any surplus after the payment of all policy claims in full, such surplus shall become a part of the general assets of the company. If the policy claimants are not paid in full out of the proceeds of said securities, they shall be entitled to share in the distribution of its general assets for the remainder of their claims, as is provided by this chapter, and as to said remainder shall not be charged with the amount received by them on their policy claims out of the proceeds of said securities: Provided, however, that when said securities have been deposited to secure registered policies or annuity bonds, as provided by this chapter, the proceeds of the securities so deposited shall be first applied to the payment of the registered policies and annuity bonds, for the security of which the same were deposited. * * *

Note: Article 13, Chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri of 1929 was repealed by Laws 1941, page 328, effective ninety days after July 12.

Memorandum of Agreement

THIS MEMORANDUM, made this 7th day of September, 1932, by and between Fidelity Investment Association, party of the first part, and Dollar Savings and Trust Company, party of the second part, both parties hereto being corporations chartered, organized, and existing under the laws of the State of West Virginia, with principal offices in the City of Wheeling, West Virginia.

WITNESSETH

WHEREAS, it is necessary, in compliance with the statutory law of the State of Missouri for the purpose of doing business therein by party of the first part, that certain deposits of securities be made with and subject to the approval of the Security Commisioner of aforesaid State of Missouri; and

WHEREAS, it would be more convenient and advantageous to party of the first part to make such deposits with party of the second part to the satisfaction of such statutory requirements and regulations, and with the consent and approval of the said Security Commissioner, now, therefore,

It is agreed that party of the second part shall entertain and undertake custodianship of said securities in total sum of three hundred and three thousand dollars ($303,000.), the property of party of the first part, holding same for the Security Commissioner of the State of Missouri, upon and under his advice and directions by written order to deliver said securities and/or coupons; * * * to permit the substitution or change of securities, and to accept additional securities, all of which to be done upon written order of said Security Commissioner.

* * * * *

[Signatures]

The foregoing Agreement for deposit and custody of securities is consented to and approved this 15th day of September, 1932.

OHIO

Page's Ohio General Code—Annotated, Volume 1, Chapter 2b: Supervisor of Bond Investment Companies

SEC. 698. Deposit with treasurer of state.—Before doing business in this state, every bond investment company shall deposit with the treasurer of state one hundred thousand dollars in cash or bonds of the United States or of the state of Ohio, or of any county or municipal corporation in Ohio, for the protection of investors in the securities of such company. Such deposit shall be made out of the paid-up capital stock of such bond investment company.

SEC. 699. Purpose of such deposit.—The deposit made by a bond investment company with the treasurer of state shall be held as security for all claims of residents of this state against such company, and shall be liable for all judgments and decrees thereon, and subject to the payment of such decrees in the same manner as the property of other non-residents. If such company ceases to do business in this state, the treasurer of state may release securities, in his discretion, retaining sufficient to satisfy all outstanding liabilities.

SEC. 699–1. Deposits required of foreign bond investment companies * * *.—In addition to the deposits mentioned in the next two preceding sections, each such company * * * shall deposit with the supervisor of bond investment companies, securities or assets * * * in an amount equal to the cash surrender value * * * on all contracts entered into on and after the effective date of this act by such companies with persons resident in the state of Ohio, and such bond investment companies are hereby required to maintain such deposits in such amounts as are equal to such contract liabilities.'

* * * * *

All deposits required under this section shall be held by the supervisor of bond investment companies for the protection and benefit of their contract holders who are residents of Ohio.

SEC. 628–30. Special deposit claims.—The owners of special deposit claims against an insurer for which a receiver has been appointed in a delinquency proceeding in this or any other state shall be given priority against their several special deposits, in accordance with the provisions of the statutes requiring the creation and maintenance of such special deposits. If there be a deficiency in any such special deposit so that the claims secured thereby are not fully discharged therefrom, the claimants may share in the general assets, but such sharing shall be deferred until general creditors, and also claimants against other special deposits who have received a smaller percentage from their respective special deposits, have been paid percentages of their claims equal to the percentage paid from such special deposit, it being the purpose and intent of this provision to equalize to this extent the advantage gained by the security provided by such special deposits.

SEC. 628–32. Liquidation, etc., of special deposit and secured claims; surplus.—The ancillary receiver of assets in this state of insurers domiciliary in other states and subject to delinquency proceedings therein shall, as soon as practicable, arrange the liquidation or other disposition of special deposit claims and secured claims proved in the ancillary proceedings in this state, and all remaining assets, after payment of expenses, he shall promptly transfer to the domiciliary receiver.

SEC. 641. Sale and distribution of securities of defaulting companies.—If any company, corporation, or association required by law to make a deposit with the superintendent of insurance, or other state officer, to secure the contracts of such company, corporation, or association, or for any other purpose, fails to pay any of its liabilities upon such contracts, or other obligations, according to the terms thereof after the liability thereon has been determined, or if such company, corporation, or association, having ceased to do business within this state, leaves unpaid any such liability or has become insolvent, the attorney general of the state, on behalf of the superintendent of insurance, or such other officer, and upon the application of any person entitled to participate in such deposit, or the proceeds arising therefrom, shall commence a civil action in the court of common pleas of Franklin county, making the company, corporation, or association, a party defendant, to determine the rights of all parties claiming any interest in such deposit, to subject the deposit to the payment or satisfaction of all liabilities and to distribute such fund among the persons entitled thereto.

PENNSYLVANIA

Purdon's Statutes Annotated (Permanent Edition 1939), Ch. 28

§ 782. License required of certain corporations, etc., doing certain business.—After the first day of October, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, no corporation or person shall, whether or not operating under a declaration of trust or other agreement, engage or continue, either directly or indirectly, in the business, within this Commonwealth, of receiving single payments, regular installment payments, or contributions to be held or used in any plan of accumulation or investment, or of issuing, negotiating, offering for sale, or selling any contract on the partial payment or installment plan, or of assuming fixed obligations, or issuing, in connection therewith, a contract based upon payments being made upon installments or single payment, under which all or part of the total amount received is to be repaid at some future time, either with or without profit, unless such corporation or person is licensed to transact such business within this Commonwealth by the commission in the manner hereinafter provided.

§ 783. Application for license; investigation; refusal or revocation of license.—Every corporation or person, desiring to obtain a license under the provisions of this act, shall file with the commission, an application in writing in such form as may be prescribed by the commission. * * *

§ 784. Deposit of security.—No corporation or person shall be licensed under the provisions of this act unless and until it has deposited with the commission in cash or bonds of the United States or of the State of Pennsylvania or of cities, counties, boroughs, or school districts of this Commonwealth, or any other state of the United States, approved by the commission, of the clear market value of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000), as security for the fulfillment of its contracts made heretofore or hereafter with residents of Pennsylvania. * * *

§ 787. Additional security.—The commission may require every corporation or person licensed under the provisions of this act to set apart a fund, no portion of which shall be applied to the expense of such corporation or person, which shall consist of not less than ten per centum of the amount designated in each contract issued as applicable to the payment of the expenses of conducting the business of such corporation or person. Such fund shall be invested at the close of each calendar year, or oftener if the commission may require, in bonds of the character described in section four of this act,[4] and forthwith deposited with the commission, in the same manner and under the same terms as prescribed by said section, as additional security for the fulfillment of its contracts, provided such corporations[5] or person may deposit cash with the commission in lieu of securities.

§ 789. Discontinuance of business.—Whenever any corporation or person licensed under the provisions of this act shall desire to discontinue with this Commonwealth the business of the nature hereinbefore set forth and described, it may make application by petition to the court of common pleas of Dauphin County, setting forth its resources and liabilities within and without this Commonwealth, and particularly an itemized and complete list of the holders or owners of the outstanding contracts issued by such corporation or person, together with the last known address of such holders or owners, and, in each case, the total amount of the liability of such corporation or person thereon, if any, and thereupon the said court, after due hearing, of which the commission shall have such notice as the court may determine, may make such order as will permit the withdrawal of said cash or bonds deposited with the commission, or a part thereof, and will, at the same time, fully protect the rights of all persons owning or holding the contracts issued by such corporation or person.

TENNESSEE

Williams' Code Annotated (1934), Volume 4, Chapter 4

§ 6057 (3273a122). Statements and documents to be filed with the commissioner before transacting business; filing fee; deposit of securities.

* * * * * *

Provided, however, that if the securities offered or to be offered for sale in Tennessee be of the class known as "investment contracts", comprising the following: investment contracts, or annuity contracts other than those of qualified insurance companies, or installment investment certificates, or securities of like kind, which contemplate that the issuer shall pay or deliver, or whereby the issuer agrees to pay or deliver, either absolutely or conditionally, to the purchaser or holder of the contract, certificate, bond or like security, a sum of money at a future time, either with or without interest, in consideration of a payment or payments made or contemplated to be made by such purchaser or holder, which securities are hereinafter referred to as investment contracts; the investment company, or issuer, domestic or foreign, upon written request of the commissioner of insurance and banking of this state, shall deposit and maintain with the said commissioner, for the benefit of the holders of such investment contracts, a deposit of securities in cash or its equivalent; but the commissioner of insurance and banking may, in his discretion, accept as said equivalent, such securities as domestic life insurance companies are permitted to invest their funds in under section 6204 as amended of the official Code of Tennessee, in amount not less than $10,000 and at no time less than 100% of the issuer's cash or current contract liability on all such outstanding investment contracts, as defined herein, sold in the State of Tennessee. The commissioner of insurance and banking of this state shall hold as custodian the securities deposited for the benefit of the holders of the investment contracts coming within the provisions of this section:

§ 6068 (3273a132). Attorney-general shall apply for receiver, etc., when.—Whenever it shall appear to the said commissioner that the assets of any investment company doing business in this state are impaired to the extent that such assets do not equal its liabilities, or that it is conducting its business in an unsafe, inequitable, or unauthorized manner, or is jeopardizing the interests of its stockholders or investors in stocks, bonds, or other securities by it offered for sale; or whenever any investment company shall fail or refuse to file any papers, statements, or documents required by this chapter, without giving satisfactory reason therefor, said commissioner shall at once communicate such facts to the attorney-general, who shall thereupon apply to the chancery court in the district where such company is located or is doing business or to a chancellor of said court for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and wind up the business of such investment company; and if such fact or facts be made to appear, it shall be sufficient evidence to authorize the appointment of a receiver and the making of such orders and decrees in such cases as equity may require.

VIRGINIA

§ 3848 (49). To what securities applicable.—(i) Shares, participations, rights or interests, by whatsoever name or term designated or described, in investment trusts and/or in any enterprise or project having the essential characteristics of what is commonly known as an investment trust, whether under the English or American theory or plan, and by whatsoever term or name known or called, and also the securities thereof for capital purposes.

* * * * *

§ 3848 (51). Information and fees required of promoters; conditions precedent to offering securities for sale; bond required.—(r) In any case the commission shall have the right to require of any promoter either before or after granting an authorization, or license, for the sale of securities, or land, a bond, the form whereof shall be prescribed and the surety approved by the commission, penalty whereof shall be fixed by the commission at not more than twenty per centum of the sales price of the securities or land proposed or authorized to be sold. The said bond shall be with surety and payable to the Commonwealth, condition that the facts set forth in the application for such authorization, or license, and in all other documents required by this act to be filed with the commission are true, and that the provisions of this act shall be strictly complied with, and that all moneys from the sale of such securities or land will be used for the proper purpose or purposes as set forth in the subscription contract and/or in the security sold and in the papers filed with the commission; and that the contract of the promoter as set forth in subscription and/or in the securities issued will be complied with. Except when the surety offered is a surety company authorized to do business in this State, it shall be the duty of the commission to satisfy itself that such surety is amply solvent before accepting the same; provided that the commission may, in its discretion, permit some other form or method of giving the security contemplated by this provision in lieu of requiring a bond as provided.

§ 3848 (60). Suits on bond.—Any person who shall be induced to purchase any securities or land, such as are designated in section three [3848 (49)] of this act, by any promoter, by reason of any misrepresentation of any material fact concerning such securities or land, contained in said application or other documents submitted in connection therewith or furnished to the commission, upon its request, or in any other written or printed matter issued or used by said promoter or its or his agents in making such sale, or shall have suffered loss by reason of the fact that moneys paid by him to the promoter of such securities or land or to the promoter's agent, have not been applied to the proper purpose of the promoter as set forth in the subscription contract, the security sold, or the papers filed with the commission, or that the promoter has failed or refused to comply with his contract as set forth in the subscription contract and/or in the certificate or other evidence of the security issued or land sold, shall have the right to bring action upon the bond provided for by this act or under any substitute agreement approved by the commission in pursuance of provisions of this act, and such bond or duly approved substitute therefor shall be security for such person for his losses; but such person shall not be entitled to recover more than the money paid, or the actual value of the property given, or the labor performed, in exchange for such securities or land, with legal interest from the date of the payment or the performance of the services or the transfer of the property. One or more recoveries shall not vitiate the bond or substitute therefor, but same shall remain in full force and effect, but no recoveries shall ever exceed the full amount of such bond or substitute therefor, and upon actions being commenced in excess of the amount of same, the commission may require a new bond, or substitute therefor, and if the same is not given or effected within thirty days, the commission may revoke the permit herein provided for, provided, however, that any suit or action instituted under this section shall be commenced within two years from the date of any such sale by such promoter or its or his agents.

Agreement

WHEREAS the Fidelity Investment Association has executed a certain bond dated August 8th, 1932, under the provisions of the Virginia Securities Law: and

WHEREAS, in lieu of sureties upon said Bond, the Association desires to deposit certain securities with a trust as security for the faithful performance by it of all its obligations under said bond; and

WHEREAS, under the said law the State Corporation Commission of Virginia may approve some form or method of giving security other than requiring a bond with sureties;

NOW, THEREFORE, be it mutually agreed between the Fidelity Investment Association, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of West Virginia, as party of the first part; and the State-Planters Bank and Trust Company of Richmond, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Virginia, Trustee, as party of the second part, as follows:

1. The party of the first part agrees to deposit with the party of the second part, as trustee, $25,000 United States Treasury Bonds, 3⅛s June 15, 1949, but upon the specific trust and condition that said securities are deposited as security for the faithful performance by the party of the first part of its several undertakings under the above mentioned bond, only.

2. If the party of the first part ceases to carry on business in the State of Virginia, and its liabilities, whether fixed or contingent, as mentioned herein, shall have been satisfied, or shall have terminated, upon satisfactory evidence of the fact the State Corporation Commission of Virginia shall direct the party of the second part to deliver to the party of the first part the securities of said party in its possession, or, if there be contingent obligations outstanding the said Commission shall direct the delivery of the amount of securities over and above the amount necessary to take care of said contingent obligations, should they be legally established.

3. If the said party of the first part fails to perform any of its obligations for which it has executed its bond, and has failed to pay the liability arising therefrom after the same shall have been ascertained by any agreement between the party of the first part and the party to whom it may be incurred, binding upon the party of the first part, or by judgment, order, or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction of the State of Virginia against the party of the first part, not appealed from, superseded or stayed, the party of the second part shall, upon the application of any person to whom the liability is due, proceed to sell at auction such an amount of the aforesaid securities as will pay the sum due and the expense of sale, and out of the proceeds of sale pay said sum and expenses.

* * * * * *

8. The party of the second part further agrees that the said securities will not be taken beyond the boundaries of this State, and will not be turned over to the party of the first part without the consent of the State Corporation Commission of Virginia.

Code of 1937—Annotated—Chapter 33, Article 9 (Annuity Contracts).

SECTION 3446 (SEC. 1). License from Insurance Commissioner Prerequisite to Engaging in Business.—No person, association or corporation shall engage in the business of soliciting or receiving deposits or payments on any annuity contract or certificate or annuity bond in fixed and stipulated installments, within this State, without first having obtained from the insurance commissioner a license to do business in this State: * * *

SECTION 3448 (SEC. 3). Deposits to be Made with the Treasurer.—Before a license to transact business in this State shall be issued by the insurance commissioner to any person, association, or corporation within the purview of section one (§ 3446) of this article, the insurance commissioner shall require the applicant to deposit with the state treasurer (in accordance with article five, chapter twelve of this code), in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders, bonds of the state of West Virginia, or such other bonds, and securities including bonds issued by the West Virginia bridge commission as may be approved by said insurance commissioner, or both, to the aggregate amount of one hundred thousand dollars, and, in addition to such deposit, such person, association or corporation shall maintain at all times a deposit with the state treasurer of bonds and securities approved by the insurance commissioner to an amount equal to the total amount which such person, association or corporation may be liable to pay in cash to the holders of all contracts under the terms thereof at the time of the deposit: Provided, That when, by the laws of any other state, any such person, association or corporation shall have been required to make and shall have made such deposit in such state, equal or greater in amount for the benefit of contract holders in such state, upon the filing of a certificate to such effect from the proper officer in such state with the insurance commissioner of this State, such person, association or corporation shall not be required to make such deposit with the treasurer of this State for the benefit of its contract holders in such other state; and when the laws of any other state require such deposit less in amount, such person, association or corporation shall file a certificate from the proper officer in such state with the insurance commissioner of this State showing the amount of the deposit made, and shall deposit with the treasurer of this State an amount which, together with the deposit made in such other state, shall make up the total amount required by this State to be deposited by such person, association or corporation, and such contract holders in such other state shall not be entitled to the benefit of the securities deposited with the treasurer of this State under this article, except so much of such deposit as may be made to complete the total amount required by this article where the law of any other state requires a lesser amount.

The insurance commissioner may require an independent appraisal, at the expense of the company, of any property on which it holds a mortgage or trust deed or any bond or other investment offered by such company for the purpose of complying with the deposit provisions of this article.

SECTION 3450 (SEC. 5). Revocation of License on Failure to Make Additional Deposits or Insufficiency of Assets.—On the failure of such person, association or corporation to deposit such additional bonds and securities with the state treasurer when so required by the insurance commissioner, the license to do business in this State shall be revoked by the insurance commissioner. Whenever the insurance commissioner, upon an examination of the affairs of any such person, association or corporation, finds that the liabilities of such person, association or corporation exceed the assets thereof, the insurance commissioner shall suspend the license of such person, association or corporation until he is satisfied that the assets of such person, association or corporation are increased to exceed such liabilities.

SECTION 3455 (SEC. 10). Authority of Insurance Commissioner; Control of Deposit Where License Revoked.—The insurance commissioner shall have the same authority over every person, association, or corporation engaged in selling annuity contracts, certificates, or bonds, as over insurance companies, and if in his opinion the assets are impaired or such person, association or corporation is not complying with the law, said commissioner shall have authority to revoke the license of such person, association, or corporation to do business in this State, and, if such license is so revoked, the deposit or a sufficient amount of same, shall remain under the authority and control of the insurance commissioner until the total liability of all the contracts, certificates or annuity bonds or contracts issued by such person, association or corporation in this State is redeemed or settled.

SECTION 3325 (1) (SEC. 45). Proceedings in Circuit Court of Kanawha County Against Insolvent Company.—Whenever any company under the supervision and regulation of the insurance commissioner shall become insolvent or shall be in such financial condition as not to be able to pay its creditors in this State, the commissioner of insurance may file a bill in the circuit court of Kanawha county for the administering of the assets of such company as an insolvent, and for the purpose of taking possession of its property in this State and the distribution of its assets among those entitled thereto according to their respective right.

Note: Article 9, Chapter 33 of the Code of West Virginia was repealed by Acts of West Virginia 1941, Chapter 46, March 8, 1941, in effect ninety days thereafter, and a new statute regulating face-amount certificate companies was enacted (W. Va. Code, c. 32, art. 3). Fidelity never qualified under this statute.

WISCONSIN

Statutes, Chapter 216, Investment Associations

216.01 Regulation.—No person and no copartnership, association or corporation, whether local or foreign, heretofore organized or which may hereafter be organized, doing business as a so-called investment, loan, benefit, co-operative, home, trust or guarantee company, for the licensing, control and management of which there is no law now in force in this state, and which such person, copartnership, association or corporation, shall solicit payments to be made to himself or itself either in a lump sum, or periodically, or on the instalment plan, issuing therefor so-called bonds, shares, coupons, certificates of membership or other evidences of obligation or agreement, or pretended agreement to return to the holder or owners thereof money or anything of value at some future date, shall solicit or transact any business in this state unless such person, copartnership, association or corporation, shall have first complied with all the provisions prescribed in chapter 215 of the statutes required of foreign building and loan associations authorized to do business in this state.

216.02. Laws applicable.—All provisions of said chapter 215 with respect to the supervision, control and conditions upon which foreign building and loan associations are permitted to do business in this state are hereby made applicable to and imposed upon persons, copartnerships, associations or corporations described in the first section of this act, the same as though they were foreign building and loan associations under said act, so far as such supervision, control and conditions can be made applicable to the particular business done by such persons, copartnerships, associations or corporations.

Chapter 215, Building and Loan Associations

215.38. Deposit.—No foreign building and loan association * * * shall issue its shares, receive moneys or transact any business in this state unless such association shall have and keep on deposit with the state treasurer, in trust for the benefit and security of all its members in this state, five hundred thousand dollars to be held in trust as aforesaid until all shares of such association held by residents of this state shall have been fully redeemed and paid off and until its contracts and obligations to persons and members residing in this state shall have been fully performed and discharged; the securities comprising such deposit shall first be approved by the banking commission under the same rules and regulations governing the approval of securities of trust company banks; and upon such deposit being made the state treasurer shall issue a certificate therefor, and thereupon the banking commission may issue its certificate of authority to said association to transact business in this state.

215.395. Increase of deposit.—Whenever the commission shall find that the liability of any foreign building and loan association or any foreign investment association on shares or contracts then outstanding or contracted for by members or persons residing in this state, exceeds ninety per cent of the amount of the deposit required by section 215.38 and section 215.39, or exceeds ninety per cent of the amount of the deposit required by such sections and by any order issued under the authority of this section, exclusive in each case, however, of any such liability under any agreement existing, created, regulated or required by the industrial commission under chapter 108 or by any other department, commission or division of state government under any other provision of law, the commission shall issue an order to such association or corporation requiring such association or corporation to deposit within thirty days with the state treasurer, an additional amount in cash or securities of the class mentioned in section 215.39, or such other securities as the commission shall require and approve. If such order is not complied with within thirty days, the commission shall revoke the certificate of authority issued to such association or corporation.

215.33. Possession by banking commission.—(1) Conditions for taking possession.—The banking commission may forthwith take possession and control of the business and property of any association to which this chapter is applicable whenever it shall find that such association:

(a) Is conducting its business contrary to law, or

(b) Has violated its charter, or any law, or

(c) Is conducting its busineess in an unauthorized or unsafe manner, or

(d) Is in an unsound or unsafe condition to transact its business, or

(e) Has an impairment of its capital, or

(f) Cannot with safety and expediency continue business, or

(g) Has suspended payment of its obligations, or

(h) Has neglected or refused to comply with the terms of a duly issued order of the commission, or

(i) Has refused to submit its books, papers, records or affairs for inspection to any examiner, or

(j) Has refused to be examined upon oath regarding its affairs.

(2) Procedure on taking possession.—Upon taking possession of the business and property of any such association the banking commission shall forthwith:

(a) Serve a notice in writing upon the president and secretary of said association, setting forth therein that it has taken possession and control of the business and property of said association. Said notice shall be executed in duplicate, and immediately after the same has been served, one of the said notices shall be filed with the clerk of the circuit court of the county where said association is located, together with proof of service.

(b) Give notice to all individuals, partnerships, corporations and associations known to the banking commission to be holding or in possession of any assets of such association.

(c) The banking commission may appoint one or more special deputy commissioners as agent or agents to assist in the duty of liquidation and distribution of the assets of one or more building and loan associations of whose business and property the banking commission shall have taken possession pursuant to the provisions of this chapter. * * *

(d) Upon taking possession of the property and business of such building and loan association, the special deputy commissioner of banking is authorized to collect all moneys due to such building and loan association, and do such other acts as are necessary to conserve its assets and business, and shall proceed to liquidate the affairs thereof as hereinafter provided. He shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and upon a petition approved by the banking commission and upon order of the circuit court of the county in which such association is located, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, or do any act or execute any other necessary instruments and upon like petition and order may sell all the real and personal property of such building and loan association on such terms as the court shall approve. Such special deputy commissioner may, if necessary, enforce individual liability of the stockholders to pay the debts of such corporation.

(3) Notice, allowance and payment of claims.—[This section provides for notice by advertisement to all persons holding claims to present them to the special deputy commissioner of banking and making legal proof thereof, etc. There is a provision for notice by mail as well.]

(4) Inventory of assets and statement of liabilities. * * *

(5) Adjustment of loans and withdrawal value of shares.—[This section provides that the banking commissioner may fix the value of all shares subject to the approval of the circuit court of the county in which the association is located. It likewise provides for appeal by any shareholder to the Supreme Court.]

(10) Appeal.—[This section permits the association to apply to the circuit court of Dane County to enjoin further proceedings by the banking commission. A hearing in reference to the matter is provided for.]

(11) Reinstatement.—Whenever the banking commission shall have taken over the possession and control of the business and property of any building and loan association, the same may resume business when and if:

(a) The owners of at least two-thirds of such association's dollar value of outstanding shares, execute a petition to such effect, the form of which shall be prescribed by the banking commission, and

(b) There is submitted to the banking commission by such shareholders or a committee duly selected by them, a plan for the reorganization and reinstatement of such association, and

(c) The banking commission recommends that control of the business and property of such association be returned to the shareholders, and

(d) The court in which such liquidation is pending, upon application of the banking commission, makes an order approving the banking commission recommendations, which order shall contain a finding that such association will be in a safe and sound condition when control is resumed by the shareholders.

(12) Reinstatement Upon Restricted Basis. Such building and loan association may also resume business upon a restricted basis, and upon such limitations and conditions as may be prescribed by the banking commission when approved by the circuit court in and for the county in which such building and loan association is located, upon application of the banking commission. Such restrictions and conditions may include, among others, a prohibition against the selling of new shares, reasonable restrictions upon withdrawals and the payment of other liabilities. Such association shall thereupon be relieved from the control and supervision of the banking commission as provided in this section, but nothing herein shall, in any manner, prohibit the banking commission from again proceeding against such association as provided herein.

REPLY BRIEF FOR THE SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

INTRODUCTORY

In our principal brief we argued that the District Court properly approved the Debtor's petition and that the Circuit Court of Appeals committed error in reversing that determination, because the interests of creditors would best be subserved by administration of the assets under Chapter X. This brief is devoted to replying to the contention that the courts below cannot administer the assets held by state representatives.

That contention is made in various forms in the briefs of the Wisconsin, Iowa, Maryland, and West Virginia respondents and in the brief filed by representatives of 17 states as amici curiae. It was not passed on by the court below.

In summary, our position is as follows:

We do not contend that the rights created by the state deposits are destroyed or entirely superseded by the reorganization proceedings. We expressly concede that the state deposit laws are valid. We expressly concede that the rights created thereunder must be recognized and protected in the reorganization under the rule of Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., Ltd., 308 U. S. 106, and Consolidated Rock Products Co. v. DuBois, 312 U. S. 510.[1]

The District Court recognized that rights created under the state deposit statutes should be preserved. The court said (R. 487):

> I have been able to see nothing in the petition which says that any vested rights of any contractholders are to be modified or need to be modified. My understanding of the allegation of the petition is that the contracts, the executory contracts of the company, contain provisions that the company cannot meet, and that in order > for any reorganization those executory contract provisions must be modified; but certainly there is no indication there that any vested rights in any deposits are going to be affected at all, and the Court would not permit that if there was any such thing contemplated. * * *

[1] Compare In re Rosett, 204 Fed. 431 (C. C. A. 2), where the State Comptroller of New York was required to surrender a deposit to the bankruptcy court but the preferences created under state law were recognized in bankruptcy.

We do contend that the property on deposit remains the property of Fidelity, and that the remedies provided under the state deposit statutes for realization on the deposit are superseded by the bankruptcy power exercised under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. Neither the Tenth nor the Eleventh Amendment precludes resort to the remedial procedures provided under the Bankruptcy Act in lieu of the remedies provided by state statutes or by contract.

A. THE DEPOSITED PROPERTY REMAINS FIDELITY'S PROPERTY OVER WHICH THE DISTRICT COURT HAS JURISDICTION

1. The assets on deposit with the state officials are Fidelity's assets. The state statutes vary in form, but there cannot, we submit, be any doubt that the deposits are for security purposes. The deposits are not themselves payments which reduce liability on the contracts, and upon full compliance with its contracts in any state Fidelity is entitled to a return of the deposit made in that state. In these circumstances, the deposits are Fidelity's assets, deposited by way of pledge or mortgage, and this is so whether or not title to the deposited securities has been assigned.

To illustrate: In the domiciliary state of West Virginia (which holds about half of all the deposits), the statute (W. Va. Code, Ch. 33, Art. 9, sec. 3 [2]) requires the amount specified to be deposited "in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders." The purpose of this deposit is indicated by two other sections which empower the Insurance Commissioner (1) to revoke the license of the company and retain control of the deposit or a sufficient amount thereof until the total liability on all contracts issued by such company in this state is redeemed or settled (W. Va. Code, Ch. 33, Art. 9, sec. 10); and (2) to file a bill for the administration of its assets, for the purpose of taking possession of its property in this state, and for the distribution of its assets among those entitled thereto according to their respective rights (W. Va. Code, Ch. 33, Art. 2, sec. 45). Sims v. Homeseekers Fire Ins. Co., 117 W. Va. 84, 183 S. E. 869 (1936).

These are the Insurance Commissioner's only alternatives in dealing with the deposited property upon insolvency of the company. The statutes give him no authority like that possessed by the sinking fund custodian in Warder v. Brady,

[2] The Tennessee, Wisconsin, and other statutes are similar. All statutes cited are set out in the appendices to our main brief.

115 F. (2d) 89 (C. C. A. 4), on which respondents rely.[1]

In the Brady case, when the company made a payment into the sinking fund, the payment reduced pro tanto the company's indebtedness to its bondholders. The deposit was accepted as payment. Hence, the court in that case found that a payment of money into the sinking fund "amounted to an appropriation [thereof] * * * to the purpose specified, so that the corporation parted with all title thereto." The deposit of property by Fidelity had no such effect, and it is that fact which distinguishes this case from the case of Warder v. Brady. Fidelity remained personally liable in the full amount of its contracts, and its contract holders looked to it as their primary source of payment. Obviously, it could not plead the value of its deposit as partial payment in a suit by a contract holder. In fact, Fidelity has always paid its contract holders directly and they have never had recourse to the fund. Had Fidelity completely paid its contract holders, it would have been entitled to a return of the deposited property. Certainly, any surplus would be neither the property of the state of West Virginia nor that of its officials; nor would it (as respondents have suggested, W. Va. Brief below, p. 61), be divided among contract holders whose contractual claims had been fully paid because that would be contrary to the explicit provisions of the statute and the contracts. In short, the property deposited is, at most, collateral security for the claims of contract holders and the deposit did not divest the company of its interest in the property. Cf. United States v. Knott, 298 U. S. 544, 550.

[1] In re Prudence Co., Inc., 82 F. (2d) 755 (C. C. A. 2), certiorari denied, 298 U. S. 685 (Md. Brief, p. 29), clearly rests on the fact that The Prudence Company, Inc., the debtor, was only the guarantor of the obligation for which the securities sought to be administered were pledged. The decision does not support the contention that collateral may not be administered in reorganization proceedings involving the corporation which is the primary obligor. This is shown by the fact that the court cited with approval In re Prudence Bonds Corp., 79 F. (2d) 205, where it was held that the collateral could be administered in the reorganization of the principal obligor.

In Maryland the statute goes beyond the West Virginia and other statutes, but there is no difference in legal effect. Section 222 of Article 48A of the Annotated Code of Maryland (1939 ed.) requires that the company "shall have assigned to and deposited (securities) with the Commissioner * * * in trust, as security for all the holders of contracts * * * bonds * * * or other securities * * *." The provision for assignment does not change the fact that the deposited securities remain property of Fidelity deposited to secure its obligations. Legal title frequently passes in pledges. And it is customary in real estate mortgage indentures to "convey, bargain, sell, assign * * *" the property to a trustee. There, as under the Maryland statute, the grantor is a residuary beneficiary of the trust. But clearly in such cases the property remains that of the grantor, subject to administration in its reorganization proceedings.

This was recognized in In re Bajardi, 8 F. (2d) 551 (S. D. N. Y.), affirmed, 9 F. (2d) 797 (C. C. A. 2). The statute there, in language like that in the Maryland Act, required every private banker to "transfer and assign to the superintendent of banks registered stocks or bonds * * *. Such stocks or bonds shall be registered in the name of the superintendent of banks officially as trustee for the depositors with such private banker * * *." See 9 F.(2d) 797. The statute involved in the Bajardi case further provided:

> Such stocks or bonds shall be registered in the name of the superintendent of banks officially as trustee for the depositors with such private banker, subject to sale and transfer and disposal of the proceeds thereof by the superintendent only upon the order of a court of competent jurisdiction * * *.

This is again similar to Section 224 of the Maryland statute, which provides:

> All deposits * * * shall be held by said Commissioner subject to sale and transfer and to the application of the proceeds of any such sale only on the order of a court of competent jurisdiction.

The district court in the Bajardi case held that the bankruptcy court in the administration of the assets was a "court of competent jurisdiction" with power, under the statute, to direct the Superintendent in the administration of the assets. The circuit court of appeals, despite the fact that the securities deposited with the Superintendent of Banks were registered in his name, recognized that they belonged to the bankrupt and summarily required their surrender to the bankruptcy court. It said (p. 799):

> The very purposes for which the deposit is required by the statute are sufficient to show that the stocks, etc., were regarded by the Legislature as the property of the banker for the payment of his debts to a specified class of creditors. [Italics supplied.]

2. The mere existence of the lien or other specific interest of the contract holders in the deposits does not preclude the exercise of jurisdiction over them by the court in reorganization proceedings under Chapter X. Even in "straight" bankruptcy proceedings, property pledged or mortgaged by the Debtor to secure its obligations is subject to the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court. Isaacs v. Hobbs Tie & Timber Co., 282 U. S. 734; In re Schulte United, Inc., 49 F. (2d) 264 (C. C. A. 2). But in "straight" bankruptcy, liens cannot be affected, and accordingly property held by a mortgagee or pledgee or receiver cannot be drawn into the possession of the bankruptcy court, except in circumstances not now material. In reorganization proceedings under Section 77B and Chapter X, the court's powers over such property are much broader. Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Co. v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co., 294 U. S. 648; Warder v. Brady, 115 F. (2d) 89 (C. C. A. 4); In re Prudence Bonds Corp., 55 F. (2d) 262 (C. C. A. 2); In re Prudence Bonds Corp., 77 F. (2d) 328 (C. C. A. 2). As the court below said in Warder v. Brady (p. 95):

> The bankruptcy court in reorganization proceedings under § 77B, 11 U. S. C. A., § 207, had, and under Ch. X of the 1938 Act now has a wider control, that comprehends not only property of the debtor in his actual or constructive possession, but also property of the debtor in the hands of lien holders. The formulation of a plan of reorganization contemplates a readjustment of secured as well as unsecured debts, and so the summary power of the court extends to all of the debtor's property that can be affected by a plan, whether or not the property is in his possession. * * *

The jurisdiction exercised by the district court is precisely that which the court in In re Prudence-Bonds Corp., 77 F. (2d) 328 (C. C. A. 2), described as proper (p. 330):

> The court of reorganization can bring within its jurisdiction property covered by mortgage or pledge, when a plan covering it has been adopted and confirmed. And prior thereto, property held by a pledgee, in which the debtor has an equity, is likewise within the court's jurisdiction, so as to prevent a disposition by foreclosure of the pledge or mortgage. For the purpose of reorganization, the court should take complete charge of property in order that it may from the beginning, and through all the intermediate steps of reorganization, so administer the property as to achieve the desired rehabilitation.

3. The fact that Fidelity is insolvent, and that the deposits are insufficient to pay the claims which they secure, does not destroy Fidelity's interest therein. Inadequacy of the deposit does not, without appropriate legal proceedings, act as a strict foreclosure or otherwise operate to divest Fidelity of its interest in the property. Moreover, insolvency does not alter the status of the property as collateral security for the debtor's personal obligations to its contract holders.[4]

4. Respondents are subject to summary orders of the district court with regard to property in their possession, because they are not adverse claimants. The mere assertion of an adverse claim does not oust the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy

[4] See In re Prudence Bonds Corp., 79 F. (2d) 205, 209 (C. C. A. 2), where the argument was rejected that when the debtor became insolvent, it lost all interest in the deposit and that the deposited collateral could not be reorganized as part of its property.

court unless the claim is colorable. Harrison v. Chamberlin, 271 U. S. 191; Warder v. Brady, 115 F. (2d) 89 (C. C. A. 4).

We submit that here there can be no more than a "mere assertion" of an adverse claim, "so unsubstantial and obviously insufficient * * * in law, as to be plainly without merit," and accordingly, the district court could properly "dispose of it summarily." Warder v. Brady, supra, at p. 92.

In Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Co. v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co., 294 U. S. 648, this Court rejected the contention that an order enjoining pledgees from selling collateral in their hands, pending the preparation and consummation of a reorganization plan, could not be entered summarily, saying (p. 681):

> * * * The bonds deposited as collateral were not in the hands of purchasers, but in the hands of creditors as security. That the equity which the debtor retained was a property interest, was not and could not be disputed by the creditors; nor was the claim of the creditors in respect of their rights in the collateral security or the rank of their liens questioned by the debtor. In short, no adverse claim was brought forward by either of the parties to the controversy. * * *

Assertions that state officials like the respondents are adverse claimants have been overruled even in cases where title was held to have vested in the state officials. In re Bajardi, 8 F. (2d) 551 (S. D.

N. Y.), affirmed 9 F. (2d) 797 (C. C. A. 2) supra, pp. 7–8; Gamble v. Daniel, 39 F. (2d) 447 (C. C. A. 8).

In Gamble v. Daniel, it was argued that the Department of Trade and Commerce of Nebraska, which had taken possession of a bankrupt trust company for liquidation, was an adverse claimant to the bankruptcy court. The court overruled the contention, holding that the Department was in the position of an assignee for creditors, and as such was subject to a summary order. It said (pp. 453–454):

> There is no dispute as to the character of the possession here. Appellant claims no right in himself in this property. He claims as the agent of the department of trade and commerce. The possession is only under the statutes of Nebraska * * *. This is purely a liquidating statute. The possession of appellant is alleged to be and is only as a "liquidating agent" under such statute. Such statute is analogous, in purpose and effect, to state statutes governing assignments for the benefit of creditors. For the matter here involved, the possession of appellant is entirely analogous to that of an assignee for the benefit of creditors under state law. It has been directly determined that such assignee is not an "adverse" holder and may be required, by summary order, to turn over property so held to the bankruptcy official. * * * [Citing cases, italics supplied.]

In Hobbs v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 87 F. (2d) 380 (C. C. A. 10), a federal court having jurisdiction over the equity receivership of an insurance company approved a reinsurance contract and summarily ordered the Commissioner of Insurance of Kansas to deliver a deposit (held in the custody of the state treasurer) to the reinsuring corporation.

The court on appeal by the Commissioner, rejected his contention that a plenary suit was necessary. It said (p. 384):

> * * * Where property is held by a third person, that is one not a party to the action and he makes a claim of right or title in himself or on behalf of some other person not a party, and such claim is adverse to that of the receiver, a plenary suit is necessary to recover possession. But the commissioner does not advance a claim of that kind. He puts forward a right of possession as trustee for persons who are bound by the proceedings taken in this action. An independent suit is not required in these circumstances. His claimed right of possession may be determined in summary manner in this case. * * *

The Maryland brief (pp. 36-37) seeks to distinguish the Hobbs case on the ground that there the court had approved a reinsurance agreement which bound all unpaid beneficiaries of the deposit, so that the purpose of the deposit had been fulfilled. But in this case any plan confirmed will similarly bind all beneficiaries of the state deposits;[8] the state officials have no interest of their beneficiaries to protect which will not be protected by the reorganization court.[9]

---

[8] On this question Miles v. New South Building and Loan Association, 95 Fed. 919 (C. C., N. D. Ga., 1899), cited in the Hobbs case, is in point. That case involved a receivership in which the trustee of a collateral bond issue was summarily ordered to surrender the collateral to the court. The trustee objected that it was an adverse claimant. The court held (pp. 921–922):

"* * * There seems to be no good reason why persons in possession of the assets of the corporation cannot be brought before the court by summary petition, and, if they admit the possession, and show no beneficial claim or title in themselves, be required to surrender such assets to the receiver. The Company [the trustee] claims no ownership in the assets. Its claim is as trustee for others. The main suit is to settle an insolvent corporation, and the rights of all of the beneficiaries in the trust represented by the Company can be fully protected by the court in the case in which the receiver was appointed. * * * The proceeds of the collection by the receiver of these claims will be held as a separate fund, subject to the same trusts that were impressed on the claims by the contracts under which they were held by the Company. The Company will not only be protected by the order of the court to surrender the assets, but will also be protected by subsequent orders applying the funds arising from the claims in strict conformity to the trusts under which the claims have been held by the Company." [Italics supplied.]

[9] The circumstance pointed out in the text also answers another argument suggested in the Maryland brief (p. 40, n.), that Fidelity's contracts with the state authorities are "contracts in the public authority," which the bankruptcy court may not reject under Sections 116 (1) and 216 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. 516 (1) and 616 (4)). As the Maryland respondent admitted below, these provisions

B. NEITHER THE ELEVENTH NOR THE TENTH AMENDMENTS BAR THESE PROCEEDINGS IN RESPECT OF STATE DEPOSITS

1. The circumstance that the assets held as security in this case are held by state officials does not raise the Eleventh Amendment as a bar to the usual powers of the reorganization court to deal with these assets under the plan and to enjoin their disposition pending the proceedings.

Under the Eleventh Amendment the courts may not entertain a suit against a state; the respondents assert no personal claim to Fidelity's assets deposited with them, but claim rights there-were intended to deal with situations such as those involving contracts between a public utility and a state for the delivery of electric power, not situations like the present where the public authority appears as creditor or trustee for creditors. This is shown by the reorganization cases in which securities held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have been dealt with under plans of reorganization. See for instance, Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Co. v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co., 294 U. S. 648; In re East Boston Coal Co., 30 F. Supp. 811 (M. D. Pa.).

Even if these provisions were applicable, this proceeding will involve no disaffirmance or rejection of the alleged contract with the Maryland Commissioner. Since the bankruptcy court undoubtedly has power to modify the claims of contract holders, and since, concededly, the Maryland Commissioner holds only for the benefit of contract holders, the bankruptcy court under the plan can satisfy the claims for whose satisfaction the Maryland Commissioner allegedly holds the securities. Surrender of the deposit to the court which can adjust rights in the underlying claims can in no event be considered a violation of the conditions of the alleged contract.

to only as agents of the States. But these factors do not bring the case under the Eleventh Amendment. This Court has uniformly recognized that when an individual is sued for the recovery of property and his jurisdiction for its retention rests on a claim asserted under state authority, he may not cut the suit short in limine by claiming immunity under the Eleventh Amendment; the suit may be maintained against his as an individual and his asserted claim of right under authority of his principal, the State, must be tried on the merits. Thus, this Court held in In re Ayers, 123 U. S. 443, 501, quoting from Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 288:

> A defendant sued as a wrong-doer, who seeks to substitute the State in his place, or to justify by the authority of the State, or to defend on the ground that the State has adopted his act and exonerated him, cannot rest on the bare assertion of his defense. He is bound to establish it. * * *

The application of this principle is not limited to situations where the defendant is a "wrong-doer" in the sense that he is a malefactor. The principle is applicable whenever it is claimed that the defendant is acting without authority either because the governmental title upon which he relies is invalid, or because a state statute is unconstitutional, or because—as we shall show is true in this case—the state statute is superseded by paramount federal legislation.

The leading case is United States v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196.[1] Suit was begun in a Virginia state court against defendants Kaufman and Strong to recover possession of land used as part of Arlington National Cemetery. The case was removed to the federal court. The United States moved to dismiss the proceedings for lack of jurisdiction on the ground that the defendants held only as agents and officers of the United States. A demurrer to the motion was sustained and Kaufman and Stron appealed. This Court held that the defendants' assertion of a claim as agents of the United States entitled them to no immunity from suit. It declared:

> This examination of the cases in this court establishes clearly this result: that the proposition that when an individual is sued in regard to property which he holds as officer or agent of the United States, his possession cannot be disturbed when that fact is brought to the attention of the court, has been overruled and denied in every case where it has been necessary to decide it, and that in many others where the record shows that the case as tried below actually and clearly presented that defence, it was neither urged by counsel nor considered by the court here * * *" (106 U. S. at 215–216).

[1] That case involved an attempt to defeat a suit by pleading the immunity of the United States from suit, but the principle applies as well to claims based on the immunity of states under the Eleventh Amendment. Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U. S. 204, infra, p. 18.

Significantly, the Court quoted with approval Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall. 203, as follows:

> Making a State officer a party does not make the State a party, although her law may have prompted his action, and the State may stand behind him as a real party in interest (106 U. S. at 215). [Italics by the Court.]

United States v. Lee has never been questioned.* On nearly identical facts, but where the title asserted was on behalf of a state and the contention was under the Eleventh Amendment, the Lee case was followed in Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U. S. 204, 221, and it was stated that the "settled doctrine" of this Court rejects the argument that a suit to recover possession of property "is a suit against the State simply because the defendant holding possession happens to be an officer of the State and asserts that he is lawfully in possession on its behalf." See also Ickes v. Fox, 300 U. S. 82, 96; In re Tyler, 149 U. S. 164; Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick Railroad Co., 109 U. S. 446; Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270; Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123; Correa v. Barbour, 71 F. (2d) 9 (C. C. A. 1); Uebersee Finanz-Korporation Aktien Gesellschaft v. Rosen, 83 F. (2d) 225 (C. C. A. 2).

In the instant case appellants hold property which is asserted to belong to the Debtor, and to which the trustee in bankruptcy of the Debtor

* No case can be cited to undermine the authority of United States v. Lee and Tindal v. Wesley. There are, of course, claims the right of possession. They are sued as individuals in possession of this property. To justify their retention of this property as against the Debtor's trustee, they rely upon authority conferred by the state in exactly the same manner as did the officers of the United States in the Lee case and of South Carolina in the Wesley case. Unless that authority does in fact justify their conduct, respondents may not withhold the Debtor's property from the Debtor's trustee.

We submit that the state authority cannot justify respondents in withholding the property from the Debtor's trustee. The paramount jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court overrides the state statutes insofar as those statutes purport to permit state officers to retain the deposits and administer the assets, just as the bankruptcy power overrides the cases where the bar of the Eleventh Amendment was held to operate, but all of those which even remotely resemble the present case are cases in which the purpose of the suit was to compel compliance by the state with its own contract. Thus, in Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S. 52, and In re Ayers, 123 U. S. 443, the suits sought to compel the states to accept their bond interest coupons in payment of taxes, as the states had agreed to do. So in Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick Railroad Co., 109 U. S. 446, the suit was to foreclose a mortgage on property owned by the state and the state was personally liable on its guarantee of the bonds secured by the mortgage. In Lankford v. Platte Iron Works, 235 U. S. 461, and Farish v. State Banking Board, 235 U. S. 498, the state had guaranteed bank deposits, just as the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation does now; and the fund, like F. D. I. C. assessments, was designed to discharge the state's direct liability.

powers of receivers under foreclosure practice and equity practice and the powers of trustees in possession under mortgage indentures. Cf. Chicago Title & Trust Co. v. 4136 Wilcox Bldg. Corp., 302 U. S. 120; International Shoe Company v. Pinkus, 278 U. S. 261; Stellwagen v. Clum, 245 U. S. 605; Globe Bank v. Martin, 236 U. S. 288; Tua v. Carriere et al., 117 U. S. 201; In re Klein, 1 How. at 277; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 212; Hammond v. Lyon Realty Company, 59 F. (2d) 592 (C. C. A. 4); In re Bankshares Corporation of The United States, 50 F. (2d) 94 (C. C. A. 2); Albert Pick & Company v. Wilson, 19 F. (2d) 18 (C. C. A. 8).

In closely related situations the lower federal courts have so held. In re Bajardi, 8 F. (2d) 551 (S. D. N. Y.) involved the bankruptcy of certain private bankers. Pursuant to the Banking Law of New York they had deposited with the Superintendent of Banks an amount equal to 10% of their total deposits, subject to sale and disposition of the holdings by the Superintendent on order of a court of competent jurisdiction. The district court held that the Superintendent was required to deliver the assets to the bankruptcy trustee. It said:

> Jurisdiction of the United States court to adjudge private bankers bankrupt and to administer their estates in bankruptcy is not only paramount, but is exclusive, and state laws assuming to confer upon state > officers or courts authority to administer such bankrupt estates are superseded, and must give way when the Bankruptcy Act is properly invoked. * * *

The decision of the District Court was affirmed in In re Bajardi, 9 F. (2d) 797 (C. C. A. 2). The contention was there made that the court below:

> erred in interfering with and assuming jurisdiction over the sovereign right of administration of the said securities imposed by law upon the state of New York through its proper administrative officer (p. 798).

The circuit court of appeals rejected this argument, but ultimately placed its holding on the ground that the state statute was not intended to conflict with the Bankruptcy Act (p. 799):

> It would require very strong language to compel belief that the state Legislature intended to invite conflict with the constitutional prerogative of the United States in respect of bankruptcies, and to inflict upon the creditors of an insolvent, or any class of them, the useless expenses of a double administration. * * *

Accordingly, the Superintendent of Banks was directed to surrender the deposit to the bankruptcy trustee. To the same effect is In re Faour, 72 F. (2d) 719 (C. C. A. 2).

The statutes here involved do not evidence any clearer intent to conflict with the bankruptcy power than did the statute considered in the Bajardi case. Therefore, the claims asserted by respondents are not justified by the statutes relied upon when properly construed; but if the statutes be deemed to justify respondents' position, the statutes are superseded by the Bankruptcy Act. On the ground that the state statute had been superseded, it was held in Gamble v. Daniel, 39 F. (2d) 447 (C. C. A. 8) that the Department of Commerce of Nebraska was required to surrender to the bankrutcy court assets of an insolvent trust company which the Department had taken for liquidation.

Similarly pertinent is In re Coney Island Hotel Corp., 9 F. Supp. 329 (E. D. N. Y.). In that case the owner of a hotel (mortgagor under a bond and mortgage) filed a petition under Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act and moved that the Superintendent of Insurance of New York be restrained from proceeding under the New York Schackno Act to recognize the same bond issue. The Superintendent argued that the court could not enjoin him from performing his duties under valid New York statutes and that the Eleventh Amendment prohibited suits against the state and state officials. The court answered these contentions as follows (p. 331):

> * * * the argument advanced ignores the provisions of article 1, § 8, of the Constitution, which empowers Congress to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States. Accordingly, national bankruptcy statutes are paramount to any state statute the effect of which may impair or emasculate them.

Accordingly, as between the Schackno Act and the provisions of section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act, no construction of any powers vested in the state superintendent of insurance by the Schackno Act can impair the congressional mandate. Such duties or privileges pursuant to which the superintendent of insurance acts cannot vitiate the constitutional authority vested in Congress. Stellwagen v. Clum, 245 U. S. 605, 38 S. Ct. 215, 62 L. Ed. 507.*

See also In re Manbeach Realty Corp., 10 F. Supp. 523 (E. D. N. Y.).

We submit, therefore, that on the merits the appellants have no right by virtue of the state law to retain the assets as against the trustee in bankruptcy.

2. For the same reason that the Eleventh Amendment does not bar exercise of bankruptcy jurisdiction over the deposited assets, the Tenth Amendment does not bar such exercise. Since there is a valid exercise of bankruptcy jurisdiction to adjust the rights of security holders, the Tenth Amendment does not operate to preserve the remedies provided by the states for such protection.

* Reversed on other grounds in 76 F. (2d) 126 (C. C. A. 2). The circuit court of appeals expressly refrained from discussing the questions on which the district court decision is cited in the text.

Through 140 years of history, this Court never wavered from its repeated assertion that:

> if the act is within the power confined to Congress, the Tenth Amendment, by its very terms, has no application * * *[10]

For a short period during 1935 and 1936 decisions of this Court took a contrary approach. Its interpretations of the Tenth Amendment in the cases cited cannot, we believe, be reconciled with more recent cases. See Hopkins Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Cleary, 296 U. S. 315; United States v. Butler, 297 U. S. 1; Ashton v. Cameron County Water Improvement District, 298 U. S. 513. Two years after the Ashton case, which involved the bankruptcy power, the Court held in Wright v. Union Central Ins. Co., 304 U. S. 502, 516:

> In view of our decision that the law is within the bankruptcy power, scant reliance can be placed on the Tenth Amendment. * * *

See United States v. Darby, 312 U. S. 100, 123–124; Feller "The Tenth Amendment Retires," 27 A. B. A. J. 223 (1941).[11]

S. 321, 357; Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 197; Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 320; Missouri v. Holland, 252 U. [11] There is no substance to the contention (West Virginia brief, pp. 35–40) that the legislative history of Section 67 (f) of the Bankruptcy Act (amended by Section 29 of

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the property deposited with the states remained property of Fidelity and is subject to reorganization in the district court.

the Investment Company Act of 1940) evidences an intention that the deposits in the hands of State officials be not disturbed. The argument seems to be that since Section 67 (f) expressly requires state deposits to be turned over to the trustee only with respect to securities sold after January 1, 1941, Congress must have intended that securities sold before that date would not be turned over to the trustee. This argument misconceives the nature of the change made by Section 67 (f). As the legislative history set out in the West Virginia brief makes clear, the purpose of the amended Section 67 (f) was to set up the following scheme with respect to deposits on contracts sold after January 1, 1941:

(1) The bankruptcy trustee is to administer the assets deposited with the state depositaries;

(2) The preference created by the deposit in favor of local security holders is to be determined and recognized;

(3) The security holders entitled to the preference are not to share in the general estate until all other creditors have received from the estate the same percentages of their claims as that which the secured creditors receive under the State deposit.

The change which occurred was in the third feature of this scheme. Prior to that time, persons secured by the state deposits would have been entitled to realize on their security and to prove a general claim for the deficiency under Section 57 (h) of the Bankruptcy Act. The deficiency claim would participate as a general claim on the same basis as the claims of other security holders who had larger deficiencies or who had no security at all. For instance, if the deposit in a particular state were equal to 80% of the claims of local creditors, the contract holders would realize 80% of their claims out of the security and would have a 20% claim for the deficiency against the general estate. The 20% deficiency claim would be entitled to share ratably with the 100% general claims of contract holders who were not secured by any deposit.

The purpose of the amendment to Section 67 (f) was to prevent the inequality indicated by the foregoing illustration. The legislative history evidences no Congressional belief that prior to the passage of Section 67 (f), the first two elements of the scheme mentioned did not already exist. There is nothing in the legislative history to show that Congress thought that without the change the bankruptcy court would have no power to take possession from the state officials and to administer the deposited assets while adjudicating and recognizing the rights created under the state deposits. We have shown that that power exists.

STATE OF THE CASE.

The opinions below, jurisdiction, and statutes involved, are fully set forth in the briefs of the parties to the case.

Fidelity Assurance Association, formerly Fidelity Investment Association, a West Virginia corporation, was licensed to do business in the States of Alabama, Delaware, Kansas, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Virginia, as well as other States in the United States. Each of the above named States, by their laws, required that Fidelity make a deposit in that State as a prerequisite to obtaining a license to do business therein, such deposit to be for the benefit of, and the protection of, the contract holders in each such State. Such deposits were made as required by law. In some of these States the deposit was required by the State authorities to be in the form of a trust indenture, with the deposit to be made with a named trustee in the State, usually a bank, and the contract purchasers were the named beneficiaries. In the other States the deposit was made directly with State officials, and is at present held by them as trustees for the benefit of their residents, as required by statute.

As shown by the evidence, the list given below, in Exhibit A attached hereto and made a part hereof, gives the number of contract holders in each of these States, the amount of the deposit made by Fidelity in each of these States and now held therein and the net cash and net reserve liability to contract holders. These States are not respondents in the instant proceedings, but are vitally interested therein, as the sovereign rights of their States and the financial rights and interests of their citizens are directly involved, and they will be bound by the decision of this Court in this case.

The States of California, Louisiana, Nebraska, New York, North Dakota, Oregon, Texas, Washington, and

Utah are not respondents in the case, do not have a deposit of Fidelity, but, as shown in Exhibited B attached hereto and made a part hereof, a number of their residents and citizens in each of those States hold a Fidelity contract with the net cash liability to the contract holders shown.

Each of these last mentioned States has depository laws requiring companies such as was Fidelity, insurance companies, and other foreign corporations of a similar nature, to make a deposit in their State as a prerequisite to obtaining a license to do business therein, for the benefit and protection of their contract holders. Each of said States at the present time has a very substantial deposit from another company which did and does a business very similar to that in which Fidelity was engaged. The deposits of such company are held as a trust fund for the benefit of the contract holders in each of these States.

ARGUMENT.

Each of the above States holding a deposit of Fidelity desires to liquidate that deposit and distribute the proceeds thereof to the contract holders of their respective States lawfully entitled thereto, as determined by an interpretation of the depository laws of their States, by their own respective State Courts in proceedings instituted in compliance with the laws of their respective States.

The said depository States understand that if their deposit is insufficient to pay their contract holders 100%, there are assets on deposit in West Virginia to which their contract holders may look for further reimbursement.

The above named States who do not hold a deposit of Fidelity are advised that the State of West Virginia, under its laws, required a deposit to be made therein for the protection of the contract holders in their States wherein no deposit was required of Fidelity, and are further advised that the contract holders of their States have received proofs of claim from the officials in West Virginia, and that their contract holders have filed their proofs of claim against that fund.

None of the States joining this brief amici curiae have made any protest or objection to the actions and proceedings taken by the Attorney General and officials of the State of West Virginia, and these States are willing and satisfied that the proper officials of the State of West Virginia shall proceed in their proper State Court, as they understand is being done, to liquidate the securities held on deposit in West Virginia, and to distribute the proceeds thereof to those judically found rightfully entitled thereto. These States appearing amicus curiae respect and believe in the honesty and integrity of the State Courts of West Virginia, the officials thereof, the Attorney General of West Virginia, and the duly elected officers of the State of West Virginia, and have no reason to doubt but that they will carry out their required duties in the premises fairly and ably and without partiality or prejudice, to the best of their abilities, as required by the laws of their State and by the decisions of their State Courts.

These States appearing amicus curiae further believe in the honesty and integrity of the Courts, Attorney Generals, and officials of the other States who are respondents in the case at bar, and are fully confident that they also will faithfully and ably and without partiality or prejudice carry out their respective required duties, and that the officials of all of these States will cooperate to mutually work out their interrelated problems.

Specific Reasons for the Filing of this Brief.

Each of the States who are parties to this brief have depository laws applicable to foreign corporations coming into the State to do business, have deposits from many foreign corporations doing various types of business, and are retaining those deposits as trust funds for the protection of the citizens of their States as provided by their respective State laws and the decisions of their State courts thereon.

The Attorney Generals of the respective States who are filing this amici curiae brief understand that the case at bar will determine, among other questions, the question of whether such deposits made in compliance with valid State laws and put in the custody and possession of State officials under those laws can or should be taken from the possession and custody of those officials in the event of insolvency of the depositing company, and be required to be turned over for liquidation to a federal trustee appointed in Chapter X proceedings in bankruptcy; whether the trust lien created by statute or trust indenture in favor of the citizens or residents of such State who have dealt with such corporation can or should be nullified or avoided; whether the depository laws of each of these respective States, in the event of insolvency, should be interpreted by the State Courts of the State which enacted those laws, or by the Federal Courts sitting in bankruptcy in a foreign jurisdiction in Chapter X proceedings.

These respective Attorney Generals are not unmindful of the fact that in the future Congress may see fit or deem it necessary to include insurance companies within the purview of the Bankruptcy Act, in which event the deposits made in each of these respective States, as well as other States of the Union, would be vitally affected by a determination of these questions in the case at bar.

It is the further understanding of those appearing here now as amici curiae that the respondents in the above case, except the Securities and Exchange Commission, adopt and support by their briefs the position that deposits made with States under valid State laws should, in the event of insolvency, remain in the custody and possession of those State officials and be administered and liquidated by them in the State Courts provided by law therefor; that the trust or other liens in favor of the citizens and residents of those States wherein the deposit is made for their benefit cannot and should not be avoided, set aside, or nullified; that interpretations of the depository laws as to which of the respective citizens and residents of each of the respective States should participate in the deposited assets, are questions of State law; and that those and all other interpretations of the depository laws of each of the States must and should be determined by the respective State Courts wherein such legislation was enacted.

As a determination of these questions and the result of this litigation will involve the sovereign rights of the several States appearing amici curiae herein, to require, under their police powers, deposits to be made by foreign corporations coming into the State, for the protection of domestic residents who may do business with such corporations; and will involve the sovereign rights of these States to administer such deposits in the event of insolvency as a part of the internal administration of their State laws; and will involve their sovereign right to have their own State statutes interpreted solely by their own tribunals; and will vitally affect the financial interests of their citizens, therefore these amici curiae States, through their Attorney Generals, adopt and support the above contentions and positions of the respondents in the case at bar, with the exception of the respondent, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and respectfully urge this Court to affirm and sustain the judgment entered below by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in these respects.

These States appearing amici curiae particularly urge this Court to uphold and sustain the following propositions, which are more fully set forth and agrued in the brief of the several respondents:

1. That Congress in enacting Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act did not intend that companies doing the kind of business in which Fidelity was engaged were precluded from being liquidated in State Courts under the laws of the respective States;

2. That required deposits of foreign corporations coming into the several States to do business shall not, in the event of insolvency, be taken from the custody, possession, control and administration of the officials of the States with whom such deposits were required to be made;

3. That such required deposits made in accordance with valid State laws for the benefit of the security purchasers and holders in each of the several States are impressed with a trust lien under the several State laws in favor of the security owners and holders, which under no circumstances can be set aside, nullified or avoided;

4. An interpretation of the depository laws of the several States should be made only in the State Courts of the particular States which enacted that legislation, rather than in a Federal Court sitting in bankruptcy;

5. That in the instant case the deposits made with the several States should be liquidated as expeditiously as possible, yet in an orderly manner, so as to obtain the greatest amount possible for the said securities, and distribution of the proceeds thereof should be made promptly following a determination by the Courts of the several States as to those properly entitled thereto under decisions and interpretations of the respective State laws by those State Courts.

CONCLUSION.

In view of the importance of the decision in this case to the several States of the United States, it is respectfully urged that whatever decision may be made by the Court in the particular circumstances, that it affirm the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals and the position of the respondents in the particulars set out. An adverse decision to the position herein taken would not only vitally adversely affect the interests of the thousands of persons, residents and citizens of these States, who are personally and financially interested in Fidelity, but would do irreparable harm and injury to these amici curiae States, their State laws, and the millions of their citizens who look to these and similar State deposits for the protection of their interests in the many types of financial corporations required to make such deposits.

STATEMENT AMICUS CURIAE IN OPPOSITION TO PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT.

To the Honorable the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

The undersigned representatives of the Legal Departments of their respective States are not parties to the appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals in this case but, having a profound interest in the subject matter thereof, we offer as amicus curiae these suggestions in opposition to the petition for certiorari.

Now come the undersigned and offer opposition to the petition of the Fidelity Assurance Association and Central Trust Company, who did petition this Court for the issuance of a writ of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fourth Circuit to review a decision of that Court heretofore entered on the 16th day of June, 1942, and in which rehearing has been denied by that Court.

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals sought to be reviewed by the petition herein reversed an order of the District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia, entered January 5, 1942, sustaining the petition for reorganization of the Fidelity Assurance Association under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. The order of the District Court held that:

A. The Fidelity was not an insurance company as contemplated by the Bankruptcy Act. (Trans. p. 19).

B. The petition for reorganization was filed in good faith as required by the act. (Trans. p. 34).

And thereupon the trial court by its decree dismissed all petitions and opposition pleadings thereto and directed that securities held by other states be turned over at once to its appointed trustee, and, summarily ordered each state officer having any such securities to immediately comply therewith.

The finding that the Fidelity was not an insurance company was made by the trial court before the record disclosed the abundant evidence which was later discovered by creditors. (Transcript of Record 339 and following). And it was stipulated by the Fidelity that its "total number of Series B Contracts with insurance clause on December 31st, 1940, was 14,626." Trans. pp. 361, 362).

On the question of good faith the trial court reached the conclusion that the petition complied with the degree of good faith required by the Bankruptcy Act. Yet the District Judge in his opinion disclosed his grave doubt as to the good faith of the petition as well as his belief that nothing could be reasonably expected of the Fidelity but a so-called slow liquidation. Some of the expressions of the trial Judge which support the above statement are as follows:

> "It is extremely doubtful whether, in view of unsettled economic conditions and the critical international situation, the Fidelity plan would any longer appeal to a large public; but it is not impossible; and it is not the duty of the court to decide for the public that investors will not or should not buy these contracts in the future." (Trans. p. 28).

"It is not necessary that there be a reasonable prospect for the successful rehabilitation of the Debtor as a going or continuing corporation. It is sufficient if it is shown that the Debtor is in a position to conform to and obtain the benefits of the statute for a slow, beneficial and orderly liquidation." Trans. p. 30).

"The character of Debtor's asets is such that it would be peculiarly beneficial in its case to obtain slow and orderly liquidation, if such should be found to be the only feasible plan." (Trans. p. 31).

The Circuit Court of Appeals, after an examination of the record of the evidence in this case, unanimously found the Fidelity Assurance Association to be an insurance company; also found that the petition for reorganization was not filed in good faith, either in law as prescribed by Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, or in fact.

A brief summary of the policy or contract holders in States where securities have been deposited to protect the citizens under the several State statutes in their investments is as follows:

* Net Liability is determined by deducting loans made to Contract-owners.

Many of the other States are filing authorities upon the two principal questions involved in this case, viz.: (a) Was the petition of the Fidelity Assurance Association filed in good faith as defined in Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act; (b) Is the Fidelity Assurance Association an insurance company as contemplated by the Bankruptcy Act.

We are, therefore, content, in order to avoid copious duplication, to offer brief suggestions to this Court in opposition to the petition in view of the fact that it is our sincere belief that a delay occasioned by a review in this case will not only consume the time of this Court unnecessarily but must inevitably result in the approval of the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals as above stated, as well as considerable loss to both creditors and contract-holders of the Fidelity Assurance Association. Not only will it be detrimental, as above set forth, but will keep out of circulation more than $20,000,000.00 and which should at once be turned back to the many thousand contract-holders.

The statutory laws of the State of Illinois, which give adequate and speedy liquidation of distribution of funds and securities of insolvent insurance companies in Illinois are hereto attached marked Exhibit "A", and made a part of these proceedings.

The State of Illinois has similar laws by which to liquidate and distribute deposited assets in savings companies other than insurance companies.

Similarly the states of Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky have adequate laws for the liquidation and distribution of the funds and securities held for the use and benefit of the contract-holders in the respective States, whether the company be deemed an insurance company or a savings and investment company.

We do not dispute the right of Congress, through its Bankruptcy Act, to confer upon the several Federal District Courts the power of reorganization of corporations, even though its property may be located in many States and embraced with the license of contract-holders. Such proceedings, under the present statute, contemplate a reorganization desired by the creditors and contract-holders not for the sole benefit of the stockholders. The good faith required of a petition by Chapter X has been defined so many times in the authorities submitted by these proceedings that it is unnecessary to argue further that the debtor's original petition offers no benefit or advantage to its creditors. To this date no person has offered any financial guarantee to further its reorganization, and in the light of the record of facts shown in these proceedings it may be safely suggested that no financial aid or guarantees will ever be offered by anyone as an inducement to the creditors to sanction reorganization. The District Court's decree means nothing more than an indefinite term of liquidation with corresponding delays and losses to the policy or contract-holders. On the other hand, if the Circuit Court of Appeals' opinion shall prevail in this case many millions of dollars will find their way back to the many contract-holders and eventually find their way into the War Treasury. The sentiments of the trial court to save harmless so far as might be possible the home institution are commendable, and it may be said, to the credit of the trial judge, that the company concealed from him the fact of its activities which classified it as an insurance company, and such facts did not become conclusively shown until a petition to remand was presented to the Circuit Court of Appeals setting forth the discovery of such evidence. (Trans. p. 339) resulting in the sitpulation as shown on transcript 361-362, where it appears that the Company admitted having written more than fourteen thousand policies.

Whether the Fidelity Assurance Association may be said to be an insurance company or some other kind of savings company, the fact remains that the States holding securities for the protection of their citizens in guarantee made to them by the surety company have laws adequate for speedy and prompt liquidation of such securities, which laws the policy or contract-holders relied upon when they joined the contract. There can, therefore, be no point to induce this Court to push aside the State laws of the several States and take away their securities and center the same in a so-called reorganization by liquidation.

We are aware that it is urged that such proceedings cannot come about except with the consent of the creditors. Sufficient answer to that statement is that the very reason Congress provided certain necessary conditions precedent to reorganization proceedings, the most important of them being that a petition should be filed in good faith, that Congress realized that a debtor must take what he can get; also, that ingennous methods could be speedily manufactured and devised by which creditors may be high-pressured into "consenting" to something called reorganization.

The effect of force as against the State laws for liquidating the securities of insurance companies and other savings corporations deposited under their requirements can only result in hostility on the part of the several States against permitting non-resident corporations to transact business therein, and must eventually germinate into unwise restrictive laws on the part of the several States. The effect of the petition for certiorari, if allowed by this Court, means freezing of great quantities of assets at a time when the same are so badly needed for other purposes and can only operate for the benefit of the stockholders and to the detriment of everybody else.

We therefore respectfully submit that this petition for certiorari should be denied.

then the Director shall report any such case to the Attorney General of this State whose duty it shall be to apply forthwith by petition on relation of the Director in the name of the People of the State of Illinois to the Circuit or Superior Court of the county in which the principal office of such company is located for an order directing such company, upon such notice as the Circuit or Superior Court may prescribe, to show cause why an order to rehabilitate or liquidate the company should not be entered as provided in this article, and for such other relief as the nature of the case and the interests of its policyholders, creditors, members, stockholders or the public may require. Such order to show cause and the service thereof as prescribed in this article shall constitute legal process in lieu of any other process otherwise provided by law.

SEC. 189. INJUNCTION.] The court shall have jurisdiction, at any time after the filing of the petition to issue an injunction restraining such company and its officers, agents, directors, employees and all other persons from transacting any company business or disposing of its property until the further order of the court. The court may issue such other injunctions or enter such other orders as may be deemed necessary to prevent interference with the proceedings, or with the Director's possession and control or title, rights or interests as herein provided or to prevent interference with the conduct of the business by the Director, and may issue such other injunctions or enter such other orders as may be deemed necessary to prevent waste of assets or the obtaining of preferences, judgments, attachments or other like liens or the making of any levy against such company or its property and assets while in the possession and control of the Director.

SEC. 193. DUTIES OF DIRECTOR AS LIQUIDATOR—SALES—NOTICE TO CREDITORS—REINSURANCE.] (1) Upon the entry of an order directing liquidation, the Director shall immediately proceed to liquidate the property, business and affairs of the company. He is hereby authorized to deal with the property and business of the company in his name as Director, or, if the court shall so order, in the name of the company.

(2) He may, subject to the approval of the court, sell or otherwise dispose of the real and personal property, or any part thereof, and sell or compromise all doubtful or uncollectible debts or claims owing to the company including claims based upon an assessment levied against a member or a subscriber of any company issuing assessable policies.

(3) He shall as soon as may be conveniently possible, give notice to all creditors who may have claims against the company, as revealed by the records of the company, to present the same.

(4) In order to preserve so far as possible the rights and interests of the policyholders of the company whose contracts were cancelled by the liquidation order and of such other creditors as may be possible, the Director may solicit a contract or contracts whereby a solvent company or companies will agree to assume in whole, or in part, or upon a modified basis, the liabilities owing to said former policyholders or creditors. If, after a full hearing upon a petition filed by the Director, the court shall find that the Director endeavored to obtain the best contract for the benefit of said parties in interest, and if the said Director shall report to the court that he is ready and willing to enter into a contract and submit a copy thereof to the court, the court shall examine the procedure and acts of the Director, and if the court shall find that the best possible contract in the interests of said parties has been obtained and that it is best for the interests of said parties that said contract be entered into, the court shall by written order approve the acts of the Director and authorize him to execute said contract.

SEC. 197. GROUNDS FOR CONSERVATION OF ASSETS OF FOREIGN OR ALIEN COMPANY.] (1) Whenever any of the grounds for rehabilitation or liquidation of domestic companies specified in clauses (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (j), (k) and (n) of Section 188, arise or exist with reference to any foreign or alien company authorized to transact the business of insurance in this State and having assets in this State, the Director may proceed for the filing of a petition as provided in this article against domestic companies, for an order directing such foreign or alien company to show cause why the Director should not take possession of its assets in this State and conserve such assets for the benefit of its creditors and for such other relief as the nature of the cause and the interests of its policyholders, creditors, members, stockholders or the public may require.

(2) The court shall have jurisdiction to issue injunctions and to enter such other orders as it may deem necessary as is provided in the case of a petition against a domestic company so far as such injunctions or orders may apply to such foreign or alien company. If the court finds that sufficient cause for conservation exists, it shall direct the Director to take possession of the property, business and affairs of the company and to conserve the same.

(3) Upon the entry of such order, the Director shall forthwith take possession of the property, business and affairs of such foreign or alien company, and conserve the same. He shall retain such possession until, on the petition either of the Director by the Attorney General, or of such foreign or alien company, or its receiver or anyone in charge of the property, business and affairs of such foreign or alien company in its domiciliary state or country, the court, after a full hearing, shall find that the ground for such order finding cause for conservation has been removed.

(4) The rights, powers and duties of the Director as such conservator, with reference to the assets of a foreign or alien company shall be ancillary to the rights, powers and duties imposed upon any receiver or other person, if any, in charge of the property, business and affairs of such company in its domiciliary state or country.

APPENDIX B.

The laws of the State of Ohio require companies of the type of Fidelity Assurance Association which do business in that state to make deposits for the benefit and protection of contract holders resident of Ohio. See Sections 698, 699 and 699-1, General Code of Ohio, contained in Appendix B hereof. Ohio has also provided by statute for the liquidation and distribution of such deposits in the event the depositing company fails to carry out its contract. See Section 641, General Code of Ohio, also quoted in Appendix B.

SECTION 641, GENERAL CODE OF OHIO.

If any company, corporation, or association required by law to make a deposit with the superintendent of insurance, or other state officer, to secure the contracts of such company, corporation, or association, or for any other purpose, fails to pay any of its liabilities upon such contracts, or other obligations, according to the terms thereof after the liability thereon has been determined, or if such company, corporation, or association, having ceased to do business within this state, leaves unpaid any such liability or has become insolvent, the attorney general of the state, on behalf of the superintendent of insurance, or such other officer, and upon the application of any person entitled to participate in such deposit, or the proceeds arising therefrom, shall commence a civil action in the court of common pleas of Franklin county, making the company, corporation, or association, a party defendant, to determine the rights of all parties claiming any interest in such deposit, to subject the deposit to the payment or satisfaction of all liabilities and to distribute such fund among the persons entitled thereto.

SECTION 698, GENERAL CODE OF OHIO.

Before doing business in this state, every bond investment company shall deposit with the treasurer of state one hundred thousand dollars in cash or bonds of the United States or of the state of Ohio, or of any county or municipal corporation in Ohio, for the protection of investors in the securities of such company. Such deposit shall be made out of the paid-up capital stock of such bond investment company.

SECTION 699, GENERAL CODE OF OHIO.

The deposit made by a bond investment company with the treasurer of state shall be held as security for all claims of residents of this state against such company, and shall be liable for all judgments and decrees thereon, and subject to the payment of such decrees in the same manner as the property of other non-residents. If such company ceases to do business in this state, the treasurer of state may release securities, in his discretion, retaining sufficient to satisfy all outstanding liabilities.

SECTION 699-1, GENERAL CODE OF OHIO.

In addition to the deposits mentioned in the next two preceding sections, each such company, except those domiciled and holding certificates of authority in this state at the effective date of this act, shall deposit with the supervisor of bond investment companies, securities or assets of the kind and character permitted to be invested in by domestic life insurance companies under the laws of the state of Ohio, in an amount equal to the cash surrender value as defined in such contracts on all contracts entered into on and after the effective date of this act by such companies with persons resident in the state of Ohio, and such bond investment companies are hereby required to maintain such deposits in such amounts as are equal to such contract liabilities.

Before receiving a certificate of authority to do business in this state for the year beginning March 1, 1940, and each year thereafter, each such company, except those domiciled in this state and holding a certificate of authority at the effective date of this act, shall deposit with the supervisor of bond investment companies securities or assets of the kind and character permitted to be invested in by domestic life insurance companies under the laws of the state of Ohio, in an amount equal to the cash surrender value on all contracts entered into prior to the effective date of this act by such companies with persons resident in the state of Ohio, and such companies are hereby required to maintain such deposits in such amounts as are equal to the contract liabilities.

All contracts or applications or subscriptions therefor entered into within the state of Ohio subsequent to March 1, 1940, by any foreign bond investment company holding a certificate of authority under the bond investment act shall contain a statement to the effect that the company maintains a deposit equal in amount to the cash surrender value as defined in said contracts in securities or assets of the kind or character permitted to be invested in by domestic life insurance companies under the laws of the state of Ohio, which deposit is segregated for the protection of contract holders resident in the state of Ohio.

All deposits required under this section shall be held by the supervisor of bond investment companies for the protection and benefit of their contract holders who are residents of Ohio.

If such company ceases to do business in this state, the supervisor of bond investment companies may release such securities or assets, in his discretion, retaining sufficient securities or assets to satisfy all outstanding contractual liabilities to persons resident of this state.

All securities or assets deposited with the supervisor of bond investment companies, hereunder, shall be deposited by said supervisor with the treasurer of state of the state of Ohio or with any federal reserve member bank or trust company approved by the supervisor of bond investment companies having a capital of not less than $1,000,000, the fees for such deposit to be paid by said bond investment company. The treasurer of state or such bank shall not deliver such securities or coupons attached thereto or assets except upon the written order of the supervisor of bond investment companies.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE.

Now come Victor Salkeld, et al., creditors of the Debtor, by Dorr E. Warner and Orlin F. Goudy, their counsel, and move the Court to grant leave to file instanter the following brief as amici curiae.

BRIEF OF AMICI CURIAE.

This brief is filed on behalf of those creditors who have no security for the payment of their claims, or whose claims are insufficiently secured. It supports the petition of the Debtor and the Central Trust Company, Trustee of the Debtor (appointed by the United States District Court), for a writ of certiorari to the United States Circuit of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

The total number of creditors of the Debtor is about eighty-eight thousand, and its liabilities are about $23,500,000. The average claim is about $267.00. The claims fully secured or nearly so aggregate about $10,500,000. The petition for the writ is opposed by officials for four States and individual contract holders located in one State on behalf of said secured creditors.

The claims of creditors whose claims are unsecured or insufficiently secured aggregate about $13,000,000 located in forty-three States, the District of Columbia and foreign countries.

The stockholders have no interest in this proceeding because the Debtor's liabilities exceed its assets.

In the lower courts the Debtor and said Trustee sought to protect the best interests of said unsecured creditors, and in this Court they are now seeking to protect their interests. Said contract holders have had no voice in this proceeding from beginning to the end, except that of the Debtor and the said Trustee and attorneys who are friends of the Court.

If there ever was a case that needed the benefit of efficient representation in the courts this is it. The best interests of said unsecured creditors require that the Debtor and said Trustee represent them in this proceeding to the best of their ability. The Debtor and the Trustee would have been derelict in their duty if they had failed to do so.

Accordingly, there is no warrant whatever for the charge made in a brief of appellee that they have represented contract holders with improper motives.

We respectfully submit that this case is of sufficient importance and public interest to warrant this Court in granting a petition for a writ of certiorari for the purpose of making a final determination of—

1. Whether the District Court correctly applied the law in deciding that the Debtor was not an insurance company within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, or whether the Court of Appeals correctly applied the law in deciding that it was an insurance company within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act.
2. Whether the District Court correctly applied the law in deciding that the petition of the Debtor was filed in good faith, or whether the Court of Appeals correctly applied the law in deciding that said petition was not filed in good faith.

Respectfully submitted,

DORR E. WARNER,
ORLIN F. GOUDY,
Counsel for Amici Curiae.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT.

BRIEF AMICI CURIAE OF VICTOR SALKELD, ET AL., CREDITORS OF THE DEBTOR.

This is a voluntary proceeding of Fidelity Assurance Association, a corporation, herein called Fidelity, for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. The District Court found that Fidelity was not an insurance company, and that its petition was filed in good faith. The Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit found that it was an insurance company and that its petition was not filed in good faith, and directed the District Court to dismiss the proceeding.

Accordingly, the questions presented here are:

1. Is Fidelity an insurance company?
2. Was the petition filed in good faith?

IS FIDELITY AN INSURANCE COMPANY?

On behalf of contract holders, we contend that it is not an insurance company within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. A charter granting it power to do an insurance business is not the sole test of whether or not a corporation is an insurance company. Its susceptibility to the Bankruptcy Act does not depend entirely upon its charter. The business it really transacted, and the business that is to be administered by the Bankruptcy Court may be examined to determine whether it is an insurance company. Its charter is some evidence that it is an insurance company, but its actual activities may be looked into to explain or rebut such evidence. If the insurance business actually transacted is merely incidental to its primary and predominant activities, it is not an insurance company, but if its primary and predominant business is writing insurance then it is an insurance company. Re Supreme Lodge of the Masons' Annuity, 286 Fed. 180 (D. C.); Re Kingston Realty Company, 160 Fed. 445 (2 C. C. A.); Grand Lodge, etc. v. McKee, 95 Fed. 2d 474 (5 C. C. A.).

Congress has recognized that the judicial test of what constitutes an insurance company is sound and reasonable. It has adopted the judicial test as applied to investment companies and proceedings in bankruptcy of face amount certificate companies. Congress has declared an investment company, which includes a face amount certificate company, shall not be classified as an insurance company, unless its primary and predominant business activity is writing insurance. It has enacted a statute declaring that an investment company and a face amount certificate company in bankruptcy proceedings should not be classified as an insurance company unless it was organized as an insurance company, and unless its primary and predominant business activity is the writing of insurance. If writing insurance is merely incidental to its primary business, then it should not be classified as an insurance company. The Investment Company Act of 1940, at the outset, provides:

> "(a) When used in this subchapter and sections 72 (a), last sentence, and 107 (f) of Title II, unless the context otherwise requires—
>
>
> "(17) 'Insurance Company' means a company which is organized as an insurance company, whose primary and predominant business activity is the writing of insurance or the reinsuring of risks underwritten by insurance companies, and which is subject to supervision by the insurance commissioner or a similar official or agency of a State; or any receiver or similar official or any liquidating agent for such a company, in his capacity as such."
> 15 U. S. C. A., par. 80a-2 (a) (17).

The subchapter is on the subject of investment companies, and section 107 (f) of Title II, above referred to, is on the subject of bankruptcy proceedings of face amount certificate companies, both of which are parts of the same act of Congress, i.e., Investment Company Act of 1940; 54 U. S. Statutes at large, Chapter 686, commencing at page 789, and commencing at page 835, respectively.

Having thus defined an insurance company, all other definitions are excluded. The doctrine of expressio unius exclusio alterius applies.

Measured by the test of its business activities, Fidelity is not an insurance company. Its primary and predominant business was selling annuity contracts on the installment plan, and investing the proceeds of the sales. Such insurance as it wrote, even if valid, was merely supplemental to its annuity contract and investment business. (We contend they wrote no valid insurance.)

Fidelity was organized under the laws of West Virginia in 1911, and for a period of over twenty-eight years, ending on December 31, 1940, its activities were exclusively selling its own annuity contracts and investing the proceeds thereof. Prior to December 31, 1940, it did no insurance business whatever of any kind or description. Its charter granted it no power to do any insurance business. Prior to December 31, 1940, it sold 87,999 annuity contracts to purchasers located in forty-eight states, the District of Columbia and foreign countries, that are still outstanding. The face amount of said contracts is over $181,000,000, and the net cash liability of Fidelity under said contracts, as of April 10, 1941, was over $23,000,000, and the value of its assets as of June 6, 1941, was over $21,000,000. Its average liability to each contract holder was under $275.00.

By December 31, 1940, it had sustained losses to such an extent that its capital and surplus was wiped out and it had become insolvent. Its liabilities exceeded its assets. On that date, in order to avoid the requirements of the Investment Company Act enacted by Congress shortly prior thereto, its charter was amended to enable it to do a life insurance business in addition to the annuity contract and investment business. However, it did no valid insurance business after December 31, 1940.

After the charter was amended the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia delivered a license to Fidelity authorizing it to do an insurance business for a period of three months beginning January 1, 1941, and ending April 1, 1941, but at the same time exacted a promise from Fidelity that it would do no insurance business without his permission. It sold no insurance contracts to new customers. However, it made an abortive attempt to do some insurance business with its old customers to whom it had previously sold annuity contracts. Without the permission of the Insurance Commissioner it offered riders to Series B contract holders, to be attached to their annuity contracts, without requiring the payment of any premium by the contract holder. The riders provided that Fidelity should assume certain insurance obligations. Its holders had been previously insured by Lincoln Life Insurance Company in a group policy to whom Fidelity paid the insurance premium. Lincoln Life Insurance Company continued to carry its insurance obligations the same as before. 9,802 contract holders out of 87,999 contracts outstanding accepted the riders.

The Insurance Commissioner refused to deliver a new license after April 1, 1941, and on April 11, 1941, brought an action against Fidelity in the State Court of West Virginia, wherein the State Court appointed a receiver for Fidelity. On June 6, 1941, Fidelity filed a petition to reorganize under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. The District Court found that Fidelity was not an insurance company and filed its petition in good faith and approved it. On appeal, the Court of Appeals found it was an insurance company and its petition was not filed in good faith, and directed the District Court to dismiss it.

It is conceded that Fidelity was not an insurance company prior to December 31, 1940, but it is contended that the 87,999 contract holders were deprived of the benefits of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act because Fidelity was transformed from a face amount certificate company into an insurance company. The transformation took place when its charter was amended authorizing it to do an insurance business, and when it sent out the riders, heretofore described. We contend that the amendment and the riders did not transform Fidelity into an insurance company because its primary and predominant business activity was selling annuity contracts and investing the proceeds thereof. The riders merely supplemented contracts already sold and outstanding in the hands of purchasers. It sold no insurance contracts to old customers, except as above set forth, and sold no insurance contracts of any kind to new customers. The number of riders accepted by old customers was 9,802 out of 87,999 contracts outstanding.

We contend that the riders were not effective because—

1. The license to do an insurance business was delivered conditionally.
2. It had no paid-up capital or surplus security invested.

1. The License to Do an Insurance Business Was Delivered Conditionally.

The Commissioner delivered the license to Fidelity upon the express condition that it should not become effective without his permission. He exacted a promise from Fidelity that it do no insurance business without his consent. He never gave his consent, consequently the license he did deliver never became effective.

2. It Had No Paid-up Capital or Surplus Securely Invested.

The statute of West Virginia prohibits Fidelity doing an insurance business without $200,000 cash capital fully paid up and a like amount of surplus securely invested. On December 31, 1940, and thereafter, it had no cash capital whatever and it had no cash surplus securely invested, and it was insolvent; its liabilities exceeded its assets. Section 3326 (1) West Virginia Code provides:

> "No life insurance company shall be admitted to do business in this state, or shall directly or indirectly enter into contracts of insurance, issue policies, take risks or transact business in this State, unless it has at least two hundred thousand dollars cash capital fully paid up or a like amount of cash surplus, securely invested; Provided that this section shall not apply to fraternal benefit Societies organized in pursuance of the provisions of Art. 8 (Sec. 3411, et seq.) of this chapter."

Accordingly, we respectfully submit that Fidelity was not transformed from a face amount certificate company into an insurance company, and its creditors by the alleged transformation were not deprived of the benefit of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.

WAS THE PETITION FILED IN GOOD FAITH?

The answer to this question involves a consideration of two subsidiary questions:

(a) Is it reasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected?

(b) Is a proceeding pending wherein the best interests of creditors will be served?

(a) Is It Reasonable to Expect that a Plan of Reorganization Can be Effected?

On behalf of contract holders we contend that the petition was filed in good faith because it is reasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected, and no proceeding is pending wherein the best interests of creditors will be served.

Several plans have been considered, but because the question arose as to the want of jurisdiction of the Federal Court, no plan has been prepared and filed. It is time enough to do the work required to prepare a plan of reorganization after the question of jurisdiction has been finally disposed of. If this Court finds that the Federal Court has jurisdiction of this proceeding a plan will, in due course, be prepared and filed, but if this Court finds that the Federal Court has no jurisdiction, no plan, of course, will be prepared and filed.

Among other plans given serious consideration, is a plan contemplating the orderly liquidation of Fidelity. If liquidation over a long period of time is desired by the requisite amount of creditors, we see no reason why a plan effectuating such liquidation is not permissible under the provisions of Chapter X. Such a plan would almost necessarily result in at least partial continued operation of the concern, although not for an unlimited period. Even if the old business is not to be continued, and the reorganized debtor is to limit its activities to the orderly liquidation of its assets, we see no reasen why such a plan may not be promulgated under Chapter X. Does it cease to be a reorganization if the purposes and aims of the corporate activities are changed? Or if the life of the corporation is limited?

There is no legal objection to a plan of orderly liquidation.

It is now settled that such a plan of reorganization is permissible under Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act. R. S. Witters Associates, Inc. v. Ebsary Gypsum Company, 93 Fed. (2d) 746; In re Central Funding Corporation, 75 Fed. (2d) 256; In re Reynolds Investing Company, Inc., No. 27,863 U. S. District Court of New Jersey; In re Cuyahoga Finance Company, No. 56,391, U. S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio.

In In re Reynolds Investing Company, Inc., John Gerdes, the well known authority on Corporate Reorganization, prepared such a plan of reorganization. In his report as trustee of the Debtor, he said:

> "The plan proposes liquidation through the medium of a reorganized Debtor rather than through an adjudication in bankruptcy, because: (1) the extent of the solvency of the Debtor is uncertain, and a judicial determination of the extent of such insolvency would involve protracted litigation, be expensive, and, in the end, be useless; (2) complete and satisfactory liquidation is a practical impossiblity within the time ordinarily contemplated by bankruptcy or other liquidation through legal proceedings; (3) corporate management is more flexible and better able to meet unforeseen contingencies in a liquidation over a long period of time than is the case where the liquidation is managed by officers of a court; and (4) control of liquidation which necessarily extends over a long period of time should be under the direct and immediate control of those primarily interested—the debenture holders and stock owners."

The decisions of the Court in the cases of R. S. Witters Associates, Inc. vs. Ebsary Gypsum Company, 93 Fed. (2d) 746, and In re Central Funding Corporation, 75 Fed. (2d) 256, holding that a plan of orderly liquidation was permissible under Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act, was before Congress at the time it amended the Act by enacting Chapter X, and since Congress did not see fit to exclude such a plan of reorganization, it must be presumed that Congress approved the judicial construction given its prior legislation of substantially the same import. Re Wisc. Nat. Bank v. Wisc. Cooperative Milk Pool, 119 Fed. (2d) 999 (7 C. C. A.).

Such a plan is permissible under the Chandler Act. Thus in In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Company, 112 Fed. (2d) 655, in a proceeding to reorganize the debtor under Chapter X, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals held that such a plan of reorganization was permissible. The appellant urged that such a plan is not permissible because such a plan does not constitute a plan of reorganization, but only a method of liquidation. On appeal from an order of the District Court approving such a plan at page 667 the Court held in part:

"* * * * but the plan involving ultimate liquidation is not contrary to the terms of the reorganization provision of the Bankruptcy Act. * * *"

An exhaustive search discloses there are no decisions to the contrary either under Section 77 B or Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.

We therefore respectfully submit that it is reasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be affected.

(b) Is a Proceeding Now Pending Wherein the Best Interests of Creditors Will be Served?

We contend that no proceeding is now pending wherein the best interests of creditors will be served. Twelve separate proceedings are now pending in the courts of twelve different states. These are the states wherein Fidelity deposited securities to secure the payment of contract holders. The best interests of creditors will not be served by any one or all of said state court proceedings because—

(1) The Federal Court has jurisdiction to approve and confirm a plan of reorganization of Fidelity and no state court proceeding is pending to reorganize Fidelity, and no state court has jurisdiction to approve and confirm a plan of reorganization.

(2) The decision of the Federal Court in respect of controversies in relation to its assets and liabilities will be uniform, and there is no assurance that the decisions of the state courts will be uniform.

(3) If liquidation is desired by the requisite amount of creditors, their best interests will be served if the Federal Court retains jurisdiction, because—

(a) A liquidation through the medium of a reorganized debtor is better than piece-meal liquidation in twelve separate court proceedings.

(b) A single corporate management is more flexible and better able to meet unforeseen contingencies in a liquidation over a long period of time than is the case where the liquidation is managed by officers of twelve different courts.

(c) Control of a liquidation which necessarily extends over a long period of time should be under the direct and immediate control of those primarily interested—the contract holders.

CONCLUSION.

We therefore respectfully submit that—

1. Fidelity is not an insurance company.
2. The petition was filed in good faith.

Respectfully submitted,

STATEMENT AND OPINIONS BELOW

Fidelity Assurance Association of Wheeling, West Virginia (hereinafter called the "DEBTOR"), and Central Trust Company of Charleston, West Virginia (hereinafter called the "TRUSTEE"), have petitioned this Court for the issuance of a writ of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit to review a decision of that Court entered on the 16th day of June, 1942 (rehearing denied July 22, 1942), reversing an order of the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia entered January 5, 1942; which order sustained that District Court's jurisdiction to entertain the Debtor's petition for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, and overruled certain motions to vacate orders of the District Court with reference to the custody and control of securities deposited by the Debtor, in accordance with State law, with States and officials thereof in each of fifteen States of the United States. The Circuit Court of Appeals ordered the case remanded for the purpose of dismissing the Debtor's petition on the ground that Debtor was an insurance company when its petition was filed on June 6, 1941, and that the said petition was not filed in good faith as defined in Section 146, particularly (3) and (4), of said Chapter X. The opinion of the District Court (Moore, D. J.) is reported in 42 F. Supp. 973 (S. D. W. Va.), and the unanimous opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reported in 129 F. (2d) 442.

JURISDICTION

The order of the Circuit Court of Appeals was entered on June 16, 1942 (R. 387) (rehearing denied July 22, 1942 (R. 397)). The petition for a writ of certiorari was filed on the 20th day of August, 1942. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under Section 240(a) of the Judicial Code, as amended by the Act of February 13, 1925 (28 U. S. C. A. 347) and Section 24(c) of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 47(c)).

STATUTES INVOLVED

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Foreword

There are seven respondents in this case (R. 363 for official designation, and 42 F. Supp. 476 for their official representation) who filed joint and several appeals in the Circuit Court of Appeals, six of whom filed controversial answers in the District Court to the Debtor's petition; five of them, for the purposes of brevity, will be referred to hereinafter as the Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Tennessee and Maryland respondents. This brief is being filed jointly in behalf of Edgar B. Sims, Auditor and ex officio Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia, and H. Isaiah Smith and Ross B. Thomas, West Virginia State Court Receivers (R. 3), hereinafter referred to jointly as the West Virginia respondents, and separately as Auditor of West Virginia and West Virginia Receivers.

1 Other statutes involved by reason of questions presented below, but not there determined, are: Code of W. Va. 12-5-2, 6; 33-9-3, 10; 33-2-45; 33-2-12; Art. VI., Sec. 35, Const. of W. Va.; Tenth Amendment to the Const. of the U. S.; Eleventh Amendment to the Const. of the U. S.; Sec. 111 of Ch. X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 511); Sec. 116(1), Ch. X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 516); Sec. 128, Ch. X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 528); Sec. 216(4) of Ch. X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 616); Statutes of the States where Debtor made deposits, set out in the Appendix of each brief discussing such statutes.

Four briefs will be filed in opposition to the petition for writ of certiorari on behalf of the respondents, Wisconsin and Iowa respondents filing a joint brief, Tennessee and Missouri respondents filing jointly, and Maryland filing separately. Counsel representing the respondents have agreed to divide the legal points and arguments thereon among themselves. It will, therefore, be necessary for the Court, if it will, to consider all of the briefs filed in opposition jointly as one composite brief, in order to reach a complete understanding of the points raised in opposition.

Only this brief of the West Virginia respondents will contain the "Statements and Opinions Below," the grounds upon which "Jurisdiction" is invoked by the petition, and a list of the "Statutes Involved," with each of the briefs filed setting out in full those particular statutes with which that brief will concern itself.

Each brief will include in its "Statement of the Case" only so much as is necessary to argue the points of law intended to be raised in that brief; each will contain a statement of the "Issues" with which it will deal; each will contain in its appendix such parts of the typewritten record, sent by the respondents to the Circuit Court of Appeals, but not printed by petitioners here, as are deemed necessary.[2] We hope that this procedure will merit the Court's approval.

(All emphasis in this brief is by counsel, unless otherwise noted.)

Statement

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals contains a complete and accurate summary of the facts upon which the points of law decided in that opinion were based.

2. "R. ____" will be used to denominate the page of the record as printed for this Court, and "T. ____" will be used to designate the page of the typewritten transcript. Reference to exhibits of the record sent to the Circuit Court of Appeals will be made by "Exh. ____, p. ____"

The opinion of the District Court (R. 3, 4) (42 F. Supp. 973, at 976) correctly sets forth how the case arose, and (R. 16, 17) (p. 981) correctly sets forth the contentions of your respondents which were therein raised.[3] The statement of facts of the District Court (R. 4-17) (42 F. Supp. at 977-981) is substantially correct, but not entirely complete. It is necessary to supplement those facts with those which follow, in order to argue correctly the issues hereinafter discussed in this brief.

In August, 1940, F. H. Pulfer, Sales Manager and Director of Debtor, brought to it one Allen G. Messick (T. 794), a Chicago promotor, who was to furnish or procure $500,000.00 to enable Debtor to continue business (T. 796). Over fifty per cent. of both the preferred and common stock of Debtor was then trusteed in John Marshall, of Washington, D. C. (R. 298, Exh. No. 95), for the purpose of enabling him to deal with Messick. Marshall's father-in-law had been one of the five founders of Debtor, and Marshall had been on its payroll at least since 1929 (T. 2939), and had served the company as its attorney, general counsel, chairman of the board, and in various other ways, for many years. For many years it had paid a part of his office rent, telephone bills, and stenographic expenses (T. 2910-11). Marshall apparently never purchased more than 110 shares of its stock, but by stock dividends came to own 750 shares of common and 275 shares of preferred stock (See Trustee's Partial Section 167 Report, p. 50). His son, John Marshall, Jr., shortly after leaving college, was made a vice-president and director of the Debtor (T. 967-8), and after Messick became chairman of the board, an assistant treasurer.

The Messick deal fell through. No money was furnished and Messick, who purportedly had come to bring money, 3 These same contentions were advanced in the Circuit Court of Appeals, whose decision was based upon only two of them (R. 363).

stayed as chairman of the board at a salary of $1,000.00 a month (T. 872) until Auditor Sims of West Virginia learned of it and prohibited further payment (T. 518-19-88). After April 11, 1941, when Auditor Sims instituted statutory receivership proceedings for the Debtor in West Virginia, with the Debtor's consent, and after the Debtor's directors had unanimously agreed to State Court proceedings in preference to any other proceedings (See Exh. of Minute Book of Board of Directors' Meetings, pp. 173-174), Messick interested an old school friend, James R. Fleming, an attorney of Fort Wayne, Indiana (T. 3601-2), who then undertook to look out for Mr. Marshall's stock interests. (T. 2974-75, 2446, R. 189, 190.)

Six of the eight directors of Debtor met in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on June 3, 1941, in a purported directors meeting (T. 1680-82; R. 13) (42 F. Supp. 980), after Marshall, Messick and Fleming had conferred together (T. 2965, 2971, 2994). These six were Marshall and Marshall's son, both of whose services had been dispensed with by the State Court Receivers (T. 3796), the latter owing, and ill owing, Debtor over $1,000.00 for rent on his home as ell as unpaid checks issued by him to Fidelity, which indebtedness Auditor Sims of West Virginia insisted should be paid (T. 547); Pulfer, who had not only been discharged by the Receivers but who owed the company $8,000.00 which he had drawn as advance salary and had not repaid, and did not think he should, and which Auditor Sims insisted must be repaid (T. 812); Messick, who had been let out by the State Court Receivers and who, on the day of their appointment, requested payment for the back salary which Auditor Sims had prevented him from getting (R. 143); Howard Reed, Vice-President, and A. L. King, who had not been retained by the West Virginia Receivers. Needing a seventh director for a quorum, they purported to elect Fleming, who was there by invitation, a director for the purpose of the meeting, although he was not, and never became, a stockholders, as required by By-Law No. 6 (R. 187) (T. 378, 1678) (R. 13) (42 F. Supp. 980), and who stated that in the light of future matters he deemed it preferable for him not to become a member of the board and serve thereon, but as an emergency confronted them, he would consent to become a member of the board to make a quorum, but that he would resign at the close of the meeting, and who did purportedly resign immediately after the meeting (R. 14) (42 F. Supp. 980). This meeting then voted to file the instant petition in bankruptcy, under Chapter X, in behalf of the Debtor, and on June 6, 1941, Fleming, together with Messick, did file the instant petition (T. 3601-2, 925) (R. 14) (42 F. Supp. 980).

Immediately after the petition was filed, the District Court, ex parte, approved the petition as being filed in good faith and having all the necessary requisites for the Court's jurisdiction under Chapter X (R. 323, 324), and appointed the Central Trust Company, of Charleston, West Virginia, the Trustee (R. 3, 324) (42 F. Supp. 976). On the following morning, June 7, 1941, still ex parte, upon petition by the Trustee, the Court appointed Townsend and Townsend, of Charleston, West Virginia, as the attorneys for the Trustee, and on further petition by the newly appointed Trustee, the Court authorized the Trustee to employ Fleming and Messick "for the purpose of assisting your Trustee in marshaling the assets of said Debtor which are now situate in divers states outside the territorial limits of the State of West Virginia, and also for the purpose of assisting Trustee in the development and formulation of a plan or reorganization for the affairs of Debtor in this proceeding, and that your Trustee be also authorized by the Court to employ the above named to perform any other special services other than that of general counsel for the Trustee * * *."

The respondents thereafter contended that Messick and Fleming had been employed by the Trustee, and although it was shown, and not denied, that they went to the State of Wisconsin, at the request of Townsend and Townsend, the Trustee's attorneys (R. 166), conferred with officials there (R. 153), and conferred with the officials of many of the depository States the next day in Chicago, and stated that they had been retained by the Trustee and authorized to speak for it (R. 150), the District Court during the hearing stated that they were never employed by the Trustee (R. 294) and during the hearing refused to receive any evidence which would tend so to show (R. 163), and later, in its opinion, so held (R. 16) (42 F. Supp. 981).

Immediately after their appointment, State officials, particularly those in West Virginia, challenged the right of Messick and Fleming to be employed by the Trustee (R. 162); Messick's appointment was promptly rescinded and that of Fleming by order of August 1, 1941 (R. 16) (42 F. Supp. 980).

As set out by the District Court (R. 4) (42 F. Supp. 976-77), immediately upon filing the petition, turn-over orders, later modified to "freezing" orders (on Aug. 9, 1941) were issued to all State officials with regard to the deposited funds held by them. Certain of the States thereupon filed controversial answers and made motions to vacate these turn-over and "freezing" orders, Maryland appearing specially for that latter purpose (R. 199). Hearings were had before the District Court on the issues joined, beginning on August 5, 1941, and lasting intermittently until October 10, 1941 (R. 4).

4 Petition and order June 7, 1941, a part of the record sent to the Circuit Court of Appeals.

Fleming appeared in the District Court as the attorney for the Debtor (42 F. Supp. 976), although never authorized so to do other than by the meeting of the board of directors above set out.

The District Court, after a full hearing on this question, held (R. 21):

> "The purported directors meeting of June 3, 1941, was not a legal meeting and the directors could not at that meeting grant any valid authority to any person to file the petition for reorganization."

Purported Ratification Meetings

September 17th Meeting

On September 17, 1941, the six directors who had purportedly met in Pittsburgh were all summoned, in Debtor's behalf, to testify at the hearings before the Court, at Charleston, West Virginia. (R. 138.) On that day as well a meeting of the board of directors was called, at which Messick, Marshall, Marshall's son, Pulfer and Reed attended, as well as D. A. Burt, A. L. King having in the meantime resigned. An offer of proof was made to the District Court which was rejected, that the president of the corporate Trustee herein attempted to persuade A. L. King to attend that directors meeting. (R. 136, 137). As well as the six directors mentioned, Wheeler Bachmann was present, he having been elected a director at the annual meeting of the Debtor in February, 1941 (Exhibit of Directors' Minutes, p. 172), and who had, upon notification thereof, declined in writing immediately thereafter to serve as such director (Exhibit Board of Directors' Minutes p. 177) (R. 15, 22). Marshall and Messick in their testimony earlier in the hearing had sworn that Bachmann was not a director on June 3, 1941 (T. 886-8-9, 422, 435).

With Bachmann present to complete their quorum, the six directors purportedly elected Marshall's nephew, Philip Paull (R. 15), to the board, and with these seven directors present, Bachmann not participating (Exh. Minutes of Board of Directors, p. 179), they purportedly ratified the authorization of June 3rd in filing the petition on June 6th (42 F. Supp. 983). No permission of the District Court to elect Paull a director was obtained as required by Section 191 of Chapter X.

The minutes of this meeting were immediately brought to Court and introduced in evidence, and after adjournment of Court on that day, Bachmann purportedly resigned from the board (Exh. Board of Directors' Minutes, p. 181).

New Attorneys for Debtor

Shortly thereafter, Fleming quit the trial and never reappeared, and although his name has continued to be used, has never since appeared at any hearing or argument in either the District Court or Circuit Court of Appeals, and no communication or answer to such has ever since that time been received by any counsel for respondents. Taking his place came John V. Ray, of the firm of Payne, Minor and Ray, of Charleston, West Virginia, who are listed in Martindale in both 1941 and 1942, as general counsel of the Central Trust Company, the disinterested Trustee herein, and that general representation has not been denied. Mr. Ray has since represented Debtor, although his right so to do, without corporate authorization, was promptly, and still is, challenged.

After the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Mr. Homer Holt, beginning July 13, 1942, has acted with Mr. Ray as counsel for the Debtor, and he frankly admits that his firm is private counsel for the Central Trust Company, Trustee herein, and it has advised with him concerning its private liabilities in connection with this estate, and that he was requested to appear for Debtor only by Mr. Marshall.

October 3rd Meeting

The next time testimony was taken before the District Court, Mr. Ray, as attorney for the Debtor, apparently abandoned the legality of this September 17th meeting (T. 2263), and failed to produce Mr. Marshall for cross-examination concerning that meeting, and asked permission of the Court to hold a further meeting of the board of directors and stockholders, and to reelect the old group as new officers and directors.

Section 9(a) of the Investment Company Act of 1940 (15 U. S. C. A., Sec. 80a-9(a)) makes it unlawful for anyone to serve as an officer or director of a company when such person is enjoined from "engaging in or continuing any conduct or practice in connection with * * * the purchase or sale of any security * * *." All of the officers and directors, except Messick, were enjoined in the Detroit suit brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission in 1938, in the consent decree entered therein, from engaging in certain practices in the sale of Debtor's securities. (42 F. Supp. 979; R. 10; Exh. 6, pp. 97-258.) Marshall and others had applied to the Securities and Exchange Commission for permission to serve as directors and exemption from this provision, as provided in Section 9(b) of the Act. It had not been granted (R. 22). Therefore, objection was made that the District Court was without power to give permission, under Section 191 of Chapter X, to these men who had been enjoined, to serve as officers and directors of the company.

It was further objected that permission to hold such meeting should only be granted upon condition that the equitable owners of the stock be permitted to vote it and not have it voted by Marshall, in whose name it was still trusteed. Since it was undenied that at least under West Virginia law the company had become an insurance company on December 31, 1940, the insurance laws of West Virginia (Ch. 31, Art. 1, Sec. 73) prohibiting a voting trustee for stock in any insurance company, it was argued to the Court that the Court should not give Marshall permission to vote this stock in ratification of his own acts.

The District Court overruled all objections and granted permission to hold stockholders and directors meetings, which were held on October 3, 1941. At the stockholders meeting the tellers reported 9,887 shares present out of a total of 17,235 shares, and Marshall, as trustee, voted 9,570 shares (Exh. of Minute Book of Directors' Meetings, p. 191). Ratification was voted by him of the former directors meetings and of the filing of Debtor's petition, and new directors were elected, among whom was Marshall's nephew, Philip Paull, and his brother-in-law, James Paull. These directors then not only ratified all acts that Marshall had previously done, but ratified a resolution passed at the purported meeting of September 17th, as follows:

> "RESOLVED, further, that John Marshall, Sr., be, and he is hereby authorized, directed and empowered to do such acts and sign such papers as may be necessary to prosecute the pending proceedings, or a new proceeding, for a corporate reorganization under Chapter X of the Federal Bankruptcy Act."

The District Court, in its opinion, held the meetings of September 17th and October 3rd valid corporate meetings, and the ratifications therein voted, ratified and validated that which was done at the meeting of June 3rd, and therefore that the petition had been properly filed (R. 23) (42 F. Supp. 984).

The District Court, in its opinion (R. 27, 30) (42 F. Supp. 985, 987), however, held that the stockholders of the Debtor had no interest of any kind whatsoever in its assets, which was confirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 383). This controversy is being carried on, and this petition is filed on behalf of stockholders only, who have had, up to the present time, the Trustee pay all of their costs and expenses, except counsel fees, out of the funds of the contract holders in the possession and under the control of the Trustee, and without any corporate authority on the part of the Debtor, other than that which is set out above, and over the continued objection and protest of a number and groups of contract holders.

Immediately after the Federal proceedings were instituted, not only State officials but numerous contract holders and groups of contract holders contested the bankruptcy proceedings, and have been doing so ever since. During the existence of the State Court proceedings of April 11th to June 6th, in West Virginia, there was only one objection filed on behalf of a single contract holder to those State Court proceedings. That was filed by the same firm of attorneys of which Mr. Holt is a member, and who now represent the Debtor, and the substance of that objection was that there should be a corporate receiver appointed instead of solely individual receivers.

Over numerous objections and exceptions, the attorneys appointed for the Trustee, throughout the hearings of the District Court, engaged in that jurisdictional controversy and undertook to sustain Debtor's petition and the jurisdiction of the District Court which appointed that Trustee and those attorneys. (T. 3620, 3625, 3634, 3642, 3644.)

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Of th questions, only the following are discussed in this brief:

I. Debtor's petition was not filed in "good faith" as that term is ordinarily used, nor as defined in Section 146(4), Chapter X, and there was never any valid corporate authority authorizing the petition to be filed.

II. The petitioners herein, that is the Trustee and those acting purportedly in behalf of the Debtor, cannot rightfully file a petition for writ of certiorari.

(The following questions were presented below, but not discussed nor decided in the opinion there, and are discussed briefly hereinafter, in an "Addendum" to this brief, as substantiating the correctness of the decision and judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals):

III. The Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibited the District Court from taking jurisdiction over the funds deposited with the States and over the State officials having custody and control thereof.

IV. The petition was not filed in the proper venue, under Section 128 of Chapter X, and under Section 111, the Debtor had no property within the District Court's territorial jurisdiction.

V. The orders of the District Court directed against State officials are void under the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

VI. The delivery of securities by the Debtor under the depository laws of the various States constituted contracts in the public authority within the meaning of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, which the District Judge could not permit to be rejected.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The decision and judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals in ordering the dismissal of Debtor's petition filed under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act was correct.[5]

I

A. Debtor's petition under Chapter X was not filed in "good faith" as that term is generally and equitably defined, in that minority stockholders, being certain of Debtor's former officers and directors who, by decision of both the Courts below, have no remaining financial interest or equity in Debtor, filed that petition and have since carried on the controversy, including the filing of the petition for writ of certiorari, for their own interests and not those of the contract holders, and all of which has been done entirely by the use of funds belonging solely and exclusively to the contract holders and creditors.

B. The petition was not filed in "good faith" as that term is defined in Section 146(4) of Chapter X, in that the prior proceedings then pending in the States, particularly in West Virginia, would best subserve the interests of the contract holders. Deposits of securities were made by Debtor with each of thirteen States for the benefit and protection of the contract holders in those States, as required by the laws of each of those States. Liquidation and distribution of those deposited securities can and should be performed by the proper officials and under the laws of each of those States, as interpreted by their own State courts, and working in cooperation with the officials of each of the other States; instead of having liquidation and distribution by the Federal Trustee appointed under Chapter X (rehabilitation of the company being concededly practically an impossibility), and the laws of each of those thirteen depository States being interpreted by the one Federal District Court.

C. As set forth fully in the Statement of Facts and in the Opinion of the District Court (42 F. Supp. at 983), the corporate meeting purportedly authorizing the original filing of Debtor's petition on June 6, 1941, "was not a legal meeting and the directors at that meeting could not grant any valid authority to any person to file the petition for reorganization," and since, as respondents contend, no other valid corporate meeting was held; and since no ratification could be had for the invalid filing of the Debtor's petition; and because the directors enjoined in the Securities and Exchange Commission suit in Detroit in 1938 by acting in violation of Section 9(a) of the Investment Company Act of 1940 were prohibited from performing any valid action, then the petition was never lawfully and validly filed; hence the decision ordering the petition dismissed was correct.

II

A. Sections 156 and 158(4) of Chapter X require that the Trustee appointed by the District Court be disinterested and have no interest in the Debtor or any interest materially adverse to the interests of any class of creditors. Therefore, the instant Trustee has no proper interest in the merits of Debtor's petition, or attempting to sustain it, and no proper interest in attempting to sustain the jurisdiction of the Court appointing it, and consequently no right to apply for a writ of certiorari to a judgment dismissing the petition.

B. Those stockholders who have caused this petition for writ of certiorari to be filed in the Debtor's name have, by the decisions of both Courts below, no financial or equitable interest remaining in the Debtor and its former assets. Hence, they have no right to continue this controversy for interests of their own, and to do so entirely with funds belonging solely to the contract holders.

DEBTOR'S PETITION WAS NOT FILED IN GOOD FAITH

A

Lack of Good Faith as that Term Is Generally Defined

The controversial answer of Edgar B. Sims, Auditor of the State of West Virginia, and the answer of the West Virginia Receivers,[6] sets forth that the Debtor's petition[4] itself shows that those filing it were not acting in "good faith", because the petition, in paragraph IX,[4] states that it is the desire of the Debtor that a plan of reorganization be effected and a Trustee be appointed to formulate it, because the Debtor will be unable to meet its obligations as they mature "unless the rights of the contract holders are modified so that the earnings received on securities and assets owned by Debtor will be sufficient in amount to meet the requirements under its outstanding contracts; if the rights of its outstanding contract holders are modified to this extent, the Debtor will be able to meet its reserve requirements and will be able to resume the operation of its business."

Under Case v. Los Angeles, 308 U. S. 106, 60 S. Ct. 1, 85 L. Ed. 110, clearly this modifying of creditors rights solely for the benefit of the stockholders could never be permitted under Chapter X, and therefore the petition should have been instantly dismissed.

Sections 141 and 144 require that the petition be filed in good faith, and Section 146, in defining "good faith," specifically does not limit it to the statutory definition.[7]

"Good faith" has been variously defined as "Consists in an honest intention to abstain from taking any unconscientious advantage of another;" "is purely a question of fact;" "the state of mind of the party;" "as the actual existing state of mind."

Black's Dictionary, 2d Ed., 544.
Searl v. School District, 133 U. S. 553, 33 L. Ed. 740.

Gerdes, in his article on "Corporate Reorganization," 52 Harvard Law Review 8, states:

> "The judge's satisfaction as to the good faith of petitioners continues to be an essential requirement for approval of petition."

In 48 Harvard Law Review, in the note on pages 287, 289, it is stated:

> "Whatever else 'good faith' signifies, it at least demands honesty of purpose."
>
> "However honest the purpose of the petition, if his primary object is not to protect his interest as a creditor, the petition is not filed in 'good faith'; * * *." (Page 289.)

Most of the writers and judges insist that the intentions of those who file a petition must be honest, and that if there is legal or equitable fraud in filing the petition, it must be dismissed. Creditors and stockholders who might incidentally be served by such proceedings can then file a proper petition themselves.

7 The history and background of this phrase "filed in good faith" is set out (R. 118-119). It is submitted that that phrase means bona fides.

In Finletter, The Law of Bankruptcy Reorganization, 35 (1939), the history of Chapter X is set forth, and the author states, as to Section 77B and Chapter X:

> "The reorganization chapters must therefore be regarded as adopting the principles of the equity receivership which was the model for the 1933 and 1934 acts. It is accordingly in the light of these principles, rather than of the liquidation concept which underlies the decision in ordinary bankruptcy, that the reorganization provision must in the main be interpreted."

In 49 Harvard Law Review 1111, at 1123, it is stated:

> "It is clear that the petitioner must show at least honesty of purpose, motive, and intent."

Sustaining cases are cited in Note 87, p. 1124.

So "good faith" is merely an extension of the equitable doctrine of "clean hands," a change in nomenclature without any change in substance; and where those filing the petition did not act in "good faith" or bona fides, and came into court with "unclean hands," the petition has been dismissed.

The West Virginia respondents' controversial answer, filed in the District Court, charges that Marshall, Messick and Fleming dominated the bringing of this instant petition; that their plan was, in bringing a Chapter X proceeding, to have all of the assets taken away from the various State officials and concentrated under one person, a Federal Trustee; that they would then be employed by the Trustee, and be in active charge of that twenty million dollar fund; that they knew, all three being competent lawyers, that there was no possibility of rehabilitation; and that if they originally brought straight bankruptcy proceedings in Federal Court, the lienholders, or State officials, would keep charge of those funds and turn over to the Federal Bankruptcy Trustee only such balances, if any, as were left after the liens were satisfied, that is, the claims of contract holders paid; that under Chapter X proceedings all of the funds could supposedly be collected into the Trustee's hands and that when rehabilitation was thereafter found to be impossible, liquidation would ensue in Federal Bankruptcy Court, with the entire funds collected being turned over en masse to that Bankruptcy Trustee, with the same three gentlemen still in charge of the liquidation and distribution. Thus, by court procedure they would have charge of the liquidation and distribution of more than twenty million dollars, together with the emoluments, fees and expenses therefor.

Such was the charge made in the answer. The facts asserted in these respondents' answer to prove it were: An invalid corporate meeting was held June 3, 1941, authorizing the petition to be filed; the Debtor's petition was filed in the late afternoon of June 6, 1941, by Fleming and Messick, and the Trustee was immediately appointed; that the next morning that Trustee presented a petition to employ Townsend and Townsend as its attorneys and general counsel, which petition the Court granted; that at the same time the Trustee presented its petition requesting authorization from the Court to employ Messick and Fleming "for the purpose of assisting your Trustee in marshaling the assets of said Debtor which are now situate in divers States outside the territorial limits of the State of West Virginia; also for the purpose of assisting Trustee in the development and formulation of a plan or reorganization for the affairs of Debtor in this proceeding; that your trustee be also authorized by the Court to employ the above named (Fleming and Messick) to perform any other special services other than that of general counsel for the Trustee in the administration of this trust * * *." The Court immediately (June 7, 1941) entered an order granting said petition and authorizing said employment.

At the hearing before the District Court, the above facts being admitted, the respondents attempted to prove that Messick and Fleming were then immediately employed by the Trustee, and the District Court stated from the bench that they had never been employed and he would not permit any evidence to be introduced on that subject. (R. 160, 16.

It was nevertheless brought out in that hearing that at the request of Townsend and Townsend (R. 166), the Trustee's appointed general counsel, Messick and Fleming left immediately for Wisconsin (R. 166) and there conferred with the officials in charge of the deposited securities (R. 153); that they stated that they represented the Trustee and were entitled to act for it (R. 153); that they wanted the Wisconsin officials to work with them (R. 167), and without friction, in turning over the Wisconsin assets to the Trustee (R. 153-154). On the following day Fleming appeared in Chicago before a meeting of the officials of the States which had deposits of securities made by Fidelity (R. 154), and there reiterated that while he had been originally engaged to look out for Mr. Marshall's stock interests (R. 149), he was there at that meeting speaking to those State officials for and on behalf of the Trustee, at its request (R. 150), and asked those officials to turn over their funds to and cooperate with the Trustee in the prosecution of the proceedings, and conferred with them at length concerning the affairs of Fidelity (R. 150). All of this evidence was undenied by Mr. Fleming and Mr. Messick (R. 154), but nevertheless the District Court held, in its written opinion (42 F. Supp. at 981; R. 16), "Messick and Fleming were never actually employed by the Trustee," and held during the hearing, "Mr. Messick nor Mr. Fleming have ever had any connection with the Trustee." (R. 293.)

After the States objected to the authorization to the Trustee to employ Messick and Fleming, the District Court immediately had such authority concerning Messick revoked, and on August 1, 1941, by written order, had the authority concerning the employment of Fleming revoked, and in his written opinion held (42 F. Supp. at 981; R. 16):

> "The Court at first authorized such employment but later, being of opinion that it would not be for the best interests of all parties concerned, revoked such authority. * * *"

Objection was made to the District Court that the former officials and directors who had been enjoined by the Securities and Exchange Commission suit in Detroit in 1938 could not continue to act purportedly for the Debtor company and dominate its affairs, and that by so doing they were violating the law, in that such was forbidden by the Investment Company Act of 1940, Section 9(a); they were nevertheless expressly permitted by the Court, over such objection, to continue to serve the company and to dominate its affairs, the District Court holding (R. 22; 42 F. Supp. at 983):

> "I am of the opinion that the fact that certain of these directors may have violated the law in serving as such directors (at the September 17th and October 3rd meetings) would not render their acts as directors invalid."

We submit, the District Court, when so requested, under Section 191, on Oct. 1, 1941, to give these persons so enjoined permission to hold a corporate meeting on Oct. 3, 1941, and re-elect themselves officers and directors, and ratify their invalid action in filing the instant petition, was without authority to permit them to violate Section 9(a), and then to hold their acts in violation of that section, valid.

Their acts in respect to bringing the original invalid petition and their acts in respect to the purported corporate meetings attempting to validate the original filing of the petition, speak more clearly than words as to the honesty of their intentions. The fact that due to the vigilance of the State officials they were prevented from carrying out their plan (R. 162) does not mitigate or excuse their lack of "good faith" in the filing of their original petition.

The District Court's opinion (R. 23) (42 F. Supp. 983) that "there could be no valid action on the part of the directors of the Debtor without the participation of at least some of these allegedly disqualified persons" overlooks the fact that had the equitable and actual owners of this stock ever been permitted to vote it, they could have elected qualified directors who could validly have acted.

We must also respectfully disagree with the District Court's statement (R. 27), to the effect that the fact "the stockholders of the Debtor had no interest in the assets is immaterial," and submit that such fact was of vital concern to the Court. Case v. Los Angeles, supra.

It is therefore respectfully submitted that there was a lack of "good faith" as that term is ordinarily and equitably used, and apart from its statutory definition in Section 146, in the filing of the original petition, by reason of which it should have been dismissed.

THE FORMER DIRECTORS, UPON INSOLVENCY, BECAME TRUSTEES OF FIDELITY'S ASSETS FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE CREDITORS, THE CONTRACT HOLDERS

Further substantiating that the directors did not act in "good faith" and that their corporate meetings were invalid, we must further consider the District Court's statement (R. 33-34) (42 F. Supp. at 988) that

> "The fact that some stockholder or director may have been motivated by the hope that he might preserve for the future some connection with the affairs of the company is not in itself proof of bad faith."

and disagree therewith.

By June 3rd the directors knew Fidelity was insolvent, and so stated in the petition filed June 6th (R. 30). In West Virginia, the cases hold that directors of insolvent corporations are trustees of its assets for the benefit of creditors:

> Pyles v. Riverside Furniture Co., 30 W. Va. 123, 2 S. E. 909;
>
> Arnold v. Knapp, 75 W. Va. 804, 84 S. E. 895;

and in Virginia:

> Triplett v. Fauver, 103 Va. 123, 48 S. E. 875.

Therefore, it was general lack of "good faith" and violation of the equitable "clean hands" doctrine for the directors to do anything which was, or the purpose of which was, for the individual benefit of those directors who were acting as such trustees.[8]

A vote by a director, where he is personally interested, renders the transaction prima facie void.

> Ravenswood Railway Co. v. Woodyard, 46 W. Va. 558, 33 S. E. 285.

> "No member of a board of directors shall vote on a question in which he is interested * * * or be present at the board while the same is being considered * * *."
>
> Code of W. Va., Sec. 69, Art. 1, Ch. 31.

The reason for denying such interested director the right to vote is because of his fiduciary or trust relationship to the corporation.

> Thurmond v. Paragon Colliery Co., 82 W. Va. 49, 95 S. E. 816.

A corporation is entitled to have the unbiased and uninfluenced opinion of each of its directors.

> Tri-State Coal, etc., Asso. v. Neace, 92 W. Va. 196, 114 S. E. 569.

A resolution of a board of directors in which one of their members was personally interested, passed at a meeting whereat that member's presence was necessary in order that a quorum be had, and the member voting in favor thereof, the resolution is prima facie fraud and void.

Flanagan v. Flanagan Coal Co., 77 W. Va. 757, 88 S. E. 897.

Hence, Debtor's petition was not filed in "good faith" and the decision ordering it dismissed was correct.

B

Petition Not Filed in "Good Faith" as Defined in Section 146(4)

Section 146(4), Chapter X, provides that the petition shall not be deemed to be filed in "good faith" if "a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding."

Since the stockholders had no legitimate interest or equity remaining, the question arises, are the interests of the contract holders best subserved in the proceedings in the States, particularly the State Court in West Virginia, or in the Federal proceedings? This is a fair question and will be met squarely.

Petitioners' brief speaks of the possibility of rehabilitation. In substance, the District Court held liquidation was inevitable, albeit, a slow and orderly one (R. 30, 31). The Circuit Court of Appeals held there was an "immediate need of a liquidation" (R. 383). Counsel for Securities and Exchange Commission, in argument before the Circuit Court of Appeals, was compelled to admit that as a practical matter rehabilitation was an impossibility, and liquidation must ensue.

All testimony to the contrary was by the former officials, subject to being struck for unqualifiedness (T. 3469, 3692), and was pre-Pearl Harbor. Our government now needs the money formerly invested in contracts such as these, to be invested in War Bonds, which are not only a safer investment, but return a higher yield.[9]

Basically, there is only one real issue involved in these entire proceedings, and that question is, WHO SHALL LIQUIDATE THE SECURITIES HELD IN EACH OF THE THIRTEEN DEPOSITORY STATES, AND WHO SHALL DISTRIBUTE TO THE CONTRACT HOLDERS THE FUNDS RECEIVED FROM THE LIQUIDATION OF THOSE SECURITIES?

On the one side are these respondents, together with the other depository States and their officials, and on the other side is the Federal Trustee, together with some of the former officers and minority stockholders of the Debtor.

Thus, the subordinate question, is not an immediate liquidation of the assets for the best interests of the contract holders? The States so contend, and are ready to do it. (R. 406, 411, 412.) The opposition contended before the Circuit Court of Appeals, liquidation should be performed slowly and orderly over a five to ten year period. The Circuit Court of Appeals, with the entire record before it, and having twice before,[10] not including informal and preliminary hearings, having had the affairs of this company before it for consideration, one of which cases was an application for receivership on the grounds of insolvency,[10] held with the States that there was "immediate need for liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of contract holders" (R. 383), and their interests would be best subserved in the prior State proceedings then pending in the State Court in West Virginia (R. 386).

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals sets forth in a footnote (R. 365) the fifteen States having a deposit made by Debtor, the amount of that deposit and its legal nature in each of those States, and the statute of each of those States under which the deposit was made.[11] Actually, however, there are only thirteen true depository States.[12] In each of these thirteen States there is an actual deposit of securities held by the State, or some of-11 The Securities and Exchange Commission, pursuant to Section 30 of the Public Utilities Holding Company Act of 1935 (R. 366), made an investigation of "Investment Trusts and Investment Companies," which was from time to time printed and submitted to Congress in correlated parts; this particular Debtor was one of those companies investigated and reported on (R. 384), beginning in June, 1938, there being at least six such partial reports. Exhibits 6 and 12 of the case at bar dealt especially with the instant company (R. 130, 384). In Appendix W thereof, at pages 179-196, there is set out a brief summary of the laws of the various States showing their requirements for deposits, the statutory official placed by law in charge of such companies, and many of the regulations and safeguards placed by the States around the sale of contracts of this nature, and around the continuation of safeguarding the interests of the investing public in such companies.

12 Briefly, in Virginia the State Corporation Commission, acting under Section 5 of the Virginia Securities Law, required Fidelity to post a bond, payable to the Commonwealth, the conditions of the bond being set out in Section 5(r), which was to protect against selling claims, and was not a depository bond in any sense of the word. In lieu of surety on the bond, the State accepted $25,000.00 in government bonds which has been loosely, but incorrectly, referred to as a deposit in Virginia.

Pennsylvania required a $100,000.00 deposit as a prerequisite to doing business in that State, and later required protection for a certain few of the contract holders. These funds are in the nature of a true deposit, and were held by the State Banking Commission. However, immediately after the West Virginia State Court receivership was instituted, and prior to these Federal proceedings, equity receiverships were set up in both the Eastern and Western Districts of Pennsylvania, both of which are still in existence; the Western District receivership having approximately $10,000.00 in its possession, and the Eastern District receivership, by virtue of an order of that Court, took from the State Banking Commission in the Middle District of Pennsylvania all of the funds in its possession, approximately $232,000.00; and has since retained them, so that in Pennsylvania there is in actuality no deposit with the State or any official thereof.

ficial thereof, in the amounts as set forth in the opinion below (R. 366), each of which deposits is still retained by the depository State (R. 371).[13] There are less than five per cent. of the Debtor's former assets, which are not held by the depository States; that is, the States hold over ninety-five per cent. of all assets.

Let us now examine the reasons underlying the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals.

On the side of the States, first, these thirteen States, beginning with West Virginia, in 1911, through their legislators, were sufficiently interested in their own people, and in the investments which those people made, to pass regulating laws for companies such as Fidelity, and were sufficiently interested in the protection of their people to require Fidelity and others to make a deposit with that State, or some official thereof, which was to protect, fully in most cases, the investors in that State in case Fidelity failed and became insolvent. The record shows these officials performed their required duties.

On the other hand, the Federal Government took no interest in these companies such as Fidelity until in 1935 the Securities and Exchange Commission was required, under the salutary laws passed concerning that body by Congress, to investigate these companies, report to Congress thereon, and recommend legislation therefor (R. 366). This the Securities and Exchange Commission fully and ably did, and among those laws passed was the 13 The West Virginia Receivers took into their possession undeposited securities and cash located in West Virginia, which, including escrow payments made by contract holders, amount to somewhat less than one million dollars. This, by order of the District Court, and over objection and protest of those State Court Receivers, was required to be turned over to the Central Trust Company, Trustee, in whose possession it has since remained (R. 371). There is still a deposit with the State of West Virginia, under the control of Auditor Sims, of more than $10,000,000 which was never turned over to the Federal authorities.

Investment Company Act of 1940, to take effect January 1, 1941.

But this Act was to apply for the future as to those companies and was not particularly concerned with the past, and specifically was not to disturb the deposits already made in the various States, but only such deposits as were made after the effective date of January 1, 1941 (R. 229). No deposit was made in any State by Fidelity after that date.

When it became apparent that the Debtor could not continue as a going insurance company, Mr. Sims, the Auditor of West Virginia, on March 25, 1941, advised the company, by a written letter (R. 139) that he was giving serious consideration to asking State Court statutory receivership for them, and asked them, however, to investigate the possibility of the company being placed in Federal Court under the Federal Bankruptcy Act for the purpose of determining whether it could be reorganized under that Act.

After a full and free discussion of the matter in a two-day session of the board of directors, a unanimous expression in favor of State Court proceedings was adopted,[14] and the Debtor was represented in those State Court proceedings thereafter instituted by the Auditor and made no objection thereto.

Until Mr. Fleming took the position that the Federal Court should take jurisdiction, some weeks after the State Court proceedings were instituted, no one else ever took that position (T. 3608).

After Auditor Sims instituted his statutory proceedings on April 11, 1941, in West Virginia, he advised the other depository States of his action, and protective proceedings were instituted by State officials in other States.

In West Virginia two Receivers, respondents herein, were appointed. In the less than two months they were permitted to act, they made a list of all of the contract holders, together with all necessary data concerning each contract, including the amount due under each contract less any loan values thereon, and segregated by states; a complete and accurate account of all of the assets and funds of Fidelity, including the amount of each State deposit; notified the contract holders of the proceedings; kept in touch with the other States' officials and their proceedings; and had a nebulous plan beginning to form for voluntary reorganization.

On the other hand, the Federal Trustee has done nothing constructive since it was appointed except to hold the funds taken over by the District Court's order from the West Virginia Receivers, and to aid the Debtor in this controversy to retain the Federal Court jurisdiction. A partial report under Section 167 was filed. It contained only data previously prepared for the State Court receivership. Lists of creditors and assets of the company were filed, taken verbatim from the State Court receivership files by one of those State Receivers, who was and is now employed by the Trustee to manage the home office of Fidelity in Wheeling. Just a year ago the Trustee was ordered to have completed, by the District Court, its Sec. 167 report and to file it and as yet this has not been done. The respondents, on many occasions, have demanded its completion, and on just as many occasions were told by the District Court that it did not concern them, and the Trustee would file it when it was ready.[15] It has not yet been filed.

15. Particularly written motions by the Tennessee and West Virginia State Court Respondents, and orders thereon, included in the record sent the C. C. A.; not found in the printed record for this Court.

True, Auditor Sims of West Virginia originally desired and hoped to reorganize Fidelity, and the State Court Receivers were working towards that end. They attempted to get the Federal Court suit dismissed as quickly as possible, knowing that delay in reorganization proceedings is fatal. It has been. Fidelity is now as dead as the Pharaohs of Egypt. These respondents have so said, and still so say, ever since it became apparent that this was to be a lengthy controversy.

From the time the Federal proceedings were instituted, these respondents requested of the Debtor, and demanded of the Trustee, that a plan be filed, or any ideas of a plan, if any they had, as quickly as could be done. To date there has not been filed by the Federal Trustee or the Debtor one scrap of paper giving any indication of any possible, let alone probable, plan. Petitioners' brief herein gives no further or better information in that regard.

As the Circuit Court of Appeals said (R. 385):

> "Certainly it would be unjust and unreasonable to delay satisfaction of their (contract holders) claims in order that an illusory hope of reorganization may be entertained."

Next arises the subordinate question as to how the depository laws in the various States can best be interpreted. The position of the respondents and the other depository States is that each State can best interpret its own depository laws, and distribute the funds to the contract holders in that State entitled thereto, and any balances remaining they have definitely agreed to turn over to West Virginia, and should their contract holders not be paid in full, to look to the West Virginia fund for any balance due.

Those advocating Federal jurisdiction maintain that the District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia can better interpret the depository laws of each of the fifteen States than can the Courts of those States; that as well there are myriad problems of law to be settled in that Court which will take years of protracted litigation to decide. These problems are such as the "Series Trust Fund" theory, "Company Interfund Loans", "Geographical Location" ideas, "Change of Residence by Contract Holders", "Trust Fund Under State Line" theory, "Jackpotting all of the Funds Generally", "Jackpotting Under Geographical Lines", "Jackpotting Under Series", and such other legal theories. (Petitioners' brief, p. 42-43.)

The States refuse to recognize any such theoretical legal problems. Their statutes to them are plain that the deposit was made in each State for the benefit and protection of the contract holders of that State, and that those persons, and those only, are entitled to those funds, and the Circuit Court of Appeals, certainly a most competent and, particularly about the affairs of the instant company, a very informed Court, so held.

A brief reading of the State statutes, or even the brief quotations therefrom contained in the note to the Circuit Court of Appeals opinion (R. 365) will resolve all legal doubts.

The petitioners say that they are not "to answer or resolve these questions" they raise "they are suggestions demonstrating the necessity of withholding any distribution" (Petitioner's Brief, p. 44); on the contrary, the STATES CAN, HAVE AND WILL ANSWER AND RESOLVE THESE QUESTIONS, and in the majority of instances have already done so. Red tape can, has been and will be cut to pieces.[16]

These respondents and the other depository States tend to the practical side of the law rather than the theoretical. With the exception of Pennsylvania and Virginia, whose position has been above and below explained, of the thirteen remaining depository States, six are respondents here. The other seven have advised counsel preparing this brief that they are in thorough accord with the position of these respondents and that, if it is possible so to do, they will so state in opposition briefs to be filed amicus curiae. In other words, all thirteen depository States are in perfect and harmonious agreement in opposition to those advocating Federal jurisdiction.

The Record (pp. 406-413, inclusive) contains letters to and from these respondents. Within thirty days from the handing down of the decision by the Circuit Court of Appeals, every one of the fifteen depository States, including Pennsylvania and Virginia, through their proper State officials, met in Charleston, West Virginia, July 9-11, 1942, and amicably discussed and settled their mutual problems. Each State, cooperating with each of the other States and the officials thereof, and with committees appointed therefor, will liquidate and distribute its own deposited fund to those rightfully entitled thereto. The quotation from the West Virginia letter (R. 406-7) and again (R. 410), the quotation from the Mary-

16 As stated so ably recently by Assistant Solicitor General Oscar Cox, "Boldness and imagination rather than dependence on archaic legalism" must govern the action of lawyers in War times. The responsibility of lawyers is to find affirmative ways by which decisions of policy makers can be promptly fulfilled. * * * "Intelligent inquiry will prompt many a lawyer to say 'Yes' or 'Go ahead' where traditional conservatism has always dictated 'Stop' or 'Caution'. Our lawyers must be sufficiently bold and imaginative to explore this new realm of freedom—to discover what the law can do as well as what it can prohibit."

land letter (R. 411-12), the quotation from the Iowa letter (R. 412-13) show clearly how the States have, can and will cooperate together.[17]

Thus, the question of liquidation has already been settled by and between the States.

A committee was formed which has prepared uniform proofs of claims for each of the depositor States and as well for Pennsylvania and Virginia, and a form for claims over against the West Virginia fund. Some of that group later met counsel for the petitioners, when a stay of mandate was requested of the Circuit Court of Appeals, and that group, as a condition to the stay, obtained a consent order, dated July 22, 1942, modifying the District Court's order of August 9, 1941, so as to permit the proper officials of the depository States the right to service those deposited funds and to permit them to send out and receive proofs of claims, and to perform other administrative functions looking towards a future distribution of the estate.

Since then they have proceeded to service those funds, collect interest thereon, sell some of the more risky securities, and put uninvested cash into interest bearing United States Government securities.

Not only has a uniform proof of claim been prepared, but it has been agreed to and adopted by each of the de-

17. The West Virginia letter (R. 410) shows the agreement that sales of securities would not be made, pending the decision of this Court, merely for the purpose of liquidation, but only for other good and sufficient reasons. The Maryland letter (R. 412), stating that they "expect to work out mutually satisfactory arrangements with other interested State officials to dispose of the securities as advantageously as possible"; the Iowa letter, showing that individual liquidation would not be had until it was determined by a committee appointed by that conference group, whether it would not be more advantageous to sell the assets as a whole; further statement from the Iowa letter: "Iowa, as agreed at the conference, does not intend to step out of bounds on the liquidation, but will go along with the rest of the States in order that the best interests of all may be obtained." pository States, and distributed to the officials of those States. At the time this opposition brief is being written, the administrative machinery in every single one of the depository States is in action, either preparing to, or already having sent out a proof of claim to each contract holder in that State; West Virginia sending out proofs of claim to all State contract holders having no deposit in their own State, but who, under the laws of West Virginia, will look to the West Virginia fund for their protection. This, by agreement between officials, includes Virginia. Each of the depository States, as well as sending and receiving a proof of claim against their own State deposit, will forward to the contract holders and receive from them a proof of claim for any deficiency in that State fund which will necessitate a claim over against the West Virginia fund.[18] The State officials will collect all of these claims over against the West Virginia fund and they will be turned over en masse to the West Virginia officials, who will accept them, file them, and consider them as pro rata claims against the West Virginia fund.

Thus, the theoretical ideas of Petitioner that the contract holders will "be required to file claims in the courts of many States" (Petitioners' Brief p. 43), has been overruled by the practical applications of law by the States, as set out above, and other than those whose claims disagree with that which is shown on the books of the Debtor company, no contract holder will be required to do anything other than sign his name, under oath, to not more than two proofs of claim, one against his own State fund and the other against the West Virginia fund for any deficiency in his own State fund, and return those in one stamped self-addressed envelope, to the statutory official in his own State. Perhaps the simpleness of this plan has confused those in opposition to the States' position.

By the time this case is before this Court this matter will in all probability have been finished. So much for the impossibility of the States being able to perform that function.

There will be none of the fanciful and theoretical legal questions in the State proceedings which Petitioners claim to be necessary for the settlement of this estate (Petitioners' Brief p. 42-43). If at any time the legal interests of two or more States are, or appear to be, in conflict, agreements at the Charleston conference were entered into as to who the parties shall be, that their representation shall be by State officials, and the proper authorized legal forums have been selected. By declaratory judgments, advancement of the case for hearing and other rapid means of legal determination, these administrative problems will be submitted to the proper State Court, both sides being represented amicably, but earnestly, by their proper State officials, and a decision as to the legal rights involved will be promptly obtained and followed. We believe that the State Court in the State wherein such legal determination is necessary is better able to decide on the law of that State, and this being so for each of the fifteen States, than can one Federal Judge in Southern District of West Virginia, however learned he may be.[19] So did the Circuit Court of Appeals. (R. 386.)

19 Since the States have possession of the deposited securities and claim title to them, and in most instances have title, it may well be that should Federal jurisdiction be upheld, there would have to be brought by the Federal Trustee fifteen plenary suits in fifteen States, to attempt to recover possession of the deposited securities, thus adding to the perplexity of undecidable questions in Federal proceedings.

Thus, in less than thirty days from the handing down of the decision, a meeting (Charleston, W. Va., July 9-11) was held and matters settled and determined, and within two months, these State officials have proceeded with and performed that which the Federal Trustee, in fifteen months, is still studying about and wondering how to do, and which the Petitioners say cannot be done. In Federal Court there has as yet been no move made to have claims proved, or other than theoretical plans laid down as to how it shall be done.

Let us now look at the personnel of each side. In each State the deposited securities were under the custody and control of an official of that State. In most of the States the Attorney General has acted in the State proceedings as the official representative of that State officer (West Virginia, Illinois, Wisconsin, Delaware, Alabama, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Maryland), and in the others has acted in an advisory capacity (Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Tennessee).

In most of the States statutory actions have been instituted in proper State Courts, and the officials of those States are acting under the judicial guidance of those State Courts.

These respondents, although widely separated geographically, have worked amicably, interestedly, and purposefully together. They have divided the onerous duties of this litigation among themselves, some acting in Court as trial examiners, others making a research of the law and cases, others preparing motions, briefs, and other legal papers; they prepared and carried out successfully a joint and several appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals; they briefed the matter separately, some States acting jointly, but by agreement legal points were apportioned among the various States, and their individual efforts, without duplication, presented one joint brief in a united front. They are again attempting to do that in this Honorable Court.

This is the practical and working answer of the States to those opposed to them, who have contended that the States cannot and will not work together, and that it is necessary to have one central authority or control of the entire matter, that one to be a District Court, for all problems of law, and the other a private trust company and its attorneys, for the remaining matters.

In answer to the District Court's opinion in the National Surety case (Petitioners' Brief p. 45) in which he regretted being unable to exercise his salutary jurisdiction over the reorganization of that company, need it be said that that company, acting under State Insurance Commissioners and State Courts, has been successfully reorganized, and done so in a far less time than the five to ten years claimed needed here.

Some judges seem surprised to learn that there have been a large number of insurance companies in the United States reorganized successfully and as going concerns, and others liquidated successfully, and that every single one of these, without exception, has been done under the supervision and jurisdiction of the State statutory officials and the State Courts, either in a single State or in many States, acting jointly and cooperatively together. The experience of these States stands them in good stead in solving problems such as the instant one, and we submit they have demonstrated that experience by their actions to date.

On the other side, we have a private trust company with no experience in these matters, which is limited to trust work only and not even to the banking business. True, it has employed one of the West Virginia Receivers to head its home office there, has hired and kept on its payroll "financial advisors" and "investment counsel", and has had capable counsel appointed by the Federal Court for it, yet who still consults private counsel, and whose private counsel are now the Debtor's attorneys presenting this petition. It applied for an interim allowance of $22,500.00 as part payment for nine months' labor of holding and servicing less than one million dollars, at least fifty per cent of which is cash. All other expense, including the "experts" it hired, even to the filing clerks of its own company, have been paid from the funds of the contract holders in its possession, by virtue of orders of the District Court. The hearing had on these fees was after argument of the case to the Circuit Court of Appeals, and the Trustee was paid during that period, before the decision was rendered, the sum of $18,000.00 as interim allowance as part payment for this work, over objection of these respondents. True it is that the Trust Company, although supposedly a disinterested trustee, has entered this litigation and has attempted to sustain Debtor's petition and the jurisdiction of that Court which appointed it, and filed a brief in the Circuit Court of Appeals, and is now joining as a party to the presentation of this petition.

Therefore, it is respectfully submitted that not only can the contract holders' interests best be subserved by continuation of the proceedings in the States, but that they, by their actions and work, have rendered moot all of the supposedly difficult Federal questions raised in Debtor's petition. By practical application of the law by these experienced State administrators, they have performed everything which need be done in these proceedings except sell the securities and distribute the funds. They are prepared at the present time, and have offers of purchase for all or various parts of the deposited securities which can be accepted immediately. There will then be left only the task of distribution, which will be accomplished just as rapidly as possible, and in conformity with the speed with which they have acted in the other matters where they have been permitted so to do.

It is therefore urgently requested that this Court as quickly as possible dismiss the petition and allow these respondents, and the other States associated with them, to distribute the money as quickly as possible to the 87,999 contract holders, to whom it belongs and who so earnestly desire it, and who eagerly await the decision of this Honorable Court permitting them to obtain it.

Debtor's Petition Was Never Validly Filed or Ratified and Could Not Have Been Validly Ratified

As to the three purported meetings of the Debtor or its directors (June 3, September 17, and October 3, 1941), that of June 3rd was invalid and was properly so held by the District Court (R. 21; 42 F. Supp. at 983).

It was necessary for the directors to have a lawful and valid corporate meeting to authorize or ratify filing the petition, and that which a majority of them, acting in an invalid corporate meeting or acting in their individual capacity, did is not legally binding. They could act only as a body, their power not being joint and several in West Virginia, only joint.

Bruch v. National Guarantee Credit Corp., 13 Del. Ch. 180, 116 Atl. 738.

The meeting of September 17th was equally invalid, and it is submitted that even Mr. Ray, Debtor's attorney, so recognized this in seeking permission for the meeting of October 3rd, and actually abandoned any contention as to its validity (T. 2261, 2263). The District Court sustained the validity of the September 17th meeting on the ground that one who, without his knowledge or consent, is elected a director, and who thereafter immediately, in writing, refuses to accept the position, is nevertheless a director until his "resignation" is accepted by the board that elected him. That this proposition is fundamentally unsound is so apparent as not to require citation of but a few of many authorities.

The District Court held that the unauthorized filing of a petition by officers of a debtor under Chapter X was an act that could be ratified (R. 23) (42 F. Supp. 984). It is submitted that that action is so serious that ratification should never be permitted; also, ratification of a previously unauthorized act by a director then beneficially interested, would stand on no higher plane than the original act.

> "There is no presumption that any officer of a corporation, even its President, has power to authorize the filing of a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. The filing of such a petition is not part of the ordinary conduct of the business of the corporation and therefore requires special action by its board of directors or its stockholders, unless an officer is given express authority for that purpose in the corporate by-laws or certificate of incorporation."

The objections which were made in the District Court to the validity of the meeting of October 3rd, to-wit, that the District Court could not under Section 191 of Chapter X give permission for a violation of Section 9(a) of the Investment Company Act of 1940; that the majority of those requested to be elected directors and officers were subject to that injunctive order in the Securities and Exchange Commission suit in Detroit in 1938; that the Court refused to permit the equitable owners of the stock to vote it; that no listing was made of the stock represented by the stockholders present (T. 3000); that the Court rejected the suggestion that a disinterested person be present at those meetings (T. 2281); that John Marshall, as trustee, in violation of the state laws of West Virginia (Code 31-1-73) and in violation of all equity and fair play, voted 9570 shares out of 9887 shares to ratify his own acts and activities; and that those elected to the board of directors were his relatives and others subject to his own bidding, is sufficient, we submit, to sustain the proposition, without further argument, that there was no valid and legal corporate meetings; and thus never any valid ratification of the invalid meeting of June 3, 1941, and consequently there has never been any valid corporate authority for the filing of Debtor's petition in these proceedings.

II

PETITIONERS CANNOT RIGHTFULLY FILE PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

A

Trustee Has No Right to File Petition

Section 156 of Chapter X provides that the Trustee appointed shall be disinterested.

Section 158(4) provides that such a person shall not be deemed disinterested if it appears that he has, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in the Debtor, an interest materially adverse to the interests of any class of creditors. There is only one class of creditors in this case, that is the contract holders.

Throughout the hearings of the District Court, the Trustee's appointed attorneys engaged in that jurisdictional controversy on the side of the Debtor, undertook to sustain the Debtor's petition and the jurisdiction of the District Court, over numerous objections and exceptions of these respondents, that is the depository States and the contract holders. (T. 3620, 3625, 3634, 3642, 3644.)

The Trustee, through its appointed attorneys, filed a brief in the Circuit Court of Appeals attempting to sustain Debtor's position, and in opposition to that of these respondents. The West Virginia appellants therein challenged the right of the Trustee and its attorneys to appear on behalf of the Debtor, and their right to attempt to sustain Debtor's petition and the jurisdiction of the District Court, and moved to strike that brief from the proceedings (R. 358). This motion was not acted upon by the Circuit Court of Appeals.

It is undisputed that Mr. Ray and Mr. Holt, the capable attorneys now representing Debtor, each belong to a firm of attorneys each of which is general counsel for Central Trust Company, the Trustee herein.

Therefore, it is submitted that the Trustee has, in violation of the provisions of Chapter X, not been disinterested; has been interested in the Debtor, both directly and indirectly; and has shown, and is showing, an interest adverse to the contract holders, the true creditors herein.

The only decided case on this question holds that the Trustee has no right, in circumstances such as these, to apply for writ of certiorari.

Loomis v. Gila County, 103 F. (2d) 312, Certiorari denied, 307 U. S. 643.

"The trustee is not concerned with the merits of the petition under Section 77B or its dismissal."

And its appeal from a dismissal of a debtor's petition was refused.

Therefore, the Trustee is not a proper party to the petition for writ of certiorari in the case at bar.

B

Those Purporting To Act for Debtor Have No Right to File Instant Petition

INTEREST OF DEBTOR IN THE APPLICATION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

Other than as set forth herein above, there has been no corporate authorization by the Debtor for filing the petition for writ of certiorari, nor for attorneys to appear in its behalf, and no corporate authority for its present attorneys to act in its behalf or to represent it. Apparently John Marshall, acting under the resolution which he himself passed by virtue of the stock trusteed in him, is employing attorneys and spending money belonging to the contract holders in carrying on this vain and useless controversy.

Therefore, there having been no valid meeting of the Debtor corporation before the petition was filed, and the act being such a one that it could not and should not be permitted to be ratified, and the attempts to ratify it being unlawful and invalid, the original petition was invalidly filed, the filing thereof was never validly ratified, and therefore the judgment rendered by the Circuit Court of Appeals should not be disturbed.

As set forth in the District Court's opinion, the Debtor is insolvent in a bankruptcy sense, in that on the basis of market values its liabilities exceed its assets by approximately ten per cent. (R. 30) (42 F. Supp., at 986).

Those stockholders who are attempting to continue this controversy, on the witness stand, stated emphatically not only that they had no new money themselves to invest in the company, but that for several years prior to the institution of these proceedings vigorous attempts had been undertaken to procure new capital, and every means tried was unavailing (R. 384).

For the stockholders to participate in any plan of reorganization under such facts as these, that participation must be based on a contribution in money or moneys worth. Mere management or agreement for further management is not sufficient. Case v. Los Angeles, supra.

In the case at bar, however, the District Court repeatedly reiterated that those who had formerly been the managers of the company and been in control thereof would never be permitted by the Court in the future to participate in its management or its affairs.

> "To hold that in a 77B reorganization creditors of a hopelessly insolvent debtor may be forced to share the already insufficient assets with stockholders, because apart from rehabilitation under that section they would suffer a worse fate (liquidation), would disregard the standards of 'fair and equitable;' and would result in impairment of the Act to the extent that it restored some of the conditions which the Congress sought to ameliorate by that remedial legislation. * * * junior interests must be excluded unless they furnish adequate consideration for the interest which they obtain in the new company."
> Case v. Los Angeles Lbr. Products Co., supra:

Therefore, under the ruling of this Court in the Los Angeles case, these stockholders can never participate in any reorganization as under the rulings of the District Court and the Circuit Court of Appeals, they have no equity remaining.

It is therefore submitted that they have no legitimate interest in petitioning this Court for a writ of certiorari, using Debtor's name therefor, particularly as even under the apparent decision of the District Court the only possible future in Chapter X proceedings for Fidelity is a liquidation, even though slow and orderly.

Stockholders' Plan to Obtain Contract Holders' Funds

We use the word "legitimate" above advisedly, because these respondents contend that these stockholders are motivated by unfair and inequitable reasons in attempting to retain the proceedings under Chapter X.

While both the Courts below have held there is no equity remaining for the stockholders, yet it is submitted that such is not their belief, and an examination of Chapter X discloses why the stockholders are so interested in retaining these proceedings, while paying lip service to the phrase "for the best interests of contract holders."

Section 204 of Chapter X provides that upon distribution, which should, of course, be a part of the District Court's stated idea of a slow and orderly liquidation, the judge may fix a time, not sooner than five years after closing the estate, after which no claimant or stockholder shall participate in distribution under the plan.

Evidence was offered, and we think it is a recognized fact, that of the 87,000 contract holders, a certain percentage would file no claim or would be impossible to locate. Should this number be even as low as twenty per cent, and should the rest be paid in full, of the approximately twenty million dollars of Fidelity's assets, this could leave four million undistributed.

If the Debtor were reorganized by way of rehabilitation, as these respondents insist is the only correct interpretation of Chapter X, this undistributed sum would be transferred to the rehabilitated corporation, and consequently to the benefit of the contract holders, the only true creditors.

Under the District Court's theory of slow liquidation, and not rehabilitation, under Section 205 of Chapter X, it is provided what would be done with this undistributed sum.

> "The securities or cash remaining unclaimed at the expiration of the time, as provided in Section 204 of this Act, or any evidence thereof, shall become the property of the debtor or of the corporation acquiring the assets of the debtor under the plan, as the case may be, free and clear of any and all claims and interest."

There is no exception made to this section, and since there would be no new corporation acquiring Debtor's assets under the plan of a slow and orderly liquidation, this sum of at least four million dollars would be RETURNED TO THE DEBTOR, which, in this case, means the STOCKHOLDERS.

It was earlier presumed that since the District Court had frequently reiterated throughout the hearings that the stockholders had no interest in the Debtor's assets, that the District Court would take means to prevent this occurrence from happening.

However, a decision by the District Court on June 11, 1942, in Sanders v. Chandler, U. S. D. C. E. Pa. (Moore, D. J.), 11 Law Weekly 2040 (being the same Judge who decided the case at bar in the District Court below, being assigned to Pennsylvania temporarily), leads to the inevitable conclusion that the result which the stockholders seek, that is, the escheat to them of the funds belonging to the contract holders, would be decided in their favor by that District Court.

In the Sanders case the District Court held, with reference to an insolvent National Bank, and a Pennsylvania statute providing for escheat to the State of unclaimed funds in the hands of such a receiver, that such statute is invalid.

The Court's reasons were that unclaimed funds were not actually such, "unless the total moneys in his (the Comptroller's) hands be more than enough to pay in full the creditors who have proved claims." Merely because some depositors failed to make a claim does not necessarily result in unclaimed funds, nor does it serve to earmark particular funds as property of such depositors.

> "All of the funds on deposit in the bank, other than those held in trust, belong to the bank, and upon insolvency are to be distributed ratably by the Comptroller to the creditors who prove their claims under the law. Only in case a surplus exists after proven claims have been paid in full may a receiver for a National Bank be said to have unclaimed funds in his hands. As I have already pointed out, even this surplus must under the federal statutes be distributed to the stockholders. * * *"

The States who have these funds on deposit can hold them indefinitely for the contract holders. In any event, it is submitted that since the contract holders stand to suffer loss by virtue of any market or other depreciation of the deposited securities, that the deposited fund belongs entirely to the contract holders, and they should receive any appreciation in it, by any means whatsoever, and in no event should the stockholders be permitted to share in the deposited funds.

All of the costs and expenses of these proceedings under Chapter X, including all of the Debtor's expenses for summoning of witnesses, paying transportation therefor, paying of court costs, expenses of counsel, not including counsel fees, payment of costs of printing records and briefs, have been paid out of the funds in the hands of the Trustee which belong exclusively to, and should be for the benefit of, the contract holders alone.

Since it is apparent that the stockholders who are applying, in the Debtor's name, for the issuance of a writ of certiorari have no equitable interest in the Debtor's former assets, and are by the above indirect and subtle means attempting to accumulate for themselves in the future a really substantial sum of money which, as well, belongs solely to the contract holders, they should have no standing to file their petition in this Court.

And since these stockholders were the former directors of the Debtor, and as such trustees for its assets on insolvency for the benefit of the same contract holders, and since their purported corporate activities were in violation of their trust or fiduciary duties, and since their attempts to accumulate a fund for themselves in the future could not and would not happen in the event the State proceedings are continued, it is respectfully submitted that this Court should deny the petition for writ of certiorari and permit the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals dismissing the purported Debtor's petition filed in the case at bar to be carried into effect.

ADDENDUM

There were certain other issues raised in the District Court (42 F. Supp. 981) by these respondents which were briefed and argued to the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 363), which latter Court neither discussed nor decided these questions (R. 363), but which, it is submitted, were of such substantial intrinsic worth that they would support and uphold the correctness of the decision and judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals in and of themselves.

III

Deposits of securities were required to be made by Fidelity by the laws of each of thirteen different States and such deposits were so made. These deposits were made either with the State itself or with an official of that State, usually as Trustee for the benefit of contract holders in that particular State. It is contended, especially where the deposit was made with the Sovereign State itself, as in West Virginia, the officials of those States, such as the West Virginia Auditor, who had possession, custody or control of those deposited funds, are protected from suit, order or the jurisdiction of the District Court by the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and clothed with immunity thereby, so that they and the deposited funds were not subject to the jurisdiction of the District Court in these proceedings.

Under Code of West Virginia, Chapter 33, Article 9, Section 3, it was provided for the Insurance Commissioner to require a deposit with the State Treasurer from such companies as the Debtor, "in accordance with Article 5, Chapter 12" to be held in trust for the benefit of contract holders for their security; and Section 2 of that latter article and chapter provides that the Treasurer of West Virginia "shall be the custodian of all securities belonging to the State of West Virginia or required to be deposited with the State."

The various laws of the other States required deposits of securities to be made either with the State itself or with some official of the State, for the benefit and protection of the contract holders, and in many instances, with an actual transfer of title to the securities. In West Virginia, after Debtor's license was revoked or expired, which it admittedly did no later than April 4, 1941, the deposit was to "remain under the authority and control of the Insurance Commissioner", who is the Auditor (Code W. Va. 33-9-10).

By virtue of this section and by reason of the S. E. C. report (Exhibit 6 of the instant case) at page 124, Note 12[20] even the residual interest, if any[21], of the Debtor in the deposited securities, no longer remained on June 6, 1941, the date the petition was filed.

Therefore, these respondents have contended, and still contend that, by virtue of the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the District Court had no jurisdiction over either the deposited funds or over that Sovereign State which required a deposit, or the State official who had custody and control and administrative charge thereof.

Restatement of the Law of Trusts, Sec. 95, p. 264[22].

20 "In the collateral trust, face-amount certificate, the securities are pledged merely to secure the company's obligation, and the company has a contingent right in the securities so deposited and their earnings SO LONG AS ITS OBLIGATIONS ARE DISCHARGED."

21 On the basis of market values, Debtor has had no residual interest in the deposited funds in West Virginia for at least nine years (R. 383).

22 "The United States or a State has capacity to take and hold property in trust, but in the absence of a statute otherwise providing, the trust is unenforceable against the United States or a State."

Lankford v. Platt Iron Works, 235 U. S. 461, 59 L. Ed. 316.

Farish v. State Banking Board, 235 U. S. 498, 59 L. Ed. 330.

Numerous other cases and authorities were cited in support of this contention below, but which, in this brief in opposition, we feel need not now concern this Court.

IV

The principal office of the Debtor was in the Northern District of West Virginia, and the only assets available to constitute "principal assets" of the Debtor within the territorial jurisdiction of the District Court for Southern West Virginia were the funds on deposit with the State of West Virginia. Since by virtue of Point I above (Eleventh Amendment), they were not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, and since the Debtor did not even retain a residual interest in those funds, then the petition should have been dismissed because of improper venue.

These respondents submit that the term "principal assets" as used in Section 128 of Chapter X means only those assets capable of being taken into possession by the Trustee and susceptible of administration by it.

This is true because of the ancestry of Chapter X, derived from the federal equity receivership rules, as set forth in Finletter "The Law of Bankruptcy Reorganization", page 23. On pages 86 and 91, the author clearly sustains this contention of these respondents, and there being no other assets of the Debtor within the territorial jurisdiction of the District Court, clearly venue was improperly laid.

The District Court only has jurisdiction of the Debtor and "its property wherever located". Sec. 111 of Chapter X. But in West Virginia, Maryland, Iowa and many of the other depository States, legal title to the deposited securities was required to be, by their depository statute, and actually was, transferred to the depository State or proper official thereof. Equitable title, or beneficial interest, was by statute in the contract holders. As shown by the record, at least in the great majority of the depository States, there was not and had not for some years been any actual residual interest for the Debtor. Therefore, the Debtor was at the institution of these proceedings no more the owner of the deposited securities than is the settler of a conventional trust the owner of property transferred in trust by him.

Warner v. Brady, 115 F. (2d) 89.

Therefore, the District Court had no jurisdiction over such deposited securities.

V

The State statutes regulating the Debtor and requiring deposits of its securities were enacted under the police power reserved to the States, and if Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act were construed to grant to a Federal Court the power to enter a decree in conflict with such State statutes, it would violate the Tenth Amendment to the Constituion of the United States.

These State statutes provided in detail for the regulation of the business conducted by companies such as the Debtor, the most important of which was that requiring a deposit of securities to be held in trust for the benefit and protection of the contract holders, such deposit to be made with the State or some official thereof. Congress, under its bankruptcy powers, could not set aside State statutes on matters of such important public policy without setting at naught the entire theory of State sovereignty; and because the powers of the Federal Government are by the Constitution always subject to the implied limitation that the rights of the Sovereign States reserved by them cannot be transgressed.

Hopkins Federal Savings & Loan Asso. v. Cleary, 296 U. S. 315.

Ashton v. Cameron County District, 298 U. S. 513.

VI

The delivery of securities by the Debtor under the depository laws of the various States constituted contracts in the public authority within the meaning of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.

Section 116(1) of Chapter X provides that the Judge may permit rejection of executory contracts of the Debtor "except contracts in public authority." These same quoted words are used in Section 216(4).

Respondents contend that these deposits did constitute such contracts made in the public authority, the Debtor having accepted the terms and provisions of these statutes, in order to be permitted to do business in each of the depository States, and that, therefore, the District Judge could not permit them to be rejected.

CONCLUSION

It is respectfully submitted that the petitioners have shown no jurisdiction whereby the petition should be granted, and have shown no reasons, in law or fact, which would justify this Court in granting the petition, and that respondents have set forth many substantial grounds why the petition should be dismissed, and the urgency therefor, it is respectfully submitted that the petition should be dismissed and the writ of certiorari should not be issued.

Respectfully submitted,

Statutes Considered in this Brief

(Only pertinent parts are quoted)

Federal Statutes

Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act as amended by the Act of June 25, 1910, 36 Stt. 839, 11 U. S. C. A. 22:

> 22. Bankrupts; who may become. (a) Any person, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation, shall be entitled to the benefits of this title as a voluntary bankrupt.
>
> (b) Any natural person, except a wage earner or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil, any unincorporated company, and any moneyed, business, or commercial corporation, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation, owing debts to the amount of $1,000 or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this title.

Section 141, Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 541):

> Upon the filing of a petition by a debtor, the judge shall enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it if not so satisfied.

Section 144, Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 544):

> If an answer filed by any creditor, indenture trustee, or stockholder shall controvert any of the material allegations of the petition, the judge shall, as soon as may be, determine, without the intervention of a jury, the issues presented by the pleadings and enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith and that the material allegations are sustained by the proofs, or dismissing it if not so satisfied.

Section 146 (3) and (4), Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 546):

> Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term "good faith", a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if—
>
> • • •
>
> (3) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected; or
>
> (4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding.

Section 150 of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 556):

> Upon the approval of a petition, the judge shall, if the indebtedness of a debtor, liquidated as to amount and not contingent as to liability, is $250,000 or over, appoint one or more trustees. Any trustee appointed under this chapter shall be disinterested and shall have the qualifications prescribed in section 73 of this title, except that the trustee need not reside or have his office within the district. • • •

Section 158(4), Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A, 558):

> A person shall not be deemed disinterested, for the purposes of section 556 and section 557 of this title, if—
>
> • • •
>
> (4) it appears that he has, by reason of any other direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in the debtor or such underwriter, or for any reason an interest materially adverse to the interests of any class of creditors or stockholders.

Section 191, Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 591):

> "• • • No person shall become an officer or director of the debtor, to fill a vacancy or otherwise, without the prior approval of the court."

Section 9(a) of the Investment Company Act of 1940 (15 U. S. C. A, Sec. 80a-9(a)):

> (a) It shall be unlawful for any of the following persons to serve or act in the capacity of officer, director, member of an advisory board, investment adviser, or depositor of any registered investment company, or principal underwriter for any registered open-end company, registered unit investment trust, or registered face-amount certificate company:
>
> • • •
> (2) any person who, by reason of any misconduct, is permanently or temporarily enjoined by order, judgment, or decree of any court of competent jurisdiction from acting as an underwriter, broker, dealer, or investment adviser, or as an affiliated person, salesman or employee of any investment company, bank, or insurance company, or from engaging in or continuing any conduct or practice in connection with any such activity or in connection with the purchase or sale of any security;

• • •

(b) Any person who is ineligible, by reason of subsection (a), to serve or act in the capacities enumerated in that subsection, may file with the Commission an application for an exemption from the provisions of that subsection. The Commission shall by order grant such application, either unconditionally or on an appropriate temporary or other conditional basis, if it is established that the prohibitions of subsection (a), as applied to such person, are unduly or disproportionately severe or that the conduct of such person has been such as not to make it against the public interest or protection of investors to grant such application.

Section 111, Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 511):

Where not inconsistent with the provisions of this chapter, the court in which a petition is filed shall, for the purposes of this chapter, have exclusive jurisdiction of the debtor and its property, wherever located.

Sec. 116(1), Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 516):

Upon the approval of a petition, the judge may, in addition to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties hereinabove and elsewhere in this chapter conferred and imposed upon him and the court—

• • •

(1) permit the rejection of executory contracts of the debtor, except contracts in the public authority, upon notice to the parties to such contracts and to such other parties in interest as the judge may designate; * * *

Sec. 128, Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 528):

If no bankruptcy proceeding is pending, an original petition may be filed with the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the corporation has had its principal place of business or its principal assets for the preceding six months or for a longer portion of the preceding six months than in any other jurisdiction.

Section 216(4), Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 616):

A plan of reorganization under this chapter—

(4) may provide for the rejection of any executory contract except contracts in the public authority; * * *

Constitution of the United States:

Tenth Amendment:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Eleventh Amendment:

The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

West Virginia Statutes

Code of West Virginia (Ch. ____, Art. ____, Sec.____):

31-1-73:

Any stock corporation of this State, except * * * insurance companies, may, by stipulation and grant of particular powers in its charter, authorize any two or more of its stockholders, by agreement in writing to be filed in the office of the corporation, to vest in some person, * * * as voting trustees, the exclusive right to vote the shares of stock of the parties to such agreement, upon all questions * * *."

12-5-2:

Treasurer Custodian of Securities.—The treasurer of this State, unless otherwise expressly provided by law, shall be custodian of all securities belonging to the State of West Virginia or by law required to be deposited with the State or held in legal custody by the State, and all departments of this State, commissioners or agents of the State, who hold any such securities, shall transfer and deliver the same to the state treasurer to be kept and held by him as legal custodian thereof until released in the manner provided by law.

12-5-6:

Whenever, by statute of this State, any public official, board, commission or department of this State is charged with the approval of securities required as collateral for the deposit of public or other funds, or required to be deposited with the state treasurer, or an investment of capital or surplus or a reserve or other fund, is required to be maintained consisting of designated securities deposited with the state treasurer, such securities shall, at the discretion of such public official, board, commission or department, be deemed to include and mean notes executed by the person or corporation required to make such deposit and made payable to the state of West Virginia upon demand, in the event of insolvency or default by such person or corporation, for the benefit of those for whom such securities are deposited, * * *.

Deposits to Be Made with the Treasurer.—Before a license to transact business in this State shall be issued by the insurance commissioner to any person, association, or corporation within the purview of section one (s. 3446) of this article, the insurance commissioner shall require the applicant to deposit with the state treasurer (in accordance with article five, chapter twelve of this code), in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders, bonds of the state of West Virginia, or such other bonds, and securities including bonds issued by the West Virginia bridge commission as may be approved by said insurance commissioner, or both, to the aggregate amount of one hundred thousand dollars, and, in addition to such deposit, such person, association or corporation shall maintain at all times a deposit with the state treasurer of bonds and securities approved by the insurance commissioner to an amount equal to the total amount which such person, association or corporation may be liable to pay in cash to the holders of all contracts under the terms thereof at the time of the deposit: Provided, That when, by the laws of any other state, any such person, association or corporation shall have been required to make and shall have made such deposit in such state, equal or greater in amount for the benefit of contract holders in such state, upon the filing of a certificate to such effect from the proper officer in such state with the insurance commissioner of this State, such person, association or corporation shall not be required to make such deposit with the treasurer of this State for the benefit of its contract holders in such other state; and when the laws of any other state require such deposit less in amount, such person, association or corporation shall file a certificate from the proper officer in such state with the insurance commissioner of this State showing the amount of the deposit made, and shall deposit with the treasurer of this State an amount which, together with the deposit made in such other state, shall make up the total amount required by this State to be deposited by such person, association or corporation, and such contract holders in such other state shall not be entitled to the benefit of the securities deposited with the treasurer of this State under this article, except so much of such deposit as may be made to complete the total amount required by this article where the law of any other state requires a lesser amount.

33-9-10:

Authority of Insurance Commissioner; Control of Deposit Where License Revoked.—The insurance commissioner shall have the same authority over every person, association, or corporation engaged in selling annuity contracts, certificates, or bonds, as over insurance companies, and if in his opinion the assets are impaired or such person, association or corporation is not complying with the law, said commissioner shall have authority to revoke the license of such person, association, or corporation to do business in this State, and, if such license is so revoked, the deposit or a sufficient amount of same, shall remain under the authority and control of the insurance commissioner until the total liability of all the contracts, certificates or annuity bonds or contracts issued by such person, association or corporation in this State is redeemed or settled.

33-2-45:

Proceedings in Circuit Court of Kanawha County against Insolvent Company.—Whenever any company under the supervision and regulation of the insurance commissioner shall become insolvent or shall be in such financial condition as not to be able to pay its creditors in this State, the commissioner of insurance may file a bill in the circuit court of Kanawha county for the administering of the assets of such company as an insolvent, and for the purpose of taking possession of its property in this State and the distribution of its assets among those entitled thereto according to their respective right.

33-2-12:

Time Licenses Shall Continue in Force.—All licenses, or certificates of authority issued by the insurance commissioner to insurance companies or associations, or agents, solicitors or brokers, shall continue in force until the first day of April next following their issuance unless the same be sooner revoked.

Article VI, Section 35, Constitution of West Virginia:

The State of West Virginia shall never be made defendant in any court of law or equity, except the state of West Virginia, including any subdivision thereof, or any municipality therein, or any officer, agent, or employee thereof, may be made defendant in any garnishment or attachment proceeding, as garnishee or suggestee.

ARGUMENT

I. THE PETITION FOR CERTIORARI AND SUPPORTING BRIEF DISCLOSE NO GROUNDS FOR THE ISSUANCE OF THE WRIT TO REVIEW THE FINDING THAT FIDELITY WAS AN INSURANCE CORPORATION ..... 20

A. Fidelity was chartered, licensed and did business as a life insurance corporation under the laws of West Virginia ..... 20

B. Fidelity's charter purposes were such after the amendment on December 31, 1940 as to constitute it a life insurance corporation according to the generally recognized classification of such corporations by the States of the United States 21

C. Fidelity's activities after its charter amendment were those of an insurance corporation ..... 22

D. Petitioners' arguments considered ..... 25

1. The point (petitioners' point No. 4) that Fidelity was not classified as an insurance corporation under the law of West Virginia ..... 25

2. The point (petitioners' point No. 3) that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is probably in conflict with applicable decisions of this Court ..... 26

3. The point (petitioners' point No. 5) that there is a conflict with decisions of other circuit courts of appeal ..... 28

4. The point (petitioners' point No. 1) that the Investment Company Act of 1940 has classified corporations such as Fidelity as other than life insurance corporations ..... 35

a. The point is not open here as it was not raised in the court below ..... 35

*b. 5. The point (petitioners' point No. 2) that a federal question is presented which has not been but should be settled by this Court ..... 40

VIEW THE DETERMINATION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT THAT FIDELITY'S PETITION FOR REORGANIZATION WAS NOT FILED IN GOOD FAITH ..... 42

A. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the prior proceedings pending in the state courts would best subserve the interests of creditors is a determination based upon an examination and appraisal of the facts in this particular case ..... 42

B. No principles as to the application of subsection (4) of Section 146 of Chapter 10 to control in future cases would result by a review in this Court of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals on this point ..... 45

C. The Circuit Court of Appeals did not decide that reorganization within the meaning of subsection (3) of Section 146 of Chapter 10 excluded a "slow and orderly liquidation" ..... 48

D. The conclusion of the Circuit Court of Appeals is obvious under the facts and a review of its decision would serve only to prolong needless litigation to the irreparable damage of contract holders ..... 51

E. The determination of the rights of contract holders in the trust funds securing their contracts in the various states is exclusively a question of state law to be determined by the state courts, and the state court proceedings should not be further delayed ..... 56

GODFREY, Missouri State Court Receiver; L. H. BROOKS, Trustee, FREDERIC LEAKE and A. L. GOLDBERG, Jr., Trustee; and SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION, Respondents.

Brief of Respondents, Banking Commission of Wisconsin and Chas. R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance and Permanent Receiver for the State of Iowa in Opposition to Petition for Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the District Court (R. 3) is reported in 42 F. Supp. 973. The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 362) is reported in 129 F. (2d) 442.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The statement of the case made by the petitioners in their petition and supporting brief is in many respects complete and accurate. There are certain important omissions, however, to which attention should be invited. To a certain extent this will require repetition of matters stated by petitioners, since it is impossible to supplement their statements in a piecemeal manner and at the same time to give an account of the matter in controversy which is readily understandable.

The supplementary statement which we feel compelled to make is rendered rather difficult by the fragmentary record which has been printed. Some of the material to which we shall refer is not found in the printed record. In cases where such references are made, we refer to statements in the reporter's transcript in the District Court, as, (T. —). Exhibits not found in the printed record are referred to as (Ex. — T. —). Thus, the exhibit and page of the reporter's transcript at which the exhibit was introduced is noted. We recognize that in so identifying matters which are found in the complete unprinted record we are not literally complying with the rules of this Court. On the other hand, we know of no other way in which the matter can be properly presented in view of the petitioners' failure to print a complete record or to arrange for a stipulation covering relevant material.

A. Statement as to the status of petitioner, Fidelity Assurance Association, as an insurance corporation

As appears from the petitioners' statement and from the opinions in both of the lower courts, Fidelity was originally incorporated on April 11, 1911, and with one charter change in November, 1912, operated as an annuity company until December 31, 1940. It is also pointed out by petitioners that from November, 1912 until December 31, 1940, Fidelity's activity brought it within the scope of art. 9, entitled "Annuity Contracts" of Ch. 33, entitled "Insurance and Annuity Contracts," of the West Virginia Code, which reads in part:

> "No person, association or corporation shall engage in the business of soliciting or receiving deposits or payments on any annuity contract or certificate or annuity bond in fixed and stipulated installments, within this State, without first having obtained from the insurance commissioner a license to do business in this State: Provided, however, That this article shall not be construed as applying to persons, associations or corporations engaged in selling merchandise in installments, insurance companies, foreign or domestic, duly authorized to do business in this State, building and loan associations, national banks and banking institutions organized and authorized to do business under the laws of this State, fraternal insurance societies, or surety companies doing business under the laws of this State. Such license shall be issued for one year, or the fractional part of a year, and for issuing the same a fee of ten dollars shall be charged; and the provisions of section twelve, article two of this chapter [which provide for expiration April 1 each year] shall apply to such license." (Ch. 33, art. 9, sec. 1, West Virginia Code)

On December 31, 1940 Fidelity's articles were amended changing its name to Fidelity Assurance Association, striking from its articles all of its prior corporate purposes and inserting in lieu thereof the following statement of its sole corporate purpose:

"To issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and connected therewith, and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities." (Ex. 24; T. 497)

At the time of this charter amendment the statutes of West Virginia read in part:

"Life insurance companies chartered by and doing business in this State, and empowered to make contracts contingent upon life, may grant and issue annuities, either in connection with or separate from contracts of insurance based upon life risks, and all such annuities heretofore issued by such companies shall be valid." (Ch. 33, art. 3, sec. 7, West Virginia Code)

On the day of its charter change to an insurance corporation, Fidelity was licensed by the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia to engage in the life insurance business (Ex. 24; T. 497). Under the provisions of West Virginia law, all licenses issued by the Commissioner of Insurance expire on April 1, Ch. 33, art. 2, sec. 12, West Virginia Code, and consequently the insurance company license expired on April 1, 1941. At that time application was made for a new license which was made out but withheld by the Insurance Commissioner (R. 361), who instituted receivership proceedings a few days later.

The insurance company license was issued under what has been termed a "gentlemen's agreement" between the Commissioner and Fidelity that no insurance policies or annuity contracts would be sold pending specific permission by the Commissioner. The Insurance Commissioner stated that the insurance license was granted in order that Fidelity could continue to receive payments under existing annuity contracts (T. 509)

It is conceded by the petitioners in this Court (Pet. for cert. p. 7), and was conceded in both of the lower courts that Fidelity's object in amending its corporate charter was to escape the regulation imposed by the Investment Company Act of 1940.

As expressed by A. L. King, who had been a director, assistant treasurer, vice-president, comptroller and secretary of Fidelity for many years, "Well, with the amended S. E. C. Statute—whatever you call it—coming into force on January 1st, we knew previous to that time that we could not continue to sell our contracts as Fidelity Assurance—Investment Association after that date. We felt, in view of the fact that we had been selling an insured contract for a period of four or five years which appealed to the public, that we could convert our association into an insurance company and broaden our field of activity to include other types of insurance and make a specialty of the sale of an insured contract that would pass the requirements of the State Insurance Commissioner." (T. 1721-1722).

The Circuit Court of Appeals found that the object of the change to an insurance company was to escape the Investment Company Act of 1940 (R. 379).

On the day that the insurance company license was issued, a meeting of Fidelity's board of directors was held. The minutes of the board for that meeting read in part:

"The directors were informed that the Secretary of State of West Virginia certified the amendment authorizing the corporation to change its name to Fidel-

[1]The change to an insurance company was made December 31, 1940. The regulatory provisions of the Investment Company Act of 1940 which had been enacted on August 22, 1940 were to become effective January 1, 1941 as to transactions in annuities by companies such as Fidelity had theretofore been. 15 U. S. C. A. 80a-52.

ity Assurance Association as of December 31, 1940. The directors were also advised that the Auditor and Insurance Commissioner ex-officio of West Virginia has issued a license to the company as a life insurance company on the same date." (P. 156 of Ex. 100; T. 2863)

The minutes further show at the designated page and exhibit that it was moved and adopted that the company, since it was now a qualified and licensed life insurance company, should thereafter assume the insurance feature of its outstanding Series B contracts carrying that feature. The minutes also show that the president was instructed to immediately send out to contract holders a letter, and a rider to be attached to Series B contracts.

The letter and rider read as follows:

"Organized 1911

FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION
Wheeling, West Virginia
Offices in Principal Cities
December 31, 1940

Dear Contract-owner:

It is with pleasure and confidence that we direct your attention to the change in our name and the widening of the scope of our business to that of issuing insurance on the lives of persons. In the future, the company will be known as Fidelity Assurance Association and will offer a complete line of life insurance policies of all types and classes, including life annuities.

These changes enable us, as a qualified legal reserve life insurance company to assume the risks and obligations provided in Section 6 of your contract. As you know, this Section makes available to you insurance covering all monthly payments not yet made in event of your death. Such insurance protection has, in the past, been procured from a legal reserve life insurance company, but was subject to cancellation, upon due notice, at any time. With the making of your regular monthly payments and the Association assuming the insurance, this condition has been eliminated.

By resolution of the Board of Directors and by the rider enclosed in duplicate, the Association assumes and itself agrees to fulfill and pay the risk and obligations of the insurance policy and of the insurance company mentioned in Section 6 of your contract. The original of the rider is to be signed and attached to your Income Reserve Contract, Series B and the other (the blue one) signed and returned to the Association in the enclosed envelope.

Cordially yours,

F. S. Risley

FsR:GA

F. S. RISLEY, President

N. B. The number of the contract to which the rider is to be attached and be a part is found at the bottom of the rider."

"FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION ASSUMPTION OF RISK AND RIDER ATTACHED TO AND A PART OF INCOME RESERVE CONTRACT SERIES "B" NUMBER

The Association, having so amended its charter as to authorize it to issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and to grant and dispose of annuities, and to change its name to Fidelity Assurance Association, in consideration of the monthly payments, provided for in the above numbered contract hereby assumes and does itself hereby agree to fulfill and pay all the risks and obligations of the insurance policy and the insurance company mentioned in Section 6 of said contract.

It is hereby agreed between the Association and the contract holder that this insurance agreement shall become and be a part of said contract and the original shall be attached thereto.

Executed in duplicate at Wheeling, West Virginia this 31st day of December, 1940.

FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION

F. S. Risley
President

Contract Owner."

At the hearing in the District Court Fidelity's officials testified that no insurance contracts had been written by the company. The fact that such contracts had been written was not then known by those opposing the petition. Pending the hearing in the Circuit Court of Appeals, it was discovered that insurance contracts composed of executed riders had been entered into. The matter was brought to the attention of the Circuit Court of Appeals by motion to remand the case, and in connection with the consideration of the motion and the case, counsel for Fidelity, by written stipulation in open court, conceded that 9,802 contracts of insurance had been entered into after December 31, 1940 by reason of execution and return of the riders to which attention has been called (R. 361).

Petitioners now assert at p. 10 of their petition that Fidelity did not assume these insurance obligations because it was never authorized to engage in the insurance business in West Virginia and the insurance obligations continued to be carried by the Lincoln National Life Insurance Company as they were before. They refer to the "record" at p. 356 in support of these statements.

At the argument in the Circuit Court of Appeals the matter of Fidelity's life insurance license was a subject of considerable controversy. When confronted with a certified copy of the license which had been issued (see Ex. 24, T. 497) and by the direct testimony of the Commissioner of Insurance that it had been issued (T. 500), with no evidence to the contrary, petitioners abandoned all claim that no such license was issued, and the Court found that the license was issued.

So far as appears, Fidelity continued to keep in force in Lincoln National Life Insurance Company the group insurance policy which covered its Series B contracts and for which it exacted payment from the contract holders, and the Court so found.

Aside from the assumption of liability on the 9,802 insurance contracts, Fidelity transacted no new business after it was chartered and licensed as a life insurance company. It issued no further annuity contracts and confined its annuity business to accepting payments on existing contracts, paying out on matured contracts and making contract loans (Op. D. C., R. 11-12).

During this period Fidelity filed proposed forms of new annuity and life insurance policies with the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia pursuant to the provisions of the law as a condition precedent to the sale of such policies (Op. C. C. A., R. 367), and on January 24, 1941 again amended its charter to reduce its authorized capital stock to $1,000,000 shares of common stock, of a par value of $8.00 per share. The resolution authorizing the change stated that it was in pursuance of a plan to transact life insurance business outside the State of West Virginia (Op. C. C. A., R. 367).

Of further significance is the fact that Fidelity by letter withdrew its registration with the Wisconsin Banking Commission as an investment company, effective December 31, 1940. It advised the Commission in connection with this withdrawal that it was entering the field of life insurance (Ex. 93, T. 2444).

B. Statement as to Fidelity's good faith in filing the petition for reorganization.

The Circuit Court of Appeals decided that the prior proceedings pending in the state courts would best subserve the interests of Fidelity's creditors. Petitioners seek to have this determination reviewed, but few facts are set forth in the petition as to the nature of the proceedings in the various state courts (such facts were fully developed on the record), and, therefore, in order that the interest and position of these respondents may be made clear, we deem it desirable to point out certain facts as to the nature and history of Fidelity's operations in Wisconsin and Iowa and the nature and history of the proceedings instituted in Wisconsin and Iowa and in other states prior to the filing of debtor's petition for reorganization.

1. The operations and proceedings in Wisconsin

In Wisconsin, Fidelity was licensed to sell its contracts from June 26, 1930 to the close of 1940. It was licensed annually under Chapter 216 of the Wisconsin Statutes (R. 40-41) pertaining to "investment associations." Under this chapter it was subject in Wisconsin to all of the laws of Wisconsin pertaining to foreign building and loan associations. Sec. 215.38, Wis. Stats. (R. 42), which was applicable to Fidelity, provided that it could not transact business in Wisconsin unless it should

> "* * * have and keep on deposit with the state treasurer, in trust for the benefit and security of all its members in this state, five hundred thousand dollars to be held in trust as aforesaid until all shares of such association held by residents of this state shall be fully redeemed and paid off and until its contracts and obligations to persons and members residing in this state shall have been fully performed and discharged. * * *"

It was also provided that the securities comprising the deposit should be approved by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, and, further, that whenever the Banking Commission should find that the liability on contracts held by persons residing in Wisconsin exceeded ninety per cent of the deposit, the Commission would require the deposit of additional securities (sec. 215.395, Wis. Stats., R. 43). Its contracts were also subject to the securities law of Wisconsin, Chapter 189, Wis. Stats. The laws of Wisconsin, insofar as pertinent here, under which Fidelity operated and was subject, are shown at R. 40 to 59.

As of April 10, 1941 Fidelity's "net cash liability" on contracts held by Wisconsin residents was $2,342,978.73, while the market value of the securities were, according to Fidelity's figures as of June 6, 1941, $2,619,399.07. A sales value of over $1,000,000 in face amount of contracts per month was reached in Wisconsin, which was one of the five states in which the company had its largest volume of sales (Ex. 48, T. 1116). Approximately six thousand contracts are presently outstanding in Wisconsin (Ex. 34, T.

757) out of the approximately 22,000 to 25,000 "active" contracts outstanding in total (R. 211). In the sale of the contracts in Wisconsin, the Wisconsin deposit law was emphasized (T. 3172), and the greatest stress was laid upon the fact that the company was supervised by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin and had securities on deposit with the State Treasurer there. A large number of the Wisconsin contract holders purchased their contracts upon the representations made to them as to the protection afforded by the Wisconsin law (Ex. 114, T. 3546, R. 65-74).

After advising the Banking Commission of Wisconsin under date of December 31, 1940 that it had become an insurance company and would no longer sell its contracts in Wisconsin, as has heretofore been pointed out, no further contracts were sold there. In fact, the sale of contracts had ceased in Wisconsin and elsewhere some time before this, Fidelity's license having been suspended in most states in 1938 or 1939 (T. 368). Upon the company's ceasing payment of its obligations to contract holders, and on April 14, 1941, three days after the institution of the West Virginia state court proceedings by the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia, the Banking Commission of Wisconsin took possession of the Wisconsin business and assets of Fidelity under appropriate statutory proceedings, particularly sec. 215.33, Wis. Stats. (R. 60-63) in the Circuit Court for Dane County, Wisconsin. Due notice to Fidelity and its officers was given, as provided by statute. Fidelity entered its appearance therein by counsel, interposed no objection thereto and took no appeal from the action of the Banking Commission of Wisconsin. A certified copy of the Wisconsin proceedings comprises Exhibit 120 of the original record herein. The Banking Commission was and is represented in the Wisconsin proceedings by the attorney general under provisions of Wisconsin law providing therefor. No fees either for counsel or receivers are being exacted in the Wisconsin proceedings. By operation of law (sec. 215.33 (8), Wis. Stats.) and as provided by the order of April 14, 1941 of the Circuit Court for Dane County (R. 60), title to and possession of all of Fidelity's assets located in Wisconsin were vested in the Banking Commission of Wisconsin "to be administered by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin under the supervision and control of the Circuit Court for Dane County, Wisconsin for the benefit and security of contract, bond or certificate holders, residents of this state * * *". (R. 61). The filing of the notice of taking possession operated, under sec. 215.33 (8), Wis. Stats., as a bar to any other action against Fidelity or its assets in Wisconsin.

Pursuant to court order dated May 16, 1941 substantially all of the Wisconsin contract holders duly filed their claims with the Banking Commission of Wisconsin (Ex. 114, T. 3546, R. 65-74) along with their actual Fidelity contracts (T. 1057).

On May 27, 1941, pursuant to order of the court and with the express consent of counsel for Fidelity, the Banking Commission of Wisconsin liquidated and sold certain of the deposited securities realizing the sum of $1,259,244.04, and these funds are still held by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin (Ex. 120, T. 3803). Of the Wisconsin deposit there remain certain securities which we consider to be the equivalent of cash and which may be readily sold without expense or difficulty, these securities being as follows:

After the Wisconsin proceedings had been commenced and carried forward as above outlined, the Banking Commission was notified on June 9, 1941 by telegram signed by the Central Trust Company of Charleston, West Virginia, that the District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia had on June 6 approved the filing of a petition for reorganization of Fidelity. Subsequently copies of ex parte orders of the District Court dated June 6 and June 10 ordering the Banking Commission of Wisconsin to turn over assets in its possession to the Central Trust Company, were received by the Banking Commission. The Banking Commission did not comply with these purported orders, but voluntarily held the Wisconsin proceedings in abeyance pending the determination of the jurisdiction of the federal court upon the proceedings had on its controversial answer and the answers of the other respondents herein to debtor's petition for reorganization. The Banking Commission has, however, maintained close contact with Fidelity's Wisconsin contract holders and has participated in discussions with other state authorities looking to the facilitation of the administration and distribution of Fidelity's assets in the Wisconsin proceedings as well as in the other state proceedings.

A large number of the Wisconsin contract holders have expressed themselves unequivocally that they are in no way interested in any proposed reorganization proceedings in West Virginia or elsewhere and are desirous of having the Wisconsin proceedings go speedily forward to the end that they may receive their proper share of the funds to be distributed there (Ex. 114, T. 3546, R. 65-74).

2. The operations and proceedings in Iowa

In Iowa Fidelity was granted a certificate of authority by the Auditor of State on or about January 7, 1927 pursuant to Chapter 392, 1927 Code of Iowa (R. 75-78). An initial deposit of $25,000 was made under the pertinent statutes, "guaranteeing the faithful performance of all contracts entered into," and thereafter additional securities were deposited in an amount at all times equal to its liabilities in Iowa. In 1930 Fidelity registered its investment contracts in Iowa under the provisions of Chapter 393.1, Iowa Code, as an issuer-dealer, but failed to secure the renewal of this license in 1936, after which time it was not permitted to sell new contracts in Iowa. In order that Fidelity might continue to collect and disburse on its outstanding contracts, it filed application in December, 1927 for a permit to do business as a foreign corporation under Chapter 386, 1935 Code of Iowa. The laws of Iowa, insofar as pertinent here, to which Fidelity was subject, are shown at R. 75 to 89.

Fidelity's "net cash liability" to Iowa contract holders was approximately $35,000 and securities were deposited in Iowa of the approximate par value of $42,000. This deposit was made in trust for the purpose of guaranteeing faithful performance of Fidelity's contracts and title to the trust deposit was vested in the Auditor of State and, under the present law, in his successor, the Commissioner of Insurance.

After the commencement of the state court proceedings in West Virginia and on April 16, 1941, the Attorney General of Iowa, on behalf of Charles R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance, commenced an action in the District Court for Polk County, Iowa for administration of the Iowa assets in accordance with the provisions of Chapters 392 and 393.1, Code of Iowa 1939, and on May 19, 1941 was appointed permanent receiver in Iowa. The Iowa assets were administered by the Iowa Commissioner of Insurance up to the time Fidelity filed its petition for reorganization, and the Iowa proceedings have been voluntarily held in abeyance since that time. The securities comprising the Iowa deposit are still held by the Commissioner of Insurance there.

3. The proceedings in other states

In a number of other states the state authorities had also commenced appropriate proceedings prior to the filing of the petition for reorganization.

On April 4, 1941 the Auditor and Ex-Officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia ordered Fidelity to cease payment on its contracts by reason of the fact that it appeared it could no longer meet its obligations, and on April 11, 1941 the Attorney General of West Virginia, at the instance of the Auditor and Ex-Officio Commissioner of Insurance, instituted insolvency proceedings against Fidelity in the Circuit Court for Kanawha County, West Virginia. Fidelity appeared in this suit, interposed no objection thereto, and receivers of the company's "free" assets were appointed. One of these receivers was later employed by the Central Trust Company to manage Fidelity's affairs in the federal proceedings. The Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia notified the various other state authorities of his action and asked that they institute proceedings with respect to the assets in their respective states (T. 730). The securities deposited in West Virginia are still held by the State Treasurer there, and the Auditor and Ex-Officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia is one of the respondents here.

The Attorney General of Ohio, at the instance of the Superintendent of Insurance of Ohio, instituted appropriate proceedings in the Common Pleas Court of Franklin County, Ohio, and filed an answer controverting the allegations of Fidelity's petition for reorganization. Ohio's answer was later withdrawn upon the entry of an order by the District Court herein on October 29, 1941 consenting that the securities on deposit in Ohio should remain there until such time as a plan of reorganization might be adopted in the federal proceedings but without prejudice to Ohio's status as an intervenor.

The Secretary of State of Illinois, with whom the deposit was made there, commenced appropriate proceedings in the Circuit Court of Sangamon County of Illinois, and the Atttorney General of Illinois filed an answer controverting the debtor's petition for reorganization. This answer was withdrawn upon the entry of an order by the District Court on October 4, 1941 providing that the securities on deposit in Illinois should remain there pending the federal proceedings.

In Tennessee certain contract holders filed a bill in the Chancery Court for Davidson County, Tennessee, to enforce their lien upon the securities deposited with the State Treasurer of Tennessee. These Tennessee contract holders intervened and filed an answer controverting debtor's petition in the federal proceedings and are respondents herein. The deposited securities are still held by the State Treasurer of Tennessee.

In Missouri a receiver was appointed at the request of the Commissioner of Securities there and the Missouri receiver filed an answer controverting Fidelity's petition for reorganization, and is one of the respondents herein. The deposited securities are still held by the Commissioner of Securities of Missouri.

The Insurance Commissioner of Maryland instituted appropriate proceedings there and is one of the respondents herein. The deposited securities are still held by him.

The Securities Commissioner of the State of Kansas entered his appearance in the federal proceedings through counsel. The deposited securities are still held in Kansas.

In all of the states having deposits and where proceedings were not instituted prior to the filing of the petition for reorganization, the appropriate authorities have conferred with the authorities of the other states and are ready to carry on such proceedings as soon as the order of the Circuit Court of Appeals becomes final.

QUESTIONS DECIDED BY THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS

The Circuit Court of Appeals decided two propositions of law in determining the case:

1. That Fidelity was an "insurance corporation" within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act as amended by the Act of June 25, 1910, 36 Stat. 839, 11 U. S. C. A. sec. 22,[1] and therefore excepted from those corporations which are subject to bankruptcy;[2]

2. That at the time Fidelity's petition was filed, prior proceedings were pending which it appeared would best serve the interest of creditors and stockholders and that the petition was subject to dismissal under sections 144 and 146 (4) of Chapter 10 of the Bankruptcy Act; 11 U. S. C. A. 544, 546 (4).[3]

ARGUMENT

I. THE PETITION FOR CERTIORARI AND SUPPORTING BRIEF DISCLOSE NO GROUNDS FOR THE ISSUANCE OF THE WRIT TO REVIEW THE FINDING THAT FIDELITY WAS AN INSURANCE CORPORATION

A. Fidelity was chartered, licensed and did business as a life insurance corporation under the laws of West Virginia

As we pointed out in our statement of the case, Fidelity amended its articles on December 31, 1940, changing its name to Fidelity Assurance Association and changing the statement of its corporate purposes so that thereafter its sole purpose was to issue life insurance and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities (Ex. 24; T. 497).

We have also pointed out that under the law of West Virginia life insurance companies, in addition to issuing life insurance, are empowered to grant and issue annuities. Ch. 33, art. 3, sec. 7, West Virginia Code.

Fidelity was granted a license to engage in business as a life insurance corporation (Ex. 24; T. 497). Under this license it issued 9,802 life insurance contracts and continued to receive payments on existing annuity contracts, made loans on such contracts, and paid out matured contracts.[1]

There is not one slight doubt but that Fidelity was chartered, licensed and did business in the State of West Virginia as a life insurance company under the insurance laws of that State after December 31, 1940 and prior to April 1, 1941. Nor, in view of the communication sent out to the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, the minutes of Fidelity's board of directors, and the communications sent out to contract holders, all of which are referred to in our statement of the case, is there the slightest doubt but that Fidelity planned to become a life insurance corporation, and that it thought that it had become such a corporation.

[1]Insurance corporations licensed to do business in West Virginia are excluded from licensing provisions relating to annuity companies. (See Ch. 33, art. 9, sec. 1, West Virginia Code, set out on p. 3). Fidelity having become a duly licensed insurance company and under such license authorized to deal in annuities, was not thereafter included within the licensing provisions relating to annuity companies. This was recognized by the Commissioner of Insurance when he testified that he licensed the company as a life insurance company in order to permit it to continue such activities with respect to existing annuity contracts (T. 500).

As pointed out in our statement of the case, the petitioners state that Fidelity did not assume any insurance obligations because, as they say, it was not authorized to do so and continued to keep its group policy in force with Lincoln National Life Insurance Company. These arguments and the document upon which they are in part based (Affidavit of F. J. McNulty, R. 356), were considered by the Circuit Court of Appeals and it found that Fidelity was authorized to and did in fact issue insurance contracts.

B. Fidelity's charter purposes were such after the amendment on December 31, 1940 as to constitute it a life insurance corporation according to the generally recognized classification of such corporations by the States of the United States

In the appendix to our brief in the Circuit Court of Appeals we referred to the statutes of many of the states providing for the incorporation of life insurance companies. These statutes are set out at pp. 100-113 of the record and are referred to in the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals in a footnote (R. 380).

A study of these statutes discloses that thirty-five states today classify life insurance corporations upon the basis of a charter power to issue life insurance and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities.

At the time that life insurance corporations were excluded from the Bankruptcy Act (Act June 25, 1910, Ch. 412, sections 3 and 4, 36 Stat. 839) twenty-eight states so defined their charter purposes.

Of the states which did not in 1910 and do not now so define life insurance corporations, few have a statutory definition of any character.

C. Fidelity's activities after its charter amendment were those of an insurance corporation

After it was chartered and licensed as a life insurance corporation, Fidelity issued contracts of life insurance and continued to deal in annuities to the extent that it received payments, made loans and paid out on existing contracts. The petitioners apparently concede that the issuance of life insurance contracts constitutes a proper activity of a life insurance corporation, but they contended below and apparently contend here that Fidelity's annuity transactions constituted the principal part of its business after its charter change and that this activity transformed it into something other than a life insurance corporation.

Their argument comes down to this: A corporation may, under the laws of West Virginia and of the states of the United States generally, be classified as a life insurance corporation upon the basis of a charter power to deal in life insurance and annuity contracts. On the other hand, if it deals in annuity contracts to a greater extent than it deals in life insurance policies, it is not an "insurance corporation" within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, even though it deals in annuities pursuant to its charter powers and license as such.

---

[1] In some cases such corporations are also authorized to issue health and accident insurance.

Two observations can be made with respect to this phase of petitioners' argument.

First. All new business transacted by Fidelity as a life insurance corporation was purely a life insurance business in any sense of the word, namely, the issuance of life insurance contracts.

Second. Commercial life insurance corporations have not, in the past history of the United States, and do not now exist except as they have been and are created by the statutes of the several states. There is no common law definition of a life insurance corporation and such corporations do not exist by virtue of any rule of common law.

It would seem, therefore, that where the words "insurance corporation" are used, as in the Bankruptcy Act, with no definition of those words, they must of necessity refer to the only insurance corporations that now or have ever existed, namely, those created by state statute. In order to determine the characteristics of such a corporation, therefore, it becomes necessary to refer to the statutes of the several states by virtue of which they exist.

We have shown that under the law of West Virginia, and under the law of the states generally, life insurance corporations have certain well-defined and understood characteristics. They are corporations authorized to issue life insurance, to grant, purchase and dispose of annuity contracts, and in some cases to issue health and accident insurance. The government of the United States has recognized this classification of life insurance companies in its statutes taxing life insurance companies, 26 U. S. C. A. sec.

201 (a),[1] and in its statutes providing for R. F. C. loans to insurance corporations, 15 U. S. C. A. sec. 605i.[2]

Under their charter powers to deal in annuities, life insurance corporations may issue such annuities for life, upon the basis of mortality tables, or for a certain period, as in the case of Fidelity's annuities.

Carroll v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of United States, 9 F. Supp. 223 (D. C., Mo., 1934).

But even where such contracts are based upon mortality tables, they are not, properly speaking, insurance contracts.[3]

It is, nevertheless, recognized that the acivities of life insurance corporations (with charter powers such as those of Fidelity) in dealing in annuities are properly the activities of such companies.

As stated by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts:

> "And the conclusion is irresistible that if the petitioner had issued only contracts for the payment of annuities, it must be deemed to be a life insurance company. If so it would be accurately described as in 'the business of life insurance.' It is none the less so engaged because it also issues policies of life insurance * * *."

Mut. Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Commonwealth, 227 Mass. 63, 116 N. E. 469, 470 (1917).

Annuities are not insurance but life insurance corporations which are classified as such by virtue of charter power to issue life insurance and to deal in annuities necessarily engage in the activities of life insurance corporations when, pursuant to those charter powers and a license to conduct a life insurance business, they deal in annuities.

D. Petitioners' arguments considered

On page 17 of the brief in support of their petition the petitioners summarize five separate arguments directed to the proposition that the Court should issue a writ of certiorari to the Circuit Court of Appeals by reason of its disposition of the insurance company question. These arguments are elaborated in later portions of their brief. Each of these points will be discussed, but for purposes of clarity we prefer to treat them out of the order in which they are stated by the petitioners.

1. The point (petitioners' point No. 4) that Fidelity was not classified as an insurance corporation under the law of West Virginia

We dispose of this point in our argument beginning at p. 20, supra. We shall add nothing here except to point out that the petitioners' claim that Fidelity was not an insurance company under West Virginia law is directed entirely to the status of the corporation prior to the charter amendment on December 31, 1940. We have made no claim and make none here that Fidelity was an insurance company prior to December 31, 1940.

2. The point (petitioners' point No. 3) that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is probably in conflict with applicable decisions of this Court

Petitioners' argument on this point is based upon the cases of Bowers v. Lawyers Mortgage Company, 285 U. S. 182, 52 S. Ct. 350, 76 L. ed. 690 (1932) and United States v. Home Title Insurance Co., 285 U. S. 191, 52 S. Ct. 319, 76 L. ed. 695 (1932).

In those cases corporations were organized under the insurance laws of New York for the purpose of guaranteeing real estate mortgage obligations and engaging in a general real estate mortgage broker's business. The question at issue was whether the corporations were insurance corporations for tax purposes. It was held that one corporation was an insurance corporation and that the other was not. These decisions were rested upon the ground that for purposes of the tax law there under consideration the character of a corporation was to be determined by its activities; that the activities of guaranteeing real estate mortgage obligations were insurance activities and that such activities were predominate in the case of the one corporation but were subsidiary in the case of the other.

A similar real estate mortgage guarantee corporation filed a petition for reorganization under Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Law following the decision in the Bowers and Home Title Insurance Co. cases. Upon the authority of those cases it was argued that the principal activities of the company were not those of guaranteeing mortgages and that consequently it was not an insurance corporation within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals held that the Bowers and Home Title Insurance Co cases were inapplicable and that considerations which obtained for purposes of administering the taxation laws involved in those cases were not apposite in determining the character of a corporation for the purposes of the Bankruptcy Law.

In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984 (C.C.A. 2d, 1935).

Certiorari was denied by this court, Union Mortgage & Guarantee Company v. Van Schaick, etc., 296 U. S. 594, 56 S. Ct. 142, 80 L. ed. 421 (1935). If it did not consider that a writ of certiorari was necessary to resolve any supposed conflict with the Bowers and Home Title Insurance Co. cases raised by In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984 (C. C. A. 2d, 1935), it becomes difficult to determine just how any such supposed conflict can be asserted as the basis for the issuance of a writ in this case. But whatever may have been the situation with respect to any conflict raised with the Bowers and Home Title Insurance Co. cases by the Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co. case, there is no such conflict in the present case.

Those cases dealt with insurance corporations of an entirely different character than that of a life insurance corporation. So far as life insurance corporations are concerned, they are defined for purposes of federal taxation as an "insurance company engaged in the business of issuing life insurance and annuity contracts (including contracts of combined life, health, and accident insurance), the reserve funds of which held for the fulfillment of such contracts comprise more than 50 per centum of its total reserve funds." 26 U. S. C. A. sec. 201 (a). True enough, a principal activities test is applicable in the taxation of life insurance companies, but we may note parenthetically that annuities and life insurance are recognized as life insurance activities for purposes of taxation. Consequently, there is no room for a contention that the activity of dealing in annuities, even if it constituted the principal portion of a life insurance company's business, would exclude it from the life insurance classification.

3. The point (petitioners' point No. 5) that there is a conflict with decisions of other circuit courts of appeal

It is a fair criticism of petitioners' argument on this point that they ignore the facts and the decision involved in the present case and for the most part confine themselves to an attempted showing that conflicts exist in other cases to which they refer. Assuming that there may be conflicts in some of the decisions with respect to the rationale employed in determining whether a corporation is to be excluded from bankruptcy under Section 4, it would nevertheless appear that some showing should be required that a decision by this court in the case at bar would resolve any such conflicts as might exist. If there is no such conflict applicable to the facts involved in the case at bar, then obviously the court could hardly determine it.

No circuit court of appeals decision laying down principles applicable in determining whether a corporation is a "municipal, railroad, insurance or banking corporation" or "a building and loan association," within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U. S. C. A. 22, has determined a case in conflict with the determination reached by the court below.

The decision of the court below is in accord with cases such as In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75

F. (2d) 984 (C. C. A. 2d, 1935). The decisions of other Circuit Courts of Appeal employing the rationale of that case are set out in the opinion of the circuit court of appeals and they, likewise, are consistent with its finding. In fact, they would be inconsistent with any other finding. The rationale of the Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co. case is that the status of a corporation as an insurance or banking corporation is to be determined according to the classification of the corporation under the law of the state of its incorporation.

The decision in Gamble v. Daniel, 39 F. (2d) 447 (C. C. A. 8th, 1930) contains reasoning which, to some extent, is inconsistent with the reasoning in In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984 (C. C. A. 2nd, 1935), and it is conceivable that a case might arise where the result would vary, depending upon whether the reasoning of the one case or the other were to be applied. In the Gamble case the question at issue was whether a corporation was a "banking corporation" and as such excepted from Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U. S. C. A. 22. The court held that "banking corporations" meant corporations which were authorized by the laws of their creation to do a banking business and that a banking business consisted of the doing of those things which, in the ordinary conception, were done by banks at the time banking corporations were excluded from bankruptcy (1910). The court held that the corporation involved in the case was not a banking corporation, since it had no power to receive deposits and since such power was in common understanding an essential attribute of the banking business.

The court also held that the corporation was not a banking corporation within the meaning of the state statutes pursuant to which it was created and existed.

It may be noted that the only instance in which a conflict could arise between the Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co. case and the Gamble case would be where a state were to classify a corporation upon the basis of charter purposes substantially differing from those which were commonly accepted as identifiable with such corporations in 1910. No such case is presented here nor do we know of a case where the question has been presented. It was specifically held by the Circuit Court of Appeals in the present case that Fidelity was an insurance corporation both upon the basis of its classification by West Virginia and by its classification by the laws of the states of the United States generally in 1910.

As we have pointed out in a preceding portion of our argument, commercial insurance corporations did not exist in 1910 and do not exist now except as they are created and their purposes defined by state statutes. Consequently, when in 1910 the laws of the states generally identified life insurance corporations as those corporations authorized to transact business in life insurance and annuities, they necessarily impressed upon the words "life insurance corporation" a commonly accepted meaning.

We are wholly unable to recognize any conflict between the present case and In re Prudence Co., 79 F. (2d) 77 (C. C. A. 2nd, 1935). In that case the question at issue was whether a corporation formed under the New York banking law was a banking corporation within the meaning of Section 4. The New York law was entitled "An act in relation to banking corporations * * * and corporations under the supervision of the banking department." The court held that corporations other than banking corporations could be formed under the New York banking law,—that Prudence Co. had not acquired the powers of a banking corporation as those corporations existed under New York law and generally, and that consequently it was not a banking corporation excluded from the Bankruptcy Act. Against the claim that the Prudence Company was an insurance corporation, if it was not a banking corporation, the court held that notwithstanding the nature of its business was the same as that done by Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co. (75 F. (2d) 984 (C. C. A. 2nd, 1935)) it was not an insurance corporation since it was not organized under the insurance law and was not such in common parlance.

Isolated portions of the opinions in the Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co. case and the Prudence Co. case, may be shown to be inconsistent with each other upon careful examination. So far as the actual holding of the cases go, there is no inconsistency. Further than that, there is no inconsistency between the holdings of either of the cases or anything that is said in them, and the holding of the Court in the present case.

We have already analyzed the Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co. case in its relation to the present one. The consistency of the Prudence Co. case is clear. Here the corporation was regarded as an insurance company because it was classified as such by West Virginia and possessed and exercised the powers customarily identifiable with life insurance corporations. There is not one sentence in the Prudence case inconsistent with such a holding.

Petitioners seem to imply that the Circuit Court of Appeals held Fidelity to be an insurance corporation by reason of the fact that it was supervised by the Commissioner of Insurance. Thus, they say it is contrary to the Prudence case and to Capital Endowment Co. v. Kroeger, 86 F. (2d) 976 (C. C. A. 6th, 1936). This claim is without foundation. There is not the slightest suggestion in the Court's opinion that Fidelity was classified as an insurance corporation upon any such basis. It may be significant that petitioners point to no language to that effect in the opinion.

The petitioners suggest that the holding below conflicts with Clemons v. Liberty Savings & Real Estate Corporation, 61 F. (2d) 448 (C. C. A. 5th, 1932). In that case the claim was made that a corporation seeking an adjudication through bankruptcy was either a banking corporation or a building and loan association and, therefore, excluded from bankruptcy under Section 4, 11 U. S. C. A. 22. The Court held that the corporation was not organized as a banking corporation under the state law and that if it occasionally did a banking business, its acts were ultra vires and could not operate to make it a bank within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Law. It further held that the corporation was neither organized to do a general savings and loan business nor did such a business as is usually conducted by building and loan associations. As stated by the court (p. 450):

> "It is evident that appellee was organized to do a general savings and loan business, something less than either a bank or a building and loan association. * * *"

There is nothing in the case which is at variance in the slightest degree with the holding of the Court in the present case.

Petitioners' principal effort in endeavoring to spell out a conflict between the case now before the Court and other decisions is directed toward a claim that some of the other decisions establish an "activities doctrine" to which the present decision does not conform. Their conception of such a doctrine is that the status of a corporation as a bank or insurance corporation is to be determined both by reference to its charter powers and its activities under such powers. Thus, they argued in the Court below that if the charter powers of a corporation authorize activity both within and without the "excepted" fields (apparently it is the thought that the insurance field rather than insurance corporations is excepted from the Bankruptcy Act) and if the predominate business actually conducted lies in a field other than the excepted field, the corporation is not excluded from the Bankruptcy Act.

There is no Circuit Court of Appeals decision holding that the status of a corporation as an insurance, banking, municipal, railroad, or building and loan corporation, within the exclusion clause of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U. S. C. A. 22, is to be determined by reference to corporate activities in addition to a consideration of charter powers. This is undoubtedly accounted for by the fact that the corporations in question, at least in modern times, are closely regulated, and conform to fairly uniform patterns with respect to charter powers denominating their business fields. This is certainly true in the case of life insurance corporations. Thus it may be said that in general corporations within the excepted classes are recognized as such by reason of the fact that their charter powers authorize certain activities. Consequently, when they engage in such activities the question as to whether their character is to be determined by their charter powers or by their activities is academic.

A case might possibly arise such as that referred to by way of illustration in In re Supreme Lodge of the Masons Annuity, 286 F. 180 (N. D. Ga. 1923), where an ancient railroad charter granted by the State of Georgia authorized the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company to conduct both a railroad and a banking business. If such a corporation were to do nothing under its charter other than to engage in the railroad business, could it be said to be a banking corporation? If such a case were to arise, then it might well be that cases such as In re Roumanian Workers Educational Ass'n., 108 F. (2d) 782 (C. C. A. 6th, 1940), and In re Kingston Realty Co., 160 F. 445 (C. C. A. 2d, 1908) dealing with the question as to what constitutes a moneyed, commercial or business corporation within the meaning of Section 4, and as to whether a corporation was principally engaged in the lines of endeavor which characterized the corporations subject to bankruptcy prior to the 1910 amendment, could be resorted to by way of analogy to deal with the situation. However, as we have said, no such case has yet found its way into a Circuit Court of Appeals in relation to the problem at issue and no such case is presented here, whether regard be had both to Fidelity's life insurance and annuity activities after January 1, 1941, or only to its life insurance activities after that day. The activities were those of a life insurance corporation both under the law of West Virginia and in the commonly accepted meaning of that term.

The argument in relation to a conflict between the decision of the Court in the present case and the decisions of other Circuit Courts of Appeal, by reason of the foregoing, necessarily points to the conclusion that the present decision is not in conflict with other decisions and that there is no conflict even as among the other decisions when they are considered with respect to the facts involved.

4. The point (petitioners' point No. 1) that the Investment Company Act of 1940 has classified corporations such as Fidelity as other than life insurance corporations

a. The point is not open here as it was not raised in the court below

This point cannot afford any basis for issuance of the writ as it was not raised in the Circuit Court of Appeals and is therefore, except in extraordinary circumstances (none of which are shown), not open in this Court. McGoldrick, etc. v. Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, 309 U. S. 430, 60 S. Ct. 670, 84 L. ed. 849 (Mar. 25, 1940).

b. In any event the point is without merit as Congress in the Investment Company Act of 1940 did not classify GENERALLY but expressly for the limited purposes of certain subsections of that Act and two sections of the Bankruptcy Act neither of which sections are germane to or involved in the case at bar

Petitioners rest their whole point upon the assumption that the Investment Company Act of 1940 has classified corporations such as Fidelity as other than life insurance corporations and that where Congress has thus classified, for purposes of federal legislation, the federal courts should follow the classification so made. Such argument is entirely meaningless unless the classification involved is related to purpose of the classification. Stress is also laid upon the fact that the classification made by the Investment Company Act of 1940 was made for the purposes, among others, of the Bankruptcy Act. Here again, the argument is meaningless unless it is related to such portions of the Bankruptcy Act as were affected by the classification.

It is true that in the Investment Company Act of 1940 Congress has created and defined the term "face amount certificate" 15 U. S. C. A. 80a-2 (a) (15)[1]. As so defined the term would include annuity contracts whether for life or for a stated period. The terms "investment company" and "face amount certificate company" are also created and defined by the Act. 15 U. S. C. A. 80a-3 (a) (2) and 15 U. S. C. A. 80a-4 (1).[2] As so defined a "face amount certificate company" which is a species of an investment company, would include all life insurance companies were it not for the exclusion made by 15 U. S. C. A. 80a-3 (c) (3)[3] and 80a-2 (a) (17)[4].

These sections define and exclude insurance companies from the definition of "investment companies" and "face amount certificate companies." As so defined and excluded, insurance companies are those whose primary and predominate business activity is the writing of insurance and which are subject to supervision by the insurance officials of the various states.

For what purpose are these classifications and definitions created? Each and every one of them are prefaced in the Investment Company Act by the express language, "When used in this subchapter and sections 72 (a), last sentence, and 107 (f) of Title 11." These are the express and only purposes subserved by these definitions in the Investment Company Act.

There can be no question but that the Investment Company Act of 1940 intended to regulate as "face amount certificate companies," for the purpose of that Act, life insurance companies whose annuity business predominates over the writing of insurance risks, but in the light of the foregoing limited express purposes of these definitions, it is not perceived wherein any tenable argument can be advanced that the Congress in the Investment Company Act evidenced any intention to adopt a "definition" of an insurance company applicable generally to the administration of federal law and federal statutes. Quite to the contrary, as we have already pointed out, for purposes of taxation and for R. F. C. loans, no attempt is made to classify life insurance corporations upon the basis of the predominance of their activity as between writing annuities and life insurance policies. 26 U. S. C. A. 201 (a); 15 U. S. C. A. 605i.

As a matter of fact, under the definition of a life insurance company made for tax purposes by 26 U. S. C. A. 201 (a), an insurance company could do 95% of its business in annuity contracts and 5% in life insurance policies. No distinction is made whatsoever between the writing of insurance and the writing of annuities, so long as the reserve funds held for the fulfillment of either or both forms of contract comprise more than 50% of the total reserves.

There is but one conclusion that is possible with respect to the intention of Congress in classifying insurance companies. There is no such thing as a uniform congressional classification of life insurance companies. The definition varies for the purposes of particular acts. Such a company is one thing for taxation, another thing for R. F. C. loans, another thing for investment company regulation and possibly still another thing for purposes of other federal statutes.

The case at bar is concerned with the status of Fidelity as a corporation eligible to the benefits of the Bankruptcy Act. It is not concerned with Fidelity's status under the Investment Company Act. It is concerned only with whether Fidelity is an "insurance corporation" within the meaning of sec. 4 of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A. 22).[1] This section excludes insurance corporations and other named corporations from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. This section was not amended or even referred to in the Investment Company Act of 1940. As we have heretofore shown, pp. 28-34 this brief, there are certain recognized tests for determining whether a corporation is an insurance corporation within the exclusion clause of sec. 4 of the Bankruptcy Act. We have shown that under these tests Fidelity must be classified as an insurance company under this exclusion clause of the Bankruptcy Act. If the Congress was not content with these recognized legal tests for determining a corporation's status as an insurance company under this exclusion clause of the Act, it would have been a simple matter for it to have made its classifications and definitions in the Investment Company Act applicable to this exclusion clause of the Bankruptcy Act. The Congress had its attention specifically directed to the Bankruptcy Act and chose to amend that Act in two small particulars only, neither of which are germane to or involved in the case at bar.

Petitioners do not even assert that the exclusion clause (sec. 4 of the Bankruptcy Act) was impliedly amended by the Investment Company Act of 1940. It would do violence to every known rule of statutory construction to so assert as the Act upon its face shows that Congress had its attention directed to the Bankruptcy Act and deliberately chose to make its classification and definitions of significance in relation to bankruptcy only with respect to two named sections of that Act, namely secs. 72 (a), last sentence, and 107 (f) of Title 11.

[1] Appendix this brief, p. 64

The Investment Company Act of 1940 amended the Bankruptcy Act in two minor respects. It added the last sentence to sec. 72 (a) and sec. 107 (f) Title 11, U. S. C. A.[1] Sec. 107 (f) obviously is not applicable to Fidelity as it relates exclusively to deposits made by a face amount certificate company with a depository to secure the holder of any security sold by or on behalf of the debtor on or after January 1, 1941. In the case at bar, none of the states hold any such deposits. Furthermore, neither this section nor the last sentence of sec. 72 (a), Title 11 U. S. C. A., dealing with the appointment of a trustee for face amount certificate companies even purport to make all face amount certificate companies as defined in the Investment Company Act eligible for bankruptcy or to state in any way, shape or manner what "face amount certificate companies," as defined in the Investment Company Act of 1940, are eligible for bankruptcy.

Congress deliberately accepted the existing law as to what persons or corporations are eligible to the benefits of the Bankruptcy Act and made only two minor administrative changes in relation to administration of the assets of a "face amount certificate company" as defined in the Investment Act, if the company is otherwise eligible for and subject to the bankruptcy law. The Congress simply recognized that some "face amount certificate companies," as defined in the Investment Company Act, would be eligible for and subject to the bankruptcy law and that some would not be. As to the former, the Congress made two minor changes in the administration of the estate of a bankrupt face certificate company. As to the latter, the Congress made no change. It is one thing to say that all "face amount certificate companies," as defined in the Act, may be adjudged bankrupts. It is another thing to say that all "face amount certificate companies" as defined in the Act which are eligible for and have been adjudicated bankrupts shall be administered in a certain way. The Congress deliberately elected the latter.

5. The point (petitioners' point No. 2) that a federal question is presented which has not been but should be settled by this Court

To some extent this contention is simply a restatement of other contentions which have been advanced under different headings. The petitioners claim, for example, that the Court should settle the questions because of conflict with decisions of other Circuit Courts of Appeal (which we have shown does not exist) and because of a conflict with the decisions of this Court relating to the administration of tax laws (which we have shown does not exist).

The only other basis which petitioners assert in their claim that the Court should determine a question which has not been and should be settled, is contained in the following extract from their brief:

> "Considering the variety of powers that are contained in the charters of the many corporations organized under the varying laws of the several States, the multiplicity of activities frequently engaged in by a single corporation, the differences in the laws of the several States relative to the issuance of corporate charters, together with the expanding field of Federal legislation, it is inevitable that questions of this general type will recur frequently. We believe that the principles of classification of corporations within the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act and especially the reorganization provisions thereof, Chapter X, should be settled by this Court." (Petitioners' brief, p. 25.)

It is a complete answer to the argument so advanced by petitioners that there is no such thing as a variety of powers contained in the charters of life insurance corporations under the laws of the several states. Neither is there a multiplicity of activities engaged in by life insurance companies under the laws of several states. There is a singular uniformity in the charter powers and activities of life insurance corporations provided for by the states of the United States and no decision which this Court could hand down could clarify the problem to any greater extent than it is now clarified. Every Circuit Court of Appeals decision, and so far as we know every District Court decision, construing Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U. S. C. A. 22, would agree that a life insurance corporation chartered to deal in life insurance and annuities under a state law providing for the incorporation of life insurance companies,—which is licensed as such, and which is engaged in the forms of enterprise authorized by its charter, is an insurance corporation.

It will be time enough for this Court to lay down a rule for the guidance of the bench and bar when a factual case is presented, indicating a need for such guidance. No such case is presented here.

II. THE PETITION AND SUPPORTING BRIEF DISCLOSE NO GROUNDS FOR THE ISSUANCE OF A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO REVIEW THE DETERMINATION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT THAT FIDELITY'S PETITION FOR REORGANIZATION WAS NOT FILED IN GOOD FAITH

A. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the prior proceedings pending in the state courts would best subserve the interests of creditors is a determination based upon an examination and appraisal of the facts in this particular case

Section 146 of Chapter 10, 11 U. S. C. A. sec. 546, insofar as material to this point, provides:

> "Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term 'good faith', a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if—
>
> "(1) * * *
>
> "(2) * * *
>
> "(3) * * *
> "(4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding."

The determination of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit under subsection (4) of Section 146 that the proceedings instituted in the state courts of West Virginia and elsewhere would best subserve the interests of creditors is a conclusion arrived at upon examination of questions of fact in this case. The Circuit Court of Appeals, of course, had no occasion to inquire as to which proceedings would best subserve the interests of Fidelity's stockholders because, as stated in the petition for reorganization and as fully conceded by all parties in the case, Fidelity is wholly insolvent in any sense of the word and the stockholders have no equity whatever to be dealt with in any form of proceedings.

It should be further borne in mind that, as both the Circuit Court of Appeals and the District Court found, there is no reasonable prospect of the company being reorganized as a going concern, but, as stated by the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 383), "only the immediate need of a liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of the contract holders." At the argument in the Circuit Court of Appeals it was freely conceded by counsel for the Securities and Exchange Commission that the chances were practically 100% against Fidelity's ever being reorganized as a going concern.

As stated in petitioners' brief herein, Fidelity's aggregate assets amount to, in round figures, $21,100,000. Of these total assets, $20,056,680.27 consist of securities on deposit with the states, $556,467.51 in undeposited securities, and approximately $500,000 in cash (R. 366). The remaining assets consist of the home office building at Wheeling, West Virginia and several parcels of real estate of small value in relation to the value of the deposited securities. It may be safely said that Fidelity's assets are from 95 to 98 per cent composed of the securities on deposit with the states.

The sole question which the Circuit Court of Appeals had for determination under subsection (4) of Section 146 was whether or not, in view of the purpose to be accomplished, that is, the sale of the deposited securities, and the distribution of the cash proceeds to the contract holders as their respective rights thereto might appear, the interests of such contract holders would be best subserved by the continuance of the state court proceedings already commenced under the statutes of the various states expressly adapted to that purpose.

This court has frequently held that it will not grant certiorari to review determinations of fact or determinations of fact and law grounded upon factual considerations.

Southern Power Co. v. North Carolina Public Service Commission, 263 U. S. 508, 44 S. Ct. 164, 68 L. ed. 413 (1924);

United States v. Johnston, 268 U. S. 220, 45 S. Ct. 496, 69 L. ed. 925 (1925);

Houston Oil Co. of Texas v. Goodrich, 245 U. S. 440, 38 S. Ct. 140, 62 L. ed. 385 (1918);

Charleston S. C. Mining & Mfg. Co. v. United States, 273 U. S. 220, 47 S. Ct. 349, 71 L. ed. 618 (1927).

This rule has been uniformly adhered to by the denial of writs of certiorari in cases where the writ was sought to review determinations upon the issue of good faith in Section 77B proceedings.

First National Bank v. Conway Road Estates Co., 94 F. (2d) 736 (C. C. A. 8th, 1938) (reversing District Court on the issue of good faith in 77B proceedings); cert. den. 304 U. S. 578, 58 S. Ct. 1047, 82 L. ed. 1541;

Price v. Spokane Silver and Lead Co., 97 F. (2d) 237 (C. C. A. 8th, 1938) (reversing District Court on issue of good faith in 77B proceedings); cert. den. 305 U. S. 626, 59 S. Ct. 88, 83 L. ed. 401;

B. No principles as to the application of subsection (4) of Section 146 of Chapter 10 to control in future cases would result by a review in this Court of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals on this point.

Petitioners seek to draw some parallel between the present case and the case of In re Marine Harbor Properties, 125 F. (2d) 296 (C. C. A. 2nd, 1942), in which certiorari was granted in 86 L. ed. (adv.) 729. They suggest that in the Marine Harbor case the same question as to good faith is involved as in this case, and that because in the Marine Harbor case properties situated in only one state were involved and because in this case properties situated in a number of states are involved, that the disposition of the Marine Harbor case in this Court will not determine the principles involved in this case. We are in full accord with petitioners' views that the decision in the Marine Harbor case will determine no principles apropos of this case, not, however, for the reason that in the Marine Harbor case the properties were situated only in one state, but for the reason that the question of law decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals in the Marine Harbor case bears no resemblance whatsoever to the question decided in this case under the provisions of subsection (4) of Section 146 of Chapter 10. The Circuit Court of Appeals in the Marine Harbor case distinctly pointed out (125 F. (2d) 299) that the reason it dismissed the petition for lack of good faith was not for the reason expressed in subsection (4) of Section 146 but for "a special instance of a lack of good faith flowing from the personal disqualification of the debtor." The court in that case followed its decision in Brooklyn Trust Co. v. Rembaugh, 110 F. (2d) 838 (C. C. A. 2nd, 1940), the rationale of the case being fully expressed in its opinion as follows (125 F. (2d) 299):

> "A majority of the court is of the opinion that the Rembaugh case should be given effect here to prevent a debtor, who has assented to a plan which is being supervised by the state court in reorganization proceedings still pending there, from flouting that jurisdiction by filing a petition in the district court. The applicable principle, as was said in the Rembaugh case, is not an absence of good faith in the filing of the new petition in the broad meaning of those words but a special instance of a lack of good faith flowing from the personal disqualification of the debtor. Section 146, 11 U. S. C. A. sec. 546, expressly disclaims any limitation upon the generality of the meaning of good faith and subsection 4 of that section is but one special instance of what will show a disabling absence of it on the part of a debtor and is not to be confused with what controls here. * * *" (Emphasis supplied)

The case of In re Paloma Estates, 126 F. (2d) 72 (C. C. A. 2nd, 1942) for review of which petitioners state a petition for certiorari has been filed, is somewhat similar to this case since the petition was dismissed because the court found that the prior proceedings would best subserve the interests of creditors within the meaning of subsection (4) of Section 146 of Chapter 10. Judge Clark, dissenting in that case, suggested that since the court had only affidavits before it and no real evidence, a more searching inquiry should have been made. Judge Clark also felt that the District Court which was affirmed by the Circuit Court had laid undue stress on the estoppel of the debtor under the doctrine of the Rembaugh case. In the Marine Harbor case, Judge Frank, dissenting, pointed out that where stockholders have no equity, under subsection (4) of Section 146 stress should be placed upon the interests of creditors.

Regardless of the merits of the "debtor estoppel" theory which was the basis of the Circuit Court of Appeals decision in the Marine Habor case and which was the basis, in part, of Judge Clark's dissenting opinion in the Paloma Estates case, we are in the fullest accord with the statements of each of these dissenting judges that under subsection (4) of Section 146 a searching inquiry should be made and the evidence fully developed to determine which proceedings are in the best interests of creditors. There can be no question in the present case that all of the facts in this regard were fully and exhaustively explored in the protracted hearing and that such facts were fully and exhaustively considered by the Circuit Court of Appeals in arriving at its determination under subsection (4) of Section 146 that the state court proceedings would best subserve the interests of creditors under the circumstances of this case.

It is idle to suggest that a review by this Court of the determination of the Circuit Court of Appeals as to which type of proceedings will best subserve the interests of creditors under subsection (4) of Section 146, made after the fullest possible presentation and review of the facts bearing upon this determination, will serve to lay down any guiding principles for future cases where the facts will inevitably be widely divergent from the facts in the case at hand.

Petitioners also quote language from the opinion in In re National Surety Co., 7 F. Supp. 959 (D. C., N. Y., 1934) as being apposite here. Suffice to say that in that case the assets securing the company's debts did not consist of negotiable securities deposited with state authorities which only remain to be sold and the proceeds distributed in order that the creditors may have the fullest possible benefit therefrom.

C. The Circuit Court of Appeals did not decide that reorganization within the meaning of subsection (3) of Section 146 of Chapter 10 excluded a "slow and orderly liquidation"

Petitioners in their brief ask the question: "Does the record show that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected?" By propounding such query petitioners seem to indicate their belief that the Circuit Court of Appeals predicated its decision in this case on subsection (3) of Section 146 of Chapter 10 wherein it is provided that a petition shall not be deemed filed in good faith if "it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected." Petitioners then suggest that a factual inquiry should be made by this Court as to such matters, and then assert the claim that the Circuit Court of Appeals entertained as its concept of reorganization as used in subsection (3) of Section 146 the concept that it must be shown in order to avoid dismissal of the petition thereunder that Fidelity can be rehabilitated as a going concern carrying on its business in substantially the same manner as it had previously done.

If the Circuit Court of Appeals had in any way predicated its decision upon subsection (3) of Section 146, we might reasonably inquire whether this Court would be moved to grant certiorari to examine the multitudinous facts and circumstances bearing upon petitioners' propounded question. However, the Circuit Court of Appeals did not rest its determination that the petition should be dismissed upon subsection (3) of Section 146 but solely upon the provisions of subsection (4) of Section 146. The Circuit Court of Appeals did state in its opinion (R. 383):

> "* * * We think it is our duty to review the situation realistically, and when this is done there appears to be no reasonable hope of a reorganization of the business as a going concern, but only the immediate need of a liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of the contract holders. Obviously there will be nothing left for these stockholders."

Examination of the District Court's opinion reveals that it in effect also held it was not reasonable to expect that Fidelity could be reorganized as a going concern. The Circuit Court of Appeals further said in its opinion (R. 384):

> "* * * The facts underlying the whole situation are so clear that even the parties in this case who insist upon reorganization under the Bankruptcy Act hold out little hope of a resumption of the business as a going concern, and content themselves for the most part with the argument that reorganization in the statutory sense includes 'a slow and orderly liquidation.'
>
> "But, it is said that even if liquidation is inevitable, the interests of creditors would be best served by a retention of the case in the federal court * * *."

The Circuit Court of Appeals then went on to demonstrate and find that the interests of creditors would in fact, under the circumstances here present, best be subserved by the prior proceedings in the state courts, the entire determination being predicated solely upon the grounds set forth in subsection (4) of Section 146. The Circuit Court of Appeals did not in any way express an opinion as to the merits of petitioners' contentions that the claimed possibility of a "reorganization" being effected in the federal court by means of some unspecified type of "slow and orderly liquidation" would be sufficient under subsection (3) of Section 146 to sustain the federal proceedings.

Petitioners, upon the assumption that the Circuit Court of Appeals has in some way expressed itself as opposed to their contentions in this regard, cite a number of cases where in federal reorganization proceedings plans of reorganization were adopted providing for the formation of holding companies to liquidate the debtor's assets over a long period of time for the benefit of creditors, these cases being:

In re Central Funding Corp., 75 F. (2d) 256, 259 (C. C. A. 2nd, 1935);

In re Mortgage Securities Corp., 75 F. (2d) 261 (C. C. A. 2nd, 1935);

Continental Insurance Company v. Louisiana Oil Refining Corp., 89 F. (2d) 333, 336 (C. C. A. 5th, 1937);

R. L. Witters Associates v. Ebsary Gypsum Company, 93 F. (2d) 746, 748 (C. C. A. 5th, 1938);

In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Company, 112 F. (2d) 655, 657 (C. C. A. 2nd, 1940); and another case is cited which holds that under Section 77B the organization of a successor corporation was not without the purview of reorganization plans thereunder:

Capital Endowment Company v. Kroeger, 86 F. (2d) 976, 979 (C.C.A. 6th, 1936).

Whatever might have been done in such cases, the Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that for the purpose of what is to be done in this case, namely, the sale of negotiable securities and the distribution of the proceeds thereof to creditors, dismissal of the petition was required under the provisions of subsection (4) of Section 146. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals upon the good faith question in this case rests solely upon that subsection.

D. The conclusion of the Circuit Court of Appeals is obvious under the facts and a review of its decision would serve only to prolong needless litigation to the irreparable damage of contract holders

Petitioners have never in this case challenged in the slightest degree the validity of the state laws under which securities were deposited in trust for the benefit of creditors in each of the respective states in order that Fidelity might be permitted to carry on its business there. Indeed, to do so would be wholly futile since such laws are common, of long standing and are uniformly held valid and effective.

See:

United States v. Knott, 298 U. S. 544, 56 S. Ct. 902, 80 L. ed. 1321 (1936);

Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 19 S. Ct. 165, 43 L. ed. 432 (1898) (particularly at 172 U. S. 257);

23 Am. Jur. 271;

23 Am. Jur. 467.

Petitioners, we are gratified to note, appear to concede that the interests of Wisconsin creditors will be best subserved by a liquidation of the Wisconsin securities in Wisconsin. They also state that there is a substantial surplus of assets held in Wisconsin over contract liabilities to residents of that state and also surpluses in certain other states. We should point out that this is a wholly incorrect statement for the reason that the deposit in Wisconsin and in certain other states exceeds only what is known as the "net cash liability" in those states on Fidelity's outstanding contracts. When it is borne in mind that contract holders had to make monthly payments for a period of eleven months or one year before there was any "net cash liability" on such contracts, it may be readily appreciated that the actual liability of Fidelity to contract holders in any particular state is in no way measured by "net cash liability." The Circuit Court of Appeals correctly relegated such contentions to the realm of "possibilities without substantial showing" (R. 385).

This case is in no sense a case where a debtor in need of rehabilitation is being denied relief under Chapter 10 needful and beneficial both to itself and its creditors. Instead, the sole question presented is whether the Central Trust Company in Charleston, West Virginia should liquidate and distribute the trust funds set up and administered in the various states for many years, or whether the state authorities to whom the contract holders have always looked shall perform that function.

We must point out that throughout the entire proceedings the federal trustee took a position of extreme hostility toward those creditors represented in person and represented by state authorities who opposed the so-called reorganization proceedings. The trustee now complains that it has not had time, due to this litigation, to formulate proposed plans of reorganization.

It was not proper for the trustee to occupy itself in this litigation. Under Section 77B it was held that a trustee appointed in such proceedings was not concerned with the merits of the petition or its dismissal. Loomis v. Gila Co., 101 F. (2d) 827 (C. C. A. 9th, 1939); petition for re-hearing den. 103 F. (2d) 312; cert. den. 307 U. S. 643, 59 S. Ct. 104, 83 L. ed. 1524. Indeed, it is our understanding that one of the prime purposes of the passage of Chapter 10 was to insure a disinterested trustee. Vigorous objection was made during the hearing to the trustee's participation on behalf of those who desired the continuance of the federal proceedings (T. 65, 77, 3615, 3625). We contend upon the same considerations as moved us then that the federal trustee has no proper place as a petitioner for certiorari in this court.

It must further be noted that of the debtor's present counsel two, namely John V. Ray and Homer A. Holt, are regularly employed as counsel for the Central Trust Company, the federal trustee. As was pointed out to the Circuit Court of Appeals, the law firm of Mr. John V. Ray is "general counsel" for Central Trust Company, and Mr. Holt disclosed at the bar of the Circuit Court of Appeals in connection with the application for stay of mandate that his law firm was also regularly employed as counsel by Central Trust Company and had in fact been consulted by it in its private interest during the course of the present proceedings in matters affecting those proceedings. Mr. James R. Fleming, who originally filed the petition on the part of debtor, withdrew on September 17, 1941 during the course of the hearing on the answers controverting the debtor's petition, and has taken no active part in any of the proceedings since that time. Mr. Ray's first appearance was on September 17, 1941 and Mr. Holt's first appearance was on the application for stay of mandate in the Circuit Court of Appeals.

If we understand the provisions of Sections 156, 157 and 158 of Chapter 10 correctly, the position of the trustee in this case does not square with the standards therein set forth.

After the interests of contract holders in Wisconsin and Iowa and elsewhere have been for years looked after at public expense and deposits have been made to secure their contracts, the Central Trust Company of Charleston, West Virginia now steps forward professing concern and anxiety for the interests of Fidelity's creditors. It insists that it, and not the state authorities, shall liquidate the deposited assets and distribute the proceeds. It must be pointed out that none of the state authorities complied with the ex-parte turn-over orders entered by the District Court on June 6th and June 19th, 1941, which orders were later rescinded under date of August 9, 1941. We are not as yet quite sure whether the federal trustee contemplates conducting a so-called re-organization proceeding without benefit of possession and control over the assets of the company, practically all of which are in the hands of the state authorities as trust deposits. Perhaps if on some theory the petition for reorganization were ultimately sustained, it would contemplate suits of some type to secure possession of these assets. This would, of course, have the effect of endlessly prolonging the litigation in connection with the purported federal reorganization proceedings and, as does the prosecution of the present petition, would further jeopardize the interests of Fidelity's contract holders by subjecting the securities securing their contracts to the risk of further depreciation in the unsettled markets of today.

In states such as Wisconsin and Iowa where the remaining deposited securities are of the highest grade and readily salable, it would seem fantastic, as it must have seemed to the Circuit Court of Appeals, to suggest that the contract holders secured by such deposits could be benefited by a "slow and orderly liquidation" in federal court. With respect to such securities what is obviously needed is a speedy and orderly liquidation. In states where the type of assets on deposit dictates another course, we must assume, as did the Circuit Court of Appeals, that such states will adopt the method of liquidation best suited to produce the most for contract holders.

Petitioners propose that the more than six thousand contract holders in Wisconsin and Iowa, whose interests have up to the present time been diligently looked after by the state authorities, shall now be thrown upon their own devices and presumably shall retain counsel to press their claims against the assets deposited in trust for their benefit in Wisconsin and Iowa in the far-off District Court in Charleston, West Virginia.

These facts all point to the correctness of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the prior state proceedings and that the granting of a writ of certiorari in this case would only serve to continue the period of speculation and hazard to which the contract holders are presently being subjected.

E. The determination of the rights of contract holders in the trust funds securing their contracts in the various states is exclusively a question of state law to be determined by the state courts, and the state court proceedings should not be further delayed

It is likely, as suggested by petitioners, that questions will arise as to the respective rights of contract holders in any one state as to their proper share of the trust funds in that state. The deposit laws of Wisconsin and Iowa and the other states are a part of a complete scheme for the supervision of corporations of Fidelity's type in each of these states. The trusts created in the respective states by these laws are for the benefit of resident creditors therein. The right of any contract holder in Wisconsin or Iowa to a share in the fund there is necessarily a question of Wisconsin or Iowa law. The deposits have been and are located in Wisconsin and Iowa. Were this proceeding to be continued in the federal court, recent decisions of this court would indicate that the federal court would be required to submit questions as to the construction of the Wisconsin, Iowa and other state laws not yet decided by the courts of these states to the state courts. Thompson v. Magnolia Petroleum Co., 309 U. S. 478, 60 S. Ct. 628, 84 L. ed. 876 (1940).

In fact, although the Circuit Court of Appeals in this case made no decision upon this point, it may be forcefully contended that where state authorities assert jurisdiction under statutes such as involved here, the federal court should dismiss the petition on this ground alone. See Pennsylvania v. Williams, 294 U. S. 176, 55 S. Ct. 380, 79 L. ed. 841 (1935); and as cited in Securities and Exchange Commission v. United States R. & Imp. Co., 310 U. S. 434, 60

S. Ct. 1044, 84 L. ed. 1293 (1940), to the effect that its principles are imported into the application of the Chandler Act by the federal courts.

See also:

Gordon v. Ominsky, 294 U. S. 186, 55 S. Ct. 391, 79 L. ed. 848 (1935);

Penn General Casualty Co. v. Pennsylvania, 294 U. S. 189, 55 S. Ct. 386, 79 L. ed. 850 (1935);

Kelleam v. Maryland Casualty Co., 312 U. S. 377, 61 S. Ct. 595, 85 L. ed. 899 (1941).

The principle of Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 321 U. S. 496, 61 S. Ct. 643, 85 L. ed. 971 (1941), is, we believe, also closely related to the principles expressed in the foregoing cases and to the principles involved in this case. As said in the opinion there (321 U. S. 500):

> "* * * Few public interests have a higher claim upon the discretion of a federal chancellor than the avoidance of needless friction with state policies; * * * This use of equitable powers is a contribution of the courts in furthering the harmonious relation between state and federal authority without the need of rigorous congressional restriction of those powers. * * *"

If it is proper and necessary for the state courts in any event, as we believe it is, to determine the application of their particular state laws to the trust deposit of debtor's assets located in such states and the sole purpose of the federal proceeding is a liquidation of some sort, then it is clear that the federal proceedings are only duplicitous and unnecessary, and there can be no possible quarrel with the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the prior proceedings best subserve the interests of Fidelity's creditors.

III. THE PETITION SHOULD BE DISMISSED FOR FAILURE ON THE PART OF PETITIONERS TO PRINT AND SERVE A RECORD IN COMPLIANCE WITH THE RULES OF THIS COURT

The petitioners have served us with what purports to be a printed record of this case but which in fact contains only a fragmentary part of the record and much material which is not of record. The abridgement which has been served upon us consists of the appendices attached to the briefs in the Circuit Court of Appeals plus the proceedings in that court including the opinion.

Under the rules of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit the original stenographic transcript made by the court reporter in the District Court is filed, as are the pleadings, exhibits and other matter of record. Parties to an appeal may place in the appendices of their briefs such portions of the testimony and such exhibits as they desire to call to the attention of the court in original form. Other matters, such as statutes relied upon in the argument, may also be placed in the appendices. The printing of an appendix is entirely optional and may be dispensed with if desired, and two of the parties, namely, the trustee and the Missouri appellant, printed no appendices to their briefs filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals.

It is not necessary that testimony be set out in an appendix to a brief filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. Under the rules references may be made to the original transcript where no particular stress is desired with respect to the exact context of testimony. In preparing the Wisconsin and Iowa brief for the Circuit Court of Appeals it was not felt that the case was suited to extensive use of quoted testimony in the appendix and consequently our appendix contained no testimony. It contained the opinion of the District Court, one of the exhibits filed in the case and statutes of the states of Wisconsin and Iowa and other states, to which reference was made in the argument.

Some of the other briefs, however, contained excerpts of the testimony found in the original transcript. Many of these excerpts have no particular significance except in connection with the briefs to which they were attached and in which reference thereto was made. Moreover, a great part of the material found in the various appendices relates to questions raised by certain of the parties in the Circuit Court of Appeals but which were not decided by that Court.

It may be fairly said that aside from such references to the testimony as are made in the opinions of the District Court and the Circuit Court of Appeals, there is very little factual material contained in the record which has been served upon us, which is of the least assistance in determining the issues raised upon the petition for certiorari. Such matter as is presented upon these issues in the record as printed by petitioners is for the most part matter which was included in the appendix to the debtor's brief filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals in support of its position there. It is thus one sided. The fact that respondents chose to print very little of the evidence upon these issues in their appendices thus operates to their disadvantage under the scheme petitioners have adopted as to the record. In fact, petitioners in the printed record submitted here have failed to print in its entirety the matter contained in the appendix to the Wisconsin brief filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals. Page 65 of that appendix, containing a schedule of securities liquidated in Wisconsin prior to the commencement of the federal proceedings and showing the prices obtained therefor, is for some reason omitted completely. We may also note that the so-called record does not even contain the pleadings in the case.

So far as we are advised, no respondents other than the Wisconsin and West Virginia respondents and possibly Maryland are in possession of a copy of the original stenographic transcript of the testimony taken in the District Court. None of the respondents are in possession of the exhibits in the case, of which there were 123, some of them consisting of hundreds of pages. Speaking for ourselves, we can say that we have been handicapped in the preparation of our brief by the failure of the petitioners to prepare and serve an adequate record, and we can well sympathize with the position of those respondents who do not even have a copy of the transcript of testimony in the District Court.

As we understand Rule 38 of this Court, where a record has not been printed for the use of the court below, as is the case here, a petitioner for certiorari must print the complete record in the case and serve it upon the respondents within the period prescribed by Section 8 of the Act of February 13, 1925 (28 U. S. C. A., sec. 350), or, if it is desired to omit from the printed record matter not essential to a consideration of the questions presented by the petition for the writ, a stipulation should be entered into between counsel for the omission of such matter. No such stipulation has been entered into in this case, although the Wisconsin respondent advised counsel for petitioners by telegraph on July 27, 1942 that the Wisconsin respondent would expect to be consulted directly by petitioners if any abridgement of the record were contemplated. We have received no acknowledgment, direct or indirect, of our telegram, and we have not been approached at any time for a statement of our views as to what the record should contain. We may say further that we have been advised that other respondents have likewise been completely ignored with respect to any views which they might have in the preparation of a record.

Rather than printing a complete record or approaching the respondents with a view to obtaining a satisfactory abridgement by stipulation, counsel for the petitioners have proceeded to print the fragmentary record with which we have been served and have also served us with a copy of a motion addressed to this Court asking that the petition for certiorari be considered upon the basis of the record printed by them.

It is our view that the motion is not timely. By the time it can be considered the time for filing respondents' opposing briefs will have expired and the time in which petitioners are permitted to file their petition, including a copy of the printed record, will have expired.

We would also oppose petitioners' motion, if in fact it is to be considered by this Court, for the reason, as we have already stated, that the printing of appendices to certain of the briefs filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals does not with any degree of completeness place before this Court and in the hands of these respondents a record of the evidence material to a consideration of the petition for the writ upon the questions decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals. Had petitioners evinced a desire to stipulate as to the record, we feel quite certain that such portions of the record as are material to a consideration of the petition could have been printed and would not have exceeded in length or cost the material which petitioners have printed as the record on the petition.

The creditors have been put to additional and unnecessary expense by the printing of a record consisting for the most part of matters wholly irrelevant to a consideration of the petition upon the questions decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals, and have likewise been prejudiced in the presentation of their position in opposition to the writ. Under the circumstances we believe petitioners' motion must be denied and the petition should be dismissed for failure to have the record printed and served in accordance with the rules of this Court.

CONCLUSION

Upon the foregoing considerations it is respectfully submitted that the petition for a writ of certiorari to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit should be denied.

11 U. S. C. A., sec. 72a:

"a. The creditors of a bankrupt, exclusive of the bankrupt's relatives or, where the bankrupt is a corporation, exclusive of its stockholders or members, its officers, and the members of its board of directors or trustees or of other similar controlling bodies, shall, at the first meeting of creditors after the adjudication, or after a vacancy has occurred in the office of trustee, or after an estate has been reopened, appoint a trustee or three trustees of such estate. If the creditors do not appoint a trustee or if the trustee so appointed fails to qualify as herein provided, the court shall make the appointment. If the bankrupt is a face-amount certificate company, as defined in section 80a-4 of Title 15, the court alone shall make the appointment; but the court shall not make such appointment without first notifying the Securities and Exchange Commission and giving it an opportunity to be heard."

11 U. S. C. A., sec. 107 (f):

"(f) (1) For the purposes of, and exclusively applicable to, this subdivision f (a) 'debtor' shall mean a face-amount certificate company as defined in section 80a-4 of Title 15; (b) 'face-amount certificate' shall mean a face-amount certificate as defined in section 80a-2 of Title 15; (c) 'depositary' is a person or State agency with whom securities or other property of a debtor is deposited or to whom property of a debtor is transferred, in trust or otherwise, pursuant to the requirements of a State law or an agreement by the debtor providing for the distribution of such property or its proceeds to creditors or security holders of the debtor in the event of the insolvency of the debtor or under other specified circumstances; (d) 'deposit creditor' is a creditor who, under the provisions of a State law or agreement providing for a deposit with or transfer to a depositary, has rights as to the securities or property so deposited or transferred which exceed the rights of a general creditor; and (e) 'State agency' is an official or agency of a State designated to act as depositary or to distribute property, or the proceeds of property held by a depositary.

"(2) Every deposit or transfer of securities or other property made by or on behalf of a debtor with or to any depositary for the benefit or protection of or to secure the holder of any security sold by or on behalf of the debtor on or after January 1, 1941, shall be voidable as against the trustee of such debtor if the property of the estate is insufficient for the full payment and discharge of all claims on account of all face-amount certificates sold by or on behalf of the debtor, and such deposit or transfer and every lien created thereby shall thereupon be avoided by the trustee subject to the provisions of paragraph 3 of this subdivision f.

"(3) In the event any deposit or transfer described in paragraph 2 of this subdivision f shall be avoided the trustee shall segregate the property received by the trustee from the depositary and charge the same with the costs and expenses of maintenance and liquidation and distribute the net proceeds thereof to the creditors who would have been entitled thereto under the provisions of the law or agreement providing for the deposit or transfer of the property, and each such creditor shall thereafter be entitled to dividends from the estate only after all creditors of the same rank shall have received the same percentage.

"(4) The court shall have summary jurisdiction of any proceedings to hear and determine the rights of any parties under this subdivision f and to hear and determine the sufficiency of the property of the estate for the full payment and discharge of all claims on account of all face-amount certificates sold by or on behalf of the debtor. Due notice of any hearing in such proceedings shall be given to every depositary and State agency which is a party in interest.

"(5) Where the provisions of subsection (c) of section 28 are not applicable, the provisions of this section will not apply."

11 U. S. C. A., sec. 506 (3):

"For the purposes of this chapter, unless inconsistent with the context—

"* * *

"(3) 'corporation' shall mean a corporation, as defined in this title, which could be adjudged a bankrupt under this title, and any railroad corporation excepting a railroad corporation authorized to file a petition under section 205 of this title;"

11 U. S. C. A., sec. 544:

"If an answer filed by any creditor, indenture trustee, or stockholder shall controvert any of the material allegations of the petition, the judge shall, as soon as may be, determine, without the intervention of a jury, the issues presented by the pleadings and enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith and that the material allegations are sustained by the proofs, or dismissing it if not so satisfied."

11 U. S. C. A., sec. 546:

"Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term 'good faith', a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if—

"(1) * * *

"(2) * * *

"(3) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected; or

"(4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding."

"(3) Any bank or insurance company; * * *"

15 U. S. C. A., sec. 605i:

"As used in sections 605e to 605j the term 'insurance company' shall include any corporation engaged in the business of insurance or in the writing of annuity contracts, irrespective of the nature thereof, and operating under the supervision of a State superintendent or department of insurance in any of the States of the United States. As used in this section and in sections 605e, 605f, and 605g of this title, the term 'State' means any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia:"

26 U. S. C. A., sec. 801 (a):

"(a) Definition. When used in this chapter the term 'life insurance company' means an insurance company engaged in the business of issuing life insurance and annuity contracts (including contracts of combined life, health, and accident insurance), the reserve funds of which held for the fulfillment of such contracts comprise more than 50 per centum of its total reserve funds."

BRIEF OF RESPONDENT, JOHN B. GONTRUM, INSURANCE COMMISSIONER OF THE STATE OF MARYLAND, IN OPPOSITION TO PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT.

OPINIONS BELOW.

The opinion of the District Court is printed in the record (R. 3-38) and is reported in 42 Fed. Supp. 973. The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals is also printed in the record (R. 363-388) and is reported in 129 Fed. (2d) 442 (Adv. Sheets).

JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under Section 240 (a) of the Judicial Code, as amended, (U. S. Code, Title 28, Sec. 347 (a)), and Section 24 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act (U. S. Code, Title 11, Sec. 47 (c)). The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals was entered on June 16, 1942 (R. 387-388). A petition for rehearing was filed on July 13, 1942 (R. 389-396) and was denied on July 22, 1942 (R. 397).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

On June 6, 1941, Fidelity Assurance Association filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia a voluntary petition for reorganization under Chapter 10 of the Bankruptcy Act. On the same day, by ex parte order, the District Court undertook to require the immediate surrender to a Trustee appointed by it, of approximately twenty millions of dollars of securities which had been deposited by Fidelity Assurance Association with officials of some fifteen states as required by the laws of such states. None of these securities were surrendered and subsequently on August 9, 1941, the turnover order was changed to an injunction (R. 319-334). In the meantime a number of states had intervened and filed answers controverting the Debtor's petition and others had filed motions to strike out the orders of June 6, 1941, and August 9, 1941. Controversial answers had also been filed by creditors and others.

After an extended hearing over a period of four months the District Court filed a lengthy opinion (R. 3-38) and on January 5, 1942, entered an order (R. 39-40) approving the Debtor's petition and overruling the numerous objections interposed by the Respondents. An appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit was filed on March 12, 1942, and that Court, holding that the Debtor was an insurance company and also that the petition had not been filed in good faith, reversed the District Court and remanded the cause with directions to the District Court to dismiss the petition (R. 363-388).

THE FACTS.

It is unfortunate that the Petitioners have submitted to this Court a printed record which, although voluminous, is hardly adequate to present the facts essential to a proper consideration of their petition for certiorari. The record printed by the Petitioners contains much that could have been omitted and yet fails to include the Debtor's petition and the controversial answers; indeed, all the pleadings in the case, with two minor exceptions, are omitted.[1] Fortunately the actual facts (as distinguished from opinion facts or conclusions) necessary to a consideration of the petition for a writ of certiorari are largely undisputed and are fairly well set out in the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals.[2] For this reason and also because the essential facts not covered in the brief of the Petitioners are set out in briefs filed by other Respondents, we will

[1] The Respondents suggested to the Petitioners that a stipulation as to the contents of the record be entered into as required by Rule 38(8) but the Petitioners chose instead to print the appendices to all the briefs filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals. These are disconnected and furnish a mere hodge podge of information for which the Petitioners have not even seen fit to prepare an index. The record certified to the Circuit Court of Appeals contained nearly 4,000 pages of testimony and 113 exhibits. Under the rules of the Circuit Court of Appeals the record was not printed and it was, of course, impossible to print any substantial portion thereof as appendices to briefs. However, a 47-page statement of facts was printed and the briefs were replete with references to and quotations from the complete record, none of which appear in the printed record here.

[2] Evidently the Petitioners also regard the Circuit Court of Appeals' statement of the facts as accurate (Petitioners' Brief, p. 63). Practically all references to the record in support of Petitioners' statement of facts are to the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals; in a few instances the opinion of the District Court is referred to. In only one instance have the Petitioners referred directly to the testimony given before the District Court.

not in this brief undertake to include a full statement of facts.

We do wish to point out, however, that the state court proceeding in Maryland is not a receivership proceeding. Under the Maryland statute securities were deposited with and assigned to the Insurance Commissioner in trust for Maryland contract holders.[3] There are no general assets of Fidelity in Maryland and the Insurance Commissioner as trustee is administering the trust created by the Maryland statute under the supervision of a court of equity. While there has been no effort to completely liquidate the securities held in trust in Maryland, there has been a partial liquidation resulting chiefly from redemptions. At the present time about 40% of the trust assets are in cash and the balance is represented by marketable securities, most of which are high grade and quoted at a price considerably in excess of par. These securities have depreciated in value since June, 1941.

As a matter of fact all of the assets deposited with the 14 states other than West Virginia, are readily marketable securities and the only doubtful assets of the Debtor (as to which the Petitioners contend "slow liquidation" is necessary) are concentrated in West Virginia and, if this proceeding were dismissed, they would be administered by only one court, the Circuit Court for Kanawha County, West Virginia.

[3] The important sections of the Maryland statute are printed in full in the record at pages 203-209. Section 222 (R. 205-206) prohibits the transaction of business in Maryland "unless and until such company shall have assigned to and deposited with the Commissioner, or with some independent trust company approved by him, in trust, as security for all the holders of contracts or other obligations heretofore or hereafter sold, negotiated, issued or accrued in said company in the State of Maryland" approved securities having a market value "at no time less than the aggregate contract liability of the company under all contracts heretofore or hereafter sold in the State of Maryland."

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

The Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit decided two and only two questions, namely: (1) that the Debtor was an insurance company and, therefore, could not file a petition for reorganization under Chapter 10 of the Bankruptcy Act, and (2) that the Debtor's petition was not filed in good faith within the meaning of Section 146 of the Bankruptcy Act and, therefore, should have been dismissed because the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the prior pending state court proceedings, since it was virtually conceded below by all parties, and by the District Court, that reorganization as a going concern was not feasible and that liquidation in some form was inevitable. The Respondents, who were Appellants below, raised a number of other questions, a favorable decision on any one of which would have resulted in the reversal of the order of the District Court, but the Circuit Court of Appeals deemed it unnecessary to pass upon any of these questions in view of its decision on the above two questions.

The Petitioners advance as their reasons for the further review by this Court on certiorari of the two questions decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals, four of the five grounds for the granting of a writ of certiorari set forth in paragraph 5(a) of Rule 38 of this Court. It is the contention of the Respondents that none of these reasons are sound, and in this brief we will make the following points in support of our position.

POINT I. No important question of federal law which has not been but should be settled by this Court was decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals.

1. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the Debtor was an insurance company at the time of the filing of the petition for reorganization is not in conflict with the Investment Company Act of 1940. (Petitioners' Point I).

2. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the Debtor at the time of the filing of the petition for reorganization was an insurance company within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act does not present a question of federal law which has not been but should be settled by this Court. (Petitioners' Point II).

3. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the interest of creditors of the Debtor would be best subserved by the prior pending state court proceedings does not present a question of federal law which has not been but should be settled by this Court. (Petitioners' Point VII).

POINT II. There is no conflict between the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals and the applicable decisions of this Court.

1. There are no decisions of this court as to what is an insurance company within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act. (Petitioners' Point III).

2. The decisions of this court in Bowers v. Lawyers Mortgage Company, 285 U. S. 182; and United States v. Home Title Insurance Company, 285 U. S. 191, are not applicable in determining what is an insurance company within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act. (Petitioners' Point III).

3. Even if such decisions of this court were applicable, the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals would not be in conflict therewith. (Petitioners' Point III).

POINT III. The Circuit Court of Appeals did not decide an important question of local law in a way which was probably in conflict with applicable local decisions.

1. There are no applicable local decisions on the question of what is an insurance company under the law of West Virginia. (Petitioners' Point IV).

2. The Circuit Court of Appeals correctly and properly applied and interpreted the West Virginia statutes in holding that the Debtor was an insurance company under such statutes at the time of the filing of the petition for reorganization. (Petitioners' Point IV).

POINT IV. There is no conflict between the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit and the decisions of other circuit courts of appeals.

1. There is no conflict in the decisions of the various circuit courts of appeals on the question of what is an insurance company within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act as amended by the Act of 1910. (Petitioners' Point V).

2. The Circuit Court of Appeals held that the Debtor was an insurance company at the time of the filing of the petition for reorganization because: (a) it was classified as an insurance company by the laws of the State of West Virginia, (b) it was classified as an insurance company by the States generally, (c) it had the charter powers of an insurance company, and (d) its activities during the six months prior to the filing of the petition for reorganization were those of an insurance company. In no case where all these factors are combined has any Circuit Court of Appeals held that the company is not an insurance company. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is, therefore, not in conflict with a decision in any other circuit. (Petitioners' Point V).

3. The Circuit Court of Appeals referred to the contention of the Petitioners that "slow and orderly liquidation" was a method of reorganization under Chapter 10 of the Bankruptcy Act but it did not decide the question and it did not hold that reorganization means only rehabilitation as a going concern. (Petitioners' Point VI).

ARGUMENT.

POINT I.

NO IMPORTANT QUESTION OF FEDERAL LAW WHICH HAS NOT BEEN BUT SHOULD BE SETTLED BY THIS COURT WAS DECIDED BY THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS.

1.

No Conflict With Investment Company Act Of 1940.

The Petitioners argue that Congress has expressly recognized that face amount certificate companies are subject to the Bankruptcy Act because the Investment Company Act of 1940 amends certain sections of the Bankruptcy Act making special provisions with reference to procedure in the bankruptcy of face amount certificate companies. They further argue that the Debtor is a face amount certificate company and not an insurance company as those terms are defined in the Investment Company Act of 1940. On these two premises the Petitioners contend that the Circuit Court of Appeals erred in classifying the Debtor as an insurance company. This point was never suggested to the lower court and is raised for the first time here, but the complete fallacy of the argument as applied to the present case is apparent from the opening paragraph of the argument in Petitioners' brief (Brief p. 19), wherein the Petitioners state that they are only considering the corporate powers and the business activities of the debtor during the period from 1912 to December 31, 1940, without reference to either the corporate powers or the business activities of the Debtor on and after January 1, 1941.

The Respondents do not contend that investment companies or face amount certificate companies are excluded from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. Likewise, the Respondents do not contend and the Circuit Court of Appeals did not hold that prior to December 31, 1940, the Debtor was an insurance company and not an investment company or face amount certificate company. On the contrary, the Respondents contended below and the Circuit Court of Appeals held that by virtue of its charter powers and its corporate activities and its classification by the State of West Virginia, and by the States generally, the Debtor on and after January 1, 1941, was an insurance company and as such excluded from the Bankruptcy Act. Since the petition for reorganization was filed on June 6, 1941, the character of the debtor corporation as of that date is the controlling factor and it avails nothing to say that as of a date more than six months prior to the date of the filing of the petition the Debtor was not an insurance company, if in fact it was such at the time the petition was filed. No authority to the contrary has been or can be cited by the Petitioners.

Tested by either the so-called state classification theory or the so-called corporate activities theory, the Debtor undoubtedly was an insurance company within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act on and after January 1, 1941.[4] On December 31, 1940, the Debtor amended its charter so as to become an insurance company,[5] and on and after that date it did everything possible to become an insurance company, as distinguished from a face amount certificate company, for the announced purpose of avoiding compliance with the Investment Company Act of 1940. This was not, as contended by the Petitioners, merely an [4] This point is developed more fully in the Wisconsin-Iowa brief.

[5] The facts as to the change in the Debtor's charter and the issuance to it of an insurance company license are more fully discussed in the Wisconsin-Iowa brief.

abortive effort at "extra judicial reorganization". The Investment Company Act of 1940 effectually ended the Debtor's career as an investment company issuing face amount certificates, because it was utterly impossible for the Debtor to comply with the regulatory provisions of that Act and of the complementary West Virginia statute (R. 367; Petitioners' Brief, p. 7). The Debtor, therefore, did not register under the provisions of Section 8 of the Investment Company Act (U. S. Code, Title 15, Sec. 80a-8), and never became a registered face amount certificate company. As an unregistered investment company it could not, after January 1, 1941,[6] issue new face amount certificates, or purchase or sell securities, or even service and receive payments on contracts issued prior to January 1, 1941.[7]

---

[6] Section 7(a) of the Investment Company Act (U. S. Code, Title 15, Sec. 80a-7(a)):

"No investment company organized or otherwise created under the laws of the United States or of a State and having a board of directors, unless registered under section 80a-8, shall directly or indirectly—

(1) offer for sale, sell, or deliver after sale, by the use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce any security or any interest in a security, whether the issuer of such security is such investment company or another person; or offer for sale, sell, or deliver after sale any such security or interest, having reason to believe that such security or interest will be made the subject of a public offering by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce;

(2) purchase, redeem, retire, or otherwise acquire or attempt to acquire, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, any security or any interest in a security, whether the issuer of such security is such investment company or another person;

(3) * * *

(4) engage in any business in interstate commerce;

(5) * * *"

[7] Practically all of Debtor's business was in interstate commerce. The sending of notices, receipt of payments, etc., was handled by mail between the home office in West Virginia and contract holders in other states. Purchases and sales of securities were also transactions in interstate commerce.

It should also be noted that the Debtor's contracts, whether made before or after January 1, 1941, to the extent they were performed after that date, would be void under Section 46(b) of the Act (U. S. Code, Title 15, Sec. 80a-46(b)). This would operate to prevent the Debtor from receiving payments on its contracts unless it could become a registered company.

It was, therefore, not merely an attempt at "extra judicial reorganization" which prompted the Debtor to convert into an insurance company; it was also the realization that the only alternative was liquidation and dissolution.[8] As an insurance company, but only as an insurance company, the Debtor could transact new business and continue to receive payments on its contracts issued prior to January 1, 1941, because insurance companies were exempted from compliance with the Investment Company Act of 1940 and also the complimentary West Virginia statute.[9] Section 3(a)(2) of the Investment Company Act[10] defines an investment company as one engaging in the business of issuing face amount certificates, or which has been engaged in such business and has such certificates outstanding, but Section 3(c)(3)[11] provides that notwithstanding such definition an insurance company is not to be deemed an investment company. Consequently, as an insurance company the Debtor could continue to receive payments on its outstanding contracts without violating [8] One other possible alternative would have been to apply to the Securities and Exchange Commission for exemption under Section 6(c) (U. S. Code, Title 15, Sec. 80a-6(c)), but this obviously would have been a forlorn hope.

---

[9] The West Virginia statute is printed in full in the appendix to Petitioners' Brief, pp. 56-59.

[10] U. S. Code, Title 15, Sec. 80a-3(a)(2):

"(a) When used in this subchapter and sections 72(a), last sentence, and 107(f) of Title 11, 'investment company' means any issuer which—

(1) * * *

(2) is engaged or proposes to engage in the business of issuing face-amount certificates of the installment type, or has been engaged in such business and has any such certificate outstanding; * * *."

[11] U. S. Code, Title 15, Sec. 80a-3(c)(3):

"(c) Notwithstanding subsections (a) and (b), none of the following persons is an investment company within the meaning of this subchapter and sections 72(a), last sentence, and 107(f) of Title 11:

(1) * * *

(2) * * *

(3) Any bank or insurance company; * * *."

the Investment Company Act. For this reason, among others, the Debtor became an insurance company on December 31, 1940.

As the Circuit Court of Appeals well stated: "Since the company deliberately assumed this new character to escape the requirements of the new federal and state statutes with respect to annuity companies, no weight should be given to the company's attempt to pose as an annuity company in the pending petition in bankruptcy". (R. 379)

Moreover, the Debtor was unquestionably an insurance company on and after January 1, 1941, even if we apply the definition of an insurance company as set out in Section 2(a)(17) of the Investment Company Act.[12] After that date it undoubtedly had an insurance company charter; it did write 9,802 insurance contracts; it issued no other new contracts whatsoever and its only other business activity was the servicing of contracts issued prior to January 1, 1941;[13] and it was under the supervision of the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia.

It follows, therefore, that even if it could be said that the Investment Company Act of 1940 was applicable, the Debtor was an insurance company (and hence not an in-

Decision That Debtor Is An Insurance Company Does Not Present A Question Which Need Be Reviewed By This Court.

The question of whether or not the Debtor is an insurance company within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act is discussed more in detail in the Wisconsin-Iowa brief. In this brief, however, we wish to point out that the question is not a question of federal law which has not been, but should be, settled by this Court, and the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals on this point, therefore, does not present any ground for the review thereof by this Court.

The question is not one which, as contended by the Petitioners, is likely to recur frequently. As a matter of fact there are now and have been for a great many years only two other corporations in the United States engaged in the type of business conducted by the Debtor prior to December 31, 1940, but even that is beside the point here because the Debtor procured an insurance company charter on December 31, 1940, and radically changed its business activities on and after January 1, 1941. Neither of the other two face amount certificate companies have been so converted into insurance companies.

In addition, the Circuit Court of Appeals, while in general approving the so-called state classification rule as the controlling principle in determining the character of a corporation under Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, nevertheless did not rest its decision solely on that theory but instead held that under the facts of this case, the Debtor was an insurance company because on and after January 1, 1941, (1) it was classified as such by the State of West Virginia, (2) it was classified as such by most of the States of the United States, (3) its charter had been specifically amended so as to make it an insurance company, and (4) its business activities were those of an insurance company. It follows, therefore, that no matter whether the one rule or the other be a proper criterion, the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals was, nevertheless, correct and would necessarily be affirmed by this Court even though this Court should hold the so-called state classification theory to be improper.

We should also like to point out that in the case, In Re Union Guarantee and Mortgage Co., 75 Fed. (2) 984, precisely the same point as that here raised by the Petitioners was raised in a petition for certiorari filed on behalf of the Union Guarantee and Mortgage Co., but this Court denied certiorari in 296 U. S. 594. The arguments made by the Petitioners here are practically identical with the arguments made by the petitioner in the Union Guarantee and Mortgage Co. case, as will be seen from an examination of the petition and supporting brief filed in the latter case. There the lower court had held that the Union Guarantee and Mortgage Co. was an insurance company and the petition for certiorari made the point that this was a decision of an important question of federal law which had not been but should be settled by this Court, and further that the decision of the lower court in that case was in conflict with the decisions of this Court and in conflict with the decisions of other circuit courts of appeals. The same authorities relied upon by the petitioner in that case are relied upon by the Petitioners here, and yet this Court denied certiorari.

The same thing was true in the case of In Re Prudence Co., 79 Fed. (2d) 77, cert. den., 296 U. S. 646, where the lower court held that The Prudence Company was not an insurance company or a banking corporation. As a matter of fact, this Court has never granted a writ of certiorari to review a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals holding that a corporation either was or was not an ir urance company, a banking corporation, or a building and loan association within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act. So far as we are aware, this Court has denied certiorari in every instance in which such questions have been presented. Gamble vs. Daniel, 39 Fed. (2d) 447, cert. den. 282 U. S. 848; Security Building & Loan Ass'n. vs. Spurlock, 65 Fed. (2d) 768, cert. den. 290 U. S. 678; In Re Peoria Life Insurance Co., 75 Fed. (2d) 777, cert. den. 296 U. S. 594.

Prior Pending State Court Proceedings.

The Petitioners apparently recognize that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals to the effect that the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the prior pending state court proceedings is a decision of a question of fact rather than one of law, because they suggest that the federal question presented is an inquiry as to what are the considerations for determining when the prior state court proceedings best subserve the interests of creditors. We must say that we have considerable difficulty in following this reasoning.

Obviously whether or not prior pending state court proceedings best subserve the interests of creditors is a question of fact which must be determined upon a consideration of all the facts and circumstances in the particular case. It is not possible nor practicable nor desirable to attempt to limit or define just what facts should and what facts should not be considered in resolving this question, any more than it is practicable or desirable to define fraud. All that can be said is that the court must consider all of the facts and circumstances disclosed by the record. Considerable judicial discretion is involved in the ultimate decision, but it, nevertheless, is a decision on a question of fact and not a decision on a question of law. What would best subserve the interests of creditors in one case may not best subserve their interests in another case.

In any event the question is not one of the kind which should be reviewed by this Court, and this Court has consistently refused to grant certiorari to review decisions of Circuit Courts of Appeals involving the issue of good faith in 77B or Chapter 10 proceedings. In Re Bush Terminal Co., 84 Fed. (2d) 984, cert. den. 299 U. S. 596; In Re 333 N. Michigan Avenue Building Corp., 84 Fed. (2d) 936, cert. den. 299 U. S. 602; Texas Hotel Securities Corp. vs. Waco Development Co., 87 Fed. (2d) 395, cert. den. 300 U. S. 679; First National Bank vs. Conway Road Estates Co., 94 Fed. (2d) 736, cert. den. 304 U. S. 578; Price vs. Spokane Silver & Lead Co., 97 Fed. (2d) 237, cert. den. 305 U. S. 626; In Re Mt. Forest Fur Farms of America, 103 Fed. (2d) 69, cert. den. 308 U. S. 583.

In their brief (p. 45) the Petitioners suggest that the question here presented is also presented by the case of In Re Marine Harbor Properties, 125 Fed. (2d) 296, cert. granted, 86 L. Ed. (adv.) 729 (No. 24, October Term, 1942), and the case of In Re Paloma Estates, 126 Fed. (2d) 72, petition for certiorari filed May 12, 1942, and not yet acted upon. At the same time, the Petitioners further suggest that the disposition of these two cases will not necessarily determine the principles governing the disposition of the case at bar. We have carefully examined the petitions for certiorari and the briefs in each of these two cases and we respectfully submit that the questions presented in each of them are entirely different from that presented by the Petitioners in the case at bar. In the Marine Harbor Properties case, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit dismissed the petition for reorganization on the ground that it was not filed in good faith because the Debtor had, some six years before, participated in a state court reorganization proceeding. As stated by the petitioner in his brief, "the question of good faith was resolved by the Circuit Court in terms of an alleged personal disqualification of the particular Debtor." An examination of the specification of errors urged by the petitioner there also discloses that the chief complaint was that the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit had refused to determine whether or not the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the state court proceeding because of its holding that the debtor by reason of its participation in such proceeding was estopped from filing a petition for reorganization under Chapter 10. In the Paloma Estates case, the petitioner raised precisely the same question and contended that the decision of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals was again put upon the basis of a personal disqualification of the debtor by reason of its participation in a prior state court proceeding. However, the Respondents point out in their brief in opposition that the Second Circuit Court of Appeals did not base its decision upon this point alone, but proceeded to determine whether in fact the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the state court proceedings. They also point out that the dissenting judge in the Circuit Court of Appeals objected to the majority decision solely on the ground that the proof relied upon to show that the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the state court proceeding was in affidavit form and for that reason insufficient. The dissenting judge voted to remand the case so that further evidence could be adduced on the question of fact as to whether the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the state court proceedings.

In the case at bar, the Circuit Court of Appeals has considered the voluminous evidence on this point and has reached the conclusion that the interests of the creditors would be best subserved in the prior pending state court proceeding. This decision on a question of fact is, therefore, quite different from the questions presented in the Marine Harbor Properties and Paloma Estates cases.

Point II.

THERE IS NO CONFLICT BETWEEN THE DECISION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS AND THE APPLICABLE DECISIONS OF THIS COURT.

The Petitioners admit that there are no decisions of this Court on the question of what is an insurance company within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act. They contend, however, that the decisions of this Court in Bowers vs. Lawyers Mortgage Company, 285 U. S. 182, and United States vs. Home Title Insurance Company, 285 U. S. 191, although dealing with the question of what is an insurance company within the meaning of Federal tax statutes, are nevertheless applicable in determining what is an insurance company under Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals on this question is in conflict with the decisions of this Court in those two cases. The Respondents here contend that the decisions in the Bowers and Home Title Insurance Company cases are not applicable in the present case but that even if they were, the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is not inconsistent therewith.

The Bowers and Home Title Insurance Company cases involved solely the question of whether the companies there involved were insurance companies within the meaning of the Federal Capital Stock Tax Law and the Federal Income Tax Law. This Court said that a general definition of an insurance company was not necessary in order to determine whether "having regard to the purpose of the classification and the considerations on which it probably was made" the taxing statutes had classified the two companies there involved as insurance companies. Upon an examination of the considerations on which the classification had been made in the taxing statutes this Court held that the company in the first case was not an insurance company within the meaning of the taxing statutes but that the company in the second case was. Obviously those decisions have no bearing at all on the question of what is an insurance company within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act. The considerations which prompted Congress to classify and exempt certain specified corporations in Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act were entirely different from the considerations which prompted Congress in providing specially for the taxation of certain types of corporations. The Circuit Court of Appeals examined the purpose of the classification in the Bankruptcy Act and the considerations on which it probably was made, and concluded that the Debtor was an insurance company within the meaning of that Act.

Even if it were assumed that the decisions in the Bowers and Home Title Insurance Company cases were applicable in the present case, nevertheless the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the present case is not inconsistent therewith. In the Bowers and the Home Title Insurance Company cases this Court held that, having regard to the purpose of the classification in the tax statute and the considerations upon which it was made, it was necessary to examine the corporate activities of the company in order to determine its character. This Court further held that although the question of whether the company was formed under the state insurance laws was significant, it was not controlling. But if we apply these same tests to the Debtor, the conclusion is, nevertheless, that it was an insurance company at the time of the filing of the petition for reorganization because it not only was classified as an insurance company by the State of West Virginia and chartered and licensed under the insurance laws of that State, but its activities during the six months preceding the petition for reorganization were those of an insurance company. Consequently there is no inconsistency between the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals and the above referred to decisions of this Court.

Point III.

THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS DID NOT DECIDE AN IMPORTANT QUESTION OF LOCAL LAW IN A WAY WHICH WAS PROBABLY IN CONFLICT WITH APPLICABLE LOCAL DECISIONS.

As the Petitioners themselves admit, there are no applicable decisions of the courts of West Virginia as to whether the Debtor, or other companies like it, are to be considered as insurance companies. However, the contention is made that the statutes of West Virginia classified the Debtor as an investment company and not as an insurance company, and that the Circuit Court of Appeals erroneously applied these statutes. The fallacy of the contention is obvious because the Petitioners consider only the charter powers and activities of the Debtor prior to December 31, 1940, whereas the Circuit Court of Appeals in determining the classification of the Debtor as an insurance company under the laws of the State of West Virginia considered its charter powers and activities subsequent to January 1, 1941. Here again the Petitioners choose to ignore the change in the character of the Debtor's charter powers and activities which occurred on and after January 1, 1941. But the character of the Debtor at the time of the filing of the petition for reorganization is controlling, and it is not possible to ignore the last six months of its existence and consider only its charter powers and corporate activities prior to that time.

The lower court has thus not misapplied the applicable statutes of West Virginia.

POINT IV.

THERE IS NO CONFLICT BETWEEN THE DECISION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT AND THE DECISIONS OF OTHER CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS.

1.

The Decision That The Debtor Is An Insurance Company Is Not In Conflict With Decisions In Other Circuits.

A superficial examination of the authorities might seem to indicate a conflict among the various circuit courts of appeals as to the principles to be applied in determining whether or not a particular corporation is one of those excepted from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act under Section 4 thereof, but we believe a more careful analysis of the decisions will show that actually this is not the case.[14]

We wish to point out, however, that regardless of whether there might appear to be a conflict among the various circuit courts of appeals as to the application of the so-called state classification theory, the so-called charter power theory, or the so-called business activities theory, nevertheless this is not a case in which this Court can resolve any such supposed conflicts. Although the Circuit Court of Appeals in this case in general approved the so-called state classification theory, it, nevertheless, held that no matter which theory is applied, the Debtor must be regarded as an insurance company since, (1) it was an insurance company under the laws of the State of West Virginia and under the laws of the States generally, (2) it had the charter powers of an insurance company, and (3) its activities during the six months prior to the filing of the petition for reorganization were those of an insurance company. As pointed out by the Circuit Court of Appeals in its opinion (R. 372), the Debtor would be classified as an insurance company even if the rule of classification approved by the District Court were followed because, although neither of the Petitioners herein had seen fit to bring the matter to the attention of the District Court, it later developed and is now admitted that the Debtor actually issued 9802 insurance contracts subsequent to January 1, 1941. (R. 339-352, 361-362).

The Circuit Court Of Appeals Did Not Pass On The Question Of Whether Or Not "Slow And Orderly Liquidation" Is A Method Of Reorganization.

The Circuit Court of Appeals decided it was not reasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization of the Debtor as a going concern could be effected, and the Petitioners argue that in so deciding the Circuit Court of Appeals held that "slow and orderly liquidation" in the Federal Court was not reorganization within the meaning of Chapter 10 of the Bankruptcy Act. They then undertake to point out that such decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is in conflict with the decisions of other circuit courts of appeals in several other cases cited. We do not concede that the cases cited are applicable, but without arguing the question of whether reorganization includes "slow and orderly liquidation" we think it sufficient merely to point out that the question was not decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals and, therefore, is not presented to this Court on the record.

The Circuit Court of Appeals held, largely on the basis of findings of fact of the District Court, that it was clearly not feasible to rehabilitate the Debtor as a going concern. The Court referred to the fact that this was virtually conceded by the District Court and by the Debtor, the Trustee, and the Securities and Exchange Commission, and it pointed out that the only suggestion made by these parties was that it was feasible to have a "slow and orderly liquidation" in the Federal Court, and that such a "slow and orderly liquidation" was a method of reorganization within the meaning of Chapter 10 of the Bankruptcy Act. The Circuit Court of Appeals clearly did not pass on the question of whether a "slow and orderly liquidation" was a method of reorganization, but, instead, held (1) that the record did not justify the conclusion that it was reasonable, or feasible, or desirable to have a "slow and orderly liquidation" in the Federal Court, and (2) that since liquidation was inevitable, the question then arose as to whether the interests of the creditors would be best subserved by such a liquidation in the Federal Court, or by liquidation in the state courts (R. 381-384). After reviewing all of the circumstances, the Circuit Court of Appeals decided in favor of the latter (R. 384-387).

There is, therefore, no conflict between the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals and the decisions of other circuit courts of appeals cited by the Petitioners which they contend hold that "slow and orderly liquidation" is a method of reorganization, because there has been no decision on this question by the Circuit Court of Appeals.

CONCLUSION.

We respectfully submit, therefore, that the petition for a writ of certiorari should be denied.

Respectfully submitted,

H. VERNON ENEY,

FOREWORD.

"We think it is our duty to review the situation realistically, and when this is done, there appears to be no reasonable hope of the reorganization of the business as a going concern, but only the immediate need of a liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of the contract holders."

Opinion of Court of Appeals.

"It is true that the broad picture developed by the testimony at the hearing does not present a very favorable view with respect to the rehabilitation and continued operation of the Debtor as a face-amount certificate company."

Opinion of District Judge.

MAY IT PLEASE THE COURT:

The Issue—*Central Trust Company v. Contract Holders.

In order that we may avoid the awkward and aweless position of straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, let us recur at the outset to the question, What is the object of this suit? Anyone reading the petition presented in this case might easily lose sight of the fact that the primary and basic issue is whether or not this insolvent company should be reorganized.

It is not of the greatest importance whether everyone can assent to the process of reasoning by which the Court of Appeals reached its conclusion that the corporation was an insurance corporation and hence excluded from the Bankruptcy Act. The effect of the decision was that there should be an immediate liquidation for the benefit of the contract holders instead of a deferred and slow liquidation for the benefit of the Central Trust Company.

The gist of the opinion of the Court of Appeals is expressed in the following sentence:

> "It has not been and cannot be reasonably contended that the interests of the well secured creditors will be advanced by interfering with the state officials in the prompt liquidation and distribution of the securities in their hands. The liquidation in every state in which deposits were made will be subject to the supervision of established governmental departments, as well qualified for the business as the trustee in bankruptcy. There is every reason to believe that the liquidation under their supervision will proceed without needless expense in a careful and expeditious manner so as to save as much as possible for the contract holders. Certainly it would be unjust and unreasonable to delay the satisfaction of their claims in order that illusory hopes of reorganization may be entertained." (Italics ours)

We submit that no other decision would have met the demands of justice for the eighty thousand contract holders whose rights have been placed in jeopardy by this proceeding. Had the case not been wholly excluded from the Bankruptcy Courts, these contract holders whould have been left defenseless against harassment and delay from further efforts to deprive them of the right to the immediate distribution of the State deposits securing their claims.

Pressing Need for Liquidation in Tennessee.

The statutes of the State of Tennessee require investment companies, such as the Debtor, as a condition to the right to engage in business in that State, to deposit and maintain securities at no time less than 100 per cent of the issuing company's cash or current contract liability on all outstanding investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee. By Chapter 209 of the Public Acts of 1939, it was provided that the Commissioner of Insurance and Banking of the State of Tennessee should hold as Custodian the securities deposited for the benefit of the holders of the investment contracts coming within the provisions of said Act. By Chapter No. 157 of the Public Acts of 1941, the State Treasurer of Tennessee was made the Custodian of all securities deposited with the State or any Department thereof. The laws of Tennessee further provide that only upon discharge in full of all liabilities on all investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee, and for which trust deposit is maintained, shall the issuing company be entitled to a release and return of the securities so deposited.

In compliance with the laws of the State of Tennessee, and in order to obtain a permit to do business and issue its investment contracts in the State of Tennessee, the Debtor company made a deposit of securities with the Commissioner of Insurance and Banking of the State of Tennessee. Citizens of the State of Tennessee, in reliance upon the protection afforded by the laws of that State, purchased the investment contracts issued by Debtor.

The transcript of the proceedings in the Chancery Court of Davidson County, Tennessee, filed as an exhibit to the answer of the defendants to the Debtor's petition for reorganization shows that prior to the time the petition was filed, a suit was pending in the State Court to subject the deposit in Tennessee to the satisfaction of the claims of contract holders entitled to the benefit of deposit in that State. The deposited securities were then being held by the State Treasurer in pursuance to the statutes of that State, making him the Custodian of the deposit. By decree of the Chancery Court he had been enjoined from disposing of the deposit in any way except under orders of that Court. The time had been fixed for the filing of the claims of creditors and many claims had already been filed. Since that time many other claims have been filed. The time expired on November 1st, 1941.

But for the injunction or stay in the order of August 9, 1941, the Tennessee State Court could have proceeded with the distribution of the deposit in Tennessee after November 1, 1941. The Debtor has no equity in the Tennessee deposit. (Tr.; p. 225)

By reason of these facts, the deposit in Tennessee cannot be affected in any way by any attempt to reorganize the Debtor except by delaying distribution. Even if there is an attempt to effect a plan of reorganization, any plan of reorganization must give the Tennessee contract holders the option of obtaining satisfaction of their entire claims out of the deposit in Tennessee. This deposit under the laws of the State cannot be withdrawn until the discharge in full of all claims of Tennessee contract holders. Since in Tennessee the Insurance Commissioner is prevented by statute from giving an investment company a license to do business unless it maintains a deposit of 100% of the amount of its cash liabilities to the holders of investment contracts sold in the State, there can be no scaling down in invitum of the claims of contract holders against the deposit so as to free any of the deposited securities for use in equalizing deficiencies in other States or to furnish working capital.

Respondents duly moved to vacate and set aside the stay order made by the District Court so as to permit the Chancery proceedings in the State Court to be prosecuted. Their motion was overruled by the District Judge. The Court of Appeals correctly envisaged the situation with respect to the State deposits generally, and concluded that it would be unjust and unreasonable to these contract holders to delay the satisfaction of their claims in order that illusory hopes of reorganization may be entertained.

Pressing Need for Liquidation in Missouri.

It is to the Missouri deposit that the Missouri contract holders must look for payment. The Commissioner of Securities in Missouri required the Debtor corporation, as a condition to the right to do business in that State, to deposit in trust for the benefit of Missouri contract holders securities equal to the amount of outstanding liabilities in that State. Prior to the appointment of the State Court receivers and prior to the filing of the petition for reorganization, the Attorney-General for the State of Missouri on the information of the Commissioner of Securities instituted a proceeding in the Missouri State Court and obtained the appointment of a receiver.

When the Missouri contract holders purchased their contracts, they were led to believe (as shown by Exhibits 37, 38, 39, 40, 85, 86 and 87) that they need look no further than the Missouri deposit for their protection, in payment of their contracts. The question with them is, when are they going to get their money? None of them would have turned his money over to Fidelity if he had contemplated the slightest possibility of the deposit in his State becoming involved in protracted and expensive litigation in a Federal Court nearly one thousand miles distant.

The Missouri contract holders are not concerned with the deposits in the State of Maryland or in Tennessee or in West Virginia, or in any other State which required deposits for the protection of contract holders in that State. They have no purpose to deprive any other State of any of the benefits of deposits made therein in accordance with applicable laws and regulations of the several Insurance and Securities Commissioners. The claim of the average contract holder is of a small amount. They can see nothing but injustice to the contract holders in any scheme or plan that has for its purpose the handling of all claims of all contract holders in the State of West Virginia, regardless of the State in which the contract holders reside.

There have been protestations of good faith by the various counsel who have appeared for the company in this proceeding, as well as the attorneys for the Central Trust Company, and assurances from them that they have no purpose but to do "equity" to all contract holders. Despite this, the Missouri contract holders know that the maintenance of this proceeding forebodes no good for them. They know that this proceeding would not be maintained for the purpose of upholding and enforcing their rights in the deposit which secures their claims. That object would be best accomplished in their own State. The proceeding has a meaning only if the object is to destroy or alter their rights in their deposit, either by cutting down their claims or postponing the time of payment. This does not seem to be "equity" to them.

State Deposits Do Not Constitute "Assets" Which May Be Made Basis of Reorganization.

The very pertinent fact that Fidelity has nothing of its own to reorganize with is obscured by petitioners' statement that its aggregate assets amount to $21,100,000.00 or approximately ninety per cent of its aggregate liabilities, $23,476,000.00. The Court of Appeals showed the situation by a tabulation of the State deposits as compared with liabilities. (Tr., p. 366) At the time of the filing of the petition, as the Court of Appeals points out, Fidelity's undeposited assets amounted to only a little more than a million dollars. And there was a deficiency of nearly three million five hundred thousand dollars between the deposits and the liabilities secured by the several deposits.

In this case all of the creditors are contract holders holding secured claims. Approximately $10,000,000.00 of securities, at the time of the filing of the petition, were held in deposits in States other than West Virginia. These fourteen other States are shown on Exhibit 48 printed in transcript at page 225. A little more than $10,000,000.00 of securities were deposited in West Virginia. This deposit was not made, however, for the sole benefit of contract holders in the State of West Virginia, but under the laws of that State supplied the deficiency between the deposits in all of the other States in which the company did business and the liabilities secured.

In the heading at the top of the page of each contract, the Company agreed to deposit approved securities in trust as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia. The laws of the State of West Virginia required a deposit in trust of bonds and securities approved by the Insurance Commissioner "to an amount equal to the total amount which such person, association or corporation may be liable to pay in cash to the holders of contracts under the terms thereof at the time of the deposit." It was further provided by the West Virginia statute that wherever other States required the corporation to make deposits to secure contract holders, the amount of the deposits in such other States might be deducted from the total amount required to be deposited with the Treasurer of the State of West Virginia.

These provisions, which were a part of the West Virginia laws, were, of course, by the provisions of the contract incorporated as a part of the contractual obligations of the Investment Company. Thus, when the Company deposited securities in Tennessee in accordance with the laws of the State of West Virginia, credit therefor was given against the West Virginia deposit. This was in compliance with the provisions of the contract that a reserve fund would be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust.

The Tennessee statutes in this regard are unambiguous. The amount of the deposit was to be not less than one hundred per cent of the cash or current contract liability on all outstanding investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee. We mention Tennessee because we think its law is fairly typical of the laws of the thirteen other States (other than West Virginia) which required deposits.

While there is some slight difference between the wording of the section relating to the reserve fund contained in the different contracts, in substance the provision is the same. By this section (Section 1, Reserve Fund), the Company agreed to create and maintain a reserve fund. It was to be a special fund for the discharge of its liability under the different Series contracts. The reserve fund was to be set aside from payments received under the different Series contracts. This reserve fund by the terms of the contracts was to be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust, as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia. Plainly when the securities were deposited in trust, as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia, a valid trust came into existence.

Manifestly, no sort of a plan of reorganization could be effected which does not deal with the deposited securities. These represent by far the greater part of the company's assets. The non-deposited securities and assets would be consumed in paying taxes, expenses of administration, fees, etc. Debtor's petition shows that the prospect of reorganization depends entirely upon some modification of the rights of all contract holders in these deposited securities. It presupposes some kind of omnipotence in the Federal Court capable of effecting a recapture of these deposits for use in supplying the deficiency of more than three and a half million dollars between the assets and liabilities of the company so that it can continue in business.

In other words, Debtor's petition necessarily contemplates the carving of working capital out of the assets held in trust for contract holders. The petition is not copied in the printed transcript. For the convenience of the Court, we have printed the pertinent Sections VII and VIII as Appendix B to this brief.

There could be no sort of reorganization that does not eliminate the deficiency between assets and liabilities. If the company is to continue in business as a face-amount certificate company, as an insurance company, or as any other kind of company, it would have to be launched in a condition of solvency. The only other alternative, it occurs to us, would be the sale or transfer of a part of the Debtor's business to some other company that is already functioning; and again insolvency is a barrier to such a plan. No businessman would take over assets with liabilities in excess of what he is getting.

Now when a business is insolvent—that is, when its liabilities are in excess of its assets—solvency can be attained in one of two ways only. Either the assets must be increased or the liabilities must be decreased. The assets of this company can be brought up to equal its liabilities only by new money being put in from the outside. All will agree that this is out of the question. The efforts of the company's directors and officers extending over a period of several years prior to the filing of the petition to bring in new capital demonstrate that this possibility has already been exhausted. (See Letter from John Marshall, Printed transcript, pp. 303-309.)

This leaves the possibility of scaling down the liabilities. It would not be enough to make them merely equal the assets. The liabilities would have to be reduced to an amount much less than the assets so as to free money from the trusts in which the securities are held to make capital and for use in paying operating expenses. It is our belief that nothing like this has ever been attempted in the annals of corporate reorganizations.

Any plan which compels secured creditors to surrender without adequate consideration for the benefit of other creditors, whether secured or unsecured, the superior rights which they have acquired is inequitable and unfair.

The contract holders in those States having fairly adequate deposits cannot be required to surrender any of the rights and protection afforded to them by statutes in those States for the benefit of their less fortunate brethren in the other States where a disparity between deposits and liabilities is found. This Court has no power to legislate. It has no power to readjust deposits, for to do so would be to impair liens created by State laws. This is prohibited by Section 67(b) of the Bankruptcy Act, which by virtue of Section 102 is applicable to proceedings under Chapter X.

Great stress is placed by the petition upon the fact that there is some inequality as between the States having deposits and other States which either do not have any deposits or smaller deposits. If we grant the disparity which exists, the Federal Courts nevertheless have no power to change the situation which exists.

The Securities and Exchange Commission had been studying investment trusts and investment companies five years before the Investment Company Act undertaking to regulate face-amount certificate companies was recommended to Congress for enactment. The study was commenced in pursuance to the mandate contained in Section 30 of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 (15 U.S.C.A., Sec. 79z-4).

The Investment Company Act of 1940 (Title 15 U.S. C.A., Sec. 80a) expressly recites that it was upon the basis of facts disclosed by the record and reports of Securities and Exchange Commission and facts otherwise disclosed and ascertained, that it was found that investment companies were affected with a national public interest. The Securities and Exchange Commission made a special report on companies issuing face-amount installment certificates which was a part of its over-all report on its study of investment trusts and investment companies. Chapter V of this Special Report deals with the subject of Governmental Regulation of face-amount certificate companies.* On Page 128 is set out a summary of the deposit requirements of the various State statutes. The table 34 on page 130 sets out the amount of deposits and cash surrender liability of certificates outstanding of Fidelity Investment Association by States as of December 31, 1937.

In 1938, the Securities and Exchange Commission had obtained an injunction in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan against Fidelity Investment Association, enjoining it, among other things, from: "A. 1. Purchasing and depositing with West Virginia, or any other State, insufficient securities or securities which do not meet deposit requirements." (Special Report, p. 257).

The variation in State deposit laws was made the subject of a special study by the Senate and House Committees, to which the Investment Company Act was referred. Commissioner Healy was the first to point it out. (See hearings before Sub-Committee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on H R. 10065, Page 62.)

Mr. Schenker, counsel for the Securities and Exchange Commission made the following statement:

"... this bill in no way, Senator Herring, touches deposits that have been made to secure certificates issued up to the time of the passage of this bill". (Printed transcript p. 234.)

The report of Senator Wagner, Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, accompanying the bill, states:

> "The bill preserves the rights of residents in those States which require specific deposits with their State officials but makes provision for equalization of treatment of all certificate holders, by providing that residents of other States must receive an amount equal to that received by the residents of States with deposits, before the latter can share in the general assets of the bankrupt company. (Sec. 29.)" (Italics ours)

We ask the Court to give special attention to the memorandum as to the hearings preceding the enactment of the Bill set out in the printed transcript at pages 226 to 237.

The Act contained an express reservation of the jurisdiction of State authorities. Section 50 provides as follows:

> "... nor shall anything in this title affect the jurisdiction of any other commission, board, agency, or officer of the United States or of any State or political subdivision of any State, over any person, security, or transaction, insofar as such jurisdiction does not conflict with any provision of this title or of any rule, regulation, or order hereunder."

The proof is irrefragable that Congress thoroughly considered the question of the application of the bankruptcy power to the then existing deposits and deliberately decided to confer no power upon the Bankruptcy Court over deposits as they existed when the Act took effect.

Validity of State Deposits Unquestioned.

To this date (one year and nine months after the effective date of the Investment Company Act and Debtor's discontinuance of the issuance of new certificates), there has been no pleading filed in this case nor in any of the fourteen States in which Fidelity had deposits, nor anywhere else, in any way questioning the validity of the State deposits. The Court of Appeals assumed without argument that all of them must be given effect to. During the hearing the District Judge set aside the order made at the time of the presentation of the petition for reorganization which directed all of the deposits to be surrendered to the Trustee. His opinion takes note of the possibility of questions as to the deposits being raised but proceeds upon the assumption that recognition must be given to the State deposits.

We venture the assertion that rarely is a case presented to this Court in which testimony on the hearing on the issue of good faith was permitted to take so wide a range. Every phase of the company's activities was probed by those who endeavored to sustain the petition. We do not believe that there is any other evidence available to the proponents of reorganization which will afford them any support in an effort to assail the State deposits.

How can it successfully be contended that all of the precautions which the States took for the protection of the investors in this Company against the day when there might be some failure on the part of the company to meet its obligations, now that that day has arrived, must be held for naught? Surely no court of equity would countenance for a minute such an attempt to undo the valid and salutary safeguards thrown up by the States to protect their citizens against the disaster which has come, except on grounds of a clear violation of some express prohibition in the Federal Constitution against State legislation of such character. No such suggestion has been made.

Fidelity never came under any Federal regulation. During its entire existence it was regulated by the State authorities. All of the deposits which were made were in pursuance to State laws. No reason whatsoever is shown why the Federal Court should have any jurisdiction to nullify the rights which have been thus created.

It is highly significant that the Securities and Exchange Commission in its report to Congress stated that neither of the two major companies (Fidelity Investment Association and Investors Syndicate) had registered their certificates under the Securities Act of 1933 "presumably by reason of the exemption in Section 3 (a) (8) of that Act." The footnote to said sentence points out that:

> "Sec. 3(a) (8) of the Securities Act of 1933 includes among the securities exempted from the registration and prospectus requirement of the Act, 'any insurance or endowment policy or annuity contract or optional annuity contract, issued by a corporation subject to the supervision of the insurance commissioner, bank commissioner, or any agency or officer performing like functions, of any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia.'"

Part Two, Statistical Survey of Investment Trusts and Investment Companies, p. 228.

Commissioner Healy, in his statement before the Sub-Committee of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the United States Senate, preceding the passage of the bill, compared these companies to savings banks (Part One hearings on S. 3580, pp. 33, 38).

Thus, until the enactment of the Investment Company Act of 1940, the Securities and Exchange Commission evidently held the view that investment companies selling face-amount certificates were exempted from the registration of their certificates under the Securities Act of 1933.*

Petitioners, for want of any better reason for the Central Trust Company's taking over the twenty millions of dollars worth of securities for distribution, say that it is better to wind up the company at Charleston in the Federal Court as that a lot of legal questions can be raised there. So far as we can discern from the petition this is the sole basis of their challenge of the finding of the Court of Appeals that the best interests of the contract holders would be subserved by the State proceedings. They naively assert:

"The prevalent theory of the States participating in this case is that the State deposits, except in West Virginia, are for the primary protection of the holders of the contracts sold in the respective States. This theory may, or may not, be sound. It should be judicially determined by a court having jurisdiction of all of the assets and of the persons interested before there is any distribution."

Then they go on to say that it is not for them to answer or resolve these questions now (one year after the taking of 4,000 pages of testimony covering the creation of the deposits with great detail), but that they are merely making suggestions demonstrating the necessity of witholding any distribution until they are settled.

What a windfall it would be to the Central Trust Company and its staff of attorneys (including those which have been loaned to the Debtor in their frenzied efforts to sustain this proceeding after the attorney who filed the petition evacuated the case) if this innocent-appearing little suggestion which "may or may not be sound" can be tested out at Charleston! Oh, what a scurrying there would be to find authorities to support elaborate pleadings raising the question of whether or not after all contract holders in Tennessee, Alabama, Kansas and the other States have any security, if only this Court would give them the green light. What a disaster it would be to eighty thousand contract holders who compare such subtleties of the law to the disputation of the ancient theologians about how many angels could stand on the point of a needle.

With liquidation in mind as the ultimate result of the litigation, petitioners say:

"Whether or not, if there should be liquidation, the assets should be distributed according to the States in which they are held and to the contract holders residing therein, or according to the contract series funds for which Fidelity owned and held these assets, will be a real question which can be effectively determined only while the res is undistributed."

To prove that there can be no possible basis for the distribution of the deposits except the State laws under which they were created, it is necessary only to refer to the testimony of Mr. Raymond Latta. Before the receivership in the State Court, the company employed this expert actuary in an effort to devise some method of determining the "equities" of the contract holders with a view of effecting some rehabilitation. Mr. Latta remained in the employ of the Receivers and continued in the employ of the Trustee in Bankruptcy until September 15, 1941. (Record, p. 3223.) He was not called as a witness by the Debtor but was called as a witness by the defendants opposing reorganization. He had gone so far as to work out tentative or rough working plans. These were filed as Exhibits 111 and 112. (Record, p. 3255). One plan was called the Uniform Plan and the other the Graduated Plan. Under the Uniform Plan contract holders would receive 80 per cent or 85 per cent of their "equities." Under the Graduated Plan some of them would receive 90 per cent and the remainder would receive 30 per cent to 50 per cent. Mr. Latta testified that no plan was ever devised which could be put into effect. (Record, pp. 3305-3306). He attended conferences with the Securities and Exchange Commission. All of these plans looked to the company being transformed into a life insurance company. (Record, p. 3306).

Mr. Latta testified that it was impossible for them to determine the amount each fund had. This was because of the various loans and inter-fund transactions. After nine months work on these problems, there were still questions which baffled this reorganization expert. For the convenience of the Court of Appeals, we are printing an excerpt from his testimony as Appendix C to this reply. This excerpt has been printed in the transcript of the record at pages 238-239.

The deposits in the several States in general secure the total liabilities in the States according to the laws of the State without distinction as to funds or series. No more power exists in this Court to readjust claims of contract holders between the different States so as to bring about a reshuffling of securities among the holders of the different series of contracts, than to take away the deposits themselves. This would be accomplishing by indirection what cannot be done directly.

The inescapable barrier to reorganization is the varying rights and interests of secured contract holders in the different States. It is unfortunate that there must be any loss. Still, since loss there must be, it should be borne where it falls. This Court cannot mitigate the misfortune of those having the lesser security by taking away any security from the better secured classes of contract holders. Moreover, the great complexity of interests would prevent the formulation of any fair modification of the existing rights of contract holders. Any such modification would have to be upon lines wholly arbitrary.

For the reasons given, no fair, equitable and feasible method of reorganization is possible in this case; and distribution of $20,000,000 of securities will have to be made according to State laws which required the deposits and govern the basis of distribution.

Why Proceedings in Bankruptcy Not to Best Interest of Contract Holders.

Whether we test the applicability of the Bankruptcy Act to Fidelity and the benefits expected to flow from it from the standpoint either of rehabilitation as a going concern, or liquidation, the same conclusion is inescapable.

Contract holders would suffer greatly from continued proceedings in bankruptcy because:

(a) Bankruptcy proceedings in this case would only serve to multiply and protract fruitless litigation and delay the payment of the just claims of contract holders; and

(b) A great amount of expense will be avoided if immediate liquidation of the State deposits in State Courts is permitted.

It has been shown that any litigation having the end in view of abrogating or modifying the State deposits as they existed at the time of the filing of the petition would be useless and detrimental to contract holders.

It is as plain as the noon-day that so far as Fidelity is concerned, no greater power over State deposits exists in the Bankruptcy Court since the enactment of the Investment Company Act, than there was before. We have seen that it was not the intention of Congress to disturb the State deposits as they existed on the effective date of the Act, which was January 1st, 1941. As Mr. Schenker stated to the Senate Sub-Committee on Banking and Currency, "meticulous care" was taken to see that those States which had deposits could hold on to them. (Printed Transcript, p. 229)

The Investment Company Act embodied a separate section headed "Bankruptcy of Face-Amount Certificate Companies." This Section 29 undertakes to amend Section 67 of the Bankruptcy Act so as to give the Bankruptcy Court summary jurisdiction over State deposits in proceedings for the liquidation of face-amount certificate companies.*

Section 29 expressly provides that it applies only to the deposit of securities made by a face-amount certificate company on or after January 1st, 1941. Deposits made prior to that time may not be avoided by the Trustee, and the Bankruptcy Court is given no summary jurisdiction of any proceedings to hear and determine the rights of any parties with respect to such deposits. It is to be borne in mind that all of the deposits of Fidelity were made prior to January 1, 1941.

That is not all. Sub-section (f) (5) of Section 29 provides:

> "Where the provisions of Sub-Section (c) of Section 28 are not applicable, the provisions of this Section shall not apply."

---

*It is worthy of note that neither prior to the enactment of the Investment Company Act nor as a result of the amendment to that Acts was any special provision made for the reorganization of face-amount certificate companies. Whereas, the Bankruptcy Act contained separate chapters with carefully framed provisions concerning Agricultural Compositions and Extensions, Railroad Reorganizations, Debt Readjustments by Municipalities and Taxing Districts, Corporate Reorganizations, Arrangements, Real Property Arrangements and Wage Earners Plan, this simple amendment designed to facilitate the liquidation of face-amount certificate companies and the distribution of the deposits made after January 1st, 1941 was added by the Investment Company Act as an amendment to Section 67 of the Chapter relating to ordinary bankruptcy. It is in such striking contrast to the carefully detailed methods set up with respect to other types of corporations as to make it exceedingly doubtful whether in any event there would be jurisdiction in the Bankruptcy Court to attempt to rehabilitate a face-amount certificate company as a going concern. But this is not a determinative question.

Manifestly, it was intended that Section 29 relating to bankruptcy of face-amount certificate companies might have application to some companies but not to all companies.

Obviously, Section 28 referred to is the preceding Section of the Investment Company Act, the title of which is Face-Amount Certificate Companies. Sub-section (c) of Section 28 relates to regulations of the Securities and Exchange Commission applicable to deposits with trustees which may be required of registered face-amount certificate companies.

For two reasons, Section 28 (c) was not applicable to Fidelity, viz:

(a) According to the statement of the representatives of the Securities and Exchange Commission at the hearing, it was never a registered face-amount certificate company; and

(b) Sub-Section (g) of Section 28 rendered the entire Section 28 (including Sub-section (c) inapplicable to Fidelity because it provides that the Section shall not apply to a face-amount certificate company which on or before the effective date of the Act has discontinued the offering of face-amount certificates to the public. Fidelity did discontinue the offering of face-amount certificates to the public before the effective date of the Act.

We have shown that the assets of Fidelity outside of the State deposit are negligible; because as the record shows there is a claim of the Federal Government for unpaid income taxes in the amount of approximately $300,000.00, and after the payment of administration expenses, Court costs and attorneys' fees, very little, if anything, will remain from the non-deposited assets to be distributed to contract holders. To make the decision in this case turn upon the non-deposited assets or the possibility of some equity in one or more of the States to go back to the general fund would be putting the cart before the horse. Contract holders would be far better off to waive altogether their claims against the non-deposited assets than to let such a trivial amount control the disposition of Twenty Million Dollars of deposited securities held in State deposits.

Therefore, for all practical purposes, Fidelity's deposits, before the Investment Company Act was enacted, were not subject to the summary power of a court of bankruptcy. They did not become subject to such summary jurisdiction after the Act took effect. Indeed the failure of Congress to amend the reorganization sections of the Bankruptcy Act, when the Investment Company Act was passed is persuasive that it was not intended that those sections of the Bankruptcy Act so ill-adapted to the processes of reorganizing a face-amount certificate company would be resorted to. However that may be, when this company avoided the necessity of becoming a registered face-amount certificate company by discontinuing the offering of face-amount certificates to the public prior to January 1, 1941, it exempted itself from the only provision of the Bankruptcy Act which would have had direct application to the State deposits.

When consideration is given to the clear intent of Congress to leave the existing deposits undisturbed, it would not be consonant with justice to arrive at the result aimed at by the petitioners by resort to any forced or strained construction of the provisions of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.

Surely there can be no gainsaying the following statement by the Court of Appeals:

> " . . . certainly the possibility that thousands of contract holders could be persuaded to modify their contracts and scale down their claims to enable the company to go on is so remote as to exist only in the imagination. No proposal for the investment of new capital has been forthcoming. The facts underlying the whole situation are so clear that even the parties in this case who insist upon reorganization under the Bankruptcy Act hold out little hope of a resumption of the business as a going concern, and content themselves for the most part with the argument that reorganization in the statutory sense includes 'a slow and orderly liquidation.' " (Italics ours).

Immediate Need of Liquidation for the Benefit of Contract Holders.

The Court of Appeals concluded that the immediate need was liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of the contract holders. This was a factual determination. The evidence clearly sustains this conclusion.

It was developed at the hearing that the expenses of the receivership in the Federal Court at Charleston, before any allowance for administrative expenses, Federal Income Tax or the income from the deposited securities, Court costs, Trustees' fees and attorneys' fees was approximately $150,000.00 per annum. This is only a part of what it is costing contract holders to keep this proceeding in Court. (Tes. of J. H. Schellhase, pp. 2614-2620, typewritten record)

The statement in the opinion of the District Judge that the company's assets "might reasonably be expected to be largely dissipated in costs, fees, and market losses by forced liquidation" in a State Court proceedings, it seems to us, is wholly unwarranted. It is not amiss, we think, to make the observation at this point that from the standpoint of costs and expenses, the chief concern of contract holders is as to the following:

(a) The annual cost of $150,000.00 in administrative expenses of the trust estate while this litigation goes on;

(b) The compensation of the Central Trust Company and its attorneys and the multitudinous costs and expenses of this litigation in addition to the annual operating expenses of $150,000.00;

(c) The loss to contract holders from depreciation in securities already incurred since the litigation commenced, and the additional depreciation which will likely be suffered before the contract holders can get their money out of the insolvent concern;

(d) The large amount of additional income taxes that will accrue if the contention of the Federal Government is sustained that the estate must pay Federal income taxes on all of the income from the securities held in State deposits;

(e) Increased allowances to Receivers and attorneys representing contract holders and depositaries occasioned by reason of this proceeding;

(f) The untold amount of fees and expenses that will be incurred by contract holders for committees and attorneys in establishing and enforcing their rights if the estate has to be administered in Charleston, West

Virginia, and in a State far distant from the places where they reside and where the deposits securing their contracts are held;

(g) And what will be the most stupendous exaction of all the over-all fees on the whole $20,000,000.00 estate that may be allowed to the Central Trust Company in Charleston and the attorneys if the summary turn-over order directing that all State deposits be turned over to the Trustee is revived and a slow liquidation is conducted by the Trust Company at Charleston.

We do not feel that we can pass the discussion of this point, without observing that in this case there may be a fast and orderly liquidation in the several States. This is what the contract holders are entitled to. Fidelity is not the kind of corporation with which the Courts were dealing in the cases cited by the District Judge in his discussion of "slow" liquidation. We believe that it is a fair generalization that the assets of those corporations did not consist of liquid securities which were fairly readily marketable. The deposits of assets of Fidelity in the several States consist principally of bonds.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, in its Report on Investment Trusts and Investment Companies as to the type of investments made by the company, states: "The Association has followed a settled policy of investing its funds almost entirely in marketable securities, about ninety percent of which have consisted of bonds and notes." (Page 96 of Report) So far as we can recall, there is not an iota of proof that there will be any benefits to contract holders to whom these securities belong from having the Central Trust Company (a moneyed corporation operating for profit) take over the deposits and reduce them to cash.

When petitioners speak of "slow liquidation", they really mean slow distribution. There would be some benefits from a slow distribution but those benefits would not inure to the contract holders. They would be benefits to the Central Trust Company.

CONCLUSION.

There is no important question of Federal law involved in this case. Certainly there is no question of Federal law involved in this case which this Court should undertake to settle. Even if this Court should disagree with the reasoning of the Court of Appeals, on the question of whether or not Fidelity was an insurance company within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act when the petition was filed, it possesses no such omniscience as to enable it to declare principles which would be controlling in every such case that may hereafter arise. Any attempt to do so would result only in confusion worse confounded.

The decision of the Court of Appeals is a just one. There is no reason for this Court to permit this litigation to be prolonged. A decision that Fidelity was a kind of corporation that could file a petition under the Bankruptcy Act and sustaining the petition which has been filed would only result in years of wasting of the contract holders funds, while the Central Trust Company and its attorneys enjoy a very luscious plum.

Servant girls, miners, policemen and letter carriers have turned over their savings to this company to be invested for them. The fact that deposit laws of the various States insured protection for these payments was no doubt the chief inducement that was used in selling the scheme. These people scattered in some twenty-nine different States cannot afford to employ lawyers and set up Committees to save their securities from being consumed in an utterly futile attempt to continue the operations of this defunct company through proceedings in a Federal Court in a distant State. They will not understand how the company could sell the contracts on the strength of guaranties from every quarter that they need never look beyond the boundaries of their own State for protection against loss because of the "safeguards" of the State deposit and then resort to the aid of a Federal Court in bankruptcy to take their security away from them.

We submit that the underlying issue is one of good faith. Debtor's case should be scrutinized with extreme care lest the Federal Courts unwittingly be used as an instrumentality for breaking faith with many thousands of humble persons who are as sheep dumb before their shearers.

CHAPTER 209 OF THE PUBLIC ACTS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF TENNESSEE, ENACTED MARCH 8, 1939, APPROVED MARCH 10, 1939.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That Section 6057 of the Code of Tennessee be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Provided, however, that if the Securities offered or to be offered for sale to Tennessee be of the class known as 'Investment Contracts', comprising the following: investment contracts, or annuity contracts other than those of qualified insurance companies, or installment investment certificates, or securities of like kind, which contemplate that the issuer shall pay or deliver, or whereby the issuer agrees to pay or deliver, either absolutely or conditionally, to the purchaser or holder of the contract, certificate, bond, or like security, a sum of money at a future time, either with or without interest, in consideration of a payment or payments made or contemplated to be made by such purchaser or holder, which securities are hereinafter referred to as investment contracts; the investment company, or issuer, domestic or foreign, upon written request of the Commissioner of Insurance and Banking of this State, shall deposit and maintain with the said Commissioner, for the benefit of the holders of such investment contracts, a deposit of securities in cash or its equivalent; but the Commissioner of Insurance and Banking may, in his discretion, accept as said equivalent, such securities as domestic life insurance companies are permitted to invest their funds in under Section 6204 as amended of the official Code of Tennessee, in amount not less than $10,000 and at no time less than 100% of the issuer's cash or current contracts, liability on all such outstanding investment contracts, as defined herein, sold in the State of Tennessee. The Commissioner of Insurance and Banking of this State shall hold as custodian the securities deposited for the benefit of the holders of the investment contracts coming within the provisions of this Section.

"Securities deposited may be withdrawn at any time by the issuer at its option whenever other securities of like character are deposited in equivalent amount with the Commissioner of Insurance and Banking of this State in substitution therefor, or to the extent of any excess over 100% of the aggregate amount of the issuer's said cash or current contract liability on all such outstanding investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee, provided only that the amount of said deposit shall not be reduced by such withdrawal below $10,000 unless the issuer has ceased to sell the investment contracts for which the deposit is maintained and no longer has authority to sell the same in this State. The Commissioner of Insurance and Banking of this State shall permit a reduction of such deposit by withdrawal of securities as herein provided upon the filing by the issuer of a proper affidavit showing that the amount of such deposit is in excess of the requirements of this Section. Upon discharge in full of all liabilities on all investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee and for which such deposit is maintained, the issuer shall be entitled to a release and return of the securities so deposited. The issuer making such deposit shall be entitled to collect and receive the income and/or payments made on securities deposited; provided, however, that the amounts unpaid on deposited securities shall at no time be less than the minimum amount required to be deposited hereunder.

"The Commissioner of Insurance and Banking shall at least annually and oftener if he may deem it proper, appoint a disinterested qualified person or persons to make an examination and appraisement of the securities deposited with him, to determine if such securities meet the requirements of this Section, and the cost of such examination and appraisement shall be borne by the issuer of the investment contracts being sold or offered for sale in this State."

SECTION 2. BE IT FURTHER ENACTED, That this Act shall take effect from and after its passage, the public welfare requiring it.

CHAPTER 157 OF THE PUBLIC ACTS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF TENNESSEE, ENACTED FEBRUARY 14, 1941, APPROVED FEBRUARY 15, 1941.

An Act to Make the State Treasurer the Custodian of all Collateral Held by or Deposited with the State or Any Department Thereof and to Fix His Duties and Responsibilities in Connection Therewith.

SECTION 1. BE IT ENACTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF TENNESSEE, That the State Treasurer be and he is hereby designated as the custodian of all collateral, securities, bonds and other valuable papers deposited with the State or any department thereof, and shall be exclusively responsible for the safekeeping thereof. It shall be the duty of each department head or other person in the State Government having in his or her possession collateral of the type above mentioned, to turn the same over to the State Treasurer upon the latter's request and to receive from the State Treasurer an itemized receipt therefor and as additional collateral, shall come into the hands of the department head or other person the same procedure shall be followed.

For the safekeeping of such collateral, the State Treasurer shall execute an additional bond in such sum as may be fixed by the Governor with the surety thereon to be approved by the Governor. He shall make an annual report to the Governor of the collateral in his hands, which report shall be made on or before December 15 of each calendar year. The expenses of such additional bond, if any, shall be paid from the appropriation made to the Treasurer's office.

SECTION 2. BE IT FURTHER ENACTED, That this Act shall take effect from and after its passage, the public welfare requiring it.

APPENDIX B.

(From Debtor's Petition for Reorganization.)

VII

Debtor further states that it now has outstanding investment and annuity contracts with reserve liabilities totaling approximately $25,000,000, and that in these contracts debtor agrees to pay interest accumulations of from four to five per cent per annum; that the decrease in interest rates in recent years has made it impossible for debtor to invest its funds in conformance with the West Virginia law and to earn the interest requirements as set forth in its said outstanding contracts; and that by reason of said interest requirements under its said contracts debtor is now suffering an annual loss of approximately $250,000 per annum, and that this loss will continue and probably increase unless the earnings on sound securities should increase far in excess of the present rate of income.

That for the reasons above set forth debtor has been unable to meet its obligations as they mature and will be unable to meet its obligations as they mature, unless the rights of its contract holders are modified so that the earnings received on securities and assets owned by debtor will be sufficient in amount to meet the requirements under its outstanding contracts; and if the rights of its outstanding contract holders are modified to this extent, debtor will be able to meet its reserve requirements and will be able to comply with the Investment Company Act of 1940 and will be enabled to resume the operation of its business.

Debtor further states that each of its existing and outstanding contracts is secured under the terms of each of its said contracts by a reserve fund, which is on deposit with the Treasurer of the State of West Virginia and with the officials and departments of other states where the securities of debtor were sold; and that the rights of all contract holders must be modified as above set forth in order that debtor may be permitted to obtain adequate relief, and that by reason of these facts debtor cannot obtain adequate relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Act.

VIII

Debtor further states that no plan of reorganization has been as yet formulated, and that it knows of no plan of reorganization, readjustment or liquidation affecting the property of the corporation pending either in connection with or without any judicial proceeding except that receiverships have been created in West Virginia and other states, some of which are threatening to sell the assets now in their possession.

APPENDIX C.

Excerpt from the Testimony of Raymond Latta, pp. 3252-3254:

"MR. PALMER:

Q. In any attempt, however, to rehabilitate the company before there were receivership proceedings, the fact that, let us say, the B fund had a 95% equity and the special annuity had, let us say, a 25% equity, was a difficult matter to work out. Wasn't that true? I mean, as a practical matter?

A. My experience there was they never determined what amounts each fund had. As far as working out a plan is concerned, it offered problems to what we were working toward, because we had no assumptions to make toward determining the equity of each fund.

Q. Let me develop that a little more fully. You attempted to find out how much equity or cash against liability each policy holder of each series of contracts would have. Is that correct—roughly?

A. Worked out statements of that nature revealing information of that nature, with innumerable assumptions made.

Q. What was that?

A. We tried to develop figures along that nature, with—making innumerable assumptions—a number of them, I mean.

Q. Part of the trouble was that you had loans between funds and transactions between funds as shown by the books of the company. Isn't that true?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you would have to assume in some instances that the loan would be paid back by one fund to the other fund before you would work on it. Isn't that right?

A. We made various assumptions.

Q. Yes! That was one of the assumptions you made.

A. Yes.

Q. And in other assumptions, you just took the reserve as shown by the books of the company as belonging to that fund, without paying back any of its loans in other funds and worked on that assumption.

A. We made various assumptions along that line; yes.

Q. You had no way, prior to receivership proceedings being brought, of determining which of your assumptions would be lawfully and legally correct?

A. Did you put a date in there? I can't answer that with a date.

Q. You had no way of determining that any of your assumptions was lawfully and legally correct?

A. I haven't heard the answer as yet, if that is what you mean.

Q. By that you mean the answer to the question is that you had no way of determining it?

A. That's right."

BRIEF ON BEHALF OF L. H. BROOKS, TRUSTEE, FREDERIC LEAKE AND A. L. GOLDBERG, JR., TRUSTEE, AND DEWEY S. GODFREY, RECEIVER FOR FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION IN THE STATE OF MISSOURI, IN OPPOSITION TO MEMORANDUM OF SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION.

May It Please the Court:

NECESSITY FOR THIS REPLY BRIEF.

Securities and Exchange Commission has filed a memorandum for the purpose of supporting the petition of Fidelity Assurance Association and Central Trust Company. We feel that the writer of the memorandum has completely overlooked facts appearing in this record, nay evidence compiled by the Securities and Exchange Commission itself, in its extensive investigation of Investment Companies, which conclusively refute all of the argument contained in the memorandum. The importance of these facts is such, we think, that the omission to give recognition to them leads inescapably to a partial and inadequate understanding of the case. Therefore, since we have no other way of exposing these fallacies, we feel that there is a duty resting upon us to bring these facts to the attention of the Court at this time by means of this reply brief.

QUESTION I—THE INSURANCE QUESTION.

The Securities and Exchange Commission says that the first question raised concerning the correctness of the reasoning by which the Court of Appeal concluded that Fidelity Assurance Association was an insurance corporation at the time the petition was filed is of such importance in the administration of Federal statutes (the Bankruptcy Act and the Investment Company Act) that this Court should undertake to settle it. The reasoning on this point is grounded upon the assumption that it is important that this Court in this case announce a decision as to the applicability of these Federal statutes to other similar companies which have attracted the savings of a large number of persons throughout the United States for investment.

But, the argument goes further than this,—as indeed it must, if the point is to merit any consideration whatsoever —and recognizes that the question is as to the eligibility of such companies for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. It may seem strange that the writer of the memorandum failed altogether to make any attempt to show that this particular company, Fidelity Assurance Association, could or should be reorganized. The failure to do so cannot be ascribed to mere oversight, inadvertence or lack of familiarity with the facts of the case on the part of the author of the brief; for the solicitor representing the Securities and Exchange Commission whose name is signed to the memorandum, in arguing the case before the Court of Appeals, admitted that in his opinion it was "almost" 100 per cent certain that Fidelity could not be reorganized as a going concern of any kind or character. Therefore, they are now driven to use the term "reorganization" with the meaning of liquidation.

Considerable emphasis is placed in the memorandum on the amount of "assets" of Fidelity (95 per cent of which are held in the State deposits), the number of contract holders, and the fact that they are scattered throughout the forty-eight States of the Union and the District of Columbia. It is hardly necessary, we think, to point out that this case may not be transferred from the field of litigation concerning private rights and interests into the field of public interest, merely on account of the amount of money involved or the interstate character of the company's operations. The public interests are not necessarily involved, because of the question made in this case, as to whether this company should be excluded from the Bankruptcy Act. No question of public importance could arise over the problem of distribution of the assets of this defunct company, unless the principles of the decision may vitally and materially affect other similar companies which in the future may be similarly situated.

In order to demonstrate, beyond the shadow of doubt, that a decision in this case settles no principles of law which can ever in the future have application to other similar companies, or to contract holders in those companies whose rights and interests are similar to the contract holders in this case, it is necessary only to refer to the findings of the Securities and Exchange Commission itself, as set forth in its Report on Investment Trusts and Investment Companies. This Report is one of the exhibits in this case, sent up in original form.

We believe that Securities and Exchange Commission will readily agree that, for the purpose of the precise question under consideration, there is a clear line of demarcation between face-amount certificate companies and all other classes of investment companies. This distinction was carefully drawn in the Investment Company Act. It can serve no purpose to call attention to the fact that there are "other large financial institutions which have attracted the savings of large numbers of persons throughout the United States for investment." Our consideration must be limited to face-amount certificate companies as defined by the Investment Company Act.

Securities and Exchange Commission in its report on Investment Trusts and Investment Companies transmitted to Congress under date of March 13, 1940, sets out that there were then only three companies of this type. They were Investors' Syndicate, Fidelity Investment Association, and United Securities Company of Missouri. The report states that the first two occupy a "predominate position" in the field. (Report, pp. 2-3.)

The report further states that the United Securities Company of Missouri is the only other sizable corporation which, so far as available information indicates, offers face amount installment certificates or contracts to the public. It was pointed out in the report that the installment or thrift certificates sold by this company did not fall in the same category as the face-amount certificates sold by the other two companies, which were the special subjects of the study embodied in this Report. It is stated in the Report that state officials apparently have not required deposits to secure certificate liability of United Securities Company of Missouri, because the face-amount certificates of that company were collaterally secured under trust agreements, and were, in effect, collateral trust certificates. (Report, pp. 121-124.) Manifestly, United Securities Company of Missouri, for the purpose of the question under consideration, is unlike Fidelity.

This leaves as the only other company which has sold face-amount certificates secured by deposits with state officials before the Investment Company Act went into effect, the Investors Syndicate. The District Judge, in his opinion, refers to this company, saying: "This regulatory law [The Investment Company Act of 1940] has not had the effect of banishing all such companies from the region of commercial operation. The testimony discloses that at least one other such company is still in operation, presumably with some measure of success." (Printed transcript, p. 29.)

Investors Syndicate, as the evidence in the case discloses, is the only investment company which has become a registered face-amount certificate company under the Investment Company Act of 1940. It has been operating in some manner as a registered face-amount certificate company since January 1, 1941, the effective date of that Act. It did not, so far as the proof discloses, undertake to transform itself into an insurance company prior to the effective date of the Act. Nor did it cease to issue face-amount certificates after the effective date of the Act. The status and characteristics of Investors' Syndicate is therefore now, at least in the respects noted, wholly dissimilar to the status and characteristics of Fidelity Assurance Association when the petition was filed.

Now, let us notice carefully the precise question which Securities and Exchange Commission says is of so great importance in the administration of Federal statutes that it ought to be settled by this Court. The question is not, as they say, merely as to the "eligibility for and amenability to corporation reorganization under Chapter X of face-amount certificates and other investment companies which procure incidental insurance power, making insubstantial use of them." (Memorandum of Securities and Exchange Commission, p. 11.) The question is inadequately stated in these terms. More exactly stated, the question is: whether or not a company which having, (a) over a period of years issued and sold face amount certificates which were secured by deposits of securities in trust, in accordance with the laws of the several states in which certificates were sold requiring such deposits to be maintained as a condition to the right to sell such certificates therein; (b) prior to the effective date of the Investment Company Act, became insolvent and found itself unable to comply with the requirements for a face-amount certificate company under that Act; (c) amended its charter so as to become an insurance company, and from and after that date did everything possible to become an insurance company, as distinguished from a face-amount certificate company, for the avowed purpose of avoiding compliance with that Act; (d) six months later, after having obligated itself as an insurance company on 9,802 insurance contracts and; (e) in this period received payments on outstanding face-amount contracts previously issued which it could not lawfully have done as a face-amount certificate company because it did not register under the Investment Company Act but had a lawful right to do as an insurance company, was an insurance company within the meaning of Sec. 4(a) of the Bankruptcy Act when it filed the petition for reorganization under Chapter X.

This question has never arisen before. Obviously it will never arise again. The decision of this question settles nothing as regards Investors' Syndicate, the only other company which was even remotely comparable to Fidelity when the latter filed its petition for reorganization. For many reasons, unnecessary to be noted here, the decision of this question involves no principles which can have even indirect application to any problem of reorganization or liquidation of other corporations, sometimes loosely called investment companies. An inevitable consequence of an attempt by this Court to declare principles of law to govern in other cases which may arise in the future involving problems of reorganization or liquidation of other types of investment companies generally, would be that in each such case various questions of conflict between the decision of this Court in this case and the decision of Courts of Appeal would be presented. By taking jurisdiction to review the decision of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in this case, this Court would be committing itself in advance to a review of most, if not all, of the cases which Securities and Exchange Commission envisage. This Court, in undertaking to review in this case, would not be settling any important question of Federal law; rather, it would be disturbing a just decision on an unimportant point of Federal law which can never again recur.

QUESTION II—GOOD FAITH.

Will Interest of Contract Holders Be Best Subserved by Proceedings for Reorganization, Under Chapter X?

The reasoning of the memorandum of Securities and Exchange Commission on this point, it seems to us, is predicated upon an incorrect assumption. The memorandum states that Fidelity kept books showing separately the status of the several series of face-amount certificates which it issued, and that particular securities acquired were allocated to the various funds. It further states that the state depositaries did not segregate the deposit of securities according to series, "even where they had notice of the particular series of contracts to which the deposited securities belonged." (Memorandum, pp. 4-5.) It is significant that identification of "they" is lacking. The only citation supporting this statement is to the opinion of the District Judge. These statements, it seems to us, are susceptible of an altogether erroneous implication—one that is not even warranted by the opinion of the District Judge.

The actual finding of the District Judge was:

> "In each of the contracts sold by the Debtor there was a provision, which is set out in the respective contracts as Section 1 thereof, whereby, with slight variation in language as to each particular class or series of contracts, the Debtor agreed to create and maintain a reserve fund for such particular class or series from payments made on contracts of that particular class or series, which reserve fund was to be used for the discharge of its liabilities on that particular class or series of contracts. On its books Debtor kept these various series funds separate and distinct, but prior to December 31, 1938, it deposited cash received from payments on all different series of contracts except Series 'B' and Series 'D' in one bank account. Payments on contracts in Series 'B' and Series 'D' were deposited in separate bank accounts from their inception. At times when the reserve fund in one series was impaired by reason of withdrawals and maturities, so called 'interfund' loans were made, of which records were kept and on which interest was charged to the borrowing fund and paid to the lending fund. In making the deposits with the various state depositaries, *Debtor did not at all times designate deposited securities as being owned by particular funds, and made no attempt to apportion its deposits of securities from a particular fund to the amount of cash liabilities against that fund in the state where the securities were deposited."

(Printed Record, p. 9.)

In view of the manifest earnestness with which Securities and Exchange Commission insists that there are difficult problems of distribution in this case which can best be settled in a single administration, we feel that the facts with reference to the creation of the state deposits should be brought squarely to the attention of the Court, and in somewhat more detail than in the opinion of the District Judge. Fortunately, the printed transcript, despite its incompleteness, embodies other portions of the typewritten record which will enable us to point out certain very important facts.

In the first place, no blame can be placed on the state authorities for the failure to segregate the deposited securities according to the various series funds. The state deposit laws did not require such a segregation. The lack of such a requirement was not regarded as a justification for non-compliance with the state laws; for one of the allegations in the bill of complaint which Securities and Exchange Commission filed against Fidelity on December 14, 1938, was that the Association had failed properly to comply with these deposit requirements. The decree of the Federal court in the case, entered on December 22, 1938, enjoined the Association, among other things, "from purchasing and depositing with West Virginia or any other state; insufficient securities or securities which do not meet deposit requirements, or failing to segregate and maintain at all times sufficient statutory deposit against appropriate liabilities." (Report of Investment Trusts and Investment Companies, p. 131.)

* All italics herein are our own.

Although an unequivocal admission that the purpose or reason for the various changes in the certificates sold was the existence of deficits in reserve funds of the anterior series, could not be obtained from any of the officers of the company who testified, this inference is clearly warranted. No good reason was given by any of the officers who testified for the minor variations in the different types or series of contracts as they were made from time to time.

Provisions in each of the different series of contracts, with slight and immaterial difference in verbiage, obligated the company to create and maintain a special fund for the discharge of its liability under the particular series of contract. The reserve fund was to be set aside from payments received on account of the particular series. By the express provisions of each of the series of contracts, this reserve fund was to be invested in approved securities, and deposited in trust as required by the laws of the State of

West Virginia. There would be no difficulty in performing the obligations both to create and maintain the separate reserve fund from the payments from the particular series of contracts, and to maintain the required deposits in trust with the state officials, as long as the company had sufficient securities—or, in other words, was solvent. Difficulty in fulfilling both the requirements arose as soon as the company became insolvent.

For many years prior to the investigation made by Securities and Exchange Commission, however, Fidelity had failed to segregate and apply separately cash payments received from contract holders having the different series of contracts. It set up on its books an account which it called a General Fund. Apparently, this was a sort of conduit through which it, as frequently as the need arose, shuttled securities acquired from one series to cover deficits in the other series.

Fidelity's financial difficulties first commenced in 1929 and 1930. At that time the securities account amounted to over $30,000,000.00, and there was about $5,000,000.00 or $6,000,000.00 depreciation. (Testimony of D. A. Burt, Printed Record, p. 270.)

The affidavit of Ben E. Jackson, an accountant-investigator for Securities and Exchange Commission, filed in the action brought by Securities and Exchange Commission against Fidelity Investment Company in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan in December, 1938, states:

> "The books and records of defendant reflect that from November 9, 1920, defendant has issued and sold to the general public about 200,000 contract certificates for a total face amount of approximately $600,000,000.00 as follows (to June 30, 1938):

| Number of Contracts | Series Contract | Total Face Value | Period of Sales |
|---|---|---|---|
| 38,504 | Special Income | $113,330,000 | November 1920-April 1925 |
| 21,843 | Special Annuity | 268,218,000 | April 1925-February 1932 |
| 24,759 | Income Reserve Series A | 60,465,000 | March 1932-June 1934 |
| 47,811 | Income Reserve Series B | 102,126,250 | June 1934-June 1938 |
| 10,457 | Income Reserve Series D | 20,690,400 | July 1935-June 1938 |

As at June 30, 1938, 112,542 of these certificates were outstanding with a total face value of $276,223,450.

"Each series of contracts sold calls for the creation and maintenance of Reserves and Special Funds for the benefit of a particular class of contract holders. Special Funds include an Active Fund for each series, and a Maturity and Retirement Reserve Fund for Special Annuity, Income Reserve, Series A; Income Reserve, Series B, and Income Reserve, Series D, contracts. The Special Income contracts call for the creation and maintenance of a Special Income Paid Up Fund. For each Fund the contracts call for the purchase and deposit in trust with the Treasurer of West Virginia underlying portfolio securities as delimited by the West Virginia code or statute which regulates the conduct of the business of defendant.

"The Books of defendant do not reflect the creation and maintenance of Maturity and Retirement Reserve Funds for Special Annuity, Income Reserve Series A, Income Reserve Series B, or Income Reserve Series D Contracts, or a Special Income Paid-Up Fund until September 30, 1937. Prior thereto, these Reserves and their assets were commingled with assets in defendant's General Fund, but with certain securities earmarked as belonging to Income Reserve Series B and Income Reserve Series D Maturity and Retirement Reserve Funds."

(Report on Investment Trusts and Investment Companies, pp. 236-237.)

Mr. Jackson's affidavit also sets out that the total of the deficits in the various contract funds on June 30, 1938, was $3,497,052.12, and further summarizes Fidelity's juggling of the different series funds as follows:

"The defendant does not require physical segregation as to special Contract Funds of portfolio securities deposited by it with the Treasurer of West Virginia. This enables defendant to make substitutions and to effect interfund sales or transfers of securities, without notification to or the approval of the West Virginia authorities. Defendant has at various times failed to purchase and deposit in trust sufficient bonds and other securities as required and delimited by the laws of West Virginia and the terms of the various contract securities issued by defendant. Defendant has purchased and deposited with the Treasurer of West Virginia bonds and other securities in default or which did not and do not meet the requirements of the West Virginia statute. Defendant has failed to maintain at all times a sufficient deposit with the Treasurer of West Virginia and with other state officers and agencies as required by the laws of said states and by the terms of the contract securities issued by said defendant.

Defendant has deposited, in states requiring deposit, securities belonging to Special Contract Funds in excess of the liability of said Funds to contract holders residing in said states; using the excess to cover in part or wholly the liabilities of other Contract Funds; although representing to prospective purchasers: 'Securities Deposited with State Departments In Accordance With Legal Requirements In Each State in Which We Operate.'"

IX

"For many years defendant has failed to segregate and apply separately cash payments received from specific classes of contract holders. Continuing this practice, defendant now does commingle in one common bank account all monies paid in by persons holding Special Income, Special Annuity, and Income Reserve Series A Contracts, with the monies of defendant's General Fund. Defendant permits overdrafts between the various Contract Funds and between the General Fund and the various Contract Funds. Before 1933, no interest allowances were made to the lending Funds. These overdrafts are in violation of contract and statutory requirements as to investment and deposit. Due to these overdrafts, at times the General Fund was indebted to various Contract Funds in amounts in excess of $2,000,000, while at the same time said General Fund was operating a speculative Margin Trading Account in securities with New York City Brokers. From defendant's books and records and from defendant's daily report of bank balances, submitted daily to sixteen of its principal officers and directors, it appears that cash has been and is now being disbursed for the defendant's General Fund and for various Contract Funds without regard to whether each of said Funds has a cash balance to its credit.

"Interfund overdrafts reached a peak total of approximately $5,000,000 as of September 30, 1936. At this time defendant's General Fund was indebted to various Contract Funds in the amount of approximately $2,000,000, and the Special Income Active Fund was indebted to other Contract Funds in the amount of approximately $3,000,000. These overdrafts were covered, so far as the bank was concerned, by defendant's drawing against cash balances to the credit of the Special Annuity Active Fund and the Income Reserve Series A Active Fund. As at December 31, 1937, interfund overdrafts between all funds Contract and General totaled $2,351,513.99, and as at June 30, 1938, $2,071,751.14.

"Various officers and directors stated in their sworn testimony that the above overdrafts resulted because certain Contract Funds had insufficient cash on hand to meet contract maturity, cash surrender, and loan demands. According to the testimony, overdrafts were essential because the 'borrowing' Contract Funds could not liquidate sufficient underlying portfolio securities to meet cash demands, without suffering such heavy losses as to impair the solvency of the Contract Funds and the capital of defendant.

"As of December 31, 1937, the Special Income Active Fund was short $756,744.87 in its cash account and the Special Annuity Maturity and Retirement Reserve Fund was short $1,585,734.83. The underlying portfolio securities of these funds are carried by defendant at a 'book' value very substantially in excess of the then market value. If underlying portfolio securities were sold from these funds to cover cash overdrafts, defendant would have to contribute cash equal to the loss, or difference between book and market value. Defendant's capital surplus and earned surplus at this time on its books amounted to $488,204.61. As of December 31, 1937, the difference between book and market value of the underlying portfolio securities of the Special Income Active Fund and the Special Annuity Maturity and Retirement Reserve Fund aggregated respectively $758,756.66 and $717,424.77. The only source from which defendant could make up realized losses in the various Contract Funds is from Defendant's General Fund. However, for the past several years and to date, defendant has pledged practically all of the marketable securities of its General Fund with the various states to cover deposits deficiencies in the various Contract Funds. If the General Fund should withdraw such deposited securities from the various states for the purpose of sale, other equivalent securities necessarily would have to be deposited. As of December 31, 1937, practically no such additional securities acceptable for deposit were available from any source.

"As of June 30, 1938, and as of October 31, 1938, the position of defendant and the various Contract Funds in these respects remained practically unchanged. As of November 23, 1938, defendant's 'independent auditors,' Wilson and Meredith (C.P.A.'s, Ohio), in commenting in their audit report for the month of October, 1938, pointed out the existence of the above-mentioned facts and questioned the practice of defendant's commingling the cash of various Contract Funds; of defendant's permitting the practice of interfund and General Fund Overdrafts; and of defendant's commingling of securities for the purpose of deposit with various States. It was suggested that defendant take steps to correct the conditions resulting from said practices.

"The above situation explains why defendant has failed to maintain at all times the required reserves against existing contract liabilities, on a market basis, and why defendant has failed adequately to restore by contribution from the General Fund deficiencies existing at various times in specific Contract Funds."

(Report on Investment Trusts and Investment Companies, pp. 240-242.)

Mr. Hubert F. Young, who had charge of purchasing securities for Fidelity, and distributing the securities for deposit with the various states, called as a witness by the Debtor, testified in part as follows:

"Q. Generally how did you distribute these securities which were transmitted by you for deposit to the various states under their respective state laws? A. We always asked the states to approve the deposit before making the shipment.

Q. Was there any reference to the allocation of these deposits to any specific contract fund? A. No, not until recent dates.

Q. All right. And now, from 1932 up until say—when? 1939? A. '38 or '39.

Q. '38 or '39. You transmitted the securities for deposit in the various states, as required by them under their state statutes, without reference to segregation? A. That is correct.

Q. (Continuing) Of these securities to specific contract funds. Is that right? A. That is correct.

Q. But since 1938 you have made an effort to accomplish that, have you? A. Yes, we have."

(Printed Transcript, p. 215)

"(The Court) Mr. Young, explain why it was that you found it impossible to make deposits to cover the annuity contracts? A. Because we had them in other states who would not let us withdraw them, for instance, in West Virginia. We had to keep certain securities down here, and the Auditor of West Virginia or the particular officer in any state would hardly let you withdraw from that state to put them in another state, and we were short that much. The annuity account, of course, is one of the insolvent accounts, and there was simply not enough securities to go around."

(Printed Transcript, p. 217)

Mr. J. H. Scheilhase, an actuary and accountant for the company, testified as follows:

"Q. And it was not until the liability on that series of contracts in that particular state was substantially below the deposited amount that a request would be made by the company for the withdrawal of deposited securities? A. Well, I don't know—the only time that I recall—and I am not certain about it—is that the only time we requested the states to take down some of those securities was in 1939. Most of the time I would say those securities were held out there for the increasing number of payments probably of some other contract fund, so that the deposit was maintained at all times either by that particular contract fund or by another fund's securities.

(The Court) Let me ask you this. There were a number of funds shown on your own book, but your deposit in the state was just one deposit, wasn't it, and not separated into funds? A. I think that is—I don't know for sure about that, but I think it was just one deposit in a state.

Q. Then, even if one fund did accumulate a surplus in a state, if some other fund was short, you couldn't get back any money from the fund that had a surplus could you? A. No, unless we would put up securities of the same value in the fund that was short."

(Printed Transcript, p. 213; italics ours)

Mr. Frank J. McNulty, Secretary of the Company, testified in part as follows:

"Cross Examination.

By Mr. Farmer:

"Q. You mean by showing segregation by series that in some of the reports in showing the liabilities in the states you list special income so much, and special annuity so much, Series A, Series B and so forth, so much, and then show the total, but you don't mean that you broke down and said these assets over he. were for special income and these for Special Annuity and these for Series A—you didn't do that in the Tennessee Reports, did you? A. We were talking about the audit reports.

Q. I thought you were talking about the reports to the state? A. No, this is the audit report.

Q. Oh! you are talking about the audit report? Is that it? A. Yes.

Q. And not the certificates that you sent to these state officials? A. Well the certificates were also broken down by funds.

Q. That is what I said, in the liabilities, but not a corresponding breakdown by deposit of securities? A. Well, in some states it was filed that way.

Q. Yes, but you don't mean that was the general practice, and you have outlined the special instances where that was done? A. Yes.

(Mr. Farmer) That is all."

(Printed Transcript, pp. 222-3)

After the Detroit injunction, Fidelity had annual audit reports prepared by the auditing firm of Haskins & Sells. The descriptive booklets embodying this report which were filed with the state officials, contain separate financial statements of the different series of funds. It was plainly stated, however, that the securities shown on the books of the company as being held for the different funds, because of state deposit laws, were not necessarily held for the funds. Three of these descriptive booklets were filed in the record as Exhibits 85, 86 and 87. We are not able to quote the exact language of the note with reference to the state deposit laws because we do not have a copy of the printed transcript, nor a copy of the descriptive booklets. Note 4 on page 11 of Exhibit 85, however, sets forth the statement plainly showing that such segregation as was made, according to the books of the company, were subject to the state deposit laws.

Mr. Arthur Koontz, general counsel for Fidelity Association, testified that his firm was consulted from time to time about the notes to be put in the auditors' report, explanations to be made, etc., so that there would be no violation of the injunction issued by the Federal Court in Detroit. Mr. Koontz states that these notes were submitted to representatives of the Securities and Exchange Commission before the booklets were published, and that he and Mr. Clark, the manager of Haskins & Sells, made a special trip to Washington to discuss this matter with the Securities and Exchange Commission. (Typewritten Transcript, pp. 3582-3588.)

We do not mean to suggest that Securities and Exchange Commission is in any way censurable for the failure of Fidelity to avoid violation of the Detroit injunction; for, as Mr. C. E. Smith, who was assistant secretary and a director of the company, admitted, although every effort was made to comply with the order, it was "very likely" that the company was unable to do so because of its condition of insolvency. (Typewritten Record, p. 1322.)

It seems to us therefore, that the foregoing clearly shows that no neglect of duty or wrong-doing is imputable to the state officials having custody of the state deposits. In the first place, there was no duty resting upon them to segregate deposited securities by contract series. In the second place, even if there had been some duty, they could not have been expected to perform the impossible. Plainly, prior to the investigation of the company by Securities and Exchange Commission, little or no effort was made by the company to make such segregation by funds. After this investigation by Securities and Exchange Commission, separation was impossible by reason of the company's insolvency. Neither situation in any way derogates against the state deposits. It was because of just such a possibility which might entail serious loss to contract holders that the state deposit laws were enacted.

We pointed out in our brief in opposition to the petition, that the validity of the state deposits had not yet been challenged in this litigation. Even now the memorandum of the Securities and Exchange Commission contains no suggestion of any grounds on which the validity of the state deposit laws can be brought into question.

Therefore, we are at liberty to proceed with the examination of Securities and Exchange Commission's argument on its Point II by assuming that legally no distribution of the securities held in state deposits (amounting, as Securities and Exchange Commission concedes, to 95% of the total "assets") could be made without giving full recognition to the deposit laws of the several states. But Securities and Exchange Commission insinuates that it must first be determined whether the state deposits are solely for the benefit of local residents and not for the benefit of all contract holders. What does this mean? Does it mean that by some inexplicable process all of the state deposits are to be brought into hodge-podge? No reason is given why this could or should be done. Inasmuch as it seems to us that it is beyond the pale of possibility that the rights of contract holders may be so far ignored as to bring all the deposited securities into one general pot with the general assets of Debtor, so as to make all contract holders merely general creditors, we will confine our further discussion to a demonstration of the fallacy underlying the next insinuation made by Securities and Exchange Commission with respect to the state deposits.

Securities and Exchange Commission in its memorandum further pose this question:

> "(d) it must be determined whether states which accepted deposits from Fidelity to secure contracts in a particular Fidelity series, with knowledge that the securities deposited constituted a fund belonging by contract to another series may keep such assets.
> "It is obvious that security holders from states without deposits or states with inadequate deposits must litigate these questions in each of the fifteen states having deposits, unless there is to be a central administration in a court of bankruptcy."

Surely Securities and Exchange Commission does not mean that such questions are inevitable. No such issue is in the case at the present time. There is no reason why such a question should ever be made, regardless of whether the state deposits are distributed by the states in accordance with the decree of the Court of Appeals, or whether there is to be some kind of administration of these deposits in a court of bankruptcy. Such litigation would only be fruitless and expensive to contract holders, because there is no possibility of any re-shuffling or redistribution of the state deposits at this time on the basis of such bookkeeping entries as were made by the company with respect to the different series of funds.

We showed in our brief in reply to the petition that valid trusts came into existence when the securities were deposited according to the state deposit laws. Now, we wish to show the obverse of this—that no valid trust came into existence at any time until the deposits of securities were made by the company with said depositaries. This means, of course, change of possession, actual or constructive.

Until the Company transferred securities to the State depositaries, they were still (notwithstanding bookkeeping entries) under the unfettered dominion and control of the Company. They should be "switched" about from one ledger account to another. They could be "loaned," or "advanced." The record shows many such transactions in very large sums. There was no attempt even to make separate bookkeeping entries until the latter years of the Company's existence.

The different contracts themselves when analyzed furnish conclusive evidence that no trust could come into existence until securities were deposited with State officials. In the first place, the contract holder was to make his payments to the Company. Undoubtedly the payments when received by the Company became its absolute property. The company agreed unconditionally—so far as reserve funds were concerned—to make the payments to the contract holder when due according to the terms of the contract. It did not agree to pay only out of the separate reserve fund. The contract holder's right to receive the payments from the Company was not limited to any special or segregated fund.

At no time throughout the whole period was there a trust fund or res until the Company parted with possession of securities by delivering them to the various depositaries.

McKey v. Paradise, 299 U. S. 119, 81 L. Ed. 75;
American Service Company v. Henderson (4 C. C. A) 120 F. (2d), 525;
Continental Casualty Company v. Powell (4 C. C. A) 83 F. (2d), 652.

The legal impediments to the attempt to redistribute the securities held in state deposits, according to the various contract series, are as great as those barring an attempt to completely abrogate the state deposit by throwing all of the securities into hodge-podge. Moreover, there is no evidence whatsoever in the record tending to show that there is any possibility of making such a redistribution of the deposited securities on any fair or reasonable basis. So not only is there the legal impossibility of doing what the Securities and Exchange Commission timorously imply may be done, but there is such a mathematical impracticability as to be tantamount to an impossibility.

There is no evidence in the record tending to show that it is possible to make such a re-allocation of the securities as would be required. The evidence was taken on the issue of whether there is a reasonable chance of reorganization. Debtor sought to show that the company could be rehabilitated. The insistence that a plan of "slow and orderly liquidation" would meet the requirements of Section 146 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act was injected in the case as an afterthought.

None of the auditors or accountants who investigated the affairs of Fidelity for Securities and Exchange Commission were called as witnesses. The only disinterested witness possessing the necessary qualifications to testify on the subject was Mr. Latta. Judge Moore asked him the question whether or not it would be possible to prepare a plan of reorganization for Fidelity from an actuarial standpoint. The answer of the witness was in the affirmative. Judge Moore, however, refused to permit any of the counsel for parties opposing reorganization to ask the witness whether or not, in his opinion, it was probable as distinguished from possible, that a plan of reorganization from an actuarial viewpoint could be worked out. (Typewritten transcript p. 3511.) He further declined to permit the witness to answer the question whether it was unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization for Fidelity could be effected. (Printed Transcript, pp. 179-180; typewritten record pp. 3353-3374.)

Mr. Latta, however, later was permitted to make some explanation as to what he meant in his response to the Court's question, and we quote from his testimony as follows:

> "MR. PALMER: Q. Mr. Latta, will you please explain your answer to the Court's question when he asked you if Fidelity could be reorganized actuarilly—I don't know the exact question, but you answered the Court's question 'Yes.' Would you explain your answer, please? A. Actuarilly whether it could be reorganized strictly from a mathematical viewpoint, as I interpreted his question to be, would be as to whether there could be computed, as far as figures are concerned, in order to place this Company in a solvent condition, ready for operation on a sound financial basis as of that time. That is my interpretation of what he meant."

* * * * *

"MR. PALMER: Q. In other words, whether or not you could possibly construct an actuarial plan for Fidelity and your answer to that bears no relation to what your answer would be as to whether Fidelity could be successfully rehabilitated, is that correct? A. They are entirely separate questions.

"Q. And bear no relation to each other? A. No. (Printed Transcript, p. 184.)

Mr. Latta further testified that the various loans and interfund transactions rendered it impossible to determine what amount each series fund had. (Printed Transcript, pp. 238-239; Typewritten record p. 3568.)

A fair epitomization of his testimony as to the inextricable confusion of the different series funds is:

". . . as far mathematically speaking, you cannot determine the exact solvency of any fund due to the problems that are presented, you might say." (Typewritten record, p. 3274.)

Granting that some readjustment between series funds is physically and mathematically possible, how could it be done on any basis that is not wholly arbitrary? When the Detroit injunction was made the Company had around $28,000,000 in State deposits. (Report on Investment Trusts and Investment Companies, p. 130.) After this injunction in 1939 the surrenders were heavy (printed transcript, p. 212). During the two years that the company operated after the Securities and Exchange Commission enjoined it from failing to segregate funds, it lost around $8,000,000 from withdrawals by contract holders. It was insolvent during this time. It did not and could not segregate funds. It followed the old policy of robbing Peter to pay Paul. So, even if a trust relationship with respect to each series contract could by enforced—and we have already demonstrated the unsoundness of any such theory—some Special Annuity contract holders for example, have been paid with series B monies. This money cannot be recovered. What about the millions which were turned back to contract holders before any bookkeeping separation by series was attempted? (Report on Investment Trusts and Investment Companies, pp. 108-109.) Too much water has already run over the dam to try at this late date to attempt any readjustment of this labyrinthine maze of figures on any now-as-for-then basis.

Had the issue of the possibility of a re-allocation of the securities between the different contract series been raised in the case before the hearings were concluded, it would have been easy to demonstrate in more detail why such a thing is unthinkable. If we suppose that it would be possible for auditors, accountants and actuaries after innumerable court hearings and appeals, to construct records for the many thousands of contract involving millions of dollars that were issued before the company commenced keeping records for each series separately, the first question that arises is, Will any of us now in the litigation live to see the task finished? The company operated two years after the Securities and Exchange Commission enjoined it from such activities and didn't do it. Mr. Latta worked on these problems seven months and couldn't do it. We feel safe in saying that the chances of such a thing ever being done can only be represented by a fraction not unlike Prof. Montague's, which had a numerator of 1 and a denominator which stretched from here to one of the fixed stars.

Litigation over these questions will not arise if the states are permitted to proceed with the liquidation and distribution of the deposits. It cannot be shown that any class of contract holders would benefit from the raising of such questions. The average claim of each contract holder is $250. Who would be willing to trade his chance for a certain 80% payment immediately for any kind of payment which might be promised to him five or ten years from now? Contract holders would choose the bird in hand even if somebody else should offer to pay the lawyers' fees for all the litigation—and wisely and prudently so.

The argument of Securities and Exchange Commission on this point, it seems to us, begs the question. The proposition is that the federal court has jurisdiction not because the best interests of contract holders will be subserved by liquidation through a simple administration in a court of bankruptcy. It is that the federal court has jurisdiction because questions can be raised in a court of bankruptcy that cannot or will not be raised in the states where the deposits are held. There is no showing that there will be any benefit to contract holders from a determination of these questions. There is no showing that the questions must inevitably arise before there can be a distribution of the state deposits according to the state laws. No attempt is made to show that even if a bankruptcy court has jurisdiction and the questions are raised, the best interest of contract holders will thereby be subserved.

The questions do not exist in the case now. Jurisdiction depends on the questions being raised. They can be raised if there is jurisdiction. Therefore there is jurisdiction. Around and around we go in the circle.

Since the questions are not now in issue, they do not say that the Court can settle them now. All they ask is for permission to go back to the District Court. There they can be raised and bruited about for a season. Eventually, of course, they will land in this court. Years and years from now they will be settled. We submit that the final judgment then would be that the state deposits must be upheld as they were when the petition was filed.

The further point is made that the Bankruptcy Court must determine whether the local deposit is for the benefit of the contract holders who resided in the state when the contracts were sold; who resided there when the deposits were made, or who now reside in the state. The evidence utterly fails to show that these questions possess any substantial importance.

It is said in the petition that in five states the local statutes exclude non-resident contract holders from participating in the local deposit. The memorandum fails to show which five states are referred to. We cannot speak as to the laws of the other states, because we have not studied all of them. The Tennessee statute, however, clearly secures only those contracts sold in the State of Tennessee. We are constrained to believe that there is little or no ambiguity in the other statutes. Granting that there may be a few cases where questions will arise as to whether or not a particular contract holder is entitled to share in a particular state deposit, there is no reason why such possibility should be determinative of this case.

Some twenty million dollars is now held in state deposits which contract holders need and want. The distribution of this entire amount should not be held up in order that questions which may possibly come up as to a few thousand dollars can be determined in a bankruptcy court rather than in the state where the questions arise. If a claim is disputed, it will be a very simple matter to pay dividends on the other claims and set aside a fund to cover the disputed claim. In this case we think our guess is as good as the other fellow's. We imagine that no controversy of this nature will arise as to 99-44/100% of the amount of deposits.

Again it is said that the bankruptcy court ought to have jurisdiction so that it can be determined whether the measure of claims is the cash value of the contract, the reserve value, the amount necessary to mature the contract, the amount paid in, or some other amount. At the same time, it is conceded that there is little probability of a surplus in any state except Wisconsin. To state an example: In Tennessee, the amount of deposit, according to the testimony at the hearing, is less than the total of the claims. No contract holder in Michigan, West Virginia or any other state will have any claim against the Tennessee deposit. What difference will it make to contract holders in any of the other states whether the basis of distribution in Tennessee is the cash value of the contracts, the reserve value, or any other amount or value? These questions affect only the contract holders in Tennessee among whom the deposit is to be distributed. Since there is a certain amount to be distributed among Tennessee contract holders, the amount of a possible claim which Tennessee contract holders would have against the West Virginia deposit is limited to the difference between the amount of the deposit and the aggregate of the claims. Say that difference is $25,000.00. It makes no difference, so far as the rights of contract holders in West Virginia and the other states against the West Virginia deposit are concerned, which group of Tennessee contract holders have the claim.

The best interests of the contract holders will be subserved by a simplification of the issue, the cutting of red tape, and the elimination of technicalities. The contract holders would rather get 80% of their claims now than 85 or 90% ten years from now. Having purchased their contracts in reliance upon Fidelity's representations that the contracts were secured by deposits in accordance with the state laws, all the contract holders will feel that justice has been done when their rights are determined by their own state courts. None of them want anything that belongs to contract holders in any other state. It is impossible to see how any contract holder or any class of contract holders could benefit from the paltry but protracted litigation which Central Trust Company and Securities and Exchange Commission hold in prospect in the Bankruptcy Court.

CONCLUSION

When this litigation was commenced, the proponents of reorganization had it in mind to disregard the state deposits. Hence, the turn-over order of June 9, directing that all state deposits be delivered to the Central Trust Company. It has gradually dawned on them that such a thing could be done. All questions now have been winnowed from the case except the trivalities which have been glossed since the Court of Appeals dismissed the petition.

The distribution of the securities belonging to the contract holders of Fidelity will not be cumbersome and difficult unless we purposely make it so. About $10,000,000.00 of the securities, or one half of the amount involved, is held in the West Virginia deposit. The other one half is held in thirteen other states. By reference to the schedule of deposits shown on page 225 of the printed transcript, it can readily be seen that four states—Alabama, Iowa, Missouri and Wisconsin—have apparently adequate deposits to cover liabilities in those states. These deposits aggregate about $3,500,000.00. Six states—Delaware, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Maryland and Tennessee—are apparently 75% or better secured. The aggregate of the deposits in those states is approximately $4,800,000.00.

Therefore, in the ten states mentioned about $8,300,000.00 can be distributed among contract holders forthwith if the proceedings in bankruptcy are dismissed. There is no reason why the West Virginia Courts cannot determine the rights of the claimants to the West Virginia deposit as expeditiously as the Bankruptcy court can. We see no reason why the larger part of the West Virginia deposit cannot be paid out forthwith among the contract holders on the basis of admitted rights and claims, reserving enough to make final settlement after the determination of the rights of all claimants.

It only makes the problem sound difficult and involved to mention the fact the contract holders reside in all of the forty-eight states. The table showing the geographical distribution of certificates in force (Report on Investment Trusts and Investment Companies, p. 166), shows that in most of the states the claims are inconsequential. It is reasonable to expect that few contract holders in the better secured states would go to the trouble of filing claims against the West Virginia deposit. This would result in the realization by contract holders in the states having the lesser security of a larger percentage of their claims.

There is no reason why any contract holder need expect to get less than 75% of his claim if distribution is made immediately on the basis of the state deposits before the funds have been diminished by losses, fees and expenses. It cannot be demonstrated that there is any possibility of any group of contract holders faring better by distribution in Bankruptcy.

At this particular time many contract holders have an urgent need for their money. It will entail serious hardship and loss to the contract holders to postpone distribution of millions of dollars while the lawyers wrangle over a congeries of points concocted out of the law of permutations and combinations. Since the decision of the Court of Appeals, the states have been going ahead with procedure for distribution, preparing to send out claims, etc.

The hopes of the contract holders of getting their funds released have been aroused. Justice will be done only by making payment to them on the same basis on which the contracts were sold and which they have counted on for all these years—the safeguards of the state deposits — and without further delay.

Respectfully submitted,

WELDON B. WHITE

PROPOSITIONS RELIED UPON IN THIS BRIEF AND THEIR DISPOSITION BY THE COURTS BELOW 61

ARGUMENT

I. THE DEBTOR IS AN INSURANCE CORPORATION WITHIN THE MEANING OF SECTION 4 OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, AS AMENDED, AND AS SUCH INELIGIBLE TO REORGANIZE UNDER THE PROVISIONS OF CHAPTER X OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT 62-96

Page

A. Insurance corporations are excluded from reorganization proceedings under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act 62-63

B. The debtor was chartered, licensed and engaged in business as an insurance corporation under the laws of West Virginia, the state of its incorporation 63-70

C. At the time insurance corporations were excluded from the Bankruptcy Act (1910), life insurance corporations were generally classified as such by reason of their charter powers to insure lives and to "grant purchase and dispose of annuities" 70-72

D. The question as to whether debtor is an insurance corporation within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act is to be determined either (1) by its classification under the law of West Virginia or (2) by its classification according to the accepted usage and understanding at the time of and since the enactment of the amendment of 1910 excluding insurance corporations from the Act. Under either test the debtor is an insurance corporation 73-78

1. Authorities holding that classification by the state of incorporation is controlling 73-75

2. The view that a generally recognized rather than a local state classification is controlling 75-76

3. Cases involving possible qualifications of the local state classification rule need not be considered 76-77

4. Debtor is an insurance corporation whether regard be had to its West Virginia classification or whether it be judged on the basis of a generally recognized classification 77-78

Page

E. There is no merit to the contention that the debtor's status as an insurance corporation is to be determined by considering the nature of its predominant activity and that, as so determined, it is not an insurance corporation 78-84

F. The petitioners' contention that the Investment Company Act of 1940 has defined the term "insurance corporation" as used in Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended in 1910, and that, as so defined, Fidelity is not an insurance corporation, is without merit 85-90

G. The question as to whether the debtor is an insurance corporation is to be determined by its status at the time the petition was filed. At that time it was an insurance corporation. It is not material that prior to December 31, 1940 it was not an insurance corporation or that the major portion of its assets and liabilities was acquired prior to the time it became an insurance corporation 90-96

II. THE PETITION FOR REORGANIZATION WAS NOT FILED IN GOOD FAITH 97-147

A. Statutes 97-98

B. The petition should have been dismissed pursuant to Section 146 (3) on the ground that it was unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization could be effected 98-131

1. The question as to whether the petition was filed in good faith within the meaning of Section 146 (3) of Chapter X was raised in the District Court and in the Circuit Court of Appeals and is open for argument in support of the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals 98

2. The purpose of Chapter X is to provide for the rehabilitation of corporations as going concerns, and the provisions of Section 146 (3) were framed in the light of that purpose. Neither the debtor's petition nor the proof demonstrates that it is entitled to the benefits of Chapter X ..... 98

a. The purpose of Chapter X and the requirements under Section 146 (3) ..... 98-114

b. Neither the petition nor the proofs thereon show that debtor is entitled to the benefits of Chapter X; in fact, the contrary is shown ..... 115-131

The Petition ..... 115-121

The petition considered with reference to the state deposit laws ..... 117-121

The Proof ..... 131

C. Prior proceedings are pending which will best subserve the interests of contract holders ..... 131-147

The Wisconsin proceedings ..... 133-135

The Iowa proceedings ..... 135-136

The proceedings in West Virginia and other states ..... 136-147

III. THE PUBLIC INTEREST, UNDER WELL SETTLED EQUITY PRINCIPLES APPLICABLE IN CHAPTER X PROCEEDINGS, REQUIRED DISMISSAL OF THE PETITION BY THE DISTRICT COURT ..... 148-152

CONCLUSION ..... 153

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF OF RESPONDENTS, BANKING COMMISSION OF WISCONSIN AND CHAS. R. FISCHER, COMMISSIONER OF INSURANCE AND PERMANENT RECEIVER FOR THE STATE OF IOWA

On October 12, 1942 this court granted certiorari to review a decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, reversing an order of the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia dated January 5, 1942. The order of the District Court had sustained the petition for reorganization of Fidelity Assurance Association, the debtor, and had overruled certain motions of the respondents Insurance Commissioner of Maryland, L. H. Brooks, Trustee, Frederic Leake and A. L.

Goldberg, Jr., Trustee, and Edgar E. Sims, Auditor of the State of West Virginia and ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia, Ross B. Thomas and H. Isaiah Smith, West Virginia State Court Receivers.

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the District Court is reported in 42 F. Supp. 973. The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reported in 129 F. (2d) 442.

JURISDICTION

The jurisdiction of this court rests on Section 240 (a) of the Judicial Code (28 U. S. C. A., sec. 347) and Section 24 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 47 (c)).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Nature of the case and the procedural facts

On June 6, 1941 Fidelity Assurance Association, the debtor herein, filed a petition for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia (R. 4-9), and on June 6, 1941 that court entered its order approving the petition as properly filed (R. 1-4). Thereafter the Banking Commission of Wisconsin (hereinafter referred to as the Wisconsin respondent) filed its answer controverting said petition (R. 48-56), and Charles R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance and Permanent Receiver for Debtor Corporation in and for the State of Iowa (hereinafter referred to as the Iowa respondent) also filed his answer controverting said petition (R. 118-124). Answers controverting debtor's petition were also filed by the respondents Edgar B. Sims, Auditor of the State of West Virginia and ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia, and H. Isaiah Smith and Ross B. Thomas, West Virginia State Court Receivers (hereinafter referred to as the West Virginia respondents) (R. 58-83); L. H. Brooks, Trustee, Frederic Leake and A. L. Goldberg, Jr., Trustee (hereinafter referred to as the Tennessee respondents) (R. 96-102); and Dewey S. Godfrey, Receiver in the State of Missouri (hereinafter referred to as the Missouri respondent) (R. 91-93). The Insurance Commissioner of Maryland (hereinafter referred to as the Maryland respondent) appeared specially and filed motions to strike out or rescind certain orders entered in the District Court on June 6, June 10 and August 9, 1941, directing certain state officials, including the Maryland respondent, to turn over certain property to the federal trustee and enjoining them in certain particulars (R. 124). The West Virginia respondents (R. 93-96; 124-127) and the Tennessee respondents (R. 128-130) also filed similar motions in the District Court with respect to said orders.

A trial of the issues presented by debtor's petition and the controverting answers and motions of said respondents was had in the District Court. On January 5, 1942 the District Court entered its order formally approving the debtor's petition for reorganization and overruling the motions of the West Virginia, Tennessee and Maryland respondents relative to the District Court's orders of June 6, June 10 and August 9, 1941.

The respondents appealed from said order to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, and on June 16, 1942 the Circuit Court reversed the order of the District Court and directed that debtor's petition for reorganization should be dismissed.

The debtor and the federal trustee petitioned to this court for a writ of certiorari to the Circuit Court of Appeals, and the writ was granted under date of October 12, 1942.

B. Respondents' joint statement of facts

This statement is made by and on behalf of all of the respondents herein except the Securities and Exchange Commission and for convenience is incorporated in this, the brief of the Wisconsin and Iowa respondents. It is designed to give as complete a picture as practicable, from the record herein, of the debtor's business and of these proceedings as affect the interests, generally, of all such respondents. Additional statements of fact as particularly affect the interests of each of the several respondents will be found in their respective briefs.

The pleadings and certain portions of the testimony have by stipulation been printed as the record in this court. The original exhibits have not been printed and are on file in this court. The references herein to the pleadings and testimony will be to the pages of the printed record in this court, and the references to exhibits will be to the original exhibit numbers of such exhibits together with the page of the record as printed in this court where such exhibits are admitted in evidence. In some instances the record as printed omits reference to the introduction of exhibits, and in such cases we have referred to the page of the original transcript where the exhibit is admitted in evidence as "R. — (original))." Certain exhibits and other material are printed in the Appendix to this brief, to which reference will be made as "(App. —)."

1. Debtor's corporate charter and amendments thereto

Fidelity Assurance Association was organized under the name of Fidelity Investment and Loan Association under the laws of West Virginia on April 11, 1911. In 1912 its corporate purposes were enlarged to include the business of soliciting or receiving payments on annuity contracts, and by virtue of this amendment it became subject to the provisions of Art. 9 of Ch. 33 of the Code of West Virginia relating to the business of selling "annuity contracts" and was licensed and supervised by the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia as an annuity company until January 1, 1940. Art. 9, Ch. 33, the Annuity Company Law, was repealed by Ch. 46, Acts of the West Virginia Legislature, passed March 8, 1941, effective ninety days thereafter. Other amendments to the articles were made in 1926, 1929 and 1931, all as shown by Ex. 20 (R. 398).

Amendment of December 31, 1940

On December 31, 1940 the debtor amended its charter, changing its name from Fidelity Investment Association to Fidelity Assurance Association. It also struck out Art. 3 of its charter as amended in December, 1912, which contained a statement of its various corporate purposes as above outlined and inserted in lieu thereof, as the complete statement of its corporate purpose, the following:

> "To issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and connected therewith, and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities." (Ex. 24, R. 437, App. 76)

Amendment of January 24, 1941

On January 24, 1941 the stockholders of the debtor further amended its charter reducing its authorized capitalization to $1,000,000 of common stock of a par value of $8 per share, the total outstanding stock to be reduced to $2,210,744 of common stock with a par value of $8 per share. In the resolution of amendment it was stated that the reason for this reduction was that at that time the company was "qualified and admitted to transact a life insurance business in the state of West Virginia only" and that it was desired to further extend the territory in which the company might operate such business and that it was necessary that the stock of the company should be common stock of all one class and be reduced to such an amount as would leave a surplus after deducting those assets of the company which were not admitted as such by the insurance departments of the various states in which it was desired to do business. (Ex. 20, R. 398) A more detailed statement of the circumstances of the debtor's conversion into a life insurance company will be made later on in this statement of facts.

2. The "Fidelity plan" in operation from December, 1912 to December 31, 1940

Up to December 31, 1940 the debtor's business was that of selling its so-called investment or annuity contracts. At one time it was licensed in 29 states. Specimens of the various contracts which it issued comprise Exs. 1 to 5 (R. 170 (original)) inclusive. From time to time the form of the contracts was changed in certain particulars, but generally speaking, the "Fidelity Plan" provided for the issuance and sale of certificates whereby the purchaser agreed to make monthly payments, in most cases for 120 months, of a definite sum of money and Fidelity agreed to return to the purchaser at the end of the monthly payment period a certain sum of money known as the "face amount" of the contract. This sum was to be paid in various annual, quarterly, monthly or other periods in accordance with the particular optional settlement plan elected by the contract holder. A sum considerably smaller than the "face amount" would be paid in a lump sum at the end of the ten year period, but after the expiration of the "waiting period" as referred to in the District Court's opinion. Each series of contracts contains extremely detailed provisions as to the rights of the contract holders with respect to payments, cash surrender values, lapsation upon failure to make payments and various optional plans of settlement. The contracts did not provide for any cash surrender or loan value until from ten to sixteen monthly payments had been made (p. 81 of Ex. 6, R. 1749 (original)) and if the contracts were lapsed at any time during these periods the contract holder forfeited to Fidelity all of the payments made. (Exs. 1 to 5, inclusive, R. 170 (original)) The contracts had to be carried for a period varying from six to nine years before the cash surrender value would be equal to the payments which had been made (p. 82 of Ex. 6, R. 1749 (original)). Exhibit 6 comprises the Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission on Companies Issuing Face Amount Installment Certificates made pursuant to Section 30 of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, hereinafter sometimes referred to as "SEC report." After all of the payments had been completed there was a waiting period varying from four to fourteen months before payments to the contract holders would commence (p. 80 of Ex. 6, R. 1749 (original)).

Prior to 1922 certain contracts known as the "Old ten-year Series" and Series D and C had been sold but apparently few if any of these are now outstanding (R. 304). At this time the company's total assets were only about $2,000,000 (R. 307). In 1921 the sale of the special income contract (Ex. 1, R. 170 (original)) commenced and this continued up to 1925, but there are only about 900 holders of these today (R. 304). This contract was discontinued because of litigation with the state of Illinois, the Secretary of State having objected to it on the ground that it was possibly misleading (R. 305-306) and the "Special Annuity Contract" (Ex. 2, R. 170 (original)) was formulated (R. 306) and sold up to 1932. This was a period of tremendous growth for the company, its assets by 1932 amounting to in excess of $25,000,000 (R. 308). In 1932 the "Special Income Contract" was formulated and this was sold up to 1934.

In 1934 Fidelity commenced the issuance of the so-called Series B contracts and the sale of these contracts comprised practically its entire volume up to the time when it suspended the business of selling contracts late in 1940. The Series B contracts were issued in two types—one the regular form and the other having an insurance protection feature which was set forth in sec. 6 of the contract and made operative at the election of the purchaser (Ex. 4, R. 170 (original)). The insurance feature provided, for an additional charge, that upon the death of the purchaser prior to the maturity of the contract a sum would be provided sufficient to pay the contract to maturity or to provide a so-called commuted value of a paid-up contract to the purchaser's estate. According to the SEC report (p. 114 of Ex. 6, R. 1749 (original)), the yield on the Series B contracts was as follows:

| Mode of Settlement | With Insurance Value | With Insurance Yield Percent | Without Insurance Value | Without Insurance Yield Percent |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| (1) Cash surrender value at end of 126 (total) monthly-installment payments | $1,015 | 1.34 | $1,075 | 2.41 |
| (2) Cash maturity value 129 months after due date of first monthly installment | 1,030 | 1.55 | 1,090 | 2.56 |
| (3) 10 annual payments, after maturity, of $125 each | 1,250 | 2.82 | (a) | 3.38 |

Seventy-five per cent of the Series B contracts sold carried the insurance feature (R. 681). Series D contracts were sold in Ohio, Kentucky and Alabama because the authorities in those states would not permit the sale of the Series B contracts with insurance unless the company qualified as a life insurance company (R. 315).

3. Fidelity a "compulsory savings" plan

As has been shown the net return to investors under the Fidelity plan was not large and they stood to lose all of their investment if they did not make at least twelve monthly payments and it was not until they had paid continuously for from six to nine years that the contracts had a cash surrender value equal to the amount of the payments made. Furthermore, it appears that only 5.29% of the persons who purchased Fidelity contracts carried them to maturity (R. 388). The record amply bears out the statement in the SEC report (p. 106 of Ex. 6, R. 1749 (original)) that "The experience of purchasers of the Association's investment certificates appears to be unsatisfactory as a whole." According to that report the loss to contract holders by reason of surrender and lapsation during the ten year period, 1927-1936, was $7,510,000 (p. 92 of Ex. 6, R. 1749 (original)). During that period the certificates which matured equaled only 14% of the amount of certificates in force at the beginning of the period (p. 11 of Ex. 6, R. 1749 (original)). Forty-seven per cent of the purchasers failed to carry the contracts for as much as one year (R. 783). F. J. McNulty, the debtor's vice-president, stated he could not say whether or not more than 2% of all those who had paid their money into Fidelity had gotten it out at maturity (R. 391).

Despite these figures, which are not disputed, those of debtor's officers who testified during the proceeding stoutly maintained their faith in the Fidelity plan as providing a means for small wage earners in the United States to put in operation a beneficial plan of savings. The lapsation losses, far from being regarded as in derogation of the "Fidelity plan," were regarded as providing a spur and incentive to the contract holders to continue payments, which were lacking in other investment plans. John Marshall, Sr., a director for twenty years, chairman of the Board for several years, general counsel, and voting trustee for the majority of stock (R. 410), stated that he understood from Mr. Paull (his father-in-law and one of the original founders) that he "thought there was a great need (for the Fidelity plan) because of his banking experience; that a great many people opened savings accounts but did not continue them" (R. 417).

D. A. Burt, a director, stated that even though the contracts did not have a cash surrender value equal to the amount of payments until they had been carried for many years, since they were sold with that understanding as expressed in the contract, he didn't "think there is any injustice done to anyone" (R. 710-711). The fact that only 5% of the contract holders carried their contracts to maturity did not alter his views (R. 712). The fact that "every month I got a little reminder on my desk that it was time for me to pay $10 or $7.50 into this Fidelity contract" seemed to him to be a very favorable factor in the plan (R. 713). As the District Court interpreted Mr. Burt's testimony:

> "It is not so much a question of a reminder as a question of compulsion on the part of the contract holder to pay or lose what he had paid" (R. 713).

The element of compulsion as being the salient feature of the plan was emphasized by L. H. Pulfer, who had been vice-president of Fidelity in charge of recruiting and building up the sales organization and who was later in charge of sales in the Chicago territory which was composed of a number of states (R. 513). He stated that the principal appeal of the plan was "it offered that element of compulsion which would get a man to do that particular thing which otherwise he probably would not do" (R. 523). Without further elaboration it may be stated that the sole economic justification for the existence of Fidelity seems, in the opinion of its officers and principals, to be that it offered a plan of "compulsory savings" (R. 557). It was particularly emphasized that nothing advantageous was claimed by way of interest return (R. 523, 557).

The SEC report which comprises Exhibit 6 of the record herein deals in the greatest of detail with Fidelity's business and also with the business of the two other companies which are apparently the only other concerns which have been engaged in any substantial way in this peculiar type of business in this country. It may be stated categorically that an examination of this report and the record in the present case reveals conclusively that the experience of investors with Fidelity and with the other companies selling these certificates has been anything but a happy one. Tables on pp. 112-113 of Ex. 6 compare the relative advantage to an investor over a ten year period in placing like sums at like intervals in a savings account, in United States Savings Bonds and in a Fidelity contract. Considering the fact that the greater percentage of Fidelity's purchasers lapsed their contracts either in the first year or in the first few years, and thus lost all or a great part of their investment, the advantage of either of the first two forms of investment over that of Fidelity is obvious.

4. The sale of the contracts

From 1925 to 1934 Fidelity's sales were in the hands of a corporation known as National Sales Agency, Inc. (R. 514) which was owned by Fred King and A. L. King (R. 514) who were also dominant figures in Fidelity. Prior to 1925 National Sales Agency handled sales in the eastern territory and a firm known as Irving and Sisson, the western territory. Ex. 34 (R. 515) shows the number and geographical distribution of contracts outstanding as of April 10, 1941. This exhibit indicates that as of that date there were 87,999 contracts outstanding, but it was testified by Mr. McNulty, the secretary and vice-president of the company (R. 407), that on that date the number of "active" contracts (meaning those upon which regular payments were being continued) was between 22,000 and 25,000. According to Ex. 34 (R. 515) the cash liabilities on the contracts outstanding as of April 10, 1941 were $23,475,068.67.

In the operation of the "Fidelity plan" a substantial part of the contract holders' payments were applied to "loading" to pay sales expense. This "loading" amounted to the entire first eight months' payments on the Series B contracts, and over the entire life of the Series B contracts, 13.7% of total payments on insured contracts and 9% of total payments on uninsured contracts (p. 82 of Ex. 6, R. 1749 (original)). In 1935, when Carroll D. Evans took over the sales management, the company had about 20 offices and 400 salesmen and the volume of sales was $1,000,000 of face amount per month (R. 921-922). From 1935 to 1940 the offices increased to about sixty in number with 1,800 salesmen in all (R. 926). The turnover of salesmen was extremely high, more than 80% per year (R. 927), and the recruiting of salesmen was one of the most important phases of the company's activities (R. 927-929). In order to get one acceptable producer it was necessary to interview 100 men (R. 929).

Despite the loading charges, National Sales Agency, Inc. became indebted to Fidelity in the amount of $1,000,000 by reason of advances made by Fidelity to that corporation upon unearned commissions (R. 384). This debt was never repaid and was transferred to certain subsidiary corporations of Fidelity (R. 769-770). After 1934 the company organized its own agency division to take over the sales which were formerly in the hands of National Sales Agency, Inc. (R. 515). Various sales officers of Fidelity who testified in this proceeding insisted that impressive and expensive offices in the principal places were Fidelity operated were a necessity in order that prospective salesmen might be favorably impressed (R. 923-924). However, despite constantly increased sales effort and expense the company consistently lost money.

The debtor's petition for reorganization (R. 7) alleges that it is suffering an annual loss of $250,000 and that this rate of loss will continue and probably increase unless the earnings or its invested securities should increase far in excess of the present rate of income. Prior to June 6, 1941, the date of filing of the petition for reorganization, all of the Fidelity sales offices had been closed and its sales organization completely dissipated and lost (R. 346-349). In 1938 or in the early part of 1939 the company's license to do business was suspended in most of the states where it did business (R. 393), and it is not now licensed in any state. It was estimated that it would take around $500,000 to recruit a new sales force which would provide adequate sales to continue operations (R. 933-934).

5. State deposits the basis for sales

The fact that Fidelity was subject to strict regulatory laws and had deposited securities thereunder to secure its obligations was a most potent sales point. The deposit laws were "the fundamental selling principle" (R. 917). The selling point in West Virginia was that "that fund would be available and under the control of the State Auditor in the event of any liquidation of the company," according to Mr. Risley, the president (R. 917). The West Virginia law "was one of the features that was stressed" (R. 921). The sales pamphlets and reports sent to contract holders made detailed reference to the state laws. In Ex. 37 (R. 852 (original)), a sales pamphlet showing the manner in which Fidelity purported to select its portfolio of investments, it was said that the securities selected were "deposited with state departments for the exclusive protection of contract holders." In Ex. 38 (R. 853 (original)) under the heading, "The exacting law under which the Association operates," sec. 3, Art. 9, Ch. 33 of the West Virginia Code was quoted. Ex. 39 (R. 853 (original)) states, under the company's financial statement, the following:

> "Securities deposited with state departments in accordance with legal requirements of each state in which we operate."

Ex. 106 (R. 1034) used in Wisconsin, contains pictures of the state capitol there and quotes portions of the Wisconsin deposit law. The company also used brochures showing pictures of the vault in the West Virginia state capitol (R. 605) and, according to Auditor Sims, sought to give out "that the state of West Virginia was behind the contracts" (R. 605-606).

6. The supervision of Fidelity by Edgar B. Sims, Auditor and Ex Officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia

It is in its relationship with the Auditor and ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia that the long existing moribund condition of Fidelity is most clearly disclosed. Edgar B. Sims first was elected to this office in 1933 and he still holds it (R. 434). Upon his becoming acquainted with the affairs of Fidelity which were under his jurisdiction, he found that "the company was in the red in market values about $7,000,000" (R. 442). Auditor Sims had general supervising jurisdiction over the company by virtue of Art. 9, Ch. 33, West Virginia Code (repealed March 8, 1941) and under sec. 3 thereof, he, as Insurance Commissioner, was to require and approve the deposit with the State Treasurer by Fidelity, of bonds and securities to be held in trust for the benefit of its contract holders located in West Virginia to an amount equal to the cash liability of West Virginia contract holders. In addition he was to require and approve a deposit in trust for the benefit of contract holders located in states other than West Virginia to the extent that the laws of such states did not provide for a deposit equal or greater than that provided for by the laws of West Virginia. Soon after taking office he discovered that Fidelity's liabilities far exceeded the market value of its assets and also discovered advances by Fidelity to National Sales Agency, Inc. of $957,000 (R. 440). He was assured, however, that the note was perfectly good (R. 440). He told Fidelity that it must operate within the loadings provided by the contracts for commissions so that this note would be reduced. The officers told him that they were obeying him but they did not obey (R. 440) and he found that the advances had increased by $90,000 by the end of the year (R. 440). In 1934 he insisted that Fidelity should take over the sales agency bank account or he would close Fidelity's business and the company complied with this order (R. 441). He called a meeting of the directors in Washington, D. C., and insisted that with the $300,000 to $500,000 per month which the contract holders were paying in Fidelity should buy bonds that had not defaulted during the depression in interest or principal, which were being sold at a discount at that time (R. 441). This policy appeared to work satisfactorily for a time due to a great rise in market prices, so that Auditor Sims could state that whereas the company was in the red in market values in 1933 about $7,000,000 "in market value today it is in the red only 2¼ million dollars" (R. 442). Auditor Sims ordered the company to cease renting expensive offices for the various sales managers but he had extreme difficulty in having this done (R. 442). He stated that the only reason the company was able to exist during the period from 1933 to 1940 was by the purchase of securities on a low market which had subsequently risen in value (R. 444), that the only way that the contracts could be sold were by means of what is known as "high pressure salesmanship" and that the expense of selling by this method was too great (R. 444).

Auditor Sims stated that, based upon his experience as auditor and his knowledge of the affairs of Fidelity, he did not believe the company could be reorganized in West Virginia "with the corpse of this one" (R. 449-450). He doubted very sincerely whether anyone could operate a face amount certificate company successfully in view of present economic conditions (R. 450). He believed that even with good management Fidelity would have been unsuccessful because "they promised too much in their contracts and the economic change in interest rates, money rates, wouldn't stand that" (R. 453). The present outstanding contracts would have to be modified and he believed that the "structure of the company economically and financially was unsound from the beginning" (R. 453-454). Even if it was run economically he felt it was condemned, stating that, "I think they were quarreling with Ray's arithmetic all the time back there" (R. 454). He had thought that the company could be mutualized and turned over to the contract holders because there is nothing left for the stockholders, but the sort of plan he had hoped to work out was very thin and nebulous (R. 457). The situation apparently appeared desperate to Auditor Sims in November and December, 1940. At that time he ordered the stock trusteed in the hands of disinterested parties, but they did not answer his letter (R. 458). Finally he filed suit through the office of the Attorney General of West Virginia (R. 459) to which further reference will be made.

7. Regulation of Fidelity by states other than West Virginia

Fidelity was at one time licensed in 29 states and each of these states had regulatory laws governing the operation of its business (R. 347). Fifteen of the states in which it did business, including West Virginia, had laws requiring a deposit of securities to secure its outstanding contracts and the remainder of the states did not require a deposit, but the contracts sold in those states were secured by the deposit made with the state of West Virginia (R. 348). Ex. 48 (R. 1116 (original)) contains a list of the states having deposit laws, the market value of securities on deposit in each (as of June 6, 1941), the "net reserve liability" in each and the "net cash liability" in each which is (as of April 10, 1941), according to Fidelity's figures, as follows:

| | Deposits by States as of June 6, 1941 | Liabilities by States as of April 10, 1941 | |
|---|---|---|---|
| | Market Value | Net Reserve Liability | Net Cash Liability |
| Ala. | $ 32,555.16 | $ 32,267.31 | $ 31,346.71 |
| Del. | 293,790.63 | 300,074.88 | 290,175.36 |
| Ill. | 3,759,894.00 | 4,368,348.52 | 4,225,790.75 |
| Ind. | 162,863.44 | 398,336.17 | 386,173.45 |
| Iowa | 45,082.50 | 35,332.03 | 34,478.27 |
| Kansas | 83,337.50 | 111,530.90 | 108,784.89 |
| Ky. | 86,712.50 | 95,376.98 | 92,690.42 |
| Md. | 470,806.25 | 508,163.70 | 492,552.24 |
| Mo. | 861,100.62 | 807,263.78 | 786,988.86 |
| Ohio | 509,573.44 | 2,439,364.17 | 2,360,418.70 |
| Pa. | 232,591.57 | 4,816,175.07 | 4,668,582.25 |
| Tenn. | 196,574.38 | 206,879.70 | 200,504.97 |
| Va. | 27,703.13 | 572,585.25 | 557,809.19 |
| West Va. | 10,674,696.08 | 7,121,651.33 | 6,896,393.88 |
| Wis. | 2,619,399.07 | 2,408,301.57 | 2,342,978.73 |
| | $20,056,680.27 | $24,221,651.36 | $23,475,668.67 |

Ex. 48 shows that the company had certain securities which are not on deposit anywhere in an amount of $556,467.51 but most of these would not be eligible for deposit under any of the state laws (R. 816). It should be stated that no direct testimony was introduced as to the market value of debtor's assets. Debtor made up its schedules from audit reports made by outside accountants who did not testify and whose methods of ascertaining values is not shown. With respect to assets other than securities, no attempt was made to place a valuation thereon in the proceedings. Thus, while we use the debtor's figures, such as those above, it should be understood that the respondents do not consider themselves bound by such figures as reflecting market or other values. The record would indicate that actual values are, in a number of instances, a great deal lower than indicated in the various schedules in evidence, and it is difficult, if not impossible, to state the true situation as to the degree of debtor's insolvency from the record.

In each state in which it did business, whether the state required a deposit or not, Fidelity was subject to special provisions of law applicable either to insurance corporations, banking corporations, building and loan associations, investment companies or other companies whose business is affected with a public interest. As we have shown, Fidelity, prior to its becoming chartered as a life insurance company, operated under the so-called Annuity Company Law of West Virginia, now repealed. In the states in which it did business it qualified with and was regulated by various state departments, in some states the Insurance Department, in some the Banking Commission and in others the Securities Department (R. 348). In the states which required deposits, as listed above, qualification and regulation was by the various departments as follows:

| State | Department | |
|---|---|---|
| Alabama | Securities Commission | (R. 348) |
| Delaware | Banking Commissioner | (R. 349) |
| Illinois | Secretary of State | (R. 350) |
| Indiana | Auditor prior to 1934, Securities Commission after 1934 | (R. 353) |
| Iowa | Securities Department and Insurance Commissioner | (R. 353) |

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Kansas | State Corporation Commission by the Securities Commissioner | (R. 354) |
| Kentucky | Division of Securities, Department of Banking and Securities | (R. 355) |
| Maryland | Insurance Department | (R. 356) |
| Missouri | Commissioner of Securities | (R. 357) |
| Ohio | Superintendent of Insurance | (R. 359) |
| Pennsylvania | Formerly Banking Department now Securities Commissioner | (R. 360) |
| Tennessee | Department of Insurance and Banking | (R. 361) |
| Virginia | State Corporation Commission | (R. 363) |
| Wisconsin | Banking Commission (also subject to registration with Securities Department, Ch. 189, Wis. Stats.) | (R. 364) |

With respect to states which did not have deposit laws, the regulatory jurisdiction was as follows:

| State | Department | |
|---|---|---|
| Dist. of Columbia | No regulation | (R. 371) |
| Arkansas | Securities Division, Railroad Commission | (R. 370) |
| Florida | Securities Commission | (R. 371) |
| Georgia | Securities Commission | (R. 371) |
| Louisiana | Securities Commission | (R. 371) |
| Michigan | Department of Insurance | (R. 371) |
| Mississippi | Secretary of State | (R. 371) |

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Maine | Commissioner of Securities, Department of Commerce | (R. 372) |
| New Jersey | Department of Insurance and Banking | (R. 372) |
| North Carolina | Securities Department | (R. 372) |
| North. Dakota | Securities Department | (R. 372) |
| Oklahoma | Securities Division, State Banking Department | (R. 372) |
| South Dakota | Securities Department | (R. 373) |
| South Carolina | Securities Commission | (R. 373) |

The laws of the various states providing for regulation of such concerns as Fidelity, placed it in varying classifications. In Wisconsin it was subject to all of the provisions of law with respect to the supervision, control and conditions upon which foreign building and loan associations are permitted to do business in that state. Sec. 216.02 Wis. Stats. Registration of its contracts was also compelled under the Wisconsin Securities Law, Ch. 189 Wis. Stats. In Kansas, South Dakota and Mississippi the statutes define a business such as that done by Fidelity as the doing of a building and loan association business, Ch. 17, Art. 10, sec. 17-1047, Corrick's General Statutes of Kansas, Ann., 1935; Tit. 7, Ch. 7.01, South Dakota Code, 1939; Ch. 96, sec. 4300, Hemingway's Ann. Code of Mississippi. In certain other of the states Fidelity was compelled to register its contracts as securities under securities laws which in some instances provided for a deposit. The deposit laws of the various states provide in most cases for a deposit in trust for the benefit and security of contract holders located therein and provide for the liquidation of these funds in the various states whenever Fidelity failed to meet its obligations therein. The amount and nature of the deposits made in each of the depositary states are summarized in the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 241-242). These laws will be dealt with in more detail in the briefs of the several respondents.

8. Fidelity and the S E C

After the establishment of the Securities and Exchange Commission in 1934 Fidelity's affairs began to receive attention from a new quarter. The Securities Act of 1933 (15 U. S. C. A., sec. 77a to 77aa) required the registration of securities sold in interstate commerce under certain terms and conditions but contained an exemption for "any insurance or endowment policy or annuity contract or optional annuity contract, issued by a corporation subject to the supervision of the insurance commissioner, bank commissioner or any agency or officer performing like functions, of any state or territory of the United States or the District of Columbia." (Sec. (3) (8), Securities Act of 1933 (15 U. S. C. A., sec. 77c (a) (8)).

Fidelity maintained that its contracts were exempt from registration under this clause of the Securities Act (R. 859) although in 1939 it decided to register with the Securities and Exchange Commission (R. 860). However, although a registration statement was prepared, this was never carried out (R. 860-861). As has been shown, the Securities and Exchange Commission made a detailed investigation of Fidelity's business and the business of the two other chief companies selling similar contracts by virtue of sec. 30 of the Public Utilities Holding Company Act of 1935, its report to Congress comprising Ex. 6 in the record herein.

While Fidelity had maintained it was exempt from registration under the Securities Act of 1933, it was subject to the provisions of sec. 17 (15 U. S. C. A., sec. 77q) of that law, relating to fraudulent sale of securities in interstate commerce or by use of the mails.

On December 14, 1938 the Securities and Exchange Commission filed its bill for an injunction against Fidelity in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division, alleging that Fidelity was engaged in acts and practices which constituted violations of the fraud provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, sec. 17 (a).

On December 22, 1938 Fidelity filed its answer denying generally the allegations of the bill and on the same day consented to the entry of a decree enjoining it from engaging in the acts specified in the complaint. The bill of complaint and other proceedings and judgment therein are found at pp. 197-258 of Ex. 6 herein. This action on the part of the Securities and Exchange Commission received widespread publicity and resulted in contracts being presented for cash surrender to the extent of $9,000,000 (Ex. 21, R. 398). The sale of contracts was completely suspended during and for a period of time after those proceedings (R. 927).

In September of 1938 the peak volume of sales had been reached, contracts having a face amount of $5,600,000 being sold in that month (R. 926). Sales had been stepped up tremendously in the late 1930s. In round figures the total "face amount" sold in 1935 was $16,000,000; in 1936, $25,000,000; in 1937, $40,000,000 and in 1938, $52,000,000 (R. 926). In November of 1938 the volume was $4,700,000 and in December, when the SEC proceedings took place, $3,000,000 and in January and February, 1939 there was no volume whatever (R. 927). After the SEC suit the highest volume reached was $1,500,000 in August, 1939 (R. 927), and sales were never again built to a point where the company could operate profitably on its then basis of operations (R. 934-935). During 1940 the monthly volume in each of ten months of that year was below $1,000,000 (R. 927).

Carroll D. Evans, who was director of agencies from 1935 to 1940, stated that when he took over the general sales management it was deemed necessary to sell a face amount of 2½ million dollars per month so that the income would meet the outgo (R. 922). Later the objective of $5,000,000 was set as a basis for profitable operations (R. 923). As a result of the SEC proceedings most of the states suspended Fidelity's licenses in 1938 or early in 1939 (R. 393).

On August 22, 1940 the Federal "Investment Company Act of 1940" was approved by the President after its passage by Congress upon the recommendation of the Securities and Exchange Commission after the completion of its report, a part of which comprises Ex. 6. The Investment Company Act became effective January 1, 1941 (insofar as it would affect Fidelity) and set up requirements to be met by companies selling face amount certificates which were utterly impossible for Fidelity to meet (R. 404, 630-631, 866, 946).

Thomas B. Foulk, who held the position of director and general attorney for the company during a period of from seven to nine years, and who had also been vice-president, stated that it was his opinion that under the Investment Company Act of 1940 Fidelity's business was through entirely and that he "just felt that we never could make the grade" (R. 946) and that after reading and studying the Investment Company Act of 1940 he felt that "Fidelity could not continue and could not live" (R. 946). He said that Fidelity then turned to the idea of becoming a life insurance company as a means of continuing its existence (R. 946).

9. The various "funds" as shown by Fidelity's books

As we have shown, Fidelity sold various "series" of contracts from time to time during the years of its existence. In these contracts there were provisions substantially alike which provided that the Association should "create and maintain a reserve fund" for the discharge of its liability upon the particular series of contracts which contained the reserve fund provision. The reserve fund provisions are set forth in paragraph 1 of the various series of contracts (Exs. 1 to 5, inclusive). The earlier contracts, such as the "Special Income Contract" (Ex. 1) did not contain provisions as to the rate at which the reserve was to be improved. The later contracts (Exs. 2, 3, 4 and 5) provided that the reserve was to be created by placing therein a sum which, when improved, at an arbitrary reserve improvement rate, in some cases 4% and in other cases 4½%, would produce a sum sufficient to pay out the contracts in the particular series (R. 776-777).

In paragraph 1 of each of the contracts it was uniformly provided that the reserve fund appertaining thereto which the company contracted to maintain "shall be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust as required by the laws of the state of West Virginia" (Exs. 1 to 5, inclusive). The securities which the company purchased with payments received from contract holders were deposited with the state of West Virginia and with state authorities elsewhere to comply with the laws of the particular states, but no attempt was made to designate which particular funds the securities came from in forwarding the securities to the various states, nor did the states themselves make any such allocation (Op. Dist. Ct., R. 181; R. 586-587; 634-635; 645-652; 663-667; 760-761). And see Ex. 27 (App. 76).

Prior to December 31, 1938 the cash payments received from the purchasers of various of the contract "series" were commingled in one bank account (Op. Dist. Ct., R. 180). This was changed after the SEC investigation. The securities on deposit with the states were at all times regarded both by the debtor, by the state laws and by the state authorities as securing all obligations to contract holders of the particular state where each deposit was made. The reports made to the states of total liabilities did not show such liabilities by "funds" (Ex. 78, R. 756).

The state deposits were established and the bulk of the securities presently therein was placed therein prior to December, 1938 when the SEC suit was brought. After the SEC suit the sales value was only a fraction of what it had been (ante, pp. 24-25), and the suit resulted in contracts being surrendered to the extent of $9,000,000 (ante, p. 24), all of which reduced the amount required to be kept on deposit. As shown by Ex. 80 (R. 757), the cash liability to contract holders on December 31, 1937 was over $28,000,000 and reserve liability over $30,000,000, as compared to cash liability of $23,000,000 and reserve liability of $24,000,000 on April 10, 1941. Thus, the deposits were established without regard to the various "funds" to which the SEC directed attention at the time of its suits.

Except for the state deposits, the contracts were otherwise unsecured. As said in the SEC report (p. 1 of Ex. 6):

> "Irrespective of their designation, these certificates are in essence, simply unsecured obligations of the companies which issue them to pay a specified sum (called the face amount or maturity value or amount), provided the purchaser, promptly, and without any delinquency, makes all of the payments required by these contracts or certificates."

In a footnote in the report (p. 1, Ex. 6) it is then explained that some states require deposits and reference is made to a later discussion of these deposits in the report. See also p. 32 of "Part One" of Report of Securities and Exchange Commission pursuant to Section 30 of The Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, where it is said:

> "The certificate holder is not a stockholder of the corporation, which is private in nature, nor does he ordinarily have any interest in or lien upon any of the specific property or assets of the corporation. He assumes, in relation to the company issuing the certificates, the status of a general creditor, not unlike the holder of an unsecured promissory note or debenture of the company."

After the searching inquiry made by the SEC and in order to comply with the injunction decree and the Securities Act of 1933 it was necessary that the situation be fully explained to prospective purchasers of contracts (R. 764-765). Accordingly, in new prospectuses issued thereafter relative to the Series B contracts (p. 11 of Ex. 85, R.

766), a footnote to the balance sheet of the Series B fund stated:

> "The securities deposited with state authorities are subject to the requirements of the states with respect to all the contract funds of Fidelity Investment Association and are not necessarily held for the sole benefit of the holders of these particular contracts. In this connection reference is made to the foreword in this report."

The foreword to the financial statements in the prospectuses stated:

> "State laws with reference to deposits are not uniform. The laws of the states in which deposits against contract liability are required do not provide the mechanics for the segregation of portfolio securities of a particular contract fund against appropriate liabilities in the states of that fund, but merely provide for the deposit of a total amount of securities equal, in some cases, to the total contract liabilities, and in others, to a specified amount. In some states contracts were sold before any law requiring deposits was passed. For such contracts the deposits were made in West Virginia. The corporation recently adopted the policy of depositing portfolio securities belonging to one fund against liabilities of that fund alone, so far as state law permits, but it has been impossible to effect a transfer between various state authorities of securities heretofore deposited so that securities of funds for contracts heretofore issued will be deposited only against liabilities of that fund, although all securities are earmarked and segregated on the Association's books." (Ex. 85, R. 766)

See also Exs. 86 and 87 (R. 766). These statements were placed in the booklets after consultation with representatives of the SEC (R. 1152-1153).

In meeting obligations on maturing contracts, funds and securities were transferred and removed from one fund to another at will to meet the demands on any particular fund (R. 383, 388). The company also pursued a policy of issuing its preferred stock to matured contract holders in lieu of paying them out in cash (R. 390).

10. Previous efforts to recapitalize

As early as 1920 an effort was made to declare Fidelity bankrupt and a group was formed to buy out dissatisfied stockholders (R. 418). And we have seen that in 1933 its liabilities were in excess of its assets at market value in the amount of $7,000,000. Prior to 1936 the question of the depletion of the securities portfolio and the reserves had arisen and there was talk about trying to get new capital and how the company might be recapitalized (R. 1136) and reorganized (R. 425). From 1938 and continuously up to the time business was suspended constant efforts were made to get new capital. Arthur B. Koontz, one of the directors who had considerable acquaintance in the financial world, at the request of Fidelity's officers, besought many firms in the investment banking field to examine Fidelity's affairs with a view to refinancing. Negotiations were had with banking groups in Philadelphia (R. 1137), investment bankers in New York (R. 1137-1138) and a life insurance company (R. 1138). The Atlas Corporation, headed by Floyd Odlum, which company and its head were prominent in the investment banking field, worked on the project for some weeks but this too failed

(R. 1140). The Chicago Corporation of Chicago, which had also been asked to refinance Investors' Syndicate (a company engaged in the same type of business as that of Fidelity) went into the matter thoroughly but decided that it did not want to go into it (R. 1141). Extensive negotiations were had with the Morris Plan Bank of New York and with Mr. Arthur Morris, the head of that institution, who was familiar with Fidelity's business, but nothing came of this (R. 1141). Attempts were made to interest the Cleveland brokerage firm of Otis & Company (R. 1141). Some of the leading business men of Wheeling had a meeting and a plan was laid before them, but they evinced no interest in it (R. 1141-1142). Negotiations with Pell & Co. of New York foundered because among other reasons "they wondered whether or not a company operating in this field might be successful in the future" (R. 1139). In January, 1939, several weeks after the Securities and Exchange Commission's injunction suit in Detroit, efforts were made to place the company in a federal equity receivership. This litigation comprises the cases of McCammon v. Fidelity Investment Association, 26 F. Supp. 117 (N. D. W. Va., 1939) and Hutchinson v. Fidelity Investment Association, 106 F. (2d) 431 (CCA 4th, 1939).

In August of 1940 Allen G. Messick of Chicago was brought into the company at the instance of F. P. Pulfer (R. 525). Messick was an old school friend of Pulfer, and Pulfer had discussed the plight of Fidelity with him at a luncheon meeting in Chicago (R. 526). Messick interested one Rosset in Fidelity and Rosset and Messick entered into a contract with Fidelity whereby they were, on certain terms and conditions, to provide the sum of $500,000 so that Fidelity might continue its business (R. 1142). In connection with this contract a voting trust of Fidelity's stock was created with John Marshall, Sr., as voting trustee. Although Marshall became voting trustee of Fidelity's stock, the money which Messick was to procure was not forthcoming and it was never produced. It is not quite clear why the plan fell through (R. 1143). Mr. Pulfer stated it was because it was found the money was to come from a Mr. Green in Chicago, who did not bear a good reputation and was later indicted by reason of some stock transactions (R. 526). Rosset brought suit against Messick and Fidelity in Chicago, charging breach of contract (R. 1143). Messick was elected to the Board of Directors in August, 1940, and became chairman of the Board in September, 1940, at a salary of $1,000 per month (R. 540). He received the salary for three months but it was cut off at the urgent request of Auditor Sims (R. 445-446). Auditor Sims did not know whether Messick had a real plan or whether it was a pretended plan, "a device to get inside" (R. 446). He felt that Messick "did not come to fetch the money, but he came to get the money" (R. 476).

11. The institution of the West Virginia state court proceedings

On March 25, 1941 Auditor Sims of West Virginia had written a letter (Ex. 94) to Arthur B. Koontz, one of the counsel for the company, advising that he contemplated instituting proceedings in the Circuit Court for Kanawha County, West Virginia (R. 1127). Mr. Sims had made very strong suggestions to the company earlier in the year that court proceedings would be necessary with respect to Fidelity's affairs (R. 1183). The situation was discussed with the officers of the company and with Mr. John Marshall, Sr., its chief counsel, and with Mr. Foulk, its general attorney (R. 1183-1184). The company had had discussions with representatives of the SEC as to the type of court proceedings which would be best suited to the situation (R. 1184-1185). Both state and federal proceedings were discussed with varying opinions being expressed, and several members of the SEC staff advised the company that they did not wish to be put in the position of advising the company what the forum was to be (R. 1186). The possibility of federal reorganization proceedings was explored (R. 1187). It was finally determined that the best plan would be to go along with the West Virginia state court proceedings instituted by Auditor Sims (R. 1187-1188). On April 4, 1941 Auditor Sims ordered Fidelity to "freeze" its business, and thereafter Auditor Sims, acting through the Attorney General of West Virginia, instituted the proceedings in the Circuit Court for Kanawha County. The bill of complaint in that action comprises Ex. 21 (R. 398). On April 7, 1941 Fidelity's Board of Directors, upon motion of John Marshall, Sr., passed an unanimous resolution authorizing the law firm of Koontz and Koontz to represent it in the suit instituted in West Virginia by Auditor Sims (R. 1156-1157). Fidelity entered its appearance in the West Virginia proceedings but interposed no answer or objection thereto (R. 1192). Auditor Sims sent a copy of the bill of complaint in the West Virginia proceedings (Ex. 21, R. 308) to the various state authorities. Auditor Sims had also telegraphed the various state authorities asking that they institute proceedings to protect the assets in their respective states (R. 508).

In the West Virginia suit two receivers were appointed, being Ross B. Thomas and H. Isaiah Smith, and these receivers took certain assets into their hands, consisting of cash in banks and undeposited securities of the value of some $500,000 (R. 819). The West Virginia state court receivers did not take over the assets on deposit with the State of West Virginia, which still remain with the State of West Virginia in the custody of the State Treasurer subject to the control of the Auditor (R. 819). The receiver Ross B. Thomas was an associate of the firm of Koontz and Koontz, and H. Isaiah Smith was formerly Budget Director of the State of West Virginia. After the commencement of the federal proceedings the federal trustee appointed H. Isaiah Smith to act in a managerial capacity in charge of the affairs of Fidelity (R. 477).

12. The institution of the other state court proceedings

Upon the company's suspending payment of its obligations and upon the institution of the West Virginia proceedings other state authorities took action.

Wisconsin

On April 14, 1941 proceedings were instituted by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, under statutes providing for liquidation of foreign building and loan associations in that state. Notice of these proceedings was duly given to the officers of Fidelity and Fidelity was represented by its Wisconsin attorney. Fidelity did not oppose the proceedings in Wisconsin. Title to the Wisconsin assets of Fidelity, including the securities deposited with the State Treasurer in the amount of some $2,600,000, was vested in the Banking Commission of Wisconsin by order of the Circuit Court for Dane County, Wisconsin. The Banking Commission of Wisconsin proceeded to administer the affairs of Fidelity and prior to the institution of the Chapter X proceedings had received proofs of claim from substantially all of the Wisconsin contract holders. These number about 12,000, of which approximately 6000 are "active." On May 27, 1941 securities comprising the approximate value of $1,259,000 of the Wisconsin deposit were liquidated and sold by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, and these funds are presently held for distribution to Wisconsin contract holders. Ex. 120 (R. 3803 (original)) comprises a certified copy of the proceedings in Wisconsin. The Banking Commission of Wisconsin, through the Attorney General of Wisconsin, intervened in these proceedings and filed its answer controverting the allegations of the debtor's petition and is one of the respondents herein.

Iowa

The Iowa proceedings were instituted in the District Court in and for Polk County, Iowa, whereby Charles R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, who had jurisdiction over Fidelity there, was appointed receiver. All of the securities comprising the Iowa deposit have been sold and the funds are presently held for distribution to contract holders. The proceedings in the Iowa state court are found in Ex. 121 (R. 3803 (original)) herein. The Commissioner of Insurance of Iowa intervened in these proceedings and filed an answer controverting the allegations of the debtor's petition and is one of the respondents herein.

Ohio

In Ohio, shortly after the West Virginia proceedings, a receivership action was instituted in the Common Pleas Court of Franklin County by John A. Lloyd, Superintendent of Insurance of Ohio, through the office of the Attorney General of Ohio, for the purpose of taking possession of and protecting some $10,000 in undeposited assets in Ohio (R. 817).

The securities comprising the Ohio deposit were on deposit with the Treasurer of State of Ohio. This deposit is subject to liquidation under specific Ohio laws with reference to liquidation of deposits of insurance companies and bond investment companies (R. 817). The Treasurer of State of Ohio filed a motion to intervene in these proceedings, through the Attorney General of Ohio, which was granted, and filed an answer controverting the allegations of debtor's petition herein. This answer was withdrawn upon the entry of an order herein by the District Court on October 29, 1941, providing that the securities on deposit with the Treasurer of State of Ohio should remain there until such time as a reorganization plan might be adopted and approved in these proceedings, but without prejudice to Ohio's status as an intervener herein.

Illinois

In Illinois the Secretary of State with whom the Illinois deposit was made (although actual custody was with the State Treasurer) instituted a proceeding in the Circuit Court of Sangamon County, Illinois, for the appointment of a receiver for the preservation and maintenance of the securities on deposit in Illinois. This was in accordance with sec. 6 (a) of the Illinois Securities Act as amended providing for the liquidation of the securities on deposit in Illinois in the event of insolvency. These matters are set forth in the petition for leave to intervene filed in these proceedings by the Attorney General of the State of Illinois.

The Attorney General of Illinois filed an answer controverting debtor's petition on behalf of the State Treasurer and Secretary of State of Illinois. This answer was withdrawn upon the entry of an order herein by the District Court on October 4, 1941 providing that the securities on deposit in Illinois should remain there until such time as a reorganization plan might be adopted and approved in these proceedings.

Tennessee

In Tennessee certain contract holders on April 21, 1941 filed a bill in the Chancery Court in Davidson County, Tennessee, for the benefit of themselves and all other holders of contracts sold in Tennessee to enforce a lien on the Tennessee deposit which was made with the State Treasurer of Tennessee. These Tennessee contract holders intervened in these proceedings and filed an answer controverting the allegations of debtor's petition and are respondents herein.

Missouri

In Missouri a receiver was appointed in a suit commenced by the Attorney General of Missouri at the request of the Commissioner of Securities in the Circuit Court of Cole County. The Missouri receiver filed an answer controverting the allegations of debtor's petition herein and is one of the respondents herein.

Maryland

In the State of Maryland the affairs of Fidelity and the deposit are under the jurisdiction of the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland, who appeared in these proceedings and filed a motion to vacate certain orders of the District Court ordering the securities on deposit in Maryland to be turned over to the federal trustee. The Insurance Commissioner of Maryland is one of the respondents herein.

Kansas

The Securities Commissioner of the State of Kansas also entered an appearance in the proceedings through counsel.

No state holding a deposit complied with the turn-over portion of the orders of the District Court entered June 6 and June 10, 1941. The turn-over portion of such orders was rescinded by order of the District Court dated August 9, 1941. Since the filing of the federal petition the various state court proceedings have been held in abeyance except that under the order of the Circuit Court of Appeals for a stay of mandate the various state authorities have been permitted to send out proofs of claim to their contract holders.

More detailed reference to the proceedings which have transpired in the various states where Fidelity maintained a deposit or was otherwise regulated will be found in the briefs of the several respondents herein.

13. The institution of the federal proceedings

The decision to file the petition under Chapter X seems to coincide with the appearance on the scene of James R. Fleming, an attorney of Fort Wayne, Indiana, who was brought into the picture by Allen G. Messick, the most recent chairman of the Board, who was a close friend of Mr. Fleming (R. 1158-1159). John Marshall, Sr., who prior to the appearance of Messick seemed to be the dominant figure in the company, appears to have come to rely upon Messick and Fleming. After the institution of the West Virginia proceedings Mr. Koontz discussed matters affecting the company with Mr. Marshall, and while Mr. Marshall did not express any dissatisfaction whatever with the course of the West Virginia proceedings, he told Mr. Koontz there were some people who thought the proceedings should be in federal court, and it finally developed that it was Fleming who had advised him in this regard (R. 1158-1159). Mr. Fleming conferred with Mr. Koontz and stated that he represented some interests in Fort Wayne, Indiana who might be interested in putting money into the company (R. 1160). He asked Mr. Koontz to prepare a plan of reorganization so he could indicate to his associates that there was some chance of rehabilitating the company, but Mr. Koontz stated that he could not do this in such a short time (R. 1161). Exhibit 115 (R. 3763 (original)), a letter dated November 25, 1940 addressed by John Marshall, Sr. to Arthur Koontz, would indicate that one of the reasons Mr. Marshall favored Mr. Messick was that he thought Messick could get money for the company and also that Messick would provide a place in the company for his son, John Marshall, Jr.

The filing of the petition under Chapter X was authorized by a directors' meeting held in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania on June 3, 1941. There were only six directors present and seven were required for a quorum, so Mr. Fleming was elected as a member of the Board to make a quorum and resigned at the end of the meeting (R. 688-689). A. L. King, one of the directors, refused to vote for the filing of the federal petition because he felt that the state court receivers had not had time to submit a plan in state court (R. 689-690). The District Court in its opinion held that this was not a legal meeting (R. 189-190). The petition under Chapter X was, however, filed on June 6, 1941.

On September 17, 1941, during the course of the hearing on the controversial answers to the debtor's petition, another meeting of the Board of Directors was held for the purpose of ratifying the filing of the petition (Ex. 92, R. 2205 (original)). Still later during the course of the hearing and on October 3, 1941 a stockholders' and directors' meeting was held to again ratify the filing of the petition (Exs. 98, 99, R. 959).

On June 7, 1941 the District Court entered an order authorizing the federal trustee to employ Mr. Fleming and Mr. Messick "for special services." This order was revoked by a later order dated August 1, 1941. Mr. Fleming and Mr. Messick conferred with the Banking Commission of Wisconsin on June 12 and stated that they had been authorized by the federal trustee to contact the various states to ascertain their attitude as to the deposits (R. 1054). Mr. Fleming stated to a meeting of state officials in Chicago on June 13 that he and Mr. Messick had been retained by the trustee to work out a reorganization plan (R. 848-849). Mr. Fleming represented the debtor at the commencement of the hearings on the controversial answers to the petition but withdrew during the course of the trial and was replaced by Mr. John Ray on September 17, 1941 (R. 662). There has been no indication whatever during the course of these proceedings that Mr. Fleming's group or anyone else would furnish any new capital for the debtor.

14. The obtaining of the life insurance charter and licenses

We have previously related that on December 31, 1940 the debtor amended its charter so as to become a life insurance company. Its sole charter purpose after that date was as follows:

> "To issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and connected therewith, and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities."

The change of charter was approved by the Insurance Commissioner and by the Secretary of State of West Virginia. The Insurance Commissioner also issued to the company a license to do business as a life insurance company on December 31, 1940, which expired March 31, 1941. The company applied for a renewal of such license and the Insurance Commissioner renewed it on April 1, 1941, to expire on March 31, 1942. All this is set forth in Ex. 24 (R. 437), the certificate of the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia, found at page 76-79 of the Appendix to this brief. During the argument on the appeal in the Circuit Court of Appeals the debtor disputed the fact that the license as an insurance company was renewed on April 1, 1941, and at the request of the court the debtor and the respondents signed a stipulation (printed below) at the bar of the court to the effect that the debtor had applied for a renewal of the license shortly before April 1, 1941 and that this license was issued, but that on June 6, 1941 the license was not in possession of the company but was in possession of the Auditor of the State of West Virginia, and that prior to June 6, 1941 the check sent in payment for this license had been returned, and that the company was not operating under said license at the time the federal petition for reorganization was filed. Since Auditor Sims issued his "freeze" order to the company on April 4, 1941 and receivers were appointed on April 10, 1941, we may assume that the fees for the license for the year 1941-1942 were returned for the reason that the company was in effect out of business shortly after the issuance of the renewal license. The fees for the salesmen's licenses were also refunded, although the record does not show when (R. 462).

All through the trial in the District Court the debtor contended that it at no time issued any life insurance contracts under its charter and license as a life insurance company, and the District Court so found, and its opinion that the debtor was not a life insurance company was predicated upon such facts. However, it was subsequently discovered that the debtor had in fact issued many thousands of life insurance contracts by virtue of certain insurance "riders" under which Fidelity had assumed the life insurance provided for in the Series B contracts, which it had issued. These facts were brought to the attention of the Circuit Court of Appeals by a motion made by the West Virginia respondents, and at the request of that court the debtor, the Securities and Exchange Commission and these respondents entered into the following stipulation (R. 237-238):

> "Counsel admit at the Bar of the Court that the license applied for shortly prior to April 1, 1941, was issued but was in possession of the Auditor of West Virginia on June 6, 1941, and that the check sent in payment therefor was returned without being cashed prior to June 6, 1941, and that the Company was not operating under said license at the time of the filing of these proceedings on June 6, 1941; and that the total number of riders sent out on December 31, 1940, which were signed by contract holders and returned to the Company, was 9,802; and that the total number of Series B contracts with insurance clause on December 31, 1940, was 14,626.

(Signatures omitted)"

"Approved April 20, 1942. John J. Parker, Senior Circuit Judge."

The "riders" which were referred to in the stipulation and which were executed by Fidelity and 9,802 persons were in form as follows:

"FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION

"ASSUMPTION OF RISK AND RIDER ATTACHED TO AND A PART OF INCOME RESERVE CONTRACT SERIES 'B' NUMBER

"The Association, having so amended its charter as to authorize it to issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and to grant and dispose of annuities, and to change its name to Fidelity Assurance Association, in consideration of the monthly payments, provided for in the above numbered contract hereby assumes and does itself hereby agree to fulfill and pay all the risks and obligations of the insurance policy and the insurance company mentioned in Section C of said contract.

"It is hereby agreed between the Association and the contract holder that this insurance agreement shall become and be a part of said contract and the original shall be attached thereto.

"Executed in duplicate at Wheeling, West Virginia this 31st day of December, 1940.

FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION

(Signed) F. S. Risley
President

(Signed) Glenn W. Stephens
Contract Owner.

34S-11190 L
GLENN W. STEPHENS,
1st CENTRAL BLDG.,
MADISON, WIS."

When these "riders" were sent to such persons for execution a letter from Fidelity accompanied them which read as follows:

"December 31, 1940

"Dear Contract-owner:

"It is with pleasure and confidence that we direct your attention to the change in our name and the widening of the scope of our business to that of issuing insurance on the lives of persons. In the future, the company will be known as Fidelity Assurance Association and will offer a complete line of life insurance policies of all types and classes, including life annuities.

"These changes enable us, as a qualified legal reserve life insurance company to assume the risks and obligations provided in Section 6 of your contract. As you know, this Section makes available to you insurance covering all monthly payments not yet made in event of your death. Such insurance protection has, in the past, been procured from a legal reserve life insurance company, but was subject to cancellation upon due notice, at any time. With the making of your regular monthly payments and the Association assuming the insurance, this condition has been eliminated.

"By resolution of the Board of Directors and by the rider enclosed in duplicate, the Association assumes and itself agrees to fulfill and pay the risk and obligations of the insurance policy and of the insurance company mentioned in Section 6 of your contract. The original of the rider is to be signed and attached to your Income Reserve Contract, Series B and the other (the blue one) signed and returned to the Association in the enclosed envelope." (See Ex. 100, R. 2863 (original))

The issuance of these riders had been formally approved at a special meeting of directors held December 31, 1940, whereby it was resolved that in view of the fact that the company was qualified and admitted to transact a life insurance business, it did thereby assume and agree to fulfill and pay all of the risks and obligations of the insurance policy and the insurance company mentioned in Sec. 6 of the Series B contracts. At this meeting life insurance policy forms were adopted, a medical director was selected and conditions under which the company would issue life insurance policies of various denominations were formally set forth (p. 156 of Ex. 100, R. 2863 (original)).

In addition to the official chartering and licensing of Fidelity as a life insurance company by West Virginia, the state issued licenses to twenty life insurance salesmen upon application of the company, and approved a number of life insurance policies to be issued (Ex. 24, R. 437, App. 76-79).

At the time of the issuance of the life insurance charter and license Auditor Sims and Fidelity had made a "gentlemen's agreement" to the effect that the company would not sell any insurance policies until he gave permission (R. 406). With respect to this agreement Auditor Sims testified, "Those licenses were actually issued but the company was told not to sell anything until they got right with our office. I did that for the purpose of—licensed them for the purpose of receiving installment payments on the outstanding contracts." (R. 438)

However, in addition to continuing to receive payments on its outstanding annuity contracts by virtue of its life insurance company charter and license, the company in fact also issued life insurance policies and assumed life insurance risks.

Upon the charter change being authorized Fidelity notified the various state authorities of this fact. It addressed a letter to the Banking Commission of Wisconsin under date of December 21, 1940 as follows:

> "At a very recent meeting of the Board of Directors of the Fidelity Investment Association, it was unanimously decided that this company should broaden its field of activities by entering the life insurance business. The amendments to our charter, enabling us to write life contracts, were unanimously approved by the stockholders at their meeting. Under these circumstances we will discontinue the sale of contracts under our registration with your department and respectfully request that such registration be terminated at December 31 without prejudice." (Ex. 93, R. 2444 (original))

15. The plan and purpose behind the new charter

The federal "Investment Company Act of 1940" was to become effective on January 1, 1941, and it became obvious to the officers of the company that it could not comply with the requirements of this law so as to be able to continue in the business of selling face amount certificates (R. 403-404, 630, 701, 946). The idea of converting Fidelity's business into that of a life insurance company had been discussed by officers and directors of the company "about five or six months prior to the actual change" (R. 879-880). It had been discussed with John Marshall, who at that time was general counsel, with Mr. Foulk, the general attorney, the firm of Koontz & Koontz and others (R. 880). According to Fred Risley, the most recent president of the company, the officers knew at the time of the passage of the Investment Company Act of 1940 (August, 1940) that something would have to be done to change the form of Fidelity's business (R. 880-881). At first the thought was to try to develop a new form of annuity contract but that idea was abandoned and the idea of forming a life insurance company was adopted (R. 881). The company engaged an attorney in Chicago, who was experienced in the life insurance field, to assist in preparing the life insurance policies, rate book and "all the paraphernalia that goes with a life insurance company" (R. 879). The officers of the company considered that its business was already very similar to that of a life insurance company (R. 529).

Since 1934 the company had been selling the Series B contracts exclusively and 75% of the contracts sold had the life insurance feature (R. 681). The authorities of the states of Ohio, Kentucky and Alabama had ruled that the Series B contracts with insurance could not be sold in those states unless the company was qualified as a life insurance company (R. 315). For this reason the Series D contracts were issued and sold in these particular states (R. 315). A substantial amount of the holders of the older contract series had converted them into Series B with insurance (R. 335-336).

It seems to be conceded by the proponents of the petition and others who testified in these proceedings, that if Fidelity should ever do business again it must be as a life insurance company (Ex. 29, R. 489; R. 416, 451, 457, 631, 670, 932-933, 944-945, 1086-1087, 1131, 1214-1215). In connection with Fidelity's conversion into a life insurance company it was necessary that its outstanding liabilities should be reduced so that it might go ahead as a life insurance company (R. 1157). Many plans were proposed. As expressed by Mr. Foulk, the company's general attorney, "as an insurance company, if we could work into that, I felt that there was a possibility of placating our people and having them comfortably go along" (R. 944-945). In order to accomplish this purpose, Fidelity, through Allen Messick, retained Raymond Latta, an experienced life insurance actuary, in February, 1941, to work out plans to have the company's contract holders voluntarily reduce their claims (R. 1125-1126). Fidelity was going "to try to put our men out and ask the contract holders to cut down their claims or contracts and still go on through reorganization outside any court" (R. 1185). Latta, in collaboration with others in the company, prepared various plans with a view to applying the contract holders' equities "toward the life insurance annuity contract" upon a voluntary basis (R. 1069). Among other plans prepared were a so-called "graduated reorganization plan" (Ex. 111, R. 1075) and a so-called "uniform reorganization plan" (Ex. 112, R. 1075). All plans so prepared involved a scaling down of contract holders' interests. Mr. Latta was retained by the federal trustee until September 15, 1941 (R. 1056), but no plan for adoption in the federal proceedings has ever been submitted.

The purpose of becoming a life insurance company is made clear by John Marshall's letter of November 25, 1940, to Arthur Koontz (Ex. 115, R. 3763 (original)). He stated:

> "I think, too, that the idea of changing to an insurance company is an excellent one. Particularly in recent years that has really been our business—selling a contract with insurance features. If we become as successful as we once were in the sale of contracts, with a reduced guarantee and more participation in the strictly insurance features, we ought to make money again. Of course, one of the distinct features is that we leave our ally, the Investor's Syndicate, and join a strong group where we will be one of many. Finally, we get away from the S. E. C., which I think will always be an annoyance even if that body is reformed."

We should point out here that under the Investment Company Act of 1940, 15 U. S. C. A., sec. 80a, an insurance company is not an "investment company" so as to be subject thereto. Sec. 3 (c) Investment Company Act of 1940, 15 U. S. C. A., sec. 80a-3 (c). In the Investment Company Act of 1940 an insurance company is defined as follows:

> "'Insurance company' means a company which is organized as an insurance company, whose primary and predominant business activity is the writing of insurance or the reinsuring of risks underwritten by insurance companies, and which is subject to supervision by the Insurance Commissioner or a similar official or agency of a state * * *" Sec. 2 (a) (17) Investment Company Act of 1940, 15 U. S. C. A., sec. 80a-2 (a) (17).

Fidelity's whole point and purpose in effecting the charter change was to come within this language so as to be an insurance company subject to state regulation only.

As expressed by A. L. King, who had been a director, assistant treasurer, vice-president, comptroller and secretary for many years, "Well, with the amended S. E. C. statute—whatever you call it—coming into force on January 1, we knew previous to that time that we could not continue to sell our contracts as Fidelity Assurance—Investment Association after that date. We felt, in view of the fact that we had been selling an insured contract for a period of four or five years which appealed to the public, that we could convert our association into an insurance company and broaden our field of activity to include other types of insurance and make a specialty of the sale of an insured contract that would pass the requirements of the State Insurance Commissioner" (R. 701).

John Marshall stated that Mr. Latta was well qualified to assist the company because "he had been in reorganization matters and was acquainted with the same type of business that we were in and in the insurance business that we would go into" (R. 1005).

Howard E. Reed, "vice-president in charge of bank and public relations" and a director of Fidelity, stated that many life insurance companies sold annuity contracts and referred specifically to the Franklin Life Insurance Company as doing "a general life insurance business and they sell an annuity contract" (R. 736). Henry M. Steussy, formerly Wisconsin sales manager for Fidelity, who had later become vice-president of the Franklin Life Insurance Company, stated that that company was selling a face amount certificate which "qualifies as an insurance policy" and "was reconstructed just as the Fidelity contract would have to be reconstructed if the Fidelity Assurance Association was going to operate as an insurance corporation" (R. 1016, 1024). Fidelity intended to do the same thing.

Fred Risley, Fidelity's president, agreed that "everything was attempted that could lawfully and reasonably be attempted to begin the company's operation as an insurance company" (R. 885).

C. Facts particularly affecting the interests of Wisconsin contract holders and the Banking Commission of Wisconsin.

Fidelity was licensed to sell its contracts in Wisconsin and sold the same there from June 26, 1930 to the close of 1940. It was licensed annually by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin under the statutes of Wisconsin appertaining to foreign building and loan associations. Sec. 216.01, Wis. Stats., provides that corporations soliciting payments in a lump sum or periodically or on the installment plan must, in order to transact business in the state, comply with all of the provisions of Chapter 215, Wis. Stats., required of foreign building and loan associations authorized to do business in Wisconsin. Fidelity's business came within this description and thus it was licensed under Chapter 215 relating to building and loan associations. Sec. 215.38 of Chapter 215 provided that no foreign building and loan association should transact business in Wisconsin unless it should

> "* * * have and keep on deposit with the state treasurer, in trust for the benefit and security of all its members in this state, five hundred thousand dollars to be held in trust as aforesaid until all shares of such association held by residents of this state shall be fully redeemed and paid off and until its contracts and obligations to persons and members residing in this state shall have been fully performed and discharged. * * *"

It was also provided that the securities comprising the deposit should first be approved by the Banking Commission under the same rules and regulations as govern the approval of securities of trust company banks. It was further provided that whenever the Banking Commission should find that the liability on contracts held by persons residing in Wisconsin exceeded ninety per cent of the deposit, the Banking Commission should require the deposit of additional securities. Its contracts were also subject to the Securities Law of Wisconsin, Chapter 189, Wis. Stats. The laws of Wisconsin, insofar as pertinent here, to which Fidelity was subject are printed at pages 1 to 20 of the Appendix hereto.

Fidelity deposited securities with the State Treasurer of Wisconsin under these provisions of law. As of April 10, 1941, according to Fidelity's figures, the "net reserve liability" on contracts held by Wisconsin residents was $2,408,301.57, while the market value of the securities on deposit there as of June 6, 1941 was $2,619,399.07 (Ex. 48, R. 1116 (original)). About half of the securities comprising the Wisconsin deposit were liquidated and sold in the proceedings had there prior to the filing of the petition for reorganization herein, which securities are included in the latter figure.

The Wisconsin sales were directed from Fidelity's Milwaukee office which was in charge of Mr. Henry Steussy, who testified in these proceedings. A sales force of 225 men was built up in Wisconsin and a volume of over one million dollars in face amount per month was reached (R. 1011). Wisconsin was one of the five states in which the company had its largest volume of sales (Ex. 48, R. 1116 (original)). The total number of contracts outstanding in Wisconsin is approximately 12,000, of which approximately 6,000 are "active" (Ex. 34, R. 515).

In the sale of the contracts in Wisconsin the law of Wisconsin was emphasized (R. 1048). In the sales material prepared at the home office and used in Wisconsin the greatest stress was laid upon the fact that the company was supervised by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin and had securities on deposit with the State Treasurer. Ex. 106 (R. 1034), a handsome brochure used in making sales in Wisconsin, containing pictures of the state capitol of Wisconsin and quoting "the exacting law of Wisconsin." illustrates the method in which sales were made on the basis of the Wisconsin law. A great number of the Wisconsin contract-holders have advised the Banking Commission of Wisconsin that they purchased their contracts by reason of the representations made to them as to the Wisconsin law, and that since the money was placed on deposit for their protection they feel it should be paid over to them. The Wisconsin contract holders are not in favor of the federal proceedings. See Ex. 114, R. 3546 (original), printed at pages 27-36 of the Appendix hereto.

Upon the company's ceasing payment of its obligations in Wisconsin, and on April 14, 1941, three days after the institution of the West Virginia state court proceedings by the Auditor of West Virginia, the Banking Commission of Wisconsin took possession of the Wisconsin business and assets of Fidelity under the statutory proceeding provided by the laws of Wisconsin for the liquidation of building and loan associations, particularly sec. 215.33, Wis. Stats. (App. 8). These proceedings were instituted in the Circuit Court for Dane County, Wisconsin. Due notice to Fidelity and its officers, as provided by statutes, was given and Fidelity entered its appearance therein by counsel, but interposed no objection to the proceedings. A certified copy of the Wisconsin proceedings comprises Ex. 120 (R. 3803 (original)) of the record herein. The Attorney General of Wisconsin represents the Banking Commission in the Wisconsin proceedings under provisions of Wisconsin law providing therefor. By operation of law (sec. 215.33 (8), Wis. Stats., App. 15) and as provided by the order of April 14, 1941, of the Circuit Court for Dane County (App. 22-25), title to and possession of all of Fidelity's assets located in Wisconsin were vested in the Banking Commission of Wisconsin "to be administered by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin under the supervision and control of the Circuit Court for Dane County, Wisconsin, for the benefit and security of contract, bond or certificate holders, residents of this state * * *" (App. 22). The filing of the notice of taking possession also operated under sec. 215.33 (8), Wis. Stats., as a bar to any action against Fidelity or its assets in Wisconsin, and this was also provided for by the court order. Actual custody of the deposited securities remained with the State Treasurer of Wisconsin pending the proceedings (App. 23). Under date of May 16, 1941 the Circuit Court for Dane County ordered that the Banking Commission should proceed to give notice for the filing of claims Substantially all of the Wisconsin contract holders duly filed their claims with the Banking Commission of Wisconsin (Ex. 114, R. 3546 (original)) prior to the filing of the federal petition. The actual contracts were filed with these claims.

On May 16, 1941 the Banking Commission having determined that certain of the securities comprising the Wisconsin deposit should be sold, the court ordered that securities should be sold up to the amount of $1,500,000.

On May 27, 1941 the Banking Commission sold certain of the Wisconsin deposited securities realizing the sum of $1,259,244.04 therefor. This sale was approved by the court on May 29, 1941, and the funds realized ordered to be deposited in banks selected by the Banking Commission (Ex. 120, R. 3803 (original)). This was in accordance with sec. 215.33 (6), Wis. Stats., providing for the deposit of funds arising out of the liquidation of delinquent building and loan associations and providing that such funds constitute preferred deposits. These funds are presently held ready for distribution to Wisconsin contract holders. A schedule of the securities sold in Wisconsin with the par value and price realized thereon is contained in Ex. 120, (R. 3803 (original)) and is printed at page 26 of the Appendix hereto.

On June 9, 1941 the Banking Commission was notified by telegram, signed by Central Trust Company, that the District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia had on June 6 approved a petition for reorganization of Fidelity, and that all persons holding property of the debtor should turn the same over to Central Trust Company. Subsequently, copies of the District Court's ex parte orders of June 6 and June 10 ordering that the Banking Commission should turn over any assets in its possession to Central Trust Company and enjoining continuance of the state proceedings were mailed to the Banking Commission. The Banking Commission of Wisconsin did not comply with these purported orders insofar as they provided for a turnover of the deposited assets to the federal trustee. It has voluntarily held its proceedings in status quo pending the determination of the jurisdiction of the District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia.

D. Facts particularly affecting the interests of Iowa contract holders and the Commissioner of Insurance of Iowa

Fidelity Assurance Association, formerly known as Fidelity Investment Association, made application under the latter name to the state of Iowa through its Executive Council pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 392, 1927 Code of Iowa, for authority to sell its contracts in the state and said application was granted and a certificate of authority issued out of the office of Auditor of State on or about January 7, 1929. At the time of the issuance of certificate of authority the debtor corporation deposited with the Auditor of State of Iowa approved securities in the sum of $25,000 pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 392, 1927 Code of Iowa, said deposit being made for the specific purpose of guaranteeing to Iowa contract purchasers faithful performance of debtor corporation's obligations. Thereafter debtor corporation deposited additional securities in an amount at all times equal to its liabilities in this state in accordance with Iowa law. (See App. 37-40 for Chapter 392).

Thereafter on March 28, 1930 debtor corporation registered its investment contracts as an issuer-dealer pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 393, 1927 Code of Iowa (now Chapter 393.1, App. 41-43) and also filed its written consent without power of revocation that suits and actions might be commenced and maintained in the courts of this state by service of process or pleading authorized by law on the Secretary of the State of Iowa, as required by law. After 1936 debtor corporation's license and certificate of authority were not renewed and it was thus prohibited from carrying on its business as an issuer-dealer. In order that said debtor coporation might continue to collect and disburse on its outstanding contracts, although prohibited from selling new contracts, it filed application under date of December 17, 1937 with the Secretary of the State of Iowa for a permit to do business as a foreign corporation, pursuant to the terms of Chapter 386, 1935 Code of Iowa (App. 50-52), and with said application filed a resolution adopted by its Board of Directors designating a resident agent on whom service of original notice of civil suits might be served in the manner provided for in Section 3421, Chapter 386, 1935 Code of Iowa.

Debtor's "net cash liability" to Iowa contract holders is approximately $35,000 and debtor has deposited in Iowa bearer securities of the approximate par value of $42,000. These securities were deposited by the debtor in trust for the express purpose of guaranteeing 100% faithful performance on the part of debtor corporation, pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 392 of the Code of Iowa.

On April 11, 1941 debtor corporation was adjudged and decreed to be insolvent in the state of West Virginia. The debtor corporation had for some time occupied a precarious position in the state of Iowa, and upon the receipt of this information Charles R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance, through the Attorney General for the state of Iowa, commenced an action in the District Court in and for Polk County, Iowa to wind up the affairs of debtor corporation pursuant to the provisions of Chapters 392 and 393.1, Code of Iowa 1939. An order was entered on April 16, 1941 by the District Court in and for Polk County, Iowa, prohibiting any business transactions on the part of said debtor corporation.

Shortly thereafter one Guy R. Shaw, an Iowa resident contract holder, filed his petition in the nature of a creditor's bill, stating his interest and the interests of others similarly situated, alleging the deposit of securities in trust with the state for benefit of contract holders and the insolvency of debtor corporation and praying that an order issue appointing Charles R. Fischer temporary receiver. On April 23, 1941 Charles R. Fischer answered and cross-petitioned to Guy R. Shaw's petition, admitting that title to securities vested in the state of Iowa for use and benefit of contract holders on dates of their deposit and praying that he be appointed temporary receiver. On April 24, 1941 an order issued appointing Charles R. Fischer temporary receiver and prescribing the notice to be given to the Iowa resident agent, the receivers in West Virginia and the officers of debtor corporation, and said notice was duly given setting the day of May 19, 1941 as the date for hearing upon the appointment of Charles R. Fischer as permanent receiver of debtor corporation.

On April 24, 1941, on motion of John M. Rankin, Attorney General for the State of Iowa, an order was entered consolidating the original cause commenced by the Attorney General with the cause commenced by Guy R. Shaw, a contract holder.

On May 1, 1941, one E. G. Pullen, a resident contract holder in debtor corporation, petitioned for leave to intervene for himself and other Iowa contract holders similarly situated and alleging the deposit in trust by debtor corporation in the state of Iowa and alleging debtor's insolvency; on May 3, 1941 an order issued from the District Court in and for Polk County, Iowa granting leave to intervene and prescribing notice to be given to debtor corporation and to Charles R. Fischer, temporary receiver, which notice was duly given.

On May 19, 1941 a decree and order (App. 52-62) issued from the District Court in and for Polk County, appointing Charles R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance, as Permanent Receiver for debtor corporation for Iowa. The court found and decreed that title to assets on deposit pursuant to Chapter 392, Code of Iowa, vested in the state of Iowa on the dates they were deposited, and that said title thereto was now by decree vested in Charles R. Fischer as Permanent Receiver for said debtor corporation and ordered said receiver to proceed to wind up the affairs of debtor corporation in Iowa and prescribed notice to be given to the Iowa creditors of debtor corporation and provided for bond to be given as permanent receiver and the District Court retained jurisdiction over the receiver and assets for winding up purposes.

On May 20, 1941 Charles R. Fischer filed final report as receiver pendente lite, alleging he is now Permanent Receiver for debtor corporation and praying that he be dismissed and discharged as temporary receiver; on May 22, 1941 the District Court in and for Polk County, Iowa entered an order dismissing and discharging Charles R. Fischer as temporary receiver of said debtor corporation, and on May 23, 1941, et seq., Charles R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance and Permanent Receiver for debtor corporation, issued full and complete notice as prescribed in the order and decree dated May 19, 1941. A certified copy of the Iowa proceedings comprises Ex. 121 (R. 3803 (original)) herein.

The Commissioner of Insurance, as Permanent Receiver for debtor corporation, proceeded to administer the assets of the debtor corporation pursuant to the laws of Iowa up to the time the debtor's petition for reorganization was filed herein. The assets on deposits were not turned over to the federal trustee. The Iowa proceedings have voluntarily been held in status quo up to the present time. All of the securities comprising the Iowa deposit have been liquidated and sold and the cash proceeds remain with the Commissioner of Insurance for distribution to contract holders. Preparation is being made for the filing of proofs of claim in the Iowa proceedings.

PROPOSITIONS RELIED UPON IN THIS BRIEF AND THEIR DISPOSITION BY THE COURTS BELOW

1. The debtor and petitioner is an insurance corporation within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act as amended (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 22), and as such, ineligible to reorganize under the provisions of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, Act June 22, 1938, c. 575, 52 Stat. 883.

The District Court held that the debtor was not such an insurance corporation, while the Circuit Court of Appeals, reversing the District Court, held that it was.

2. The debtor's petition for reorganization was not filed in good faith within the meaning of Section 144 and subsecs. (3) and (4) of Section 146 of Chapter X (11 U. S. C. A., secs. 541, 546 (3) (4)).

The District Court held that the petition was filed in good faith within the meaning of the designated statutes. The Circuit Court of Appeals, reversing the ruling of the District Court, held that the petition was not filed in good faith within the meaning of Sections 144 and 146 (4). It made no finding as to whether dismissal was also required under Section 146 (3).

3. The public interest, under well settled equity principles applicable in Chapter X proceedings, required dismissal of the petition.

This contention was not ruled upon in either of the courts below.

ARGUMENT

I.

THE DEBTOR IS AN INSURANCE CORPORATION WITHIN THE MEANING OF SECTION 4 OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, AS AMENDED, AND AS SUCH INELIGIBLE TO REORGANIZE UNDER THE PROVISIONS OF CHAPTER X OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT

A. Insurance corporations are excluded from reorganization proceedings under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act

Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended, 11 U. S. C. A., sec. 22, reads in part as follows:

> "(a) Any person, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation, shall be entitled to the benefits of this title as a voluntary bankrupt.
>
> "(b) Any natural person, except a wage earner or farmer, and any moneyed, business, or commercial corporation, except a building and loan association, a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation, owing debts to the amount of $1,000 or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this title."

Chapter X, Section 106 contains the following provision:

> "For the purposes of this chapter, unless inconsistent with the context—
> "• • •

"(3) 'corporation' shall mean a corporation, as defined in this title, which could be adjudged a bankrupt under this title, and any railroad corporation except a railroad corporation authorized to file a petition under section 205 of this title;"

11 U. S. C. A., sec. 506 (3).

The question is squarely presented as to whether the debtor is an insurance corporation and therefore precluded from instituting reorganization proceedings.

B. The debtor was chartered, licensed and engaged in business as an insurance corporation under the laws of West Virginia, the state of its incorporation

The debtor was originally organized as a brokerage company and in 1912 its charter was amended to enable it to engage in "the business of soliciting and receiving deposits and payments on any annuity contracts, certificates or annuity bonds." From 1912 to December 31, 1940 it operated under the provisions of Ch. 33, Art. 9, sec. 1 of the West Virginia Code, reading:

"No person, association or corporation shall engage in the business of soliciting or receiving deposits or payments on any annuity contract or certificate or annuity bond in fixed and stipulated installments, within this State, without first having obtained from the insurance commissioner a license to do business in this State: Provided, however, That this article shall not be construed as applying to * * * insurance companies, * * * duly authorized to do business in this State, * * *. Such license shall be issued for one year, or the fractional part of a year, * * * and the provisions of section twelve, article two of this chapter [which provide for expiration April 1 each year] shall apply to such license." (Emphasis supplied)

During this period the debtor operated under the name of Fidelity Investment Association. We made no claim in the court below[1] and make none here that Fidelity was an insurance corporation during that period of its operation. As suggested in the petitioners' brief, it could hardly be regarded as an insurance corporation when such corporations were excluded from the provisions of the statute pursuant to which it was licensed.

On December 31, 1940 by charter amendment Fidelity's name was changed to Fidelity Assurance Association and the following statement of corporate purpose was substituted for that under which it had been operating:

> "To issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and connected therewith, and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities."

A certified copy of the charter amendments and a certificate by the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia setting out the steps that were taken in connection therewith may be found in Exhibit 24 which is printed at pp. 76 to 78 of the Appendix.

According to the Insurance Commissioner's certificate, application was made to him pursuant to the provisions of Ch. 33, Art. 2, sec. 3 of the West Virginia Code to approve the amendments. That section provides that the Secretary of State may not issue a certificate of incorporation to an insurance company until the Insurance Commissioner shall have approved the charter in writing. Exhibit 24 shows that the Insurance Commissioner approved the amended charter pursuant to sec. 3 and Fidelity's application, on [1] An intimation to the contrary in petitioner's brief (p. 33) is unfounded.

December 31, 1940. The Secretary of State of West Virginia then issued a certificate of amendment (App. 78-79).

Exhibit 24 also discloses that following the amendment of its charter and on the same day, Fidelity applied to the Insurance Commissioner for a license to engage in the insurance business. A license was issued under the provisions of Ch. 33, Art. 2, sec. 6 to transact such a business in West Virginia. A certified copy of the license is included in Exhibit 24. That part of the exhibit is not printed in the Appendix, since we have had no copy of the document.

At the time the debtor was chartered and licensed as an insurance company and thereafter during all the times involved in these proceedings, the law of West Virginia contained the following provision:

> "Life insurance companies chartered by and doing business in this State, and empowered to make contracts contingent upon life, may grant and issue annuities, either in connection with or separate from contracts of insurance based upon life risks, and all such annuities heretofore issued by such companies shall be valid." (Ch. 33, Art. 3, sec. 7, West Virginia Code)

The license to the debtor to engage in business as an insurance company was issued pursuant to an informal understanding with the Insurance Commissioner that it would enter into no new contracts of any kind until he advised the company that it might do so. The Commissioner testified that he issued the license at the time in order that the debtor would have authority to receive payments under its outstanding contracts (R. 438).

Under its charter and license as a life insurance company the debtor carried on its annuity business by continuing to receive payments upon outstanding contracts, by paying out amounts due on outstanding contracts and by managing its securities portfolio (R. 182). It does not appear that it attempted to write any further annuity contracts. The same cannot be said, however, with respect to insurance contracts.

At the hearing in the District Court those officials of the debtor who should have been in a position to know of its activities testified that it had issued no insurance policies after its incorporation and licensing as a life insurance company. After the case had been decided by the District Court and while the appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals was pending, evidence was uncovered which established that the company had in fact entered into life insurance contracts. A motion was made in the Circuit Court of Appeals to remand the case for further testimony. The motion was considered at the same time that the case was argued in the Circuit Court of Appeals, and counsel for all parties stipulated at the bar of that court that certain riders were sent out by the company in December 31, 1940 to the holders of its Series B contracts with the insurance clause.[1] It was stipulated that 9,802 riders were executed by contract holders and returned to the company, and that the total number of outstanding contracts with the insurance clause as of that date was 14,626 (R. 237).

The riders to which this stipulation referred are set out in the statement of facts (ante, p. 43-44). We have also set out a letter which accompanied the riders. The letter in plain words advised each contract holder that the company had become authorized to engage in the insurance business; that it desired to assume the insurance provided for in his annuity contract; that it was enclosing a rider which it had executed and by virtue of which it would assume the insurance when the rider had been executed and returned to it.

The debtor and the trustee in their brief do not unequivocally deny that by reason of the execution and return of these riders the company entered into 9,802 insurance contracts. They say, however, that the finding of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the contracts existed was made without "thorough consideration," and that they do not concede such contracts were created. They admit that by virtue of the riders, the company "would have assumed the insurance obligations * * *—when, if ever, * * * [it] could clear with the West Virginia State Auditor and get the right to issue insurance contracts" (Debtor's brief, p. 37).

It is preposterous to contend that any informal understanding with the Insurance Commissioner that it would not issue insurance contracts could invalidate such contracts issued by Fidelity under its unconditional license. There is no suggestion that any of the contract holders who entered into an insurance contract with Fidelity was advised of any such informal agreement. In fact, each holder was advised by the letter accompanying the rider that the company was ready, able and willing to enter into an insurance contract with him. We refuse to seriously consider the implied suggestion by the debtor and the trustee that no insurance agreements were effectuated with the 9,802 contract holders who executed and returned riders.

The brief of the Securities and Exchange Commission refers to Fidelity's insurance obligation as an "illegal gratuitous assumption of a liability" (SEC brief, p. 23). We are not advised in the brief of the respect in which these contracts were illegal; nor are we advised of the respect in which they were gratuitous. As in the case of the debtor and the trustee, the Securities and Exchange Commission fails to offer anything resembling a valid argument to the effect that these executed insurance riders forming a part of Series B contracts, upon which contract holders continued to pay the amounts called for by the contracts, did not constitute insurance contracts, binding upon the company.

The insurance contracts entered into by the debtor were nonetheless so because it continued to cover its liability by continuing its group insurance policy with Lincoln National. As the Series B contracts with the insurance feature were originally written, the debtor agreed, for a stipulated portion of the payment due on the contract, to obtain insurance that would protect the estate of the contract holder against loss of the contract in the event of his death prior to contract maturity. The debtor carried out its obligations under such contracts by obtaining a group life insurance policy with Lincoln National Life covering such Series B contract holders. After Fidelity itself assumed the insurance risk provided for in these Series B contracts it continued to carry the group policy with the Lincoln National Life. So far as we are advised, any claim against Fidelity arising out of its insurance contract has been paid by Lincoln National Life.

The fact that Fidelity has continued to carry its group policy with Lincoln National, however, does not affect the validity of its own insurance contracts. Actually the practical result of its doing so has been that it has carried reinsurance to the extent of 100% of its own insurance obligation. Had Lincoln National become insolvent to a greater extent than is Fidelity, so that it would be to the interest of a contract holder to assert a claim against Fidelity directly on his contract, no court would say that Fidelity had escaped its obligation by covering the contract holder through a group policy with Lincoln National. And if today coverage under the group policy with Lincoln National were to be cancelled as applied to those with whom Fidelity has contracted, there could be no question as to Fidelity's liability to those contract holders.

Summarizing the debtor's status as an insurance company under West Virginia law, it is established that it applied for incorporation as a life insurance company under the provisions of law particularly applicable to the incorporation of insurance companies; that it applied for and obtained an unconditional license to transact a life insurance business in West Virginia; that under its charter powers as a life insurance company and under West Virginia law it was empowered to deal in life insurance and in annuities; and that pursuant to its charter and its license it assumed liability on 9,802 life insurance policies and continued to carry on its annuity business except for the writing of new contracts. Debtor thus was chartered and licensed as a life insurance corporation by West Virginia and it transacted business in that state as such.[1]

Opposing briefs, both by the debtor, trustee and the Securities and Exchange Commission, attempt to gloss over Fidelity's status after its incorporation as a life insurance company by repeated statements that it was but a step

[1]No license was in effect at the time the debtor filed its petition. The license granted on December 31, 1940 expired on April 1, 1941. Application was made for a new license. The license was issued (App. 78), but the payment therefor was later refunded and the license returned. It does not appear as to when this was done except that it was done prior to the time the petition was filed (R. 237). Presumably the Commissioner felt obligated to return the money, since he ordered the company to cease business on April 4, 1941 and took it over under statutory receivership proceedings on April 11, 1941. While the difference is perhaps not material, the renewal license was not refused, as suggested in opposing briefs.

in an abortive "extra-judicial reorganization." They suggest that its incorporation, licensing and transaction of business as an insurance company was an effort to resuscitate the company as a paying business enterprise and that since the effort failed Fidelity cannot be regarded as having become a life insurance corporation. The suggestion implies that something necessary to constitute it a validly organized, licensed and operating insurance company remained uncompleted. Such an implication is contrary to the plain facts of the case, as we have already pointed out.

C. At the time insurance corporations were excluded from the Bankruptcy Act (1910), life insurance corporations were generally classified as such by reason of their charter powers to insure lives and to "grant, purchase and dispose of annuities"

We have seen that under the law of West Virginia, life insurance companies are those empowered to issue life insurance and to "grant and issue annuities." We have, moreover, seen that the sole corporate purpose of the debtor was

> "to issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and connected therewith, and to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities."

The law of West Virginia in thus classifying debtor as an insurance corporation is the same as that which has existed in the majority of states of the United States for many years.

Insurance corporations were excluded from the Bankruptcy Act by Act June 25, 1910, c. 412, secs. 3 and 4, 36

Stat. 839. At that time twenty-eight states,[1] including the territories of Arizona and New Mexico, classified a life insurance company as a corporation formed for the purpose of insuring the lives of persons and "to grant, purchase and dispose of annuities." The statutory language varies in the several states but the substance is clearly as indicated. We have set out at pages 63-73 in the Appendix the statutory provisions of these twenty-eight states. A typical case is that of New Jersey, where the law provides as follows:

> "Ten or more persons may become a corporation for the purpose of making any of the following kinds of insurance to wit:
>
> "* * *
>
> "—Life.—III. Upon the lives or health of persons, and every insurance appertaining thereto, and to grant, purchase or dispose of annuities;"
>
> Compiled Statutes of New Jersey, (1709-1910) Vol. 2, p. 2838.

It will be noted that this statutory provision defining the purposes for which life insurance corporations may be organized is almost identical with the charter purpose of the debtor.

Twenty states did not in 1910 have statutory provisions such as those pointed out. Some of them defined life insurance corporations as companies issuing insurance on the lives of persons, without making mention of the power to issue any form of annuity contract. Others did not define the term. Of these twenty states, however, at least seven[1] have amended their statutes since 1910 to conform to the statutes of the twenty-eight states, to which reference has been made. The statutes of these states are set out in the Appendix at pages 73-75.

It is, of course, an undeniable fact that in the year 1910 there was no commonly accepted meaning attached to the term "life insurance corporation" except as such meaning was derived from the laws of the several states which provided for the incorporation and regulation of such corporations. This is true also today. The federal government did not in 1910, and does not now, assume to incorporate life insurance companies for the purpose of carrying on a general life insurance business. It is established, therefore, that the term "life insurance corporation," in the year 1910 and today, in common, ordinary usage and understanding implies a corporation organized to issue insurance upon the lives of persons and to "grant, purchase and dispose of annuities." Such companies are in many cases empowered also to engage in activities such as writing accident and health insurance. We are not concerned with such powers in this case, however.

D. The question as to whether debtor is an insurance corporation within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act is to be determined either (1) by its classification under the law of West Virginia or (2) by its classification according to the accepted usage and understanding at the time of and since the enactment of the amendment of 1910 excluding insurance corporations from the Act. Under either test the debtor is an insurance corporation.

The adjudicated cases are not entirely consistent upon the test to be applied in determining whether a corporation falls within the classes excluded from the Bankruptcy Act by the provisions of sec. 4, 11 U. S. C. A., sec. 22. Five circuits, including the Fourth in the present case, hold that the question is to be determined by the classification of a corporation by the laws of the state of its creation, while one circuit holds that Congress intended to exclude such corporations as were generally recognized to be within the excepted classes at the time the Bankruptcy Law was amended to remove them from its operation. It is apparent that there could be no conflict in the two views, however, unless some state were to classify an excluded corporation upon the basis of charter powers other than those which are generally identified with such a corporation. We have found no case in which this has been true.

1. Authorities holding that classification by the state of incorporation is controlling

Perhaps the leading case holding to this view is In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984, 985 (CCA 2d, 1935), where the court stated the principle in the following language:

"* * * The most natural inference is that Congress meant to leave to local winding up statutes the liquidation of such companies; that, since the states commonly kept supervision over them during their lives, it was reasonable that they should take charge on their demise.[1] * * * Now it is the powers conferred upon the company, not its activities, which are decisive. * * * So far as In re Supreme Lodge of Masons Annuity (D. C.) 286 F. 180, holds otherwise it cannot be accepted. If a state enacts that companies having powers of a prescribed kind must be regulated, that is of course authoritative; and, if in addition it classes the company as a bank or a railroad or an insurer, that too should be authoritative. Kansas v. Hayes, 62 F. (2d) 597 (C. C. A. 10); Security B. & L. Ass'n v. Spurlock, 65 F. (2d) 768 (C. C. A. 9). This is true, not because Congress was bound to yield in such cases, but because otherwise its apparent purpose to leave the winding up of such companies to the state would not be effected; for the will of the state is no clearer to supervise the company than to class it as it does. When Congress excepted not all companies affected with a public interest, but specified kinds of such company, presumably it intended the states to define the kinds."

[1]The court's inference was properly drawn. Mr. Jacob Weinstein, a member of the National Bankruptcy Conference, who assisted in the drafting of Ch. X and who appeared at the hearings before the House Committee on Judiciary to explain the bill, stated that such was the purpose of its framers. He said:

"We have a letter from Mr. E. R. Elliott, an attorney of St. Louis, Mo. Mr. Elliott suggests that insurance companies be brought within the scope of corporate reorganizations. The conference has thoroughly canvassed and considered that whole subject of persons amenable to reorganization proceedings, and they have decided that in the case of insurance companies and banking corporations and the like, they be not brought within the scope of the reorganization proceedings. The cases of these companies, which are now excluded from the act—the various States have set up, first, controlling agencies in the operation of the companies; and, secondly, when companies become embarrassed, the agencies, in order to take care of them and to liquidate them, when necessary, and it is the judgment of the conference that it would be much better to allow these companies to be liquidated or reorganized under local law, than to bring them in under the bankruptcy law * * *" (House Committee on Judiciary, Hearings on H. R. 6439, 75th Congress, 1937-38, p. 242)

Cases from other circuits so holding are:

Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias v. McKee, 95 F. (2d) 474 (CCA 5th, 1938);

State of Kansas v. Hayes, 62 F. (2d) 597 (CCA 10th, 1932);

Security Building & Loan Ass'n v. Spurlock, 65 F. (2d) 768 (CCA 9th, 1933).

2. The view that a generally recognized rather than a local state classification is controlling

The highest authority that we have found supporting the view that local classification is not controlling is Gamble v. Daniel, 39 F. (2d) 447 (CCA 8th, 1930). There the question was whether a corporation organized under the laws of Nebraska was excluded from the Bankruptcy Act as a banking corporation. The court discussed the matter as follows:

"* * * We have no doubt that when Congress used the words 'banking corporations' it meant corporations which were authorized by the laws of their creation to do a banking business.

"* * * When Congress spoke of 'banking corporations' it spoke as of 1910. It used the words in no technical nor special sense, but as they were then ordinarily understood. As that time, the ordinary conception of a bank was of a business which was based primarily on the receipt of deposits (general or special), which deposits were used by the bank for loans, discounts, buying and selling commercial paper, and other business purposes. * * * Without attempting a full definition of these words used in this section of the Bankruptcy Act (as amended), this necessary element of deposits is stressed because it is important in this case.

"Having in mind the above construction of the words in the Bankruptcy Act, we turn to the statutes of Nebraska to ascertain the powers of this company. In such examination we are not bound by terminology, but are seeking to ascertain the actual powers granted. * * *." Gamble v. Daniel, 39 F. (2d) 447, 450-451.

The case of In re Supreme Lodge of the Masons Annuity, 286 F. 180 (N. D. Ga., 1923), also holds to this view.

3. Cases involving possible qualifications of the local state classification rule need not be considered

It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to consider whether the rule of In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984 (CCA 2d, 1935) was modified by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of In re Prudence Co., 79 F. (2d) 77 (CCA 2d, 1935).

It might be contended on the basis of the Prudence case that a state could not classify a corporation as a "railroad, insurance, or banking corporation" unless its charter purposes and the law under which it does business permit it to exercise some of the powers which have been commonly accepted as belonging to such corporations. But see Empire Title & Guarantee Co. v. United States, 101 F. (2d) 69 (CCA 2d, 1939). Neither is it necessary to consider other cases where it might likewise be contended that the rule of local state classification might be so limited.

Cf. Clemons v. Liberty Savings & Real Estate Corporation, 61 F. (2d) 448 (CCA 5th, 1932);

Woolsey v. Security Trust Co., 74 F. (2d) 334 (CCA 5th, 1934).

In the present case the debtor was classified as a life insurance corporation upon the basis of charter powers which are generally characteristic of life insurance corporations.

If a state were to enact that any corporation organized under its laws should be an insurance corporation, and if it were claimed that a corporation organized under its laws to operate a restaurant were an insurance corporation and excluded from the Bankruptcy Act, it might be contended with some force that the federal courts should refuse to follow the state classification. Such a case has not arisen to date, however, though many years have elapsed since these various types of corporations were excluded. Nor is it probable that the courts will be confronted with such a case. But if the time comes when states thus abuse the power that Congress has relinquished to them to reorganize and liquidate these particular classes of corporations, the Congress may, by a change of definitions or by removal of the exclusion clause altogether, adequately deal with the situation.

4. Debtor is an insurance corporation whether regard be had to its West Virginia classification or whether it be judged on the basis of a generally recognized classification

We have already pointed out that the debtor was organized as a life insurance corporation under the laws of West Virginia and that it was licensed and did business as such. If its status is to be determined upon the basis of its classification under the law of West Virginia, then it must necessarily be an insurance corporation.

If we turn from the matter of local classification and regard the debtor's status upon the basis of the general and accepted meaning of the term "life insurance corporation" at the time such corporations were excluded from the Act in 1910 by Act June 25, 1910, c. 412, secs. 3 and 4, 36 Stat. 839, it is likewise established, as we have shown, that the debtor is an insurance corporation.

E. There is no merit to the contention that the debtor's status as an insurance corporation is to be determined by considering the nature of its predominant activity and that, as so determined, it is not an insurance corporation

The debtor, the trustee and the Securities and Exchange Commission have contended throughout this case that the debtor's status as an insurance corporation is to be determined by application of what those of us interested in the case have denominated the "activities doctrine." They wholly reject the rule that the status of a corporation is to be determined by its classification under the laws pursuant to which it was organized. They agree with the one Circuit Court of Appeals decision, Gamble v. Daniel, 39 F. (2d) 447 (CCA 8th, 1930); which rejects the local classification rule and adopts a rule of generally recognized classification. They disagree with the Gamble case, however, in that they contend a corporation's status should be determined by its predominant activity rather than its charter powers, whereas the Gamble case holds that classification by charter power is the proper rule. They thus stand without support for their doctrine from any Circuit Court of Appeals decision construing the exclusion clause of the Bankruptcy Act now under consideration. The proposition contended for by the petitioners and the Securities and Exchange Commission was accepted by the District Court and was thus stated in its decision:

"In deciding whether a corporation is to be classified as an insurance or banking corporation or a building and loan association within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, the court must first examine the provisions of its corporate charter. If the charter authorizes the company to engage in business in any of the excepted fields, and if the company in fact engages principally in a business which lies within that field, such a corporation must be treated as one excluded from the benefits of Chapter X. However, if its charter authorizes the corporation to engage in activities outside the excepted fields, and if all the business actually done by the corporation is outside those fields, then it must be treated as not being within any of the excluded classes. By this test Debtor must be classified as a corporation which is not an insurance corporation within the meaning of the exemption provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. * * *." (R. 189)

The court then distinguished "insurance annuities" (life annuities) from "investment annuities" (annuities for a term of years). It held that the only business conducted by the debtor under its charter and license as a life insurance company involved "investment annuities" and that it did not, therefore, transact an insurance business.[1] Accordingly, the court held that since transactions in investment annuities constituted the debtor's only business and since such annuities were not insurance, the debtor was not an insurance corporation.

It should be remarked, first of all, that the District Court erred in the distinction it attempted to draw between "insurance annuities" and "investment annuities." It is to be inferred from its decision that had Fidelity's activities

[1] The issuance of life insurance contracts was not known to the court. See discussion ante, p. 66.

after its incorporation as a life insurance company consisted of dealings with reference to life annuities, it would be regarded as a life insurance company. But no annuity contract, either for life or for a period of years, is an insurance contract.

State v. Ham, 54 Wyo. 148, 88 P. (2d) 484 (1939).

Life insurance corporations under their charter power to deal in annuities may issue such annuities for life, upon the basis of mortality tables, or for a certain period without regard to mortality tables, as in the case of Fidelity's annuities.

Carroll v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of United States, 9 F. Supp. 223, 224 (D. C. Mo., 1934);

Daniel v. Life Ins. Co. of Virginia, (Tex. Civ. App.) 102 S. W. (2d) 256, 260 (1937).

And life insurance corporations conducting an annuity business under a life insurance charter to deal in life insurance and annuities and under a license to conduct a life insurance business are regarded as engaged in a life insurance business. As stated by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts:

> "And the conclusion is irresistible that if the petitioner had issued only contracts for the payment of annuities, it must be deemed to be a life insurance company. If so it would be accurately described as in 'the business of life insurance.' It is none the less so engaged because it also issues policies of life insurance. * * *." Mut. Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Commonwealth, 227 Mass. 63, 116 N. E. 469, 470 (1917)

and by the Supreme Court of Iowa:

> * * * That these words 'business done in this state' were inclusive of the granting and selling of annuities was made definitely certain by legislative enactment prior to the year 1934. That is, the Legislature had identified the granting and selling of annuities as a part of the business permitted and anticipated to be done in this state by insurance companies in the enjoyment of their business licenses. Reference is to chapter 147 of the Acts of the Forty-fifth General Assembly, which added to chapter 308 of the 1931 Code, section 8673-a, which provides that 'any life insurance company organized on the stock or mutual plan may grant and sell annuities. * * *.' Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Murphy, 223 Ia. 333, 271 N. W. 899, 902 (1937)

See also: State v. Lucas, 348 Mo. 286, 153 S. W. (2d) 10 (1941).

It must therefore be concluded that, even assuming the rule of law applied by the District Court to be applicable, it was misapplied in that if the annuity business done by Fidelity after its incorporation as a life insurance company constituted its predominant activity, the activity nevertheless was that of a life insurance company doing a life insurance business. The situation is comparable to the activity of the trust department of a banking corporation. Banking corporations authorized to conduct a trust business are nevertheless banking corporations, and the trust department cannot be considered apart from the corporation which conducts it and be regarded as something other than a banking business. Sterling v. Tantum, 5 Boyce (28 Del.) 409, 94 A. 176, 182.

An annuity business may be transacted by a corporation other than a life insurance corporation. Such a business may also be transacted by a life insurance corporation. Thus, the fact that a corporation transacts an annuity business is not, of itself, significant in determining the character of the corporation.

The District Court, in addition to misapplying the "activities doctrine" as stated in its opinion, further erred in accepting the contention also made here that there is any such doctrine recognized by the authorities in construing the exclusion provision of Section 4. The debtor, the trustee and the Securities and Exchange Commission rely for the most part on cases such as Cate v. Connell, 173 F. 445 (CCA 1st, 1909), In re Kingston Realty Co., 160 F. 445 (CCA 2d, 1908), In re Interstate Paving Co., 171 F. 604 (D. C. N. Y., 1909), arising under Section 4 prior to its amendment by Act June 25, 1910, c. 412, 36 Stat. 839. The inapplicability of these cases was pointed out by the Circuit Court of Appeals. They arose under the statute at a time when it provided that the amenability of a corporation to involuntary bankruptcy was to be determined by its principal pursuit. It was to avoid the uncertainty and confusion produced by the application of the statutory activities test that the 1910 amendment was made.

Gamble v. Daniel, 39 F. (2d) 447 (CCA 8th, 1930).

Another line of authority upon which the petitioners and the Securities and Exchange Commission rely is constituted by cases such as In re Roumanian Workers Educational Ass'n., 108 F. (2d) 782 (CCA 6th, 1940), which are concerned with determining whether a corporation is a "moneyed, business or commercial corporation" within the meaning of Section 4. The inapplicability of these cases was likewise pointed out in the opinion by the Circuit Court of Appeals.

The only case which directly supports petitioners' view as to the existence of an "activities doctrine" is In re Supreme Lodge of the Masons Annuity, 286 F. 180 (N. D. Ga., 1923), which is contrary in that respect to the decisions of the Court of Appeals for that circuit. Cf. Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias v. McKee, 95 F. (2d) 474 (CCA 5th, 1938). In that case the court remarked that the charter powers of a corporation should be resorted to in most instances for the purpose of determining its classification, and that in extreme cases resort might be had to activities rather than charter powers. The court by way of illustrating the application of the "activities doctrine" referred to a Georgia corporation which had obtained an ancient grant of a charter containing power to operate a railroad and a bank. It remarked that the company at no time had operated a bank, and that in order to determine its character the business actually done under its charter should control.

It may be that in a proper case there would be occasion to resort to an "activities doctrine." If under state law a corporation in a particular case were not clearly classified and if its charter powers and activities were broad enough to include operations both within and without the fields in which insurance, banking, building and loan corporations, etc. usually operate, a court might find it necessary to look to the business actually done, or to those charter powers actually exercised, in determining the true character of the corporation. Such, however, is not the case here, and it is not probable that such a case will often arise. Insurance, banking, building and loan and railroad corporations are almost universally regarded as being affected with a public interest and are closely regulated by the states. In line with this regulation, the purposes for which such corporations may be organized are usually defined to exclude non-related enterprises. This is certainly true in the field of life insurance. A study of the statutes relating to life insurance corporations which we have set out at pp. 63 to 75 of the Appendix indicates the uniformity of the law of the various states, certainty of classification, and the exclusion of non-related enterprises.

F. The petitioners' contention that the Investment Company Act of 1940 has defined the term "insurance corporation" as used in Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended in 1910, and that, as so defined, Fidelity is not an insurance corporation, is without merit

The petitioners contend in this court that even if the term "insurance corporation," as inserted in Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act by the 1910 amendment, was not defined, it has now been defined by the Investment Company Act of 1940 and that, as so defined, the term does not include Fidelity. Under the Investment Company Act of 1940 the term "face amount certificate" is created and defined (15 U. S. C. A., sec. 80a-2 (a) (15)). The term embraces both life and term annuities and other comparable contracts which are not material here. The term "investment company" is also created and defined (15 U. S. C. A., sec. 80a-3 (a) (2)). An "investment company" is a company issuing face amount certificates or other defined types of investment contracts. The term "face amount certificate company" is created and defined (15 U. S. C. A., sec. 80a-4 (1)). A "face amount certificate company" is an investment company dealing in face amount certificates. Since any annuity is a face amount certificate, and since companies dealing in face amount certificates are face amount certificate companies, all life insurance companies would be regulated under the Investment Company Act, were it not for the exclusion made by 15 U. S. C. A., sec. 80a-3 (c) (3) and 80a-2 (a) (17). These sections define and exclude insurance companies from the definition of "investment companies" and "face amount certificate companies." As so defined and excluded, insurance companies are those whose primary and predominant business activity is the writing of insurance policies and which are subject to supervision by the insurance officials of the various states.

In addition to providing extensive regulation for face amount certificate companies and other investment companies, the Investment Company Act of 1940 amended two sections of the Bankruptcy Act, namely Section 44 (a) (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 72 (a)) dealing with the appointment of trustees in bankrupt estates and Section 67 (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 107) dealing with liens upon, and fraudulent transfers of, the property of bankrupts. The amendment of Section 44 (a) provided that if a bankrupt were a face amount certificate company, the court should appoint the trustee upon giving the Securities and Exchange Commission an opportunity to be heard, and the creation of Section 67 (f) provided a method for equalizing the distribution in bankruptcy of state deposits made after January 1, 1941 by face amount certificate companies.

The petitioners argue that on the basis of these provisions of the Investment Company Act of 1940, the Congress has created a type of company known as a face amount certificate company; that the term "face amount certificate company" is created, among other things, for the purpose of the Bankruptcy Law; that it is clearly contemplated that face amount certificate companies may become bankrupts; that face amount certificate companies include insurance corporations whose primary and predominant business does not consist of writing insurance policies, and that consequently no face amount certificate company is an insurance corporation within the meaning of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended in 1910, excluding such corporations from bankruptcy.

This argument was not advanced in the court below and is not pressed in this court by the Securities and Exchange Commission.[1]

In enacting the Investment Company Act of 1940 Congress specifically directed its attention to amending the Bankruptcy Act. That act was amended in two particulars, neither of which related to the provisions (Section 4) specifying those who might become bankrupt. Both of the amended sections, 44 and 67, relate to the administration of assets of those who have been adjudged bankrupt. Had Congress intended to deal with the question of those who might become bankrupt, it could easily have done so. Had it intended to define the term "face amount certificate company" for purposes of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act and to provide that the undefined term "insurance corporation" used in that section should not include a face amount certificate company, it could easily have done so by express language. It is unbelievable that it could have intended to do these things through the process of tenuous indirection contended for.

The fact that Section 4 remained unchanged in the face of the other specific changes in the act is in itself persuasive that Congress addressed itself to the subject of

---

[1]The Securities and Exchange Commission, however, advances the contention that if insurance corporations are to be classified according to the law of the state of incorporation, as held by the court below, the result may be that the definition of the term "insurance company" under the Investment Company Act of 1940 may be affected. We can see no ground for such a contention. Under the Investment Company Act of 1940 the term "insurance company" as there used is defined as a company whose primary and predominant business activity is the writing of insurance. The definition of that term for the purposes of that act would necessarily control in the application of that act. The fact that for the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act the term "insurance corporation" may be judicially defined otherwise in the absence of legislative definition, in no way bears upon the administration of the Investment Company Act. The term "insurance corporation" may have a different meaning as defined for the purposes of different acts. See 26 U. S. C. A., sec. 201 (a), where life insurance companies are defined for purposes of taxation, and 15 U. S. C. A., sec. 605i, where they are defined for purposes of Reconstruction Finance Corporation lending. A face amount certificate company could be a life insurance corporation for purposes of taxation or purposes of RFC lending, even though it were not an insurance company for the purposes of the Investment Company Act of 1940. There is no reason why the same difference could not exist between the Investment Company Act and the Bankruptcy Act.

changing the act and intended no changes other than those expressly provided for.

Sampayo v. Bank of Nova Scotia, 313 U. S. 270, 85 L. ed. 1324, 61 S. Ct. 953 (1941)

No one contends that face amount certificate companies were first made amenable to the Bankruptcy Act by the Investment Company Act of 1940. While the term was first defined in the Investment Company Act, the companies to which it was applied had long been in existence and many of them were subject to the Bankruptcy Act as "moneyed, business or commercial corporations" not otherwise exempt as insurance corporations, etc. under Section 4. During its existence as an annuity company under West Virginia law Fidelity was subject to the Bankruptcy Act. Those who framed the Investment Company Act were obviously aware that such companies were amenable to bankruptcy, and there is no reason to suppose that in amending the Bankruptcy Act they were doing anything other than providing for the administration in bankruptcy of the assets of those companies.

The doctrine of implied amendment and implied repeal is not favored. If a subsequent statute which does not expressly change an existing provision can be given effect without being interpreted as so amending the provision, it will not be regarded as having been intended to do so.

Starbird v. Brown, 24 A. 824, 84 Me. 238, 240; and see, generally, cases cited in 59 C. J. 857. Applying this rule to the situation at hand, it is evident that no amendment of Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act can be implied. (There is no contention of an express one.) Had face amount certificate companies been excluded from bankruptcy prior to the enactment of the Investment Company Act which made provision for their administration in bankruptcy, they would impliedly have been made amenable to the Bankruptcy Law. The provision for the administration of their assets would have been inconsistent with their exclusion. However, since there were face amount certificate companies as defined in the Investment Company Act which were amenable to bankruptcy prior to the enactment of the Investment Company Act, there is no ground for supposing that Congress intended going further than to provide for administering the assets of such companies. There is no reason to suppose that Congress intended to provide for the administration of the assets of face amount certificate companies otherwise excluded by the Bankruptcy Act and thus to amend the excluding provisions. The term "insurance corporation" as used in Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act can be given the meaning attributed to it by the courts without in any way conflicting with the Investment Company Act of 1940. The term "face amount certificate company" and the term "insurance company" as used in the Investment Company Act of 1940 can be given full effect without in any way conflicting with the judicial interpretation of the term "insurance corporation" as used in Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act. Under such circumstances there is no room for the doctrine of implied amendment.

It is established, in view of the foregoing, that in enacting the Investment Company Act of 1940 Congress did not intend to supersede the judicial definition of the term "insurance corporation" as used in Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act and that the decisions relied upon by the court below remain authoritative.

G. The question as to whether the debtor is an insurance corporation is to be determined by its status at the time the petition was filed. At that time it was an insurance corporation. It is not material that prior to December 31, 1940 it was not an insurance corporation or that the major portion of its assets and liabilities was acquired prior to the time it became an insurance corporation

We have pointed out that the debtor was incorporated as an insurance company in West Virginia on December 31, 1940 and that it was licensed and did business as such in West Virginia. At the time the present proceedings were instituted, June 6, 1941, the debtor had been placed in receivership by the Insurance Commissioner under the provisions of West Virginia law. It was not at that time transacting any business, except such as was transacted through the receivers. For purposes of this proceeding, however, we look to its status at the inception of the receivership.

In re Peoria Life Ins. Co., 75 F. (2d) 777 (CCA 7th, 1935);

In re Union Guarantee & Mortgage Co., 75 F. (2d) 984 (CCA 2d, 1935).

At that time the debtor existed as an insurance corporation under West Virginia law.

It seems to be the contention of the petitioners and the Securities and Exchange Commission that since the debtor acquired the status of an insurance corporation but a few months prior to the time it was taken over by the Insurance Commissioner, its status as such a corporation should be disregarded in these proceedings. Thus, the petitioners stress the argument that a corporation should not be permitted to change its classification to that of a corporation excluded from bankruptcy and thereby to deny its creditors the benefits of bankruptcy. The Securities and Exchange Commission emphasizes that the principal assets and liabilities of the debtor were acquired prior to the time it became an insurance corporation; that it is such assets and liabilities which are to be administered, and that accordingly it should be regarded as occupying the status it had during the time it acquired the assets and liabilities. We may note parenthetically that the record does not show a comparison of the assets and liabilities acquired by Fidelity before and after December 31, 1940. After that time it received substantial amounts of money and incurred substantial obligations on its contracts. It also acquired liability under its insurance contracts, although the extent to which claims may arise out of such contracts will be contingent upon factors such as whether the re-insurance agreement is continued.

The contention of the petitioners is clever. It stresses the denial to creditors of the benefits of bankruptcy through change in the debtor's status. One would almost think that the creditors had instituted this proceeding. But such is not the case. It was instituted by the debtor. In the very nature of things different considerations must obtain in the two cases.

Chicago T. & T. Co. v. Forty-One Thirty-Six W. Corp., 302 U. S. 120, 82 L. ed. 147, 58 S. Ct. 125 (1937);

The right of the creditors is amply provided for by permitting them to file an involuntary petition in a proper case.

On December 31, 1940 the debtor applied to West Virginia for permission to incorporate as a life insurance corporation under West Virginia law. The permission was granted. It invoked the protection of West Virginia law,—it assumed the status of a life insurance corporation under West Virginia law for purposes which it considered beneficial to it. The regulatory provisions of the Investment Company Act of 1940 became effective January 1, 1941, one day following the debtor's incorporation as a life insurance company. It has been conceded by everyone in this case that the change was made for the purpose, among others, of escaping the regulatory provisions of the Investment Company Act. As to just how this was to be done has not yet been fully disclosed. Several theories are plausible. But whatever its plan may have been, the debtor thought that by assuming the status of a life insurance corporation under West Virginia law its chances of continuing in business would be enhanced.

West Virginia has enacted regulation appertaining to the incorporation and supervision of life insurance companies.[2] The debtor voluntarily assumed the status of a life insurance corporation in West Virginia. But after some months of effort, it found itself unable to continue business. It then utilized its corporate authority, enjoyed by virtue of its existence as a West Virginia life insurance corporation, and filed a petition in federal District Court denying that it was a life insurance corporation and basing its claim for relief upon that denial. These facts speak for themselves.

[1]The Supreme Court did not accept all the reasoning of the Circuit Court of Appeals. Cf. Marine Harbor Properties, Inc. v. Manufacturer's Trust Co., ——, U S ——, 87 L. ed. (adv.) 73, 63 S. Ct. 93. But we do not understand that the lower court was overruled on the proposition to which it is cited.

[2]It was because of the adequacy of such regulation, including liquidation and reorganization proceedings, that insurance corporations were excluded from the Bankruptcy Act (ante, p. 74).

As to the claim that the debtor's status at the time it acquired the major portion of its assets and liabilities should control, there are helpful precedents.

The Bankruptcy Act has long provided for voluntary petitions by farmers and wage earners, but it has exempted them from involuntary proceedings (Section 4 (b), 11 U. S. C. A., sec. 22 (b)). Since natural persons are by nature empowered to engage in an infinite variety of occupations, it has been necessary to define the terms "wage earner" and "farmer" upon the basis of their primary and principal activities (Section 1 (17), (32), 11 U. S. C. A., sec. (1) (17), (32)). In administering the Bankruptcy Act cases have occurred where one incurred assets and liabilities as a farmer and thereafter engaged in an occupation not exempt from involuntary bankruptcy. Other cases have occurred where persons have incurred assets and liabilities in an unexempt occupation and have thereafter assumed the status of a wage earner or farmer. There is some authority for the proposition that the status of a farmer or wage earner for the purpose of amenability to bankruptcy is to be determined as of the time that his assets and liabilities were acquired.

It is the general rule, however, that status is to be determined as of the time of an act of bankruptcy.

The status of a person during the time when assets and liabilities were acquired is held by the weight of authority to be material only in so far as it bears upon what his chief occupation was at the time an act of bankruptcy was committed.

In order to remove any doubt about the question Congress, following the majority rule, has enacted that the status of a person as a farmer or wage earner is to be determined as of the time an act of bankruptcy is committed. (Bankruptcy Act, Section 22 (b), as amended by Act June 22, 1938, c. 575, sec. 1, 52 Stat. 845). It is thus the legislative policy that status at the time assets and liabilities are acquired is not determinative.

In re Harriman, 31 F. Supp. 50 (D. C. N. Y., 1939)

By analogy to the cases and congressional policy dealing with the status of a person as a farmer or wage earner, the status of a corporation at the time of acquiring the major portion of its assets and liabilities should not determine its amenability to bankruptcy.[1] In a case of ordinary bankruptcy, even where the proceedings are involuntary, the status of the corporation at the time of the alleged act of bankruptcy should govern, although it may be conceded that a corporation could not, shortly before such an act, join the class of those excluded from bankruptcy with the intention of avoiding an involuntary petition.

In re Inman, 57 F. (2d) 595 (D. C. Wyo., 1932).

So far as Chapter X is concerned, we may assume that a similar rule would obtain. We may assume that if a corporation committed an act of bankruptcy and thereafter changed its classification within four months, it would nevertheless be amenable to an involuntary petition at the suit of its creditors (Bankruptcy Act, Section 131, 11 U. S. C. A., sec. 531). We may assume, moreover, that if any of the other matters had occurred, which under Section 131 invest creditors with the right to institute involuntary proceedings, a corporation could not thereafter change its status while the basis for jurisdiction continued to exist. Since this suit is not instituted by creditors, however, the question is not material and, even if it were, no basis would be afforded for holding the debtor amenable to Chapter X under the facts of the case. We may also assume that a corporation could not change into an excluded class for purposes of avoiding a Chapter X petition by creditors knowing that shortly thereafter it would commit an act of bankruptcy or suffer one of the contingencies to befall it which constitute a ground for the filing of an involuntary petition. But there is no evidence that Fidelity changed its classification with any such idea in mind, and none of those supporting the petition have ever ventured the suggestion that it entertained such an idea.

II

THE PETITION FOR REORGANIZATION WAS NOT FILED IN GOOD FAITH

Assuming for the purpose of argument that debtor were not an insurance corporation, its petition was not filed in good faith.

A. Statutes

Section 130 (7) of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, Act June 22, 1938, 52 Stat. 883 (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 530 (7)), provides that every petition shall state "the specific facts showing the need for relief under this chapter and why adequate relief cannot be obtained under chapter 11 of this act."

Section 144 of Chapter X (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 544) provides:

> "If an answer filed by any creditor, indenture trustee, or stockholder shall controvert any of the material allegations of the petition, the judge shall, as soon as may be, determine, without the intervention of a jury, the issues presented by the pleadings and enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith and that the material allegations are sustained by the proofs, or dismissing it if not so satisfied."

Section 146 of Chapter X (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 546), insofar as material here, provides:

> "Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term 'good faith,' a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if—

>
> "(2) * * *

"(3) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected; or

"(4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding."

B. The petition should have been dismissed pursuant to Section 146 (3) on the ground that it was unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization could be effected

1. The question as to whether the petition was filed in good faith within the meaning of Section 146 (3) of Chapter X was raised in the District Court and in the Circuit Court of Appeals and is open for argument in support of the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals.

In Ryerson v. United States, 312 U. S. 405, 85 L. ed. 917, 61 S. Ct. 656 (1941), it was held that a respondent in a matter brought before the court by certiorari might advance any proposition in support of the judgment of the court below which was argued in that court.

2. The purpose of Chapter X is to provide for the rehabilitation of corporations as going concerns, and the provisions of Section 146 (3) were framed in the light of that purpose. Neither the debtor's petition nor the proof demonstrates that it is entitled to the benefits of Chapter X.

a. The purpose of Chapter X and the requirements under Section 146 (3)

The fundamental purpose of Chapter X and its predecessor, Section 77B, was to provide means for the rehabilitation of corporations in order to preserve values inherent in their continuance as going business enterprises. The purposes of Chapter X are sharply distinguished from the purposes of straight bankruptcy or other proceedings, having for their purpose the liquidation of the assets of business concerns and their distribution to creditors. This fundamental difference is explained at pp. 2-3 of Finletter, Law of Bankruptcy Reorganization (1939 ed.), where it is said:

> "Now there is one underlying fact about these laws (and their successors, the reorganization chapters of the 1938 Act) which colors their whole quality. They are not bankruptcy laws at all. Bankruptcy procedure is a method of liquidation, and the reorganization provisions of the Act are codifications of the old federal equity receivership whose purpose is the opposite one of reorganization. The rules of law which make up the equity procedure were conceived with reference to the continuance of the enterprise as a going concern. The statutes and decisions which constitute the law of bankruptcy were formed with the object of liquidating the business and obtaining the maximum amount of cash for distribution to the creditors. The interpretation of the new reorganization chapters of the Act accordingly must recognize their real ancestry. The principles of the equity receivership underlie nearly every substantive provision of the new amendments.
>
> "The reason that the new laws are in the Bankruptcy Act is entirely a question of constitutionality. * * *" (Emphasis supplied) Finletter, Law of Bankruptcy Reorganization (1939 ed.) pp. 2-3.

See entire discussion of "Origins of Reorganization Provisions," Finletter (1939 ed.), pp. 1-35, and

Warner Bros. Pictures v. Lawton-Byrne-Bruner Ins. A. Co., 79 F. (2d) 804, 810-811 (CCA 8th, 1935).

As said in In re Dutch Woodcraft Shops, 14 F. Supp. 467 (D. C. W. D. Mich., 1935):

> "Obviously, the essential purpose of section 77B is to preserve and continue a going business but in cases where going concern values have been wholly or practically eliminated, the case is one for liquidation rather than for reorganization. The preservation of business enterprises must not be at the expense of creditors, and the provisions of sec. 77B should not be taken advantage of to effect what, in fact, amounts to a composition under sec. 12 (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 30)."

See citation of a portion of the foregoing language and discussion of the Dutch Woodcraft Shops case in Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., 308 U. S. 106, 84 L. ed. 110, 60 S. Ct. 1 (1939) (at 308 U. S., footnote 120-121).

Section 146 of Chapter X, the "good faith" provision, and subsec. (3) thereof must be interpreted, as were the "good faith" provisions of Section 77B, in the light of the fundamental purpose of Chapter X. Good faith was found wanting in Section 77B proceedings where the debtor could not meet the burden of proof upon it to show that it could be reorganized as a going concern, and under such circumstances such petitions were dismissed.

An illustrative case was First National Bank v. Conway Road Estates Co., 94 F. (2d) 736 (CCA 8th, 1938), cert. den. 304 U. S. 578, 82 L. ed. 1541, 58 S. Ct. 1047, where the issue of good faith was passed upon prior to the submission of a plan of reorganization on motion by a lien holder to dissolve a temporary injunction restraining foreclosure. The language of the case is apposite here. It was said:

> "In a reorganization proceeding under section 77B good faith means more than honesty of purpose. It also requires that there be a reasonable possibility of successful reorganization. Wright v. Vinton Branch Bank, 300 U. S. 440, 463, 57 S. Ct. 556, 562, 81 L. Ed. 736; Tennessee Publishing Co. v. American Bank, supra; In re. Tennessee Publishing Co., 6 Cir., 81 F. 2d 463; In re Loeb Apartments, 7 Cir., 89 F. 2d 431; Manati Sugar Co. v. Mock, 2 Cir., 75 F. 2d 284; O'Connor v. Mills, 8 Cir., 90 F. 2d 665; Provident Ins. Co. v. University Church, 9 Cir., 90 F. 2d 992.

"Whenever want of good faith appears the debtor's petition should be dismissed even though a plan of reorganization has not been submitted. The District Court was reversed for failure to dismiss in such a case in Provident Ins. Co. v. University Church, supra, in Re Wisun & Golub, 2 Cir., 84 F. 2d 1, and in Re North Kenmore Corporation, 7 Cir., 81 F. 2d 656. The judgment of the District Court dismissing the petition for want of good faith was affirmed in O'Connor v. Mills, supra; in Manati Sugar Co. v. Mock; supra; and in Re Gribsby-Grunow Co., 7 Cir., 77 F. 2d 200.

"In Brockett v. Winkle Terra Cotta Co., 8 Cir., 81 F. 2d 949, 953, Judge Valkenburgh, speaking for this court, said in reference to section 77B: 'The outstanding purpose of the Amended Act, upon which this case rests, was to afford aid in the effort to rehabilitate corporations solvent in fact but unable to meet maturing obligations.' It was not the purpose to lend its aid generally and without discrimination to corporations hopelessly insolvent, and without legal resources to prosecute their business with reasonable prospect of success.

"Considering the act itself and all these decisions it is apparent that it is the duty of the District Court to bear in mind the purpose and function of 77B at every step of the proceedings; and whenever it appears that rehabilitation of the debtor is impracticable or that injunctive relief is not sought in good faith the court in the exercise of a sound discretion should refuse the debtor further aid in harassing lienholders. * * *" (94 F. (2d) 739)

Other cases similarly decided under Section 77B, in addition to those cited in the above case, are:

Price v. Spokane Silver and Lead Co., 97 F. (2d) 237 (CCA 8th, 1938); cert. den. 305 U. S. 626, 83 L. ed. 401, 59 S. Ct. 88;

Sophian v. Congress Realty Co., 98 F. (2d) 499 (CCA 8th, 1938);

Milwaukee Postal Bldg. Corp. v. McCann, 95 F. (2d) 948, 950 (CCA 8th, 1938);

Sartorius v. Bardo, 95 F. (2d) 387 (CCA 2d, 1938);

In re Island Park Associates, 77 F. (2d) 334, 337 (CCA 2d, 1935);

In re Greyling Realty Co., 74 F. (2d) 734, 736 (CCA 2d, 1935);

In re Prudence-Bonds Corp., 77 F. (2d) 328, 330 (CCA 2d, 1935);

and see:

Old Fort Improvement Co. v. Lea, 89 F. (2d) 286, 289 (CCA 4th, 1937);

48 Harvard Law Review 283.

And it seems clear that this court, as well, recognized the basic proposition that the sole purpose for which 77B proceedings might be maintained was to "rehabilitate" or "resuscitate" corporations as distinguished from the liquidation of their assets. It said in City Bank Farmers Trust Co. v. Irving Trust Co., 299 U. S. 433, 81 L. ed. 324, 57 S. Ct. 292 (1937):

> "The purpose of § 77B was to facilitate rehabilitation of embarrassed corporations by a scaling or rearrangement of their obligations and shareholders' interests, thus avoiding a winding up, a sale of assets, and a distribution of the proceeds. * * *" (299 U. S. 438)

And in Tennessee Publishing Co. v. American National Bank, 299 U. S. 18, 81 L. ed. 13, 57 S. Ct. 85 (1936):

> "Nor do we need to inquire as to the precise limits of the concept of 'good faith' as required by sec. 77B. Whatever these limits may be, the statute clearly contemplates the submission of a plan of reorganization which admits of being confirmed as 'fair and equitable' and as 'feasible.' However honest in its efforts the debtor may be, and however sincere its motives, the District Court is not bound to clog its docket with visionary or impracticable schemes for resuscitation." (299 U. S. 22)

As said in Marine Harbor Properties, Inc. v. Manufacturer's Trust Co., —— U. S. ——, 87 L. ed. (adv.) 73; 63 S. Ct. 93 (Nov. 9, 1942):

> "* * * Section 146 [of Chapter X] represents a codification of some of the interpretations which the courts had given the words 'good faith' in proceedings under sec. 77B. S. Rep. No. 1916, 75th Cong., 3rd Sess., p. 27. * * *" (87 L. ed. (adv.) 75)

That such codification of prior interpretations of the good faith provisions of Section 77B was made in the light of the cases cited thereunder to which we have just referred, and similar cases, is clear from the statements made at hearings held before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives from June 1 to June 9, 1937, inclusive. Mr. Weinstein, member of the National Bankruptcy Conference, in explaining the definition of "good faith" in Chapter X, said in part (p. 140 of Hearing before the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, 75th Cong., 1st Sess., on H. R. 6439):

> "Now, as I indicated a while ago in connection with the approval of the petition, we have carefully defined the meaning of the phrase 'good faith' that is not defined in 77B. It may be anything that the judge says it means, and there have been decisions and there have been variances, and in some instances they are conflicting. One court has set up one standard and another court set up another standard. We have correlated these decisions and have taken out of the decisions what we believe to be the proper standards for determining good faith in the filing of the petition. We have also related good faith to what we tried to do in II, in respect to keep[ing] out companies that have no place in II, that ought to go under subsection I. I have read the definition of good faith and will not tire the committee by repeating it."

The date of Senate Report No. 1916, 75th Congress, Third Session, referred to in the Marine Harbor Properties case was April 20, 1938 and is obviously similar in substance to the statements of Mr. Weinstein previously made in June, 1937 at the House Judiciary Committee hearing.

Cases decided under Chapter X involving subsec. (3) of Section 146 consequently hold that petitions for reorganization must be dismissed where the debtor cannot meet the burden of proof upon it to show that the corporation can be reorganized as a going concern.

In re Julius Roehrs Co., 115 F. (2d) 723 (CCA 3rd, 1940);

In re Suburban Properties, Inc., 110 F. (2d) 438 (CCA 7th, 1940);

Chapman Bros. Co. v. Security-First Nat. Bank, 111 F. (2d) 86 (CCA 9th, 1940);

San Francisco Laundry Ass'n v. American Trust Co., 127 F. (2d) 187 (CCA 9th, 1942);

In re Ware Metal Products, Inc., 42 F. Supp. 538 (D. C. Mass., 1941).

We had not thought the proposition open to doubt that unless the debtor could show that it was reasonable to believe that it could be rehabilitated as a going concern, the petition should be dismissed. The debtor's petition was filed with the declared purpose of having its obligations reduced to a point where it would be solvent and could again continue its business. All of its proof adduced at the hearing was directed toward attempting to show that it could again resume business. During the hearings, however, it became evident to all that Fidelity could never again be a going concern. The Circuit Court of Appeals expressly found and the District Court, as may be fairly inferred from its opinion, was also of the opinion that there was no reasonable prospect of the company being reorganized as a going concern. As stated by the Circuit Court of Appeals, there is "only the immediate need of a liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of the contract holders" (R. 259).

Under the authorities which we have cited such a situation required dismissal of the petition. After the hearings, however, it began to be suggested, particularly by the SEC and the federal trustee, that the federal proceedings should continue for the purpose of effecting what was termed a "slow and orderly liquidation," although no testimony had been adduced by any party to show the need for or the desirability of any such procedure. The District Court accepted that view and, insofar as its opinion is referable to Section 146 (3), apparently based its decision on the proposition which it expressed as follows:

> "It is not necessary that there be a reasonable prospect for the successful rehabilitation of the Debtor as a going or continuing corporation. It is sufficient if it is shown that the Debtor is in a position to conform to and obtain the benefits of the statute for a slow, beneficial and orderly liquidation. R. L. Witters Associates, Inc. v. Ebsary Gypsum Co., Inc., et al., 93 F. (2d) 746 (C. C. A. 5th 1938); Re Central Funding Corporation, 75 F. (2d) 256 (C. C. A. 2d 1935); In Re: Mortgage Securities Corporation, 75 F. (2d) 261 (C. C. A. 2d 1935). * * *." (R. 196)

It is our view that this proposition is wholly erroneous as applied to the facts of this case. Such a construction of subsec. (3) of Section 146 of Chapter X results, under the facts here present, in its complete abrogation. It is difficult to see how a petition for reorganization could ever be dismissed by a creditor or other party in interest on the grounds specified in Section 146 (3), if all a debtor is required to show in order to suspend prior proceedings and to initiate federal reorganization proceedings is that the assets of the corporation could be liquidated in a "slow and orderly" fashion. This could be done with any assets of any corporation, whatever the circumstances, and the protection afforded creditors by Section 146 would be a mere illusion.

We will analyze the cases cited in the District Court's opinion: In R. L. Witters Associates v. Ebsary Gypsum Company, 93 F. (2d) 746 (CCA 5th, 1938), which arose under Section 77B, the District Court had said, among other things.

> "By reference to 'good faith' the meaning is not merely sincerity of intention. The expression embraces a reasonable expectation of continued useful existence. There must be reasonable prospect for successful rehabilitation of the debtor * * *
>
> "Undoubtedly section 77B is aimed at the 'continuance of a business as a going concern,' and does not contemplate an inactive corporation, bereft of its chief means of livelihood. * * *
>
> "Where a case presented is one for liquidation or for composition, proceedings under 77B should not be approved and the rights of creditors must be guarded and recognized throughout the proceedings as paramount to those of stockholders. * * *" (93 F. (2d) 747)

(We may note that language substantially similar to the foregoing was expressly approved in Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., as cited ante at page 100.)

The Circuit Court of Appeals said of this:

> "Appellant insists that the District Judge gave too narrow a construction to the statutory words 'good faith'; that he gave them a meaning not intended by the lawmakers, and neither expressed nor implicit in the words. It insists that this ruling would exclude from the operation of the statute all corporations except those which are to be reorganized as going concerns; that specifically it would exclude corporations seeking an orderly and conserving liquidation as against the disrupting and dismembering processes of common-law actions and seizures.

"We agree with appellant. The statute as to the corporations eligible to file the petition is broad and comprehensive. Under it, 'Any corporation which could become a bankrupt * * * may file an original petition.' Nowhere in the statute is there any definition of 'good faith.' What is meant by the term must be drawn from the meaning of the words themselves; as interpreted by the context in which they are used; the purpose back of the statute, the mischiefs it was enacted to prevent, the results it was enacted to accomplish." (Emphasis supplied) (93 F. (2d) 748)

Judging from this language the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit apparently adopted the theory that under certain circumstances a corporation might petition for reorganization on the ground that it sought an orderly and conserving liquidation of its assets. Under the numerous decisions which we have cited we believe that it is highly doubtful whether such a construction of the act could be maintained as a broad proposition. The lower court's opinion in the Witters case is certainly in line with the authorities to which we have referred. The Circuit Court of Appeals' decision was handed down January 5, 1938 and appears, from the language above quoted, to have been predicated upon the fact that Section 77B contained no definition of good faith. We have seen, however, that Chapter X does contain an explicit definition of good faith and that as early as June, 1937 at the House Judiciary Committee hearing thereon this definition was stated to be the result of the correlation of previous decisions of the courts on the good faith question. Chapter X became effective June 22, 1938 and there can be no question but that in its enactment Congress intended to adopt the decisions rendered prior to the Circuit Court of Appeals' decision in the Witters case. The District Court's opinion in the Witters case (19 F. Supp. 648) was handed down June 16, 1937 and the cases relied upon therein must obviously have been the same cases which Congress had in mind in adopting the specific definition of good faith found in Chapter X.

Assuming for the purpose of argument that, as possibly decided in the Circuit Court of Appeals' decision in the Witters case, a petition for reorganization could be approved solely on the ground that the debtor sought an orderly and conserving liquidation of its assets, it seems too clear for argument that such a theory of reorganization, if valid at all, must be limited to cases where the debtor can make some showing of "going concern value."

Examination of the opinion of the District Court in the Witters case, In re Witters Associates, Inc., 19 F. Supp. 648 (D. C. S. D. Fla., 1937), reveals that prior to the petition for reorganization being filed the debtor had sold all of its property to a corporation known as Cement Sales, Inc. under common control with it, which latter corporation proposed to go into the business of importing foreign cement. The property sold consisted of a warehouse and dock which had cost about $49,000, and was subject to mortgages of approximately $28,000, which mortgages had been assumed by Cement Sales, Inc. The remainder of the purchase price was the sum of $21,500 to be paid by Cement Sales, Inc. in monthly installments of $200.00 each. The only basis upon which the Circuit Court of Appeals decision could be approved would be, as we see it, on the theory that it had reason to believe that the operation of the business of Cement Sales, Inc., the purchasing corporation, would enable it to pay off the mortgages and also pay for the equity of the debtor company, which equity amounted to approximately $21,500.

The situation there was vastly different from that of Fidelity Assurance Association in this case. Here the debtor has no equity whatever remaining in any of its assets, proceedings had already been commenced for the purpose of liquidating those assets prior to the filing of the petition, and going concern values of any kind are entirely absent.

The case of In re Julius Roehrs Co., 115 F. (2d) 723 (CCA 3rd, 1940), is of particular interest in this regard. There the District Court had dismissed a petition filed under Chapter X as not filed in good faith. In deciding on the good faith question the District Court had required that the debtor file a tentative plan of reorganization and there was general testimony of one of the officers of the debtor as to why it was believed reorganization would be possible and advantageous. The Circuit Court of Appeals in remanding the case to the District Court for further proceedings, said:

> "* * * that it was not the duty of the court to ascertain whether or not a particular plan of reorganization could be carried out but only whether it was reasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization could be effected; that there was opportunity and need for reorganization and that the petition was filed with the honest intention of effecting it and not for the purpose of hindering and delaying creditors. R. L. Witters Associates v. Ebsary Gypsum Co., Inc., 5 Cir., 93 F. 2d 746; Snyder v. Fenner, 3 Cir., 101 F. 2d 736. Nor is the test whether stockholders will profit by reorganization. It may well be that a plan ultimately adopted would exclude stockholders from any participation. Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., Ltd., 308 U. S. 106, 131, 60 S. Ct. 1, 84 L. Ed. 110; In re Central Funding Corp., 2 Cir., 75 F. 2d 256, 261. There is always a question as to whether or not there is a good will or going concern value in the business of a debtor which feasibly may be preserved by reorganization for those entitled to it. But, as we have already indicated, the petition may not be found to be filed in good faith if it is within any of the prohibitions set forth by Section 146, though it must also be borne in mind that the generality of the meaning of the term 'good faith' is not to be limited by the specific provisions of the section. These are the questions that the District Court must pass on." (Emphasis supplied) (115 F. (2d) 724)

The cases cited by the District Court in the present case cannot, we believe, go beyond the scope of this language.

The case of Re Central Funding Corp., 75 F. (2d) 256 (CCA 2d, 1935), has little, if any, application here. The question of good faith was in no way involved, discussed or decided there. No party had challenged the debtor's good faith. The case involved an appeal from an order confirming a plan of reorganization entered in the lower court. Ninety-four per cent of the debtor's security holders had consented to the plan and only an indenture trustee appealed from the order. The only issue was whether the plan adopted was a plan of reorganization within the meaning of Section 77B (b) (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 207 (b)), (which provisions are similar to those of Section 216 of Chapter X). The opinion does not disclose the factual situation in sufficient detail so that we are able to determine what the decision would have been on the issue of good faith, had such issue been raised. From the language of the court we may deduce that there was some proof in the case which would indicate that the continuance of the business for liquidating purposes only (which apparently had been its only previous function) would produce more for the creditors than a more speedy liquidation. The court did point out:

> "* * * The plan here does not recognize an equity which is of no value, and it arranges simply for the carrying on of the same business conducted by the Central Funding Corporation for a long enough period to enable the new corporation to liquidate advantageously the collateral that secured the bonds that were issued by the debtor. * * *" (75 F. (2d), 259)

Assuming such a case to have a bearing upon the construction of the good faith provisions of Chapter X, it is readily seen that the facts in this case are radically different. Here creditors and others have challenged the debtor's good faith, proceedings have been commenced for the liquidation of Fidelity's assets for their benefit in proceedings expressly adapted to such purpose, and there is no proof whatever that there are any going concern values to be preserved for creditors by a plan of "slow liquidation" which might conceivably be worked out.

In re Mortgage Securities Corporation, 75 F. (2d) 261 (CCA 2d, 1935), is a companion case to the Central Funding case and the facts are the same. The question of good faith was not raised in the case nor touched upon in the short opinion.

The other cases relied upon by appellants, such as In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Co., 112 F. (2d) 655 (CCA 2d, 1940), and Continental Ins. Co. v. Louisiana Oil Refining Corp., 89 F. (2d) 333 (CCA 5th, 1937), are not helpful on the issue of good faith as presented in this case. The issue of good faith was not raised nor in any way decided or commented on in either of these cases. We note that in the Porto Rican American Tobacco Co. case the plan apparently contemplated that going concern value would be realized upon by a sale of all of the assets of a subsidiary corporation of debtor to a competing corporation which would operate the same and issue its securities to the debtor's creditors. The Louisiana Oil Refining case is cited in the Porto Rican American Tobacco Co. case, and while the issue of good faith was in no way raised in the Louisiana Oil Refining case, we note that the plan under discussion provided for the continued operation of the business of the debtor by another concern with which it would merge. Such cases are of no assistance here, where the business in which the debtor formally engaged is not to be carried on again but all that remains to be done is to liquidate assets consisting entirely of negotiable securities held in trust by various state authorities to secure contract holders therein. Obviously such procedure would not constitute the reorganization of the business of Fidelity Assurance Association as the term "reorganization" must be interpreted as used in subsec. (3) of Section 146.

That there is a distinction between the cases to which we have referred where the issue of good faith was not raised, and the case at hand where the issue was raised, is demonstrated by Sophian v. Congress Realty Co., 98 F. (2d) 499 (CCA 8th, 1938). No issue of good faith was raised in that case. The court reviewed a plan of reorganization adopted in the District Court, refused to confirm it, remanded the case for further proceedings and, in so doing, said:

> "The petition of this debtor for reorganization should probably have been dismissed on the ground that it was not filed in good faith. Price v. Spokane, Silver & Lead Co., supra, at page 247. The appellants, however, have not asked that that be done. It is possible that in these proceedings some plan can be worked out which will give to the bondholders all that they are entitled to and will secure the elimination of the valueless stock interest." (98 F. (2d) 502)

It seems too clear for argument that Chapter X was not intended as a mode of liquidating insolvent companies. As said in Securities and Exchange Commission v. United States R. & Imp. Co., 310 U. S. 434, 84 L. ed. 1293, 60 S. Ct. 1044 (1940), where liquidation is indicated, a petition for reorganization must be dismissed "leaving the debtor to the alternative remedy of bankruptcy liquidation" (310 U. S. 457).

b. Neither the petition nor the proofs thereon show that debtor is entitled to the benefits of Chapter X; in fact, the contrary is shown

The Petition

The obvious purpose of debtor's petition as filed was to rehabilitate it as a going concern. The proofs adduced by the debtor were directed to showing that it could be rehabilitated as a going concern. When such proofs utterly failed, the SEC and the federal trustee introduced the idea of "slow liquidation" as reorganization, as discussed above. It is obvious from the petition that the debtor is proceeding on a wholly erroneous theory of what may be accomplished in a Chapter X proceeding, even though it did recognize at the outset that the purpose of the proceeding was to enable it to be rehabilitated and continue as a going concern. Paragraph VII of the petition (R. 7-8) reads:

> "Debtor further states that it now has outstanding investment and annuity contracts with reserve liabilities totaling approximately $25,000,000, and that in these contracts debtor agrees to pay interest accumulations of from four to five percent per annum; that the decrease in interest rates in recent years has made it impossible for debtor to invest its funds in conformance with the West Virginia law and to earn the interest requirements as set forth in its said outstanding contracts; and that by reason of said interest requirements under its said contracts debtor is now suffering an annual loss of approximately $250,000 per annum, and that this loss will continue and probably increase unless the earnings on sound securities should increase far in excess of the present rate of income.
> "That for the reasons above set forth debtor has been unable to meet its obligations as they mature and will be unable to meet its obligations as they mature unless the rights of its contract holders are modified so that the earnings received on securities and assets owned by debtor will be sufficient in amount to meet the requirements under its outstanding contracts; and if the rights of its outstanding contract holders are modified to this extent, debtor will be able to comply with the Investment Company Act of 1940 and will be enabled to resume the operation of its business.

"Debtor further states that each of its existing and outstanding contracts is secured under the terms of each of its said contracts by a reserve fund, which is on deposit with the Treasurer of the State of West Virginia and with the officials and departments of other states where the securities of debtor were sold; and that the rights of all contract holders must be modified as above set forth in order that debtor may be permitted to obtain adequate relief, and that by reason of these facts debtor cannot obtain adequate relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Act."

Debtor thus seeks to carve an equity for itself out of the assets which belong wholly to contract holders. This it cannot do.

The petition considered with reference to the state deposit laws

In order to have a clear understanding of just what the debtor seeks to accomplish here we must consider the nature and operation of the state laws, particularly those providing for deposits.

Fidelity was strictly regulated in each state in which it operated. In fifteen of these states, including West Virginia, it had to maintain a deposit as a condition precedent to its obtaining a license to do business therein. The West Virginia deposit was made pursuant to sec. 3, Art. 9, Ch. 33, West Virginia Code.

This section provided that in order to be licensed in West Virginia a deposit in trust of one hundred thousand dollars, and additionally, an amount equal to the total cash liabilities of the company had to be made with the state. The deposit was to be made in securities subject to approval of the insurance commissioner. The deposit requirement was reduced to the extent that the company had securities on deposit elsewhere to secure its liabilities in accordance with the standards of the West Virginia law.

In Wisconsin by sec. 216.02, Wis. Stats. (dealing with "investment associations," App. 1) all of the provisions of Ch. 215 (which relates to the regulation of building and loan associations, App. 2-18) with respect to the supervision, control and conditions upon which foreign building and loan associations are permitted to do business there are made applicable to busiresses such as Fidelity's. By secs. 215.38, 215.39 and 215.395 (App. 3-4) it is provided that a deposit of specified securities shall be maintained as a condition precedent to being licensed to do business there "in trust for the benefit and security of all its members in this state", in such amount that the liabilities on outstanding contracts shall not exceed 90% of the deposit. The deposit is to be held in trust until "all contracts and obligations to persons and members residing in this state shall have been fully performed and discharged." These building and loan association laws were applicable to Fidelity's business and to the deposit made in Wisconsin during all the time it operated there, and thereafter with respect to the liquidation of its Wisconsin assets. Sec. 215.33, Wis. Stats. (App. 8-18).

The laws of the states which require deposits are summarized in the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 241).

Most of these state laws contain detailed provisions for the liquidation of the deposit in the event of insolvency and all provide for the retention of the deposit by the state authority until all claims of residents have been paid in full. The amount of the deposits actually held by the various state authorities, and the liabilities appertaining thereto, is shown, according to debtor's figures, in Ex. 48 (R. 1116 (original)) and a schedule taken therefrom is set forth in the joint statement of facts (ante, p. 19).

Fidelity's contracts themselves uniformly contained a provision in Section 1 thereof that the company should maintain certain "reserves" and provided further that "the reserve fund less any unpaid portion of any loans made therefrom on such contracts and any uncollected interest shall be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust as required by the laws of the state of West Virginia" (Exs. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5; R. 170 (original)).

Thus it is seen that all of the contract holders are beneficiaries of state trust deposits, some under the West Virginia trust deposit alone, some under both the West Virginia trust deposit and the trust deposit in another state and some, such as those in Wisconsin and Iowa, under trust deposits in their own state.

The debtor has made no contention that these trusts are not valid as created and indeed could make no such contention. Such provisions are commonly found in state statutes providing for the regulation of quasi-public corporations such as Fidelity and are everywhere sustained as valid enactments. Such laws are discussed generally at 23 Am. Jur. 271 and at 23 Am. Jur. 467, where it is said:

> "* * * the corporation, as well as its stockholders and receiver, is estopped from disputing the validity of a trust upon which the corporation has deposited securities as a condition of the license to do business in the state. * * *"

And see: United States v. Knott, 298 U. S. 544, 80 L. ed. 1321, 56 S. Ct. 902 (1936);

Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 43 L. ed. 432, 19 S. Ct. 165 (1898) (particularly at 172 U. S. 257);

American United Life Ins. Co. v. Fischer, 130 F. (2d) 643 (CCA 8th, 1942).

The validity of the Wisconsin deposit law (in an earlier form) with respect to deposits required of foreign building and loan associations (Fidelity was regulated as such under Wisconsin law during the time it operated there) has been fully sustained in Wisconsin. Lewis v. American Savings & Loan Assoc., 98 Wis. 203, 73 N. W. 793 (1898).

According to Ex. 48 filed by the debtor (R. 1116 (original)), the market value of all securities on deposit under these laws with the State of West Virginia and with other states was $20,056,680.27 on June 6, 1941, while the total "net cash liability" to contract holders for whose benefit these deposits were made was, according to that exhibit, $23,475,668.67 as of April 10, 1941. On these figures then, the various state trust deposits are, on a "net cash liability" basis, insufficient to meet Fidelity's present contract liability by a sum in excess of $3,400,000. If Fidelity were again to be licensed so as to continue to do business in the State of West Virginia or in any of these other states requiring deposits, it is clear not only that the present deposits could not be disturbed, but that additions thereto would have to be made in an amount in excess of $3,400,000. To remedy this situation Fidelity, according to the allegations of its petition for reorganization, proposes to reduce its liabilities on its contracts.

Apparently debtor would maintain that while it was necessary to meet the requirements of the state deposit laws in order for it to be licensed to do business in the states, yet as soon as its liabilities exceed those permitted by these laws, it can then, in order to prevent the state authorities from foreclosing on these funds for the benefit of the contract holders, obtain the aid of the federal court in reducing its liabilities to a point where the deposits would again be made whole. Aside from running afoul of the principles of the Marine Harbor Properties, the Los Angeles Lumber Products and other cases cited above, the sustaining of a petition for reorganization on such a showing would render the state deposit laws of no practical effect or value whatever. Presumably such corporations as the debtor might avoid the effect of the state laws upon which their licenses to do business depended by filing periodic petitions for reorganization in federal court whenever the deposits might shrink to a value below the requirements of the state laws.

The Proof

Assuming that, despite the obvious deficiency of the petition within the principles and under the facts above discussed, the debtor could be permitted to establish its good faith at the hearing on the controversial answers, if has wholly failed to do so. The burden of proof is of course upon the debtor to establish its good faith in the proceedings, particularly when expressly challenged thereon.

Marine Harbor Properties, Inc. v. Manufacturer's Trust Co., —— U. S. ——, 87 L. ed. (adv.) 73, 63 S. Ct. 93 (1942);

In re Cook, 104 F. (2d) 981 (CCA 7th, 1939);

Hickey v. Ritz Carlton, 96 F. (2d) 748 (CCA 3rd, 1938);

Manati Sugar Co. v. Mock, 75 F. (2d) 284 (CCA 2d, 1935);

In re Scheney Brothers, 12 F. Supp. 609 (D. C. Conn., 1935).

The debtor utterly failed to sustain the burden of proof which is upon it to show, in accordance with Section 146-(3), that it is reasonable to expect that it can be reorganized. It will be recalled that debtor is completely insolvent to the extent of at least three or four million dollars, that it has no license to do business in any state, that it completely suspended the sale of annuity contracts prior to December 31, 1940, that all of its offices have long since been closed, its sales force completely dissipated and lost, and that it is without good will of any sort.

No witness produced by the debtor was able to give the slightest hint as to the manner in which a reorganization could be effected.

John Marshall, Sr., former chairman of the Board, voting trustee, and one of the individuals dominant in the filing of the petition, stated that "I have not any idea of the plan, have not worked on the plan, and don't feel that I am competent to work on it. I have hoped some plan could be worked out" (R. 420), and that "I would not even sit here as a witness and say a plan could be promulgated" (R. 420); "How it is going to be done, I cannot say; I simply don't know" (R. 429).

Mr. McNulty, the debtor's vice president, stated that "There should be additional and new money" (R. 336). He had "not gone into the point of developing any plan" (R. 343). He stated he was a stockholder, had been with the company since 1922, felt attached and devoted to it and "just hopes there is some way to reorganize" (R. 343).

According to Auditor Sims, "The structure of the company economically and financially was unsound from the beginning" (R. 454).

Allen G. Messick, the most recent chairman of the Board, stated that he had been working on the proposition for a year and a half (R. 561). He thought that "a company can be founded on compulsory savings and yield a safe return" (R. 557). He had considered a plan to segregate everything into funds, telling the contract holders what they had, and then "frankly putting it up to them and having them write it down on a relisted basis" (R. 559). He conceded that where contract holders in some states were secured to the full extent of their contracts by deposits, even such a voluntary plan as he proposed would necessarily fail (R. 559).

D. A. Burt, one of the directors, stated that "the first thing of course is to get a plan of such character that new capital can be obtained" (R. 708), but that he did not know whether the company should be continued as a face amount certificate company or in some other form or a combination of more than one form of business (R. 709). He refused to discuss any possible plan, stating, "You are trying to get me to discuss the plan which I will not discuss" (R. 721). In stating that he thought the company could be reorganized he had not considered the authorities of the twenty-nine states in which the company had been licensed (R. 724). He didn't know the basis on which the contracts had been sold in the various states because "we had a regularly organized company to look after those sales" (R. 726).

Carroll D. Evans, formerly a member of the Board and director of sales since 1935, stated that, having in mind the best interests of the contract holders, he could not answer the question as to whether the company should be liquidated or reorganized (R. 933).

The most conclusive testimony to the effect that it is utterly hopeless to expect that Fidelity could succeed either in the sale of annuity or insurance contracts in the future is that of Henry M. Steussy who, during the time Fidelity operated in Wisconsin, was in charge of its operations there.

Mr. Steussy testified that after he left Fidelity he became vice president of Franklin Life Insurance Company. That company, a large and well established concern, had instituted a program whereby a face amount certificate "reconstructed just as the Fidelity contract would have to be reconstructed if the Fidelity Assurance Association was going to operate as an insurance corporation" (R. 1024) was to be sold by that company. It had been qualified for sale by Franklin in eighteen states (R. 1016). When he had been in charge of Fidelity's Wisconsin operations that office ranked in the top position of all of Fidelity's offices with respect to its sales record (R. 1011). When placed in charge of this program for Franklin he took with him only his best Fidelity salesmen, those who had been able to sell even after the SEC investigation (R. 1026). Franklin had given special training to a group who specialized in selling the annuity type policy for it (R. 1025). The program proved to be a complete failure, however, and these salesmen were unable to sell a sufficient volume of the new Franklin contracts to stay in the business (R. 1026).

Based upon his experience both in Fidelity and in the Franklin Life Insurance Company, he stated that the company could not be reorganized on the seven per cent loading charge permitted by the Investment Company Act of 1940 and could not possibly load the contracts so that it could assemble a sales force and be successful in selling (R. 1039-1040). He stated that Fidelity could not be qualified with the insurance departments in most states of the union (R. 1040).

The competition in the field of savings created by the sale of defense bonds was also shown to make the prospect of future success remote (R. 1043-1046). In view of the fact that government defense bonds may be purchased on monthly payments with the purchaser receiving monthly notices and that the yield is 2.9% (higher than the yield on most of the Fidelity contracts sold since 1934) it is not difficult to see why Fidelity could not hope to meet this competition and the testimony is clear that it could not.

Counsel for the SEC expressly conceded in the Circuit Court of Appeals that the possibilities were "practically 100%" against Fidelity being reorganized as a going concern, and do not argue here that it may be so reorganized. However, the petitioners (the debtor and the trustee) still appear at this late date to be attempting to show that Fidelity can be reorganized as a going concern. In their brief (pp. 44-46) they refer to the testimony of certain witnesses who made statements to the effect that they thought Fidelity could be reorganized. These witnesses specifically refused to venture the slightest suggestion as to how a reorganization might be accomplished or made suggestions so vague as to be entirely without practical meaning. Some of them, as we have shown, testified positively that debtor could not be reorganized. And see testimony of D. A. Burt, R. 715, 718-721, 724, 726, 727; Hubert F. Young, R. 631; Edgar B. Sims, R. 457; H. Isaiah Smith, R. 480, 481, 482, 483; Allen Messick, R. 559-560; Raymond Latta, R. 1111, et seq.

"Pell, Ltd." referred to at p. 45 of petitioners' brief, was merely an association of financial men in New York who evinced some interest in purchasing the stock of Fidel Association of New York, a subsidiary of Fidelity, and expressly stated they would make no promises with respect to reorganizing Fidelity (R. 1226). The vague suggestions made in petitioners' brief that Fidelity might be merged with some other investment or insurance company fall far short of meeting the burden of proof on the debtor to show that it can be reorganized.

The District Court made no finding whatever as to whether or not it was unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization could be effected. In its opinion it said:

> "* * * It is true that the broad picture developed by the testimony at the hearing does not present a very favorable view with respect to the rehabilitation and continued operation of the Debtor as a face amount certificate company. * * *" (R. 194-195)

The proponents of the petition were all agreed that any hope of continuance as a going concern would be as a life insurance company (see respondents' joint statement of facts, p. 48-51 ante). Assuming for the purpose of argument that debtor was not a life insurance company on the day the petition was filed, it seems obvious that it could not reorganize itself as such under Chapter X.

The District Court further said (R. 195):

> "* * * It is extremely doubtful whether, in view of unsettled economic conditions and the critical international situation, the Fidelity plan would any longer appeal to a large public; but it is not impossible; and it is not the duty of the court to decide for the public that investors will not or should not buy these contracts in the future." (Emphasis supplied)

Under the District Court's own interpretation of the testimony, dismissal is unquestionably required under the authorities which we have discussed above. The District Court's opinion (R. 195-196) contains certain statements bearing upon its conclusion that it was "not impossible" for the debtor to resume business. It was said that "the fact that the company has not been operated profitably in the past is not shown to be the result of financial unsoundness in the plan itself." But such statement is completely disproved by the record, particularly the SEC report comprising Ex. 6.

The District Court further stated that it was unsoundness in management methods and extravagant sales and promotion expenses, useless expenditures for lavish offices including the home office building in Wheeling, West Virginia, and over-expansion particularly in states like Wisconsin where the strictness of regulatory laws made it impossible to operate at a profit, that brought about the company's failure to operate profitably. We do not dispute that these things contributed to its downfall, but nevertheless it was conclusively shown that it was only by these so-called "high-pressure" sales methods that the company could sell its contracts in sufficient volume to continue in business (R. 924).

The District Court stated that the requirements of the Investment Company Act of 1940 were calculated to make the contracts more salable and that this regulatory law has not had the effect of banishing such companies from commercial operation. However, each and every officer of the debtor who testified, and also its general attorney, stated unequivocally that the company could not operate under the Investment Company Act of 1940. And the chief reason for the re-chartering of the company as an insurance company on December 31, 1940 was that the company recognized it was impossible to operate under that Act. The District Court also stated that the testimony discloses that at least one other such company is still in operation "presumably with some measure of success." We take it that by this statement the court referred to the "Investors' Syndicate," a company which operated on the same basis as Fidelity and which was mentioned several times in the testimony. But diligent search of the record on our part does not reveal the economic situation of Investors' Syndicate. The testimony shows that that company some time ago was negotiating with a certain "Chicago Corporation" with a view to refinancing, and that these negotiations apparently did not succeed (R. 1141). Mr. Pulfer, Fidelity's sales manager in Illinois, testified that he "understood" Investors' Syndicate was still engaged in business and "understood they had a very nice business last year." This is of course the purest hearsay and could form no basis whatever for a conclusion that Investors' Syndicate was operating profitably either in the past or at present. Hubert F. Young, who had charge of Fidelity's investment portfolio, testified that he "understood" that Investors' Syndicate had recently incorporated a new company under the Investment Company Act of 1940, but he stated that he had "no idea" whether that company was now doing business in West Virginia, Wisconsin, Illinois, Tennessee and other states (R. 677). H. Isaiah Smith, one of the West Virginia state court receivers, presently employed by the federal trustee, stated that he did not know whether the Investors' Syndicate was selling face amount certificates today (R. 511). The District Court then remarked that it did not see where the situation of Investors' Syndicate was material because "we may form a new company of Fidelity before we are through with it" (R. 511). We find no other reference to that company anywhere in the record. Neither the SEC, who presumably would have full information as to the operation of Investors' Syndicate under the Investment Company Act of 1940 and previously, nor the debtor, made any attempt whatever to demonstrate that that company, either in its past character or as a new company, had operated or was operating with any degree of success. We refer to the SEC report, Ex. 6, for a discussion of the affairs of Investors' Syndicate.

With respect to all of the unfavorable publicity which Fidelity has received, the District Court stated that all this had been directed to the unreorganized company and that "it does not follow that if and when the company may be reorganized under the supervision of a United States court, it would retain any of the stigmata which it is the purpose of such reorganization to remove." In view of the undisputed facts as to the effect of this publicity, we can hardly agree with this.

The District Court disposed of the argument that the several states where the debtor had sold its contracts might be unfriendly to future operations of the reorganized company therein by stating "it is sufficient to say that this argument imputes to the governments of those states unworthy motives for future action—motives which no court should assume would be entertained." The District Court wholly failed to consider the nature and effect of the various state laws upon Fidelity's operations, apparently being of the opinion that no discretion whatever resided in state officials as to whether or not the "Fidelity plan" would again be acceptable to those states. The difficulties to be faced may be illustrated by examination of cases in which former efforts of state authorities to ban Fidelity and similar companies are shown.

In Investors' Syndicate v. Bryan, 113 Neb. 816, 205 N. W. 294 (1925), affirmed in memorandum opinion by this court, at 274 U. S. 718, 71 L. ed. 1322, 47 S. Ct. 590, the action of the administrative authorities of the state of Nebraska was sustained in denying that company a license to operate there on the basis that the contracts were unfair, unjust and inequitable.

In Investors' Syndicate v. Porter, 52 F. (2d) 189 (D. C. Mont., 1931), that company sought to enjoin enforcement of an order of the Auditor and Ex-officio Investment Commissioner of Montana, which had revoked the company's license to sell unless the lapsation and other penalties were modified. A three judge district court granted the injunction on the ground that the Montana statute did not give due process. This holding was reversed in Porter v. Investors' Syndicate, 286 U. S. 461, 76 L. ed. 1226, 52 S. Ct. 617. In view of the reversal of the district court's judgment, the dissent of one of the district judges is interesting. It provides a complete answer to the contention that the states do not have power under existing law to bar contracts containing such "forfeiture" and "loading" as those involved here on the ground that they are inequitable and unfair to investors.

In Fidelity Investment Ass'n v. Emerson, 318 Ill. 548, 149 N. E. 530 (1925), the Secretary of State of Illinois had cancelled Fidelity's license to do business there because the contracts "would work or tend to work fraud upon the purchasers" within the meaning of the Illinois Security Law. Two lower appellate courts sustained the order and it was set aside in the Illinois Supreme Court which found in substance that since the forfeitures were set forth in the contract the contracts could not be said to be fraudulent on their face. The court left open the question as to whether the order might have been sustained if it had been based upon the selling methods used.

We may say that the securities law of Wisconsin, Chapter 189, under which Fidelity's contracts would have to be registered if they were again to be sold there, gives the Securities Department there broad discretion to deny registration if the plan of operation "tends to be unfair, inequitable or fraudulent, or against public interest or the interest of investors." (Sec. 189.13, Wis. Stats. 1941; App.

18-20). The Iowa Securities Act contains similar provisions. (Ch. 393.1, App. 41-50; and Ch. 392 Code of Iowa, App. 37-40). The regulatory laws of other states contain like provisions, and while no state authority could state by way of pre-judgment that Fidelity would not again be admitted there, a realistic appraisal of the situation leads inevitably to the conclusion that, now that the manner in which the "Fidelity plan" operated has been fully disclosed, including the fact that 95% of the investors therein did not carry the contracts to maturity and sustained a net loss upon their investment, such state laws and regulatory authorities would not permit the operation of this type of "plan" again.

C. Prior proceedings are pending which will best subserve the interests of contract holders

The Circuit Court of Appeals held that the petition was not filed in good faith within the meaning of Section 146 (4) of Chapter X, which provides that a petition shall not be deemed to be filed in good faith if a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding. This decision was, of course, arrived at in the light of the complete record on file with the court.

In Marine Harbor Properties, Inc. v. Manufacturer's Trust Co., —— U. S. ——, 87 L. ed. (adv.) 73, 63 S. Ct. 93 (Nov. 9, 1942), it is said, in discussing the history and proper interpretation of Section 146 (4) of Chapter X:

> "In view of that history it seems clear that when a prior proceeding is pending, a petitioner's showing of 'need for relief' under Ch. X, required to be contained in every petition by the express provisions of § 130 (7), must demonstrate that at least in some substantial particular the prior proceedings withhold or deny creditors or stockholders profits, advantages, or protection which Ch. X affords. In absence of such a showing the 'need for relief' has not been established and the District Court is not enabled to make an informed judgment on the 'good faith' issue." (87 L. ed. (adv.) 76)

The debtor did not make nor attempt to make, either in its petition or proof, any showing that the prior proceedings pending in the state courts would deny creditors benefits, advantages or protection which Chapter X affords. The petition merely stated that the debtor could not resume business unless its contracts were modified. It thus shows on its face that there is no equity remaining for the stockholders in the assets of the company. The petition recites that certain state court proceedings are pending, but it makes no suggestion that such proceedings are not adequate for the protection of creditors. In fact, it does not even suggest that the proceedings are brought for their benefit.

In arriving at a conclusion under Section 146 (4) of Chapter X the only question involved is whether or not the prior proceedings best subserve the interests of the creditors in this case, the contract holders. Aside from the fact that the debtor wholly failed to make any showing that the prior proceedings would not best subserve the interests of contract holders, the facts as analyzed by the Circuit Court of Appeals show conclusively that the prior proceedings will in fact best subserve the interests of contract holders.

The Wisconsin proceedings

We have previously in this brief set forth the nature of the laws providing for the licensing and supervision of Fidelity and the liquidation of its assets in Wisconsin (ante, p. 51-55). The proceedings there were instituted under a complete and detailed scheme providing for the realization of the claims of Wisconsin contract holders out of the assets deposited in Wisconsin. Prior to the filing of the federal petition the Wisconsin contract holders had filed their claims, including the contracts themselves, in the Wisconsin proceedings (Ex. 114, R. 3546 (original), App. 27-36). The Wisconsin contract holders have always looked to and still look to the Banking Commission of Wisconsin to secure to them their proper share of the funds on deposit there. There are some 6000 "active" contract holders in Wisconsin with a total "net cash liability" of approximately $2,340,000. The average "net cash liability" to each of these contract holders is thus between three and four hundred dollars. They purchased the contracts on express representations made to them by debtor as to the security provided by the Wisconsin deposit law. The settlement of any questions arising as to the relative rights of such contract holders in the Wisconsin deposit is amply provided for. It seems almost idle to suggest that the interests of Wisconsin contract holders would be better subserved if each of them is thrown on his own resources and required to employ counsel to prosecute a claim against the Wisconsin deposit in the far-off District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia.

The attitude of the Wisconsin contract holders has been clearly expressed. With singular unanimity they are desirous of severing for once and all their relationship with Fidelity Assurance Association. Their desire is to have the funds deposited in Wisconsin applied to the just settlement of their claims in an expeditious manner. They are wholly uninterested in reorganization or liquidation plans which may be formulated in the District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia. Their sentiments are expressed in the affidavits of Howard L. Smith and Emmett G. Hampton admitted in evidence here under stipulation as to matters of fact which they contain (R. 3546 (original)), which affidavits comprise Ex. 114 printed at pp. 27 to 36 of the Appendix hereto.

The proceedings pending in Wisconsin are conducted entirely by public authorities under the supervision of a state court, and no liquidator's fees for this service are to be exacted out of the securities deposited there. Counsel for the Banking Commission of Wisconsin in these proceedings have been and are being provided by the Attorney General of Wisconsin at no cost to the contract holders. Prior to the commencement of the federal proceedings and on May 27, 1941, securities comprising a part of the Wisconsin deposit were liquidated and sold, whereby the sum of $1,259,244.04 was realized (Ex. 120, R. 3803 (original)). The prices obtained were substantially in excess of the par value of the securities sold and we have not heard the slightest suggestion that this sale was not conducted in a manner which produced the highest possible prices for these securities. A schedule of the securities so sold and the prices obtained therefor, which is a part of Ex. 120 of the record herein, is printed at p. 26 of the Appendix hereto.

The securities remaining on deposit in Wisconsin are of the highest grade and it is apparent at a glance that they may be liquidated without the slightest difficulty or expense. These securities are:

| | Par Value | Market According to Published Quotations 4-14-41 |
|---|---|---|
| City of Milwaukee— Park 5% 1949 | $ 50,000.00 | $ 62,812.50 |
| City of Milwaukee— Sewer 5% 1947 | 30,000.00 | 37,125.00 |
| City of Milwaukee— Sewer 5% 1948 | 50,000.00 | 62,562.50 |
| City of Milwaukee— Sewer 5% 1949 | 50,000.00 | 63,062.50 |
| City of Milwaukee— Sewer 5% 1950 | 25,000.00 | 32,406.25 |
| United States Treasury— 2⅞—1960-55 | 160,000.00 | 175,350.00 |
| United States Treasury— 3¼—1946-44 | 34,000.00 | 36,751.88 |
| United States Treasury— ¾ Sept. 1944 | 800,000.00 | 798,000.00 |
| | $1,199,000.00 | $1,268,070.63 |

In the face of this situation the filing of the debtor's Chapter X petition has resulted in the Wisconsin proceedings having been held in abeyance since June 6, 1941. We have heard no suggestion that some form of "slow liquidation" plan would result in more money being obtained for these securities than may be presently obtained. To delay their liquidation would only appear to evidence a willingness on the part of the proponents of the petition to speculate with the contract holders' money.

The Iowa proceedings

The proceedings in Iowa were likewise commenced prior to the federal proceedings, and the laws of Iowa providing for the licensing and supervision of Fidelity and the liquidation of its assets and the proceedings therein, have been described earlier in this brief (ante, p. 56-57). The Iowa deposit has been converted to cash.

The proceedings in West Virginia and other states

Neither in the record nor in the District Court's opinion is any suggestion found that the proceedings commenced in the states having deposits other than West Virginia are in any way inadequate or will not secure to the contract holders in those states an economical and speedy method for realizing on the securities deposited for their benefit. Only about one-half of the deposits in dollar amount are located in West Virginia (ante, p. 19). With respect to states other than West Virginia, even where the contract holders are not fully secured therein, the situation would seem to be the same as that in Wisconsin and Iowa, as discussed above.

The District Court, while apparently not questioning the adequacy of the proceedings in states other than West Virginia, set forth in its opinion certain considerations upon which it concluded that the West Virginia proceedings would not best subserve the interests of contract holders. We can add little to the discussion of this portion of the District Court's opinion by the Circuit Court of Appeals. In that part of its opinion which relates that one of the West Virginia state court receivers was connected with a law firm whose senior member had been a director of the debtor, the District Court said:

> "* * * It is not improbable that investigation into Debtor's affairs may disclose the existence of liability from some or all of the directors to Debtor's creditors. Is it reasonable to suppose that such liabilities, if any, > would be diligently sought out and pursued in a proceeding with which one of Debtor's directors is so closely associated? * * *" (Emphasis supplied) (R. 198)

As pointed out by the Circuit Court of Appeals no specific facts are set out as to any liability on the part of Fidelity's former directors to its creditors, nor can we find the slightest indication of such in the record. Should such a liability be discovered at some future time, it is difficult to see how a federal trustee could enforce such a liability. We know of nothing in Chapter X which gives a trustee appointed thereunder either the right or duty to enforce claims or causes of action which creditors of the corporation may have against its directors. Section 167 (3) of Chapter X (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 567 (3)) provides that the trustee shall

> "* * * report to the judge any facts ascertained by him pertaining to fraud, misconduct, mismanagement and irregularities, and to any causes of action available to the estate." (Emphasis supplied)

A trustee does not succeed to claims which might exist in favor of individuals against a debtor's directors.

> 1 Gerdes, Corporate Reorganization, para. 405;
> Finletter, Law of Bankruptcy Reorganization, pp. 198-199.

Assuming that a federal trustee might prosecute causes of action existing in favor of the debtor against individuals, no suggestion was made by the District Court that such a liability exists, nor do we know of anything in the record which would so disclose. The SEC brief stresses "the necessity for impartial investigation" to ascertain whether any such liability exists.

Fidelity has been under investigation by the SEC since prior to 1938. Counsel for the SEC participated in the entire proceedings here but no evidence was adduced and no specific facts are pointed to from which a real possibility that such liability exists could be shown. It seems inconceivable that there could be any fact relative to possible liabilities on the part of individuals to the company which has thus far escaped attention. The SEC brief refers to certain affidavits and pleadings filed by some of its counsel in the injunction suit brought against Fidelity in Detroit in 1938. The allegations of these affidavits and pleadings were expressly denied by Fidelity in its answer to the complaint and the denial was incorporated into the consent decree entered which expressly provided that it was consented to "without admitting the allegations of the complaint and denying past derelictions." See SEC report, Ex. 6, pp. 249-258. Such references made after the full and complete hearing had in this matter will hardly warrant the conclusion that the West Virginia courts and authorities will not perform their duty or that the enforcement of contract holders' rights should be further delayed and jeopardized pending a search for some solvent individual who might be liable to the company on some theory by reason of some past transaction.

It may also be pointed out that one of the West Virginia state court receivers, H. Isaiah Smith, has been placed in charge of Fidelity's affairs to act for the federal trustee, and we cannot conceive how doubts could be expressed as to the adequacy of the West Virginia proceedings in the respect just discussed under such a circumstance.

If interest on the part of state court receivers, as distinguished from the federal trustee, is to be regarded as controlling in some measure, we believe it is proper to examine the position taken by the federal trustee in this proceeding to date. The federal trustee and its counsel took an active and, we may say leading, part in the trial of the issues presented by the controversial answers to debtor's petition. The federal trustee joins with debtor as one of the petitioners here and throughout has actively opposed at every step the position of those creditors represented in person and by state authorities who oppose the continuance of the federal proceedings. We had thought the provisions of Chapter X, particularly Section 158 thereof (11 U. S. C. A., sec. 558) relating to the disinterestedness of trustees, would necessarily preclude such participation by the trustee.

Under Section 77B it was held that a trustee appointed thereunder was not concerned with the merits of the petition or its dismissal.

> Loomis v. Gila County, 101 F. (2d) 827 (CCA 9th, 1939) petition for rehearing denied (with opinion) 103 F. (2d) 312; cert. den. 307 U. S. 643, 83 L. ed. 1524, 59 S. Ct. 1041.

As said in 1 Gerdes, Corporate Reorganization, para. 390:

> "In his relation with creditors and stockholders, the trustee is a fiduciary. His attitude toward all the creditors and stockholders should be the same, and no particular group should be favored over others of the same class."

The participation of the federal trustee in the trial of the issues between the debtor and the respondents here was directly challenged early and late in the hearing

(R. 300, 302, 1166, 1171). After Mr. Fleming, who as we have seen (ante, p. 38-40) was instrumental in filing debtor's petition and acted for it in so doing, withdrew from the trial of the issues presented by respondents' controversial answers, he was supplanted by Mr. Ray who also appeared for the debtor in the Circuit Court of Appeals and who appears here. As was pointed out to the Circuit Court of Appeals, the law firm of Mr. Ray is listed as "general counsel" for Central Trust Company, the federal trustee, although this was not known to us at the time of the hearing in the District Court. Mr. Holt, who appeared as counsel for debtor upon the application for the writ of certiorari and who now appears for it, disclosed at the bar of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in connection with debtor's application for stay of mandate, that his law firm was also regularly employed as counsel by Central Trust Company and had in fact been consulted by it in its private interest during the course of the present proceedings in matters affecting those proceedings. We impute no motives to these counsel inconsistent with the highest standards of conduct under Chapter X or under any other standards, but we believe the circumstances indicate a position on the part of the trustee not consistent with the provisions of Section 158 of Chapter X. The independent trustee was referred to by Mr. Justice Douglas, then a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission, at the House hearings on Chapter X, as "the keystone" of the program (p. 165, Hearing before the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, 75th Congress, First Session on H. R. 6439).

Although, as we have shown, the debtor by its petition and the proof thereon wholly failed to sustain the burden upon it to show good faith within the meaning of Section 146, the federal trustee has throughout taken upon itself that burden. And its failure of proof has been as abject as that of the debtor. To date the trustee has made only the vaguest suggestions as to how the debtor might be reorganized. It contends, however, that the proceedings should remain in federal court and urged both in the District Court and the Circuit Court of Appeals that this was desirable so that the securities could be subjected to "slow liquidation." Apparently the District Court was influenced in this direction because it said in its opinion that:

> "* * * The character of Debtor's assets is such that it would be peculiarly beneficial in its case to obtain slow and orderly liquidation, if such should be found to be the only feasible plan. The dumping upon the market of twenty million dollars worth of securities of the kind held in Debtor's portfolio would most certainly result in substantial losses, which may be avoided by slow and careful liquidation over an extended period of time. * * *" (R. 196-197)

A report filed in the District Court by the trustee on May 15, 1942, after the argument on appeal in the Circuit Court of Appeals, reveals that the trustee apparently no longer subscribes to this idea. The report is entitled "REPORT OF CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY, TRUSTEE, ON SECURITIES COMPRISING THE INVESTMENT PORTFOLIO OF FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION," and is printed at pp. 80 to 90 of the Appendix hereto. In this report it is said (App. 80):

> "Your Trustee further respectfully reports that all of the securities, excepting United States Treasury obligations and those rated 'A' or better, are regarded in the main by your Trustee as either falling in the so-called 'marginal classification, or securities which cannot be regarded as satisfactory for investment of savings funds."

Each type of security is discussed and the conclusion reached that except for United States government bonds each and all of the securities comprising the state deposits should be promptly sold. In discussing state, county and municipal revenue bonds it is said (App. 82):

> "* * * The longer the delay in acting on such vulnerable securities, just to such an extent is the danger increased that satisfactory sale can be accomplished. * * *"

This is precisely in accord with the position these respondents took at the inception of the federal proceedings and with the position we take now. Nevertheless, the fact that Wisconsin had prior to the federal proceedings sold certain securities, comprising in large part municipal, railroad and industrial issues, was constantly pointed to both by the debtor and the trustee during the hearing in the District Court as having been an error and one of the chief reasons why the federal proceedings should continue. The only difference between the position which the trustee takes in its report filed May 15, 1942 and that of the respondents is that, instead of distributing the proceeds of the sales the trustee suggests that such proceeds shall be re-invested in securities of the trustee's choosing and retained by it. We can only conclude from the report that the trustee does not favor "slow and orderly liquidation" or see any purpose therein, and that it does favor speedy liquidation but slow distribution. The trustee apparently would do everything the states are seeking to do except to place the funds in the hands of the contract holders who are entitled thereto. All that the trustee insists is that some plan (its nature undisclosed) shall be adopted whereby it shall have the control of the depositors' funds for an indefinite period of years. How the interests of contract holders are to be best subserved by such procedure, we cannot understand. The states emphatically disclaim any necessity for or intention of "dumping" the securities comprising the deposits on the market. See App. 26 for results of liquidation in Wisconsin.

Petitioners and the SEC suggest and have suggested an infinite number of legal questions which they conceive could arise between the state authorities and contract holders of the several states, and it is suggested that such questions should be decided in one forum.

The SEC brief advances the proposition that the state deposits may be found, after all, not to secure effectively the residents of the states for whose benefit the state deposit laws were enacted. They suggest that because of the manner in which Fidelity kept its books and because of certain provisions of the contracts, the securities which Fidelity placed on deposit with the states were impressed with a prior trust in its hands and therefore were improperly deposited with the states. Such a suggestion could hardly be heard to come from the debtor itself, whose petition is being tested in these proceedings, but in any event such speculations may be quickly disposed of. It is perhaps significant that while this question was raised frequently during the proceedings, particularly by counsel for the SEC, such counsel have consistently refused to make any positive statement as to their belief or disbelief in the theory that the state deposits were not valid as made. The District Court expressly stated that it made no determination of this point (R. 181).

The SEC brief states that when Fidelity deposited securities it made efforts to maintain segregation by series. It is then stated that "some of the state depositaries made their own selection of the securities to be deposited with them without regard to the particular fund of Fidelity to which the securities belonged." Such statements distort the record. The plain fact is, as is well known to everyone in these proceedings, that the state laws did not contemplate any segregation of securities by "funds" or "series," but merely that the securities on deposit should be of sufficient amount to secure the company's total liabilities in each particular state to the extent specified in the several laws, without regard to the fact that the company might from time to time develop and sell various "series" of contracts. And the state deposits were made on this theory during the entire life of the company. It was not until the SEC investigation in 1938 that suggestions began to be made that in some manner the securities were impressed with a trust by "funds" in the hands of the company. The great bulk of the deposits as presently constituted were made long prior to the SEC investigation. We refer to the joint statement of facts, ante, pp. 26 to 30, for a statement of the facts as to the various "funds" as related to the state deposits. The District Court expressly found (R. 181) that the debtor "made no attempt to proportion its deposits of securities from a particular fund to the amount of cash liabilities against that fund in the state where the securities were deposited." The Securities and Exchange Commission itself (as distinguished from its counsel) expressly found and reported to Congress that Fidelity's contracts were unsecured except for the state deposits (ante, pp. 28-30). And a reading of the contracts (Exs. 1-5, inclusive) will make clear beyond all doubt that no trust was created thereby, it being expressly stated that the securities comprising the "reserves" were to be deposited "in trust as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia." The deposit law of West Virginia made provision for deposits in other states and the contracts sold in other states were, of course, subject to the provisions of the laws of such states. The trusts arose by virtue of the state laws and the deposits made thereunder and there are no other "trusts." The states, while assuming the validity of their laws, do not, as suggested by the SEC, attempt to preclude challenge thereof. The courts of Wisconsin and Iowa and of the other states are open to all who may desire on any theory to make claim against the funds on deposit there, and any questions so presented should be decided there.

The depositary states have worked in harmony during the entire course of these proceedings and should questions arise between them, we can see no reason for suggesting that they will not be determined in an expeditious and adequate manner.

It is probable that questions will arise as to who are proper claimants in any particular deposits and as to the proper measure of claims. And doubtless, there will be questions as to the relative rights of claimants in particular deposits. These are questions of state law.

Fischer v. American United L. Ins. Co., 314 U. S. 549, 86 L. ed. 444, 62 S. Ct. 380 (Jan. 1942);

American United L. Ins. Co. v. Fischer, 130 F. (2d) 643 (CCA 8th, July 1942).

Such questions of state law involve both the rights of contract holders within the states as to the funds on deposit there and the rights of the states and their lawfully constituted administrative bodies with respect to the regulation of the debtor's business within each of the several states.

These questions are not so formidable that the state courts cannot adequately cope with them. Assuming such questions to be complex and difficult their existence would not furnish any reason for extending the scope and purpose of Chapter X. In the liquidation of any large corporation doing business in a number of states and having pledged its property in various states under various laws, it is inevitable that a number of legal questions will arise. And such questions will arise whether the liquidation be conducted in state courts or in bankruptcy proceedings in the federal courts. This situation, however, did not lead Congress to extend the scope of the reorganization statute to supplant existing procedures, whether state or federal, for liquidation, nor will the exigencies of a particular case add to the federal court's jurisdiction under Chapter X.[1]

[1] In fact, the drafters of Chapter X considered this very question in rejecting the contention that insurance companies should be brought within the scope of the Act. A letter dated May 14, 1937 to Hon. Walter Chandler was introduced into the record of the hearing before the House Judiciary Committee, reading in part as follows:

"* * * Personally, I see no reason why insurance companies which fail should not be wound up in bankruptcy. As you know, most of these companies are operating in several States, necessitating separate receiverships or wind-ups in each State, with an enormous duplication in expenses and gross inequality of treatment between residents of various States. Sometimes, where one State happens to have a large amount of assets and another none, the policyholders are paid not on the basis of their claims prorating over the United States as a whole, but on the basis of what assets happen to be in their home State. I could give you many instances of cases where policyholders of one State are paid in full or paid a very large percentage of their claims, while at the same time policyholders of another State get little or nothing. By striking out the word 'insurance' in two places in the bill one very great abuse will be rectified."

Mr. Jacob Weinstein, one of the drafters of the bill, who appeared before the House Committee to explain its provisions, related to the Committee in reference to the letter:

"We have a letter from Mr. E. H. Elliott, an attorney of St. Louis, Mo. Mr. Elliott suggests that insurance companies be brought within the scope of corporate reorganizations. The conference has thoroughly canvassed and considered that whole subject of persons amenable to reorganization proceedings, and they have decided that in the case of insurance companies and banking corporations and the like, they be not brought within the scope of the reorganization proceedings. The cases of these companies, which are now excluded from the act—the various States have set up, first, controlling agencies in the operation of the companies; and, secondly, when companies become embarrassed, the agencies, in order to take care of them, and to liquidate them, when necessary; and it is the judgment of the conference that it would be much better to allow these companies to be liquidated or reorganized under local law, than to bring them in under the bankruptcy law. * * *"

P. 242, Hearing before Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, 75th Cong., 1st Sess., on H. R. 6439.

Recent decisions of this court would indicate that were the federal proceedings to continue the District Court would be required to submit questions as to the construction of the deposit laws of the various states to the state courts of those states, where such questions had not yet been decided by the state courts.

Thompson v. Magnolia Petroleum Co., 309 U. S. 478, 84 L. ed. 876, 60 S. Ct. 628 (1940);

Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U. S. 496, 85 L. ed. 971, 61 S. Ct. 643 (1941), infra;

Fischer v. American United L. Ins. Co., 314 U. S. 549, 86 L. ed. 444, 62 S. Ct. 380 (1942).

If, in any event, the federal court would be required to refer such matters to the state courts for disposition, it seems unreasonable to suggest that a multiplicity of state court actions can be avoided by an assumption of federal jurisdiction. On the contrary, it clearly appears that such assumption of jurisdiction would result in the addition of yet another court to those which must ultimately pass upon the questions at issue. Common sense dictates that where the important questions in the case must be referred to the state courts in any event, each of those courts should be permitted to effect a complete disposition of the deposits in their respective states.

III

THE PUBLIC INTEREST, UNDER WELL SETTLED EQUITY PRINCIPLES APPLICABLE IN CHAPTER X PROCEEDINGS, REQUIRED DISMISSAL OF THE PETITION BY THE DISTRICT COURT

Equitable principles applicable in Chapter X proceedings required dismissal of the petition by the District Court. These principles may be considered as existing independently of the express words of Chapter X or as an aspect of the question of "good faith" within the general meaning of that term as used in Chapter X.

We advanced this contention before the Circuit Court of Appeals, and it is open here.

Ryerson v. United States, 312 U. S. 405, 85 L. ed. 917, 61 S. Ct. 656 (1941).

Section 77B and Chapter X were and are but an extension and codification of the rules of law and practice which had been developed in the former federal equity receivership proceedings.

Finletter, Law of Bankruptcy Reorganization (1939 ed.), pp. 1-35, particularly pp. 18-19.

This proposition is explained in the fullest of detail in Securities and Exchange Commission v. United States R. & Imp. Co., 310 U. S. 434, 84 L. ed. 1293, 60 S. Ct. 1044 (1940). The question there was whether, even though it be conceded that jurisdiction to entertain the debtor's petition existed under Chapter XI of the Bankruptcy Act, the District Court should have proceeded under Chapter X on the ground that such procedure was better adapted to the circumstances of the case. It was held that even though

Chapter XI did not contain in words provisions similar to Section 146 of Chapter X, the District Court should in the exercise of sound discretion have dismissed the Chapter XI petition and remitted respondent, if it was so advised, to the initiation of a proceeding under Chapter X. During the discussion it was said:

> "A bankruptcy court is a court of equity, § 2, 11 USCA § 11, and is guided by equitable doctrines and principles except in so far as they are inconsistent with the Act. * * *" (310 U. S. 455)

We direct particular attention to the citation and discussion of the case of Pennsylvania v. Williams, 294 U. S. 176, 79 L. ed. 841, 55 S. Ct. 380 (1935), in the United States R. & Imp. Co. case. In citing that case it was said:

> "* * * A court of equity may in its discretion in the exercise of the jurisdiction committed to it grant or deny relief upon performance of a condition which will safeguard the public interest. It may in the public interest, even withhold relief altogether, and it would seem that it is bound to stay its hand in the public interest when it reasonably appears that private right will not suffer. * * *" (310 U. S. 455)

There can be no question but that the principles of Pennsylvania v. Williams and related cases are imported into the application of Chapter X.

In Pennsylvania v. Williams, 294 U. S. 176, 79 L. ed. 841, 55 S. Ct. 380 (1935), a federal District Court had appointed an equity receiver of a Pennsylvania building and loan association. Later, the appropriate authorities of Pennsylvania had intervened and moved for dismissal upon the ground that the statutes of Pennsylvania afforded a complete scheme for liquidation of the association. It was held to be error for the District Court to have retained jurisdiction. It was said:

"* * * It is in the public interest that federal courts of equity should exercise their discretionary power with proper regard for the rightful independence of state governments in carrying out their domestic policy. (citing) It has long been accepted practice for the federal courts to relinquish their jurisdiction in favor of the state courts, where its exercise would involve control of or interference with the internal affairs of a domestic corporation of the state. (citing) There are stronger reasons for adopting a like practice where the exercise of jurisdiction involves an unnecessary interference by injunction with the lawful action of state officers. (citing)" (294 U. S. 185)

Penn General Casualty Co. v. Pennsylvania, 294 U. S. 189, 79 L. ed. 850, 55 S. Ct. 386 (1935);

Kelleam v. Maryland Casualty Co., 312 U. S. 377, 85 L. ed. 899, 61 S. Ct. 595 (1941);

Annotation, 96 A. L. R. 1173.

As said in Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U. S. 496, 85 L. ed. 971, 61 S. Ct. 643 (1941):

"* * * Few public interests have a higher claim upon the discretion of a federal chancellor than the avoidance of needless friction with state policies, whether the policy relates to the enforcement of the criminal law, Fenner v. Boykin, 271 U. S. 240, 70 L. ed. 927, 46 S. Ct. 492; Spielman Motor Sales Co. v. Dodge, 295 U. S. 89, 79 L. ed. 1322, 55 S. Ct. 678; or the administration of a specialized scheme for liquidating embarrassed business enterprises, Pennsylvania v. Williams, 294 U. S. 176, 79 L. ed. 841, 55 S. Ct. 380, 96 A. L. R. 1166; or the final authority of a state court to interpret doubtful regulatory laws of the state, Gilchrist v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. 279 U. S. 159, 73 L. ed. 652, 49 S. Ct. 282; cf. Hawks v. Hamill, 288 U. S. 52, 61, 77 L. ed. 610, 618, 53 S. Ct. 240. These cases reflect a doctrine of abstention appropriate to our federal system whereby the federal courts, 'exercising a wise discretion,' restrain their authority because of 'scrupulous regard for the rightful independence of the state governments' and for the smooth working of the federal judiciary. See Cavanaugh v. Looney, 248 U. S. 453, 457, 63 L. ed. 354, 358, 39 S. Ct. 142; Di Giovanni v. Camden F. Ins. Asso., 296 U. S. 64, 73, 80 L. ed. 47, 53, 56 S. Ct. 1. This use of equitable powers is a contribution of the courts in furthering the harmonious relation between state and federal authority without the need of rigorous congressional restriction of those powers. * * *" (312 U. S. 500-501)

The statutes of Pennsylvania providing for the liquidation of building and loan associations are substantially identical to the statutes of Wisconsin which cover the proceedings there in this case. An even more striking application of these principles as applied to the facts of this case was made in Brashear v. Intermountain Building & Loan Ass'n, 109 F. (2d) 857 (CCA 9th, 1940), and in Gallegos v. Smith, 111 F. (2d) 805 (CCA 9th, 1940). In these latter cases the corporation, as here, had deposits in various states and the state authorities had proceeded precisely as they have done here and under statutes substantially similar.

To propose in this case that the lawful functions of the state authorities shall be suspended, the contract holders in the several states deprived of all assistance therefrom and to relegate them to pursuance of their own remedies in a far-off federal District Court, is to flout the states and the very laws under which the contract holders assumed their relationship with the debtor, upon which they rely for the fulfillment of its obligations, and to which the debtor owed its life and business.

In their function as liquidators of insolvent financial institutions over which they have control, the Banking Commissioners of Wisconsin "are executive or administrative officers carrying out a legislative policy." Pallange v. Liberty State Bank, 216 Wis. 418, 421, 256 N. W. 708, 710. The states' conception of their position and duty is expressed better than we are able to do in the opinion by Mr. Justice Cardozo in Hopkins Federal Savings and Loan Association v. Cleary, 296 U. S. 315, 80 L. ed. 251, 56 S. Ct. 235 (1935) (cited in Securities and Exchange Commission v. United States R. & Imp. Co.):

> "The standing of Wisconsin to resist a trespass on its powers is confirmed if we view the subject from another angle of approach. In the creation of corporations of this quasi-public order and in keeping them thereafter within the limits of their charters, the state is parens patriae, acting in a spirit of benevolence for the welfare of its citizens. Shareholders and creditors have assumed a relation to the business in the belief that the assets will be protected by all the power of the government against use for other ends than those stated in the charter. Aside from the direct interest of the state in the preservation of agencies established for the common good, there is thus the duty of the parens patriae to keep faith with those who have put their trust in the parental power. * * *" (296 U. S. 340-341)

Investment Associations

216.01 Regulation. No person and no copartnership, association or corporation, whether local or foreign, heretofore organized or which may hereafter be organized, doing business as a so-called investment, loan, benefit, cooperative, home, trust or guarantee company, for the licensing, control and management of which there is no law now in force in this state, and which such person, copartnership, association or corporation, shall solicit payments to be made to himself or itself either in a lump sum, or periodically, or on the instalment plan, issuing therefor so-called bonds, shares, coupons, certificates of membership or other evidences of obligation or agreement, or pretended agreement to return to the holder or owners thereof money or anything of value at some future date, shall solicit or transact any business in this state unless such person, copartnership, association or corporation, shall have first complied with all the provisions prescribed in chapter 215 of the statutes required of foreign building and loan associations authorized to do business in this state.

216.02 Laws applicable. All provisions of said chapter 215 with respect to the supervision, control and conditions upon which foreign building and loan associations are permitted to do business in this state are hereby made applicable to and imposed upon persons, copartnerships, associations or corporations described in the first section of this act, the same as though they were foreign building and loan associations under said act, so far as such supervision, control and conditions can be made applicable to the particular business done by such persons, copartnerships, associations or corporations.

216.03 Penalty. Any person, copartnership, association or corporation who or which shall act as principal or agent in doing such business or in soliciting business for, or membership of participation in, any such copartnership, association or corporation, or solicit business for such person or persons doing business as such companies, not authorized to do business in this state, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail of not less than three months, nor more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

(Secs. 216.04 to end of Chapter 216 omitted.)

Chapter 215

Building and Loan Associations

215.01 Local and foreign; organization. (1) A corporation for the purpose of raising money to be loaned among its members shall be known as a building and loan association; if organized under the laws of this state, as a local association, and if under the laws of any other state or territory, as a foreign association. The words "building and loan association" shall form part of the name of every such local association hereafter organized; and no corporation not organized under these statutes shall be entitled to use a name embodying such words, except that corporations now existing may continue their present names. The name adopted by any association hereafter incorporated shall not be the same assumed by any other association, nor so similar as to be liable to mislead.

215.38 Deposit. No foreign building and loan association and no foreign association or corporation representing itself to be a building and loan association or doing business on the building-society plan, and no association or corporation organized under the laws of any other state or territory and doing business in the manner provided for mutual loan and building associations by this chapter shall issue its shares, receive moneys or transact any business in this state unless such association shall have and keep on deposit with the state treasurer, in trust for the benefit and security of all its members in this state, five hundred thousand dollars to be held in trust as aforesaid until all shares of such association held by residents of this state shall have been fully redeemed and paid off and until its contracts and obligations to persons and members residing in this state shall have been fully performed and discharged; the securities comprising such deposit shall first be approved by the banking commission under the same rules and regulations governing the approval of securities of trust company banks; and upon such deposit being made the state treasurer shall issue a certificate therefor, and thereupon the banking commission may issue its certificate of authority to said association to transact business in this state.

215.39 Same. The deposit to be made with the state treasurer by any foreign association may consist of bonds or treasury notes of the United States, or bonds of this state or any city, town or county of this state, having authority to issue the same. All interest which may accrue on securities held by the state treasurer may be collected, and retained by the association depositing such securities so long as such association remains solvent and performs all contracts with its members. Any securities on deposit as provided herein, if approved by the banking commission, may from time to time be withdrawn if others of equal value and of the character named in this section are substituted therefor. If any such securities shall depreciate in value new ones must be added, so that the deposit may at all times be kept good and of the value of five hundred thousand dollars, and it shall be the duty of the banking commission to revoke the certificate of authority of any such association whenever there exists an impairment of such deposit for a period of more than thirty days after due notice to the association given by such commission.

215.395 Increase of deposit. Whenever the commission shall find that the liability of any foreign building and loan association or any foreign investment association on shares or contracts then outstanding or contracted for by members or persons residing in this state, exceeds ninety per cent of the amount of the deposit required by section 215.38 and section 215.39, or exceeds ninety per cent of the amount of the deposit required by such sections and by any order issued under the authority of this section, exclusive in each case, however, of any such liability under any agreement existing, created, regulated or required by the industrial commission under chapter 108 or by any other department, commission or division of a state government under any other provision of law, the commission shall issue an order to such association or corporation requiring such association or corporation to deposit within thirty days with the state treasurer, an additional amount in cash or securities of the class mentioned in section 215.39, or such other securities as the commission shall require and approve. If such order is not complied with within thirty days, the commission shall revoke the certificate of authority issued to such association or corporation.

215.41 Conditions precedent. Every foreign building and loan association, before commencing to do business in this state, shall:

(1) File with the banking commission a duly authenticated copy of its charter or articles of incorporation and by-laws, of its certificates of shares and of all printed matter issued by it.

(2) File with the banking commission a certificate of the state officer having charge and supervision of such associations in the state in which incorporated, certifying that such association is legally incorporated and authorized to transact business, and that similar associations incorporated under the laws of this state are permitted and licensed to transact business in such state.

(3) Pay to the banking commission one hundred dollars for filing the papers mentioned in this section. Before granting a license to any such association organized or incorporated under the laws of any other state or foreign government it shall require that every such association shall file in writing an appointment of the banking commission or its successor in office as the attorney upon whom any summons, notice or process of any court of this state may be served and stipulate that service of any such summons, notice or process upon such attorney, in any action brought upon any cause of action arising out of any business or transaction in this state, shall be accepted irrevocably as a valid service upon such association, and copies of said appointment, certified by the banking commission, shall be deemed sufficient evidence of its authority to accept service as the attorney on behalf of any such association. Each such association shall agree, in such appointment of attorney, that the license granted by the banking commission shall cease and be revoked in case such association shall remove or make application to remove into any court of the United States any action or proceeding commenced in any court of this state upon a claim or cause of action arising out of any business or transaction done in this state, and it shall be the imperative duty of the banking commission to revoke any and every authority, license or certificate granted to any such association violating the provisions of this section, and no such association shall have its license or certificate of authority renewed for three years after such revocation, and shall agree that in the event of revocation of license such appointment of the banking commission shall continue for the purpose of serving process for beginning actions upon any certificate of stock or liability incurred or contracted in this state while it transacted business therein, so long as any liability shall exist. When legal process against any such association is served upon the banking commission, it shall immediately notify the association of such service by letter and inclose a copy of the process served on it to said association or to any person designated by the officers thereof in writing. The plaintiff, for each process so served, shall pay to the banking commission, or, at the time of such service, a fee of two dollars, which shall be recovered by the plaintiff as a part of the taxable costs if it prevail in the suit. The banking commission shall keep a record of all process served on it, which record shall show the day and hour when such service was so made, and all the fees received by it on account of the service of such process shall be paid into the state treasury.

215.45 Agents; fee. No person shall act as the agent or representative of any foreign building and loan association until after he shall, at the request of such association, have procured from the banking commission a license reciting the fact that such association is authorized and licensed to transact business in this state and has complied with all lawful requirements. The fee for such license shall be twenty-five dollars, and the license shall continue in force, unless sooner revoked by the commission, during and until the close of the fiscal year of the association.

215.46 . Withdrawing securities. Any foreign building and loan association, having made the deposit of securities required by this chapter, and desiring to withdraw the same or any of them without depositing securities of like character and amount, or desiring to discontinue its business or withdraw from the state, may do so by complying with the following provisions: File with the banking commission a statement reciting the reasons for desiring to withdraw such securities and the amount to be withdrawn; and the commission shall thereupon examine such association and determine the amount of its liabilities on account of all agreements or contracts outstanding with residents of this state, and if convinced that the interests of such residents will not be injured or jeopardized by such withdrawal shall cause to be published in three newspapers in this state for three weeks, at the expense of the association, notice of such request for the withdrawal of such securities, and if no written objection is filed by any resident of this state holding any share, certificate, bond or other evidence of indebtedness of or against such association within one week after the last date of the publication of such request the banking commission shall issue a certificate certifying to the state treasurer the amount of liabilities, if any, existing in this state and the amount of securities such association shall be permitted to withdraw, and upon filing a receipt for such amount the association shall be permitted to withdraw the same; provided, that there shall remain at all times a sufficient deposit to protect residents of this state holding shares, certificates, bonds or other evidences of indebtedness of or against such association and that such deposit shall decrease only as the liabilities of such association decrease on account of such residents.

215.33 Possession by banking commission. (1) CONDITIONS FOR TAKING POSSESSION. The banking commission may forthwith take possession and control of the business and property of any association to which this chapter is applicable whenever it shall find that such association:

(a) Is conducting its business contrary to law, or,

(b) Has violated its charter, or any law, or

(c) Is conducting its business in an unauthorized or unsafe manner, or

(d) Is in an unsound or unsafe condition to transact its business, or

(e) Has an impairment of its capital, or

(f) Cannot with safety and expediency continue business, or

(g) Has suspended payment of its obligations, or

(h) Has neglected or refused to comply with the terms of a duly issued order of the commission, or

(i) Has refused to submit its books, papers, records, or affairs for inspection to any examiner, or

(j) Has refused to be examined upon oath regarding its affairs.

(2) PROCEDURE ON TAKING POSSESSION. Upon taking possession of the business and property of any such association the banking commission shall forthwith:

(a) Serve a notice in writing upon the president and secretary of said association, setting forth therein that it has taken possession and control of the business and property of said association. Said notice shall be executed in duplicate, and immediately after the same has been served, one of the said notices shall be filed with the clerk of the circuit court of the county where said association is located, together with proof of service.

(b) Give notice to all individuals, partnerships, corporations and associations known to the banking commission to be holding or in possession of any assets of such association.

(c) The banking commission may appoint one or more special deputy commissioners as agent or agents to assist in the duty of liquidation and distribution of the assets of one or more building and loan associations of whose business and property the banking commission shall have taken possession pursuant to the provisions of this chapter. A certificate of such appointment shall be filed in the office of the banking commission and a certified copy in the office of the clerk of the circuit court for the county in which such building and loan association is located. The banking commission may employ such counsel and procure such expert assistance and advice as may be necessary in the liquidation and distribution of the assets of such building and loan associations, and may retain such of the officers or employes of such building and loan associations as they may deem necessary. The special deputy commissioner and assistants shall furnish such security for the faithful discharge of their duties as the banking commission deems proper. Such special deputy commissioner may execute, acknowledge and deliver any and all deeds, assignments, releases or other instruments necessary and proper to effect any sale and transfer or incumberance of real estate or personal property and may borrow money for use in the liquidation after the same has been approved by the banking commission, and an order obtained from the circuit court of the county in which said association is located, as hereinafter provided.

(d) Upon taking possession of the property and business of such building and loan association, the special deputy commissioner of banking is authorized to collect all moneys due to such building and loan association, and do such other acts as are necessary to conserve its assets and business, and shall proceed to liquidate the affairs thereof as hereinafter provided. He shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and upon a petition approved by the banking commission and upon order of the circuit court of the county in which such association is located, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, or do any act or execute any other necessary instruments and upon like petition and order may sell all the real and personal property of such building and loan association on such terms as the court shall approve. Such special deputy commissioner may, if necessary, enforce individual liability of the stockholders to pay the debts of such corporation.

(e) The banking commission may, in the event of its taking possession of any building and loan association, the shares or share accounts of which are to any extent insured by the federal savings and loan insurance corporation, tender to said corporation the appointment as statutory liquidator of such association. If it does not make such tender it shall tender to said federal savings and loan insurance corporation the appointment as statutory coliquidator of such association to act jointly with the banking commission, but such coliquidatorship shall not extend over a period of more than one year from the date of such tender, at the expiration of which time the banking commission shall become the sole liquidator except as herein otherwise provided. The commission shall tender to said corporation the appointment as sole statutory liquidator of such association whenever said corporation shall have become subrogated to the rights of at least 90 per cent of the outstanding liability of such association on shares and share accounts; and if in addition said corporation shall have deposited with the clerk of the circuit court for the county in which such association is located shares or share accounts in a local insured association not in default at least equal in amount to the shares and share accounts as to which the corporation has not become subrogated, or if the corporation shall become subrogated as to all the shares and share accounts in such association, it may then exercise all the powers and privileges herein conferred upon it without court order or approval. It shall be the duty of such clerk to accept such deposit for the benefit of the persons entitled to such shares or share accounts.

(f) If said corporation accepts such appointment as sole liquidator it shall have and possess all the powers and privileges given by the laws of this state to the banking commission as statutory liquidator of a possessed building and loan association, as provided in section 215.33 or otherwise, including section 215.116 and be subject to all the duties of the banking commission as such statutory sole liquidator, except in so far as such powers, privileges or duties are in conflict with the provision of any applicable federal laws, and except as herein otherwise provided, unless and until such association shall resume business, pursuant to subsection (11) or subsection (12) of section 215.33. If said corporation accepts such appointment as coliquidator it shall have and possess such powers and privileges equally and jointly with the banking commission and shall be subject to such duties equally and jointly with said commission.

(g) In the event said federal savings and loan insurance corporation shall accept the appointment as such coliquidator or liquidator, it shall file such acceptance with the banking commission and the clerk of the circuit court of the county in which the association is located and it is authorized and empowered to be and act, without bond, as such coliquidator or liquidator. Upon the filing by said federal savings and loan insurance corporation of its acceptance of the appointment as such sole liquidator, the possession of and title to all the assets, business and property of such association of every kind and nature shall pass to and vest in said corporation without the execution of any instruments of conveyance, assignments, transfer or indorsement. Upon the filing by said corporation of its acceptance of the appointment as coliquidator such possession and title shall pass to and be vested in the banking commission and said corporation jointly. In the event said corporation shall not qualify as sole liquidator at or before the time herein provided for the expiration of such coliquidatorship, said corporation shall be wholly divested of and from such joint title and possession and the sole title and possession shall thereupon vest immediately in the banking commission. The vesting of title and the possession of the property and assets of such association, as provided by subsection (8) of section 215.33, shall not render such property or assets subject to any claims or demands against the federal savings and loan insurance corporation, except such as may be incurred by such corporation with respect to such association and its property or assets. Whether or not it shall serve as aforesaid, the federal savings and loan insurance corporation may make loans on the security of or may purchase, with the approval of the court, except as herein otherwise provided, at public or private sale, all or any part of the assets of any association, the shares, share accounts or accounts of which are to any extent insured by it, but in the event of such sale and purchase, said corporation shall bid for and pay a fair and reasonable price.

(h) Whether or not said federal savings and loan insurance corporation shall serve as liquidator of any such association, whenever it shall pay or make available for payment the shares, share accounts or accounts of any such association in liquidation which are insured by it, it shall be subrogated upon the surrender and transfer to it of any such shares, share accounts or accounts, with respect to such shares, share accounts or accounts, but such surrender and transfer shall not affect any right which the transferor may have in any portion of such shares, share accounts or accounts which are not paid or made available for payment, or any right to participate in the distribution of the net proceeds remaining from the disposition of the assets of such association; provided, that the rights of the investors and creditors of such association shall be determined in accordance with the applicable provisions of the laws of this state.

(3) NOTICE, ALLOWANCE AND PAYMENT OF CLAIMS. The special deputy commissioner of banking shall cause notice to be given by advertisement in such newspapers as he may direct, weekly, for 3 consecutive weeks, calling on all persons who may have claims against such building and loan association, to present the same to the special deputy commissioner of banking, and make legal proof thereof at a place and within a time, not earlier than the last day of publication, to be therein specified. He shall mail a similar notice to all persons at their last known address, whose names appear as creditors upon the books of the building and loan association. Proof of service of such notice shall be filed with the clerk of said court. The special deputy commissioner may reject any claim. Any party interested may also file written objections to any claim with the special deputy commissioner of banking and after notice by registered mail of such rejection, said claimant shall be barred unless he commences an action thereon within 3 months. Claims presented after the expiration of the time fixed in the notice to creditors shall be entitled to share in the distribution only to the extent of the assets then in the hands of the special deputy commissioner of banking equitably applicable thereto.

(4) INVENTORY OF ASSETS AND STATEMENT OF LIABILITIES. Upon taking possession of the property and assets of such building and loan association, the special deputy commissioner of banking shall make an inventory of the assets of such building and loan association, in duplicate, one to be filed in the office of the banking commission, and one in the office of the clerk of circuit court for the county in which such building and loan association is located. Upon the expiration of the time fixed for the presentation of claims, the special deputy commissioner of banking shall make in duplicate a full and complete list of the claims presented, including and specifying such claims as have been rejected by him, one to be filed in the office of the banking commission, and one in the office of the clerk of circuit court for the county in which such building and loan association is located. Such inventory and list of claims shall be open at all reasonable times to inspection.

(5) ADJUSTMENT OF LOANS AND WITHDRAWAL VALUE OF SHARES. The value of shares pledged upon a loan to such association shall be applied and credited to such loan and the borrower shall be liable only for the balance. The rate of interest charged upon such balance shall be the legal rate. The value shall be determined in such manner as the banking commission prescribes, and shall be made pursuant to subsections (1) and (3) of section 215.332, or in such other manner as the banking commission may prescribe. Upon the approval of such value by the banking commission and the circuit court of the county in which such building and loan association is located, the book value of each member shall be reduced proportionately. At least 5 days' written notice of such determination of value shall be given to all shareholders of the time and place such value shall be submitted to the circuit court for approval. Should any stockholder or creditor of such association feel aggrieved by any such determination of value, he may at any time within 15 days after the mailing of a notice by the banking commission, addressed to the last known address of such party, giving notice of such determination and value of such shares, appeal to the supreme court. After the creditors of such association shall have been paid, the association, and the members thereof, may avail themselves of the provisions of section 215.116.

(6) COMPENSATION AND EXPENSES IN CONNECTION WITH LIQUIDATION. The compensation of the special deputy commissioners, counsel and other employes and assistants, and all expenses of supervision and liquidation shall be fixed by the banking commission, subject to the approval of the circuit court for the county in which such building and loan association is located, and shall upon the certificate of the banking commission be paid out of the funds of such building and loan association. Expenses of supervision and liquidation shall include the cost of the service rendered by the building and loan division of the banking department to the building and loan association being liquidated and shall be determined from time to time by the banking commission and shall be paid to the banking department from the assets of the building and loan association as other expenses of liquidation are paid. The moneys collected by the special deputy commissioner of banking shall be from time to time deposited in one or more state banks, and, in case of the suspension or insolvency of the depository, such deposits shall be preferred before all other deposits.

(7) DIVIDENDS. At any time after the expiration of the date fixed for the presentation of claims, the special deputy commissioner of banking in charge of the liquidation of such building and loan association may, upon a petition approved by the banking commission and an order of the circuit court of the county in which such building and loan association is located, out of the funds remaining, after the payment of expenses and debts, declare one or more dividends, and may declare a final dividend, such dividend to be paid to such persons, and in such amounts as may be directed by the circuit court.

(8) TITLE PASSES TO BANKING COMMISSION. Immediately upon filing the notice as provided for in subsection (2) of section 215.33, the possession of all assets and property of such building and loan association of every kind and nature, wheresoever situated, shall be deemed to be transferred from such association to, and assumed by the banking commission; and filing of the notice mentioned herein, shall of itself, and without the execution or delivery of any instruments of conveyance, assignment, transfer or indorsement, vest the title to all such assets and property in the banking commission. Such filing shall also operate as a bar to any attachment, garnishment, execution or other legal proceedings against such building and loan association, or its assets and property, or its liabilities.

(9) EFFECT OF POSSESSION. No building and loan association shall have a lien, or charge for any payment, advance or clearance made, or liability thereafter incurred, against any of the assets of the building and loan association of whose property and business the banking commission shall have taken possession.

(10) APPEAL. Whenever any such building and loan association whose property and business the banking commission has taken possession of, as aforesaid, deems itself aggrieved thereby, it may, at any time within ten days after such taking, apply to the circuit court of Dane county to enjoin further proceedings; and said court after citing the banking commission to show cause why further proceedings should not be enjoined and hearing all allegations and proofs of the parties and determining the facts, may, upon the merits dismiss such application or enjoin the banking commission from further proceedings, and direct it to surrender such business and property to such building and loan association.

(11) REINSTATEMENT. Whenever the banking commission shall have taken over the possession and control of the business and property of any building and loan association, the same may resume business when and if:

(a) The owners of at least two-thirds of such association's dollar value of outstanding shares, execute a petition to such effect, the form of which shall be prescribed by the banking commission, and

(b) There is submitted to the banking commission by such shareholders or a committee duly selected by them, a plan for the reorganization and reinstatement of such association, and

(c) The banking commission recommends that control of the business and property of such association be returned to the shareholders, and

(d) The court in which such liquidation is pending, upon application of the banking commission, makes an order approving the banking commission recommendations, which order shall contain a finding that such association will be in a safe and sound condition when control is resumed by the shareholders.

(12) REINSTATEMENT UPON RESTRICTED BASIS. Such building and loan association may also resume business upon a restricted basis, and upon such limitations and conditions as may be prescribed by the banking commission when approved by the circuit court in and for the county in which such building and loan association is located, upon application of the banking commission. Such restrictions and conditions may include, among others, a prohibition against the selling of new shares, reasonable restrictions upon withdrawals and the payment of other liabilities. Such association shall thereupon be relieved from the control and supervision of the banking commission as provided in this section, but nothing herein shall, in any manner, prohibit the banking commission from again proceeding against such association as provided herein.

(13) LIQUIDATING DIVIDENDS AND UNCLAIMED FUNDS. (a) Unclaimed liquidating dividends and unclaimed funds remaining unpaid in the hands of the special deputy commissioner of banking for six months after the order for final distribution shall be by him deposited in one or more state banks, to the credit of the banking commission in its name, in trust for the several shareholders and creditors. The banking commission shall include in its annual report to the governor the names of building and loan associations so taken possession of and liquidated, and the sums of unclaimed and unpaid liquidating dividends and unclaimed funds with respect to each of them respectively, including a statement of interest earned upon such funds.

(b) The banking commission may pay over the moneys so held by it to the persons respectively entitled thereto, upon being furnished satisfactory evidence of their right to the same. In case of doubt or conflicting claims, it may require an order of the circuit court authorizing and directing the payment thereof. It may apply the interest earned by the moneys so held by it towards defraying the expenses in the payment and distribution of such unclaimed liquidating dividends and funds to the stockholders and creditors entitled to receive the same.

(Other portions of Chapter 215 omitted as not pertinent.)

Chapter 189

Securities Law

189.12 Limitation of sales. No person shall sell or offer for sale in this state any security unless registered under section 189.13; • • •

189.13 Registration of securities. (1) Securities shall be registered under this chapter upon application and in the manner provided in this section.

(2) The application for registration shall be signed by the issuer or a licensed dealer, shall be verified and shall be filed with the department. It shall contain such information and representations as the department may require as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

(3) The department shall examine such application and the other papers and documents filed therewith, and may make or have made a detailed inspection, appraisal, audit, or other investigation of the property and affairs of the issuer. The department, upon payment of the expense reasonably attributable to its investigation, shall by order register the securities covered by such application if the following shall be made to appear to the department:

(a) The proposed plan of business of the issuer is not unlawful, dishonest, fraudulent, or otherwise contrary to public policy.

(b) The plan of financing is not or does not tend to be unfair, inequitable or fraudulent, or against public interest or the interest of investors.

(c) The articles of incorporation or association, declaration of trust, charter, constitution, by-laws, lease, contract, or any instrument or indenture under which the securities are issued is not contrary to law or unfair, inequitable, or fraudulent.

(d) The class of securities for which registration is sought bears a reasonable proportion to other classes of securities and to the fair value of the property and business, due consideration being given to the nature of the business, its earnings, its credit and propects, the possibility that the fair value of the property and business may change from time to time, the effect which the issue of such securities may have on the management and operation of the business by reason of the relative amount of financial interest which the various classes of security holders will have in the business, and to other relevant matters.

(e) The commissions, fees and expenses to be incurred in connection with such issue or the sale thereof or the gross or net profit of any party or parties in connection therewith, is not unreasonable.

(f) The advertising matter to be used in the sale of the securities is not false, unfair, inequitable, fraudulent or misleading and gives fair and reasonably adequate information with reference to the securities and the issuer.

(g) It does not appear that any relationship exists between the issuer and the trustee in any instrument under which the securities have been or are to be issued, by virtue of which the interests of the trustee might be in conflict with the interests of purchasers.

(h) The methods to be used in the sale of the securities are not such as to be misleading, unfair, inequitable or fraudulent as to the purchasers, or against public interest or the interest of investors. Unless the foregoing shall be made to appear to the department, the department shall issue its findings and order denying registration.

ORDER OF CIRCUIT COURT FOR DANE COUNTY, WISCONSIN, APRIL 14, 1941

(From Ex. 120)

(Caption Omitted)

On reading and filing the petition of the Banking Commission of Wisconsin dated April 14, 1941, and said Commission appearing by Frank H. Bixby, Commissioner of Banking; John E. Martin, Attorney General; and Rickard H. Lauritzen, Assistant Attorney General; and said Fidelity Assurance Association appearing by its attorneys Rieser and Mathys by R. M. Rieser, and the Court being advised as to the nature and purpose of the petition, and being satisfied that the petition sets forth facts sufficient to support an order to be entered herein, and that facts exist establishing the jurisdiction of the Court and that it is necessary and desirable that an order be promptly entered herein;

NOW, THEREFORE, IT IS ORDERED:

1. That possession and control of all of the property, business and assets of Fidelity Assurance Association, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of West Virginia, located in the State of Wisconsin of whatever nature and wherever located in the State of Wisconsin be and the same hereby is vested in the Banking Commission of Wisconsin; and said Commission is hereby ordered to forthwith take possession of and hold said property, said property to be administered by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin under the supervision and control of the Circuit Court for Dane County, Wisconsin, for the benefit and security of contract, bond or certificate holders, residents of this State, and other creditors of said Association located in Wisconsin.

2. That title to the securities heretofore deposited by said Fidelity Assurance Association with the State Treasurer of Wisconsin as set forth in said petition, being securities having a market value as of February 28, 1941, as set forth in said petition, of $2,606,883.16, and interest coupons appertaining thereto in the amount of $28,394.53, likewise on deposit with the State Treasurer of Wisconsin, in trust for the benefit and security of Wisconsin contract, bond or certificate holders and creditors, be likewise vested in the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, custody and possession of such deposited assets, however, to remain in the State Treasurer of Wisconsin pending the further order of the Court.

3. That the prosecution or the taking of any proceedings in and relative to the suit entitled "H. L. Currie vs. Fidelity Assurance Association" now pending in the Circuit Court for La Crosse County, Wisconsin, and the taking of any proceedings relative to any other suits which may have been commenced against said Association in the Courts of Wisconsin, and the commencement and prosecution of any and all actions against said Association in the Courts of the State of Wisconsin, is hereby enjoined.

4. That the expenses of the Banking Commission of Wisconsin in administering the business and assets of said Association located in Wisconsin be paid out of the assets of said Association located in the State of Wisconsin.

5. That the Banking Commission of Wisconsin be and the same hereby is authorized and empowered to forthwith ascertain the names and identity of all contract, bond or certificate holders and creditors of said Association located in Wisconsin, the nature of the contracts, bonds or certificates and claims held by each of such Wisconsin bond, contract or certificate holders and creditors and the respective amounts of such contracts, bonds or certificates and claims.

6. That the Banking Commission of Wisconsin be and the same is hereby empowered to seek from time to time the further advice of the Court and further orders relative to the administration of the assets of said Association.

7. That a copy of this order be forthwith served upon the said Fidelity Assurance Association, upon the State Treasurer of Wisconsin, upon the plaintiff's attorney in the aforementioned suit, entitled "H. L. Currie vs. Fidelity Assurance Association," now pending in the Circuit Court for La Crosse County, Wisconsin, upon any and all banks, depositaries or other persons, firms or corporations which the said Banking Commission of Wisconsin may find to have in possession any assets of said Association, and upon any and all persons whom said Banking Commission of Wisconsin may find to have commenced or to be about to commence any suit of any kind or nature against said Fidelity Assurance Association in the Courts of the State of Wisconsin.

8. Whenever a certified copy of this order shall be presented by the Banking Commission to any bank or other depositary or debtor of said Association in the State of Wisconsin it shall constitute full authority for the payment or surrender to the Commission of any funds, property or assets of said Association demanded by said Commission.

9. It is further ordered that delivery of a copy of this order either before or after the commencement of any suit or other action herein enjoined shall constitute due notice to such person of the injunctions, prohibitions, restraints and orders herein contained and hereby ordered, as well as of all other terms and provisions hereof affecting any such person, and shall thereafter be binding upon such person, his agents, attorneys and representatives.

Dated April 14, 1941.

AFFIDAVIT OF HOWARD L. SMITH, SPECIAL DEPUTY COMMISSIONER OF BANKING

(Exhibit 114)

(Caption Omitted)

Howard L. Smith being first duly sworn on oath deposes and says:

1. That he is an adult resident of the City of Madison, Dane County, Wisconsin, and is by profession a Certified Public Accountant, and that on the 25th day of April, 1941, he was duly appointed by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, Special Deputy Commissioner of Banking to assist in the liquidation of the Wisconsin assets of the Fidelity Assurance Association, and that this appointment was confirmed by the Circuit Court for Dane County having jurisdiction of said proceedings.

2. That as such Special Deputy Commissioner of Banking, he has been since April 25th, 1941, in charge of the liquidation of the Wisconsin assets of Fidelity Assurance Association and has official custody and supervision over all of the records and files of said liquidation and has charge of all matters pertaining thereto.

3. That he prepared claim forms for the filing of claims of Wisconsin contract holders of Fidelity Assurance Association, and that he is familiar with the claims filed by said contract holders and with all of the correspondence had with such contract holders relating thereto.

4. That on said claim forms there was provided a space for "comments" to be made by said contract holders if they so desired, and that upon said claim forms which had been filed in the approximate number of fifty-four hundred, many of said contract holders have voluntarily expressed their sentiments relative to possible reorganization of Fidelity Assurance Association and that of such contract holders so expressing themselves, a total of one hundred thirty-four have indicated clearly that they are in no way interested in a possible reorganization of Fidelity Assurance Association and are desirous of having paid to them the present value of their contracts.

5. That a number of said contract holders in the space provided for said "comments" have indicated that they purchased said contracts upon the express representations made by the salesman of Fidelity Assurance Association that the liability of the Association to them upon such contracts was fully protected by a deposit made with the State Treasurer of Wisconsin by said Association. A total of seventy-four of such contract holders have voluntarily expressed themselves in this manner.

6. That although in published notices given by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin it was indicated that a reorganization of said company might at some future time be effected, the overwhelming majority of those expressing themselves in this regard in the space provided for "comments" on the claim forms filed by them have as above stated, indicated that they desire to have the present value of their contracts paid to them.

7. That a number of Wisconsin contract holders have corresponded by letter with the Banking Commission of Wisconsin and have expressed themselves with respect to possible reorganization and also as to the representations upon which they purchased such contracts. In sixty-two letters containing expressions in this regard, contract holders have clearly indicated that they do not favor a reorganization of the company and desire to have paid to them the present value of their contracts, and in twenty-six of said letters which contained expressions in this regard, the contract holders stated that they had been assured by representatives of Fidelity Assurance Association that the liability of the company to them was fully protected by a deposit made with the State Treasurer of Wisconsin.

8. That of all the written communications received by way of "comments" attached to claim forms or by letters from contract holders aggregating over forty-three hundred in all, only eleven contract holders expressed themselves as in any way in favor of a possible reorganization of Fidelity Assurance Association, copies of these eleven communications being attached hereto and made a part hereof.

9. That affiant as such Special Deputy Commissioner of Banking has talked personally with a large number of contract holders aggregating to the best of his knowledge and belief between two and three hundred in number and that practically all of said contract holders expressed themselves as not being interested in possible reorganization plans affecting Fidelity Assurance Association and they desired to have the present value of their contracts paid to them by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin and that a great number of them further indicated that they had purchased their contracts on the express representation that the liability of the company to them was fully protected by a deposit made with the State Treasurer of Wisconsin by the company and that they were of the firm belief that the amount of this liability should not be reduced and that it should be paid to them.

10. That from his knowledge of the affairs of Fidelity Assurance Association in Wisconsin as such Special Deputy Commissioner of Banking, affiant is firmly convinced that few, if any, Wisconsin contract holders would consent to a plan of reorganization which would involve a reduction in the present value of their contracts. That from his knowledge of said affairs, affiant is further convinced that said Wisconsin contract holders having purchased their contracts on the express representation that in the event of a default they would be protected by the Wisconsin deposits have become greatly aroused and incensed by reason of the fact that Fidelity Assurance Association has sought to prevent the prompt payment of their claims out of the Wisconsin deposits and have sought to have said deposits removed from the State of Wisconsin and subjected to the jurisdiction of a Federal Court in the Southern District of West Virginia. That by reason of the present attitude of Wisconsin contract holders affiant is of the belief that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to secure the consent of any appreciable number of said contract holders to any proposed plan of reorganization involving any modification either of the present value or the matured value of their contracts.

COMMENTS MADE TO BANKING COMMISSION OF WISCONSIN BY WISCONSIN CONTRACT HOLDERS IN CONNECTION WITH CLAIMS FILED, REFERRED TO IN PARAGRAPH 8 OF FOREGOING AFFIDAVIT AND ATTACHED THERETO

(Claim Forms to which Comments attached Omitted)

"Should you have any reorganization plan we would consider that rather than accept a cash settlement."—Obert Johnson, Osseo, Wis. (Claim No. 2253)

"As a matter of fact I am not anxious to cash in these contracts if the banking commission in West Virginia gets the company on its feet again. I received a letter in May from the commission asking if they should draw on my account as the Fidelity company had been doing and I gave them permission to do so. This money of course is in a separate fund but I presume the insurance these contracts represent is still in force. * * * The thought has just occurred to me that we in this state should at least receive the amount of money we actually paid in; instead of the cash surrender value as I have figured it; inasmuch as the banking department had at least 100% coverage on the money we sent out east."—W. B. Southard (Claim No. 2550)

"If Company is Reorganized intehd to leave amount in for ten years if possible and collect full amount at that time."—Ernest N. Peterson, Wausau, Wis. (Claim No. 1508)

"Don't intend to cash contract, as surrender value so small (for only a year). Hope this amount could be used for Insurance policy after firm is reorganized or leave amount in for 10 yrs. (14 months paid in $105.00)"—Hilda Zeier Peterson, Wausau, Wis. (Claim No. 1510)

"I have paid in $15.00 per mo. for eleven months—the cash surrender value is much less I know—I took a loss of $200.00 on a cash surrender of another contract—I think I should have the $165 in this case. P.S. A reliable insurance policy (reliable company) will be acceptable—but not a loss of money paid in."—Frances K. Tipple, Taycheedah, Wis. (Claim No. 2245)

"If the Fidelity Association should prove solvent and reorganize then, I would want to resume my contract and not have to suffer the loss that this surrender makes. Will the warrant be honored under these circumstances? Before cashing takes place will a report be made to us on the status of Fidelity at the time? I do not want to take the cash surrender value if I can avoid that loss."—Ralph A. Borah. (Claim No. 2364)

"If a reorganization of the company is effected I would like to be notified of the details before final settlement of the cash surrender value is made."—Richard J. Feil, Madison, Wis. (Claim No. 2371)

"I don't know just what the cash surrender value of this contract would be but as of April 10 I have paid in 5 years and 2 months of $930 which does not take into account any interest they may have credited me with. If I understand their cash commuted value schedule this contract would rate the 6th coupon or $749 plus 2 extra months, which being 1/6 of the year would amount to $31. On these two contracts therefor I will be forced to take a loss of $300; less any interest I may have earned so as my inclosed letter states; I am not anxious to cash them in if the state of West Virginia can work out a plan that is feasible."—Willard B. Southard, Rice Lake, Wis. (Claim No. 2590)

"If reorganization takes place satisfied to continue with Company."—Joseph A. Rauch, Francis Creek, Wis. (Claim No. 2758)

"I should prefer to have my contract run to maturity rather than take the cash surrender value in the near future. Realizing the matter may be complicated, however,

I expect to accept the settlement agreed upon by others of this state. Nevertheless, I am continuing to make my payments to the trustees of the Company with the hope that a reorganization plan enabling payment of face of contracts may be achieved."—John K. Lanckton, Menomonie, Wis. (Claim No. 2764)

"If insurance setup to be proposed by Fidelity Assurance Association is satisfactory, I wish to take insurance instead of cash and surrender."—H. V. Foshion, Algoma, Wis. (Claim No. 4539)

AFFIDAVIT OF EMMETT G. HAMPTON

(Exhibit 114)

(Caption Omitted)

Emmett G. Hampton being first duly sworn on oath deposes and says:

1. That he is an adult resident of the City of Madison, Dane County, Wisconsin, and that he is regularly employed by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin as Supervisor of Credit Unions, and that at the request of the Banking Commission of Wisconsin, he assumed duties as Office Manager in connection with the liquidation of the Wisconsin assets of Fidelity Assurance Association, title to which Wisconsin assets became vested in the Banking Commission of Wisconsin on April 14, 1941, and which liquidation is now in process under the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court for Dane County, Wisconsin.

2. That as such Office Manager he had charge of all of the files and records in said liquidation proceedings affecting Fidelity Assurance Association during the period from May 15, 1941, to August 1, 1941, during which period claims were being filed in said liquidation by Wisconsin contract holders of Fidelity Assurance Association.

3. That while acting as such Office Manager, he conducted correspondence with Wisconsin contract holders relative to claims in said liquidation and discussed with various contract holders, in person or by telephone, questions relating to the liquidation of the Wisconsin assets of Fidelity Assurance Association. Such personal interviews were had with contract holders aggregating to the best of his knowledge and belief between eight hundred and one thousand in number out of the total of approximately fifty-four hundred contract holders who have filed their claims with the Banking Commission of Wisconsin.

4. That a majority of said contract holders with whom he discussed these matters voluntarily expressed their entire satisfaction with the proceedings as conducted by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin and that it was their express desire that these proceedings should be continued and that in the event efforts should be made to have their claims adjusted in a Federal Court in bankruptcy or re-organization proceedings that it was their desire that the Banking Commission of Wisconsin make every effort to resist any such attempt to so adjust their rights and to continue the proceedings under the supervision of the Banking Commission and the Circuit Court for Dane County, Wisconsin; that these contract holders fully understood that the expenses of the liquidation conducted by the Banking Commission of Wisconsin would necessarily be paid out of the assets on deposit in Wisconsin for their benefit but that they nevertheless were of the firm belief that the proceedings in Wisconsin should be continued.

5. That a great majority of said contract holders volunteered the information that they had purchased their contracts upon express assurance received from the salesman of Fidelity Assurance Association that the Association had on deposit with the State Treasurer of Wisconsin a sum equal to 110% of the Cash Value of Wisconsin contracts and that such sum was segregated apart from the other assets of the Association for the express benefit of Wisconsin contract holders; that a number of such contract holders further stated that prior to their purchase of the contracts they had checked the salesman's statements in this regard with the Banking Commission of Wisconsin and had ascertained that such was in fact the case; that a great majority of said contract holders further volunteered the information that they were not interested in any reorganization plan which would affect their rights against Fidelity Assurance Association but were now desirous of realizing the present value of their contracts as soon as possible; that of all of the contract holders with whom he discussed matters affecting their claims against Fidelity Assurance Association, only one suggested that he might be in favor of a reorganization of the company and then only if a reorganization would produce more than the present value of his contract.

6. That from his contact with said Wisconsin contract holders, affiant is convinced that any attempts to secure the continuance of payments by such contract holders to Fidelity Assurance Association upon a possible reorganization of said Association would fail, the overwhelming sentiment of such contract holders being that they desire to sever their relationship with Fidelity Assurance Association.

STATUTES OF IOWA, INSOFAR AS PERTINENT TO THE ISSUES IN THIS CASE, TO WHICH FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION WAS AND IS SUBJECT

Chapter 392

Sale of Stock on Installment Plan

8517 Terms defined. The term "association" when used in this chapter shall mean any person, firm, company, partnership, association, or corporation, other than building and loan associations and insurance companies and associations, which issue stocks on the partial payment or installment plan. The term "issue," shall mean issue, sell, place, engage in or otherwise dispose of or handle. The term "stock" shall mean certificates, memberships, shares, bonds, contracts, debentures, stocks, tontine contracts, or other investment securities or agreements of any kind or character issued upon the partial payment or installment plan.

8518 Certificate—how obtained. No association contemplated by this chapter shall issue any stock until it shall have procured from the commissioner of insurance a certificate of authority authorizing it to engage in such business. To procure such certificate of authority it shall be necessary for such association to file with the commissioner of insurance a statement, under oath, showing the name and location of such association, the name and post-office address of its officers, the date of organization, and if incorporated a copy of its articles of incorporation, also, a copy of its bylaws or rules by which it is to be governed, the form of its certificates, stocks, or contracts, all printed matter issued by it, together with a detailed statement of its financial condition and such other information concerning its affairs or plan of business as the commissioner of insurance may require.

8519 Approval by commissioner. If the commissioner of insurance is satisfied that the business is not in violation of law or of public policy, and is safe, reliable, and entitled to public confidence, and shall approve the form of certificate of stock or contract, he shall issue to such association a certificate of authority authorizing it to transact business within this state until the first day of March next succeeding the date of such authorization.

8520 Annual report. During the month of January of each year, every association transacting the business contemplated by this chapter, shall file with the commissioner of insurance a statement showing its condition on the thirty-first day of December preceding. Said statement shall be in such form as shall be prescribed by the commissioner of insurance. If it appears from such statement that such association is doing a safe business and is solvent, the commissioner of insurance may renew its certificate of authority authorizing it to transact business within the state until the first day of March of the following year. If at any time it shall appear that such association is doing an unsafe business or is insolvent the commissioner of insurance may revoke its certificate of authority authorizing it to transact business within the state until the first day of March of the following year. If at any time it shall appear that such association is doing an unsafe business or is insolvent the commissioner of insurance may revoke its certificate of authority to transact business and having revoked the certificate of authority of an association organized under the laws of this state, he shall report his action to the attorney general who shall at once apply to the district court or a judge thereof for the appointment of a receiver to close up the affairs of such association, and an injunction may issue in the same proceeding enjoining and restraining the association from transacting business in this state.

8521 Bonds or securities deposited. Before any association shall be authorized to transact business contemplated by this chapter, it shall deposit with the commissioner of insurance a bond approved by the commissioner of insurance, guaranteeing the faithful performance of all contracts entered into by such association or securities of the kind designated in subsections 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of section 8737, or such other securities as shall be approved by the commissioner of insurance in the amount of twenty-five thousand dollars, which amount shall remain in possession of the commissioner of insurance until the end of the calendar year in which the association shall first be authorized to transact business. At the end of such calendar year, such association shall deposit with the commissioner of insurance securities of the kind above provided in an amount equal to all its liabilities to persons residing within this state and shall keep such deposit at all times equal to such liability; provided that at no time shall such deposit be reduced below twenty-five thousand dollars except at such time as such association shall be by law closing out its business and its liabilities shall have been reduced below twenty-five thousand dollars.

8522 Unauthorized companies—penalty. Any member or representative of any association who shall attempt to issue or sell any stock as contemplated by this chapter or to transact any business whatsoever in the name of or on behalf of such association, not authorized to do business within this state, or which has failed or refused to comply with the provisions of this chapter, or has violated any of its provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail not to exceed one year, or by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than ten hundred dollars or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

8524 Examination. Every such association doing business within this state, shall be subject to examination in the same manner as is provided for the examination of insurance companies and shall pay the same fees and costs therefor, and shall so far as is consistent with the plan of business, be subject to the same restrictions and regulations. Such examinations shall be full and complete and in making the same the commissioner of insurance or examiner shall have full access to and may demand the production of all books, securities, papers, moneys, etc., of the association under examination, and may administer oaths, summon and compel the attendance and testimony of any persons connected with such association. If upon such examination, it shall appear that such association does not conduct its business in accordance with law, or if it permits forfeiture of payments by persons holding its stock, after three years from the issuance of said stock or provides for the payment of its expenses other than from earnings, or that any profits, advantage, or compensation of any form or description is given to any member or investor over any other member or investor of the same class, or if beneficiaries are selected or determined or advantages given one over another by any form of chance, lottery, or hazard, or if certificates of stock are by their terms or by any other provision to be redeemed in numerical order or by any arbitrary order or precedence, without reference to the amount previously paid thereon by the holder thereof, or that the affairs are in an unsound condition, or if such association refuses such examination to be made, the commissioner of insurance may revoke its certificate of authority to do business in this state, and having revoked the certificate of authority of an association organized under the laws of this state, he shall report the same to the attorney general, who shall proceed as provided in section 8520.

Chapter 393.1

Iowa Securities Act

8581.02 Administration. The administration of the provisions of this chapter shall be vested in the commissioner of insurance of the state of Iowa.

The commissioner of insurance shall appoint a superintendent in charge of the securities department and may appoint one or more assistants. The superintendent appointed under this chapter shall perform such duties as the commissioner of insurance shall generally or specifically direct. In case of vacancy in the office of commissioner of insurance, by reason of absence, physical disability or other cause, to administer properly the provisions of this chapter, the superintendent appointed under this chapter shall act for and in the stead of the commissioner of insurance, and thereupon the superintendent shall have generally, for the time being, all the power and authority of this chapter conferred upon the commissioner of insurance.

8581.06 Registration of securities. No securities except of a class exempt under any of the provisions of section 8581.04 or unless sold in any transaction exempt under any of the provisions of section 8581.05 shall be sold within this state unless such securities shall have been registered by qualification as hereinafter defined. Registration of stock shall be deemed to include the registration of rights to subscribe to such stock if the application under section 8581.07 for registration of such stock includes a statement that such rights are to be issued.

8581.07 Registration by qualification. All securities required by this chapter to be registered before being sold in this state shall be registered only by qualification in the manner provided by this section.

The commissioner of insurance shall receive and act upon applications to have securities registered by qualification, and may prescribe forms on which he may require such applications to be submitted. Applications shall be in writing and shall be duly signed by the applicant and sworn to by any person having knowledge of the facts, and filed in the office of the commissioner of insurance and may be made either by the issuer of the securities for which registration is applied or by any registered dealer desiring to sell the same within this state.

The commissioner of insurance may require the applicant to submit to him the following information respecting the issuer and such other information as he may in his judgment deem necessary to enable him to ascertain whether such securities shall be registered pursuant to the provisions of this section:

* * *

The commissioner of insurance shall have power to place such conditions, limitations and restrictions on any registration as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this chapter and the conditions, limitations and restrictions, if any, shall be entered in the register of securities or an entry shall be made in the register of securities referring to a formal order of the commissioner of insurance on file showing such conditions, limitations and restrictions.

* * *

If upon examination of any application the commissioner of insurance shall find that the sale of security referred to therein would not be fraudulent or would not work or tend to work a fraud upon the purchaser, or that the enterprise or business of the issuer is not based upon unsound business principles, he shall record the registration of such security in the register of securities, and thereupon such security so registered may be sold by the issuer or by any registered dealer, subject, however, to the further order of the commissioner of insurance as hereinafter provided.

So long as any security is sold or offered for sale pursuant to registration by qualification under this section, there shall be filed with the commissioner of insurance, each year, within ninety days after the termination of the fiscal year of the issuer of such security, a statement properly verified, which statement shall set forth the financial condition, the amount of assets and liabilities and such other information concerning the financial affairs or the plan of business of the issuer as the commissioner of insurance may require in order to determine whether the continued sale of such securities would result or tend to result in fraud; provided, however, that any applicant for registration by qualification may file with the commissioner of insurance a verified statement that applicant will make no further original distribution under the registration and one statement of condition as required by this paragraph either concurrently therewith or subsequent thereto and thereafter no statement shall be required under this paragraph.

* * * *

8581.08 May limit price and commission. The commissioner of insurance may also limit the price at which the securities, either of par or no par value, may be sold. In case of a sale by or on behalf of an issuer, the commissioner of insurance may allow a commission not to exceed twenty per cent of the sale price, such percentage to include all expenses incidental to such sale, including advertising or any other expense chargeable in any way to the sale of such securities.

8581.09 Consent to service. Upon any application for registration under this chapter where the issuer functions or intends to function as a dealer in the manner permitted by section 8581.11 and such issuer is not domiciled in this state, there shall be filed with such application the irrevocable written consent of the issuer that suits and actions, growing out of the violation of any provision or provisions of this chapter, may be commenced against it in the proper court of any county in this state in which a cause of action may arise or in which the plaintiff may reside, by the service of any process or pleading authorized by the laws of this state, on the commissioner of insurance, said consent stipulating and agreeing that such service of such process or pleadings on such commissioner of insurance shall be taken and held in all courts to be as valid and binding as if due service had been made upon the issuer himself, and said written consent shall be authenticated by the seal of said issuer, if it has a seal, and by the acknowledged signature of any officer of the incorporated or unincorporated association, if it be an incorporated or unincorporated association, duly authorized by resolution of the board of directors, trustees or managers of the corporation or association, and shall in such case be accompanied by a duly certified copy of the resolution of the board of directors, trustees or managers of the corporation or association, authorizing the officers to execute the same. In case any process or pleadings mentioned in this chapter are served upon the commissioner of insurance, it shall be by duplicate copies, one of which shall be filed in the office of the commissioner of insurance and another immediately forwarded by registered mail to the principal office of the issuer against which said process or pleadings are directed.

8581.10 Revocation of registration of securities. The commissioner of insurance may refuse or revoke the registration of any security by entering an order to that effect, with his findings in respect thereto, if after a reasonable notice and a hearing or upon examination into the affairs of the issuer of such security it shall appear that the issuer:

1. Is insolvent; or

2. Has violated any of the provisions of this chapter or any order of the commissioner of insurance of which such issuer has notice; or

3. Has been or is engaged or is about to engage in fraudulent transactions; or

4. Is in any other way dishonest or has made any fraudulent representations in any prospectus or in any circular or other literature that has been distributed concerning the issuer or its securities; or

5. Is of bad business repute; or

6. Does not conduct its business in accordance with law; or

7. That its affairs are in an unsound condition, or

8. That the enterprise or business of the issuer is not based upon sound business principles.

In making such examination the commissioner of insurance shall have access to and may compel the production of all the books and papers of such issuer, and he or the superintendent may administer oaths to and examine the officers of such issuer or any other person connected therewith as to its business and affairs and may also require a balance sheet exhibiting the assets and liabilities of any such issuer or his income statement, or both, to be certified to by a public accountant either of this state or of any other state where the issuer's business is located, approved by the commissioner of insurance.

Whenever the commissioner of insurance may deem it necessary, he may also require such balance sheet or income statement, or both to be made more specific in such particulars as the commissioner of insurance shall point out or to be brought down to the latest practicable date.

If any issuer shall refuse to permit an examination to be made by the commissioner of insurance, it shall be proper ground for refusal or cancellation of registration.

If the commissioner of insurance shall deem it necessary he may enter an order suspending the right to sell securities pending any investigation or hearing, provided that the order shall state the grounds of the commissioner of insurance for taking such action.

Notice of the entry of such order shall be given personally or by telephone, telegraph, or mail to the issuer and every registered dealer who shall have notified the commissioner of insurance of an intention to sell such security.

8581.14 Revocation of dealers' and salesmen's registrations. Registration under section 8581.11 may be refused or any registration granted may be revoked by the commissioner of insurance if after a reasonable notice and a hearing the commissioner of insurance determines that such applicant or registrant so registered:

1. Has violated any provision of this chapter or any regulation made hereunder; or

2. Has made a material false statement in the application for registration; or

3. Has been guilty of a fraudulent act in connection with any sale of securities, or has been or is engaged or is about to engage in making fictitious or pretended sales or purchases of any of such securities or has been or is engaged or is about to engage in any practice or sale of securities which is fraudulent or in violation of the law; or

4. Has demonstrated his unworthiness to transact the business of dealer or salesman;

5. Has been convicted of a felony, or any misdemeanor of which an essential element is fraud;

6. Has made any representations or false statements to, or concealed any essential or material fact from, any person in the sale of a security to such person;

7. Has failed to account to persons interested for all money and/or property received;

8. Has not delivered after a reasonable time, to persons entitled thereto, securities held or agreed to be delivered by the dealer or broker, as and when paid, and due to be delivered;

9. Has made or is making misrepresentations of any essentials or material fact to the commissioner of insurance, or has violated a provision of the laws of any foreign state regulating the sale of securities therein;

10. Is insolvent;

11. Is selling or offering for sale securities through any solicitor and agent not registered in compliance with the provisions of this chapter;

12. Has been refused a license in any state, or that any license in any state theretofore granted the applicant or registrant, or any officer, director, member or partner, manager or trustee thereof has been canceled, suspended or withdrawn for fraudulent conduct or violation of the law of such state regulating the sale of securities therein;

13. Is or has been using practices in the sale of securities that work or tend to work a fraud;

14. Has refused to furnish or give pertinent data to the commissioner of insurance;

* * *

It shall be sufficient cause for refusal or cancellation of registration in case of a partnership or corporation or any unincorporated association, if any member of a partnership or any officer or director of the corporation or association has been guilty of any act or omission which would be cause for refusing or revoking the registration of an individual dealer or salesman.

8581.15 Examinations and insolvency. The commissioner of insurance may compel every licensed dealer to make a report not later than the tenth of each month of all securities purchased and sold by such dealer and its salesmen during the preceding calendar month, and the books of all dealers, whether they are duly licensed or their license has been suspended, revoked or canceled, shall at all times be open to examination and inspection by the commissioner of insurance or any of his employees or any person delegated to examine them. If, upon examination, it is found that the dealer is insolvent or if the records are in such condition that the examiner is unable to determine the financial condition of the dealer, the commissioner of insurance may ask the appointment of a receiver to safeguard the interests of the public; the district court in Polk county or the county in which such dealer has its principal place of business shall have authority to appoint such receiver.

8581.21 Injunctions. Whenever it shall appear to the commissioner of insurance, either upon complaint or otherwise, that in the issuance, sale, promotion, negotiation, advertisement, or distribution of any securities within this state, including any security exempted under the provisions of section 8581.04, and including and transaction exempted under the provisions of section 8581.05, any person, as defined in this chapter, shall have employed or employs, or is about to employ any device, scheme or artifice to defraud or for obtaining money or property by means of any false pretense, representation or promise, or that any such person shall have made, makes or attempts to make, in this state fictitious or pretended purchases or sales of securities or shall have engaged in, or engages in or is about to engage in any practices or transaction or course of business relating to the purchase or sale of securities which is in violation of law or which is fraudulent or which has operated or which would operate as a fraud upon the purchaser, any one or all of which devices, schemes, artifices, fictitious or pretended purchases or sales of securities, practices, transactions and courses of business are hereby declared to be and are hereinafter referred to as fraudulent practices; or that any person acting as a dealer or salesman within this state without being duly registered as such dealer or salesman as provided in this chapter, the commissioner of insurance may:

2. Examine the promoter, seller, broker, dealer, negotiator, advertiser or issuer of any such securities, and any agents, employees, partners, officers, directors, members or stockholders thereof, under oath; and examine such records, books, documents, accounts and papers as may be relevant or material to the inquiry. For this purpose the commissioner of insurance shall have power to require by subpoena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of papers, and the commissioner of insurance may sign subpoenas, administer oaths, and affirmations, examine witnesses and receive evidence. The fees and mileage shall be the same as prescribed by law in judicial procedure in the courts of this state in civil cases. Any party to any hearing before the commissioner of insurance, shall have the right to the attendance of witnesses in his behalf at such hearing, upon making a request therefor to the commissioner of insurance and designating the person or persons sought to be subpoenaed.

* * *

5. Whenever it shall appear to the commissioner of insurance from any report or statement filed, from any examination made as provided for in this chapter, or from any other source that any person, as defined in this chapter, has engaged in, is engaged in or is about to engage in any practice declared to be illegal and prohibited by the chapter, or that it will be against public interest for any person, as defined in this chapter, to issue, sell, offer for sale, purchase, offer to purchase, promote, negotiate, advertise or distribute any securities within or from this state, he may by petition apply to a court of equity for a writ of injunction or the appointment of a receiver, or both. The said petition shall allege that it appears to the commissioner of insurance from an investigation made in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, that such person, as defined in the chapter, is engaged in or is about to engage in practices declared to be illegal and prohibited or that it is against public interests for such person, as defined in this chapter, to issue, sell, offer for sale, purchase, offer to purchase, promote, negotiate, advertise or distribute any securities within or from this state, which allegations may be verified generally, and on the filing of said petition the court may issue an injunction restraining such person from continuing such practices or engaging therein or doing any acts in furtherance thereof and/or the court may issue an injunction restraining the issuance, sale, offer for sale, purchase or offer to purchase, promotion, negotiation, advertisement, or distribution within or from this state, of any securities by such person and any agents, employees, brokers, partners, officers, directors or stockholders thereof, until the court shall otherwise order.

Chapter 386

Permits To Foreign Corporations

8420. Application for permit. Any corporation for pecuniary profit organized under the laws of another state, or of any territory of the United States, or of any foreign country, which has transacted business in the state of Iowa since September 1, 1886, or desires hereafter to transact business in this state, and which has not a permit to do such business, shall file with the secretary of state a certified copy of its articles of incorporation, duly attested by the secretary of state or other state officer in whose office the original articles were filed, accompanied by a resolution of its board of directors or stockholders authorizing the filing thereof, and also authorizing the service of process to be made upon any of its officers or agents in this state engaged in transacting its business, and requesting the issuance to such corporation of a permit to transact business in this state: said application to contain a stipulation that such permit shall be subject to the provisions of this chapter.

8421. Details of application—secretary of state as process agent. Said application shall also contain a statement subscribed and sworn to by at least two of the principal officers of the corporation, setting forth the following facts, to-wit:

1. The total authorized capital of the corporation.
2. The total paid up capital of the corporation.
3. The total value of all assets of the corporation, including money and property other than money represented by capital, surplus, undivided profits, bonds, promissory notes, certificates of indebtedness or other designation, whether carried as money on hand or in bank, real estate or personal property of any description.
4. The total value of money and all other property the corporation has in use or held as investment in the state, at the time the statement is made (if any).
5. The total value of money and all other property the corporation proposes or expects to make use of in the state, during the ensuing year.
6. Certified copy of the resolution of the board of directors of said corporation giving name and address in Iowa of a resident agent on whom the service of original notice of civil suit in the courts of this state may be served. Failing which, or in the event such agent may not be found within the state, service of such process may then be made upon said corporation through the secretary of state by sending the original and two copies thereof to him, and on the original of which he shall accept service on behalf of said corporation, retain one copy for his files and send the other by registered mail to the corporation at the address of its home office as shown by the records in his office, which service shall have the same force and effect as if lawfully made upon said corporation within the county where such civil suit could be maintained against it under the laws of this state.

§422. Secretary of state to determine values. The secretary of state can make such independent and further investigation as to the property within this state owned by any such corporation as he may desire, and upon the true facts determine the value thereof, and fix the fee to be paid by such company.

DECREE AND ORDER OF DISTRICT COURT, POLK COUNTY, IOWA, APPOINTING PERMANENT RECEIVER

(Part of Ex. 121)

(Caption Omitted)

Now on this 19th day of May, A. D., 1941, the same being one of the regular days of the May 1941 term of said Court, this matter comes on for final hearing before the Honorable John J. Halloran, one of the Judges of the above named Court, upon the application and petition of G. R. Shaw for the appointment of a receiver for the above named Company, the answer and cross-petition of the defendant and intervenor Chas. R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, for the appointment of a permanent receiver, the petition of the State of Iowa through its Attorney General John M. Rankin for the appointment of a permanent receiver, and the petition of intervention of E. G. Pullen for the appointment of a permanent receiver. Plaintiff's proof of service of notice upon the defendant corporation and upon H. Isaiah Smith, one of the receivers appointed by the Circuit Court, Kanawha County, State of West Virginia, for the defendant corporation, are thereupon submitted, and the Court finds that on the 24th day of April, A. D., 1941, this Court entered an order appointing Chas. R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, receiver pendente lite, and fixing the 10th day of May, A. D., 1941, at 9:00 o'clock, A. M., at the Court House in Des Moines, Polk County, Iowa, before the Honorable John J. Halloran, as the date, time, and place of hearing upon the application and petition for the appointment of a permanent receiver for said defendant corporation and its assets within the State of Iowa, and to show cause why its affairs and business in the State of Iowa should not be wound up and its assets distributed to Iowa creditors as by law provided, and that said order further provided that notice of the date, time, and place of hearing upon the application and petition for the appointment of a permanent receiver should be given by personal service upon the defendant corporation and upon the parties named in said order, and that notice was given to the defendant corporation and upon H. Isaiah Smith, one of the receivers appointed by the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, State of West Virginia, the state of the said defendant corporation's domicile, as provided for in said order.

The plaintiff, G. R. Shaw, and the intervenor, E. G. Pullen, appear now by their attorneys Carl J. Stephens and Ben C. Buckingham, the intervenor, State of Iowa by its Attorney General John M. Rankin and Asst. Attorney General Floyd Philbrick, and that the defendant-cross-petitioner Chas. R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, appears by Attorney General John M. Rankin and Asst. Attorney General Floyd Philbrick, and that the defendant, Fidelity Assurance Association, appears not and its default is hereby entered against it.

And the Court having examined the files in said cause, the notices and the return of service thereon, and having examined the evidence submitted, heard the statements of counsel, and being fully advised in the premises, FINDS:

That the defendant corporation is a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of West Virginia, engaged in the business, among other things, of offering for sale and selling installment and annuity investment contracts;

That on or about the 11th day of April, 1941, upon complaint of E. G. Sims, Auditor of State of the State of West Virginia, and ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of said state, an order was entered by the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, State of West Virginia, finding that said defendant corporation was insolvent and was unable to meet its matured and maturing obligations and to pay its creditors, and that the further continuance of its business would be hazardous to the best interests of its contract holders, creditors, and the public, and that it was necessary for the preservation of the property and assets of said defendant corporation and of the respective rights of its creditors and stockholders that the same should be administered through a receiver or receivers, and ordering and decreeing the appointment of H. Isaiah Smith and Ross B. Thomas Receivers of said defendant corporation and of its property and assets, and that the said H. Isaiah Smith and Ross B. Thomas are the duly appointed, qualified, and acting receivers in the State of West Virginia of said defendant corporation;

That the defendant corporation was, upon its application and order of the Executive Council of the State of Iowa entered on the 7th day of January, 1929, issued a certificate of authority by the Auditor of State of the State of Iowa pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 392, Code of Iowa, 1927, authorizing it to engage in the business in the State of Iowa of offering for sale and selling installment and annuity investment contracts to persons residing within the State of Iowa;

That pursuant to the provisions of said Chapter 392, the defendant corporation, as a condition precedent to the issuance of certificate of authority and its engaging in business in the State of Iowa, deposited with the Auditor of State of the State of Iowa securities in the amount of Twenty-five Thousand ($25,000) Dollars, guaranteeing the faithful performance of contracts sold by it to persons residing in Iowa, and that since said original deposit it has supplemented the same and maintained said deposit in an amount equal to all of its liability to Iowa contract-purchasers and now has on deposit with the Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 392, Code of Iowa, 1927, as amended by the Acts of the 48th General Assembly, securities of the par value of Forty-two Thousand ($42,000) Dollars;

That said defendant corporation, according to the evidence submitted, has a present liability to Iowa contract purchasers approximating somewhere between Thirty-five Thousand ($35,000) Dollars and Forty-five Thousand ($45,000) Dollars;

That the defendant corporation filed application with the Secretary of State, State of Iowa, on or about the 17th day of December, 1937, for qualification as a foreign corporation under and pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 386, Code of Iowa, 1931, and that permit was issued by the Secretary of State to said corporation;

That with its said application it filed resolution of its board of directors designating Walter L. Keck, Maquoketa, Iowa, as its resident agent, and consenting to the service of process on him pursuant to the provisions of said Chapter 386, and that the said Walter L. Keck is now the resident agent of said defendant corporation;

That the defendant corporation did on or about the 28th day of March, 1930, file its application with the Secretary of State of the State of Iowa, for registration of securities as an issuer-dealer of securities pursuant to and in compliance with the provisions of the Iowa Securities Law as contained in Chapter 393, Code of Iowa, 1927, and that pursuant to said application said defendant corporation was authorized to sell in Iowa installment and annuity investment contracts, and that pursuant to said registration and said Chapter 393, Code of Iowa, 1927, said defendant corporation did file with the Secretary of State, State of Iowa, its written consent without power of revocation that suits and actions might be commenced against it in the State of Iowa by the service of process upon the Secretary of State of the State of Iowa;

That said defendant corporation's registration was cancelled sometime during the year 1936 in accordance with the laws of the State of Iowa;

That the said defendant corporation did sell its installment annuity investment contracts to persons residing in Iowa, and that the plaintiff, G. R. Shaw, and the intervenor,

E. G. Pullen, are contract holders as alleged in the plaintiff's petition and the said intervenor's petition, and that each, as well as other Iowa contract purchasers, has an interest in the assets of the defendant corporation now on deposit with the defendant-cross-petitioner Chas. R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, and that said deposit constitutes a trust fund for the benefit of said plaintiff, intervenor and other Iowa contract purchasers;

That Chas. R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, was, pursuant to the order of this Court entered on the 24th day of April, A. D., 1941, appointed receiver pendente lite of the defendant corporation and its assets located and situated within the State of Iowa, and that the said Chas. R. Fischer qualified as such receiver by filing surety bond approved by the Clerk of this Court and by taking his oath on the 24th day of April, 1941, and now has in his possession as such the securities deposited by said defendant corporation with him as Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 392, Code of Iowa, 1939;

That the defendant corporation is insolvent, and that the further continuance of its business in the State of Iowa would be hazardous to its contract purchasers, creditors, and the public, and that a permanent receiver should be appointed for said defendant corporation in the State of Iowa as prayed to take charge and possession of its assets situated within the State of Iowa for the purpose of winding up the affairs and business of said defendant corporation, and for the purpose of distributing the same to the Iowa contract purchasers for whose benefit said assets were deposited in accordance with the provisions of Chapter 392,

Code of Iowa, 1939, and such other creditors as may by the laws of this state be entitled to the same;

That this Court has jurisdiction to appoint a permanent receiver for the defendant corporation, and its assets located in the State of Iowa, and to grant the relief prayed for by the parties to this cause of action.

NOW, THEREFORE, IT IS FINALLY ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED:

That under and pursuant to the statutes and laws of this state that the business and affairs of the defendant, Fidelity Assurance Association, in the State of Iowa be dissolved, closed up, and its assets situated within the State of Iowa administered and distributed in accordance with the laws of this state to Iowa contract purchasers of the defendant corporation, and such others as may be entitled to the same;

That Chas. R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, be, and he is hereby appointed permanent receiver of said defendant corporation in accordance with the statutes and laws of this state with authority and direction to take charge of and manage the property, assets, and business of the defendant corporation within the State of Iowa with full power to sue for, collect, receive, and take into his possession the goods, chattels, rights, credits, moneys, books, papers, property and assets of every description and wherever stiuated in the State of Iowa of the defendant corporation, and to do any and all acts and things which may be necessary, proper, or advisable to preserve the property, assets, rights and privileges of the defendant corporation, and with all the incidental powers ordinarily vested in receivers in like cases;

That said receiver shall, as soon as it may be practicable, file an inventory of all property of every description that shall have come into his possession as such receiver;

That said receiver be, and he is, hereby directed to proceed to wind up the business of the defendant corporation in the State of Iowa and to that end all installment annuity investment contract purchasers and creditors, including all lien and unsecured creditors of the defendant and all claimants to specific assets in the hands of the receiver, be, and they hereby are ordered to file proof of their claim with the Clerk of the District Court on or before the 20th day of August, A. D., 1941;

That every proof of claim shall be itemized and sworn to and shall state the particularity, nature, and origin of the claim so asserted, the actual consideration therefor, when the same has become or will become due, whether any or what securities are held, whether any or what payments have been made thereon, and the sum claimed is justly due, and that the claimant has not, nor has any other persons for his use, received any security or satisfaction whatever, other than by him set forth;

That said receiver shall, within thirty (30) days from the date hereof, give notice to creditors of the defendant corporation advising them with respect to filing of claim, the powers of receiver with respect thereto, as herein set forth, and the time within which all claims shall be filed, by publishing the same in at least three newspapers of general circulation in the State of Iowa once each week for two consecutive weeks, the first publication thereof to be not later than the 3rd day of June, A. D., 1941;

That said receiver is authorized to examine the claims so filed, as heretofore provided, and to make his findings thereon allowing or disallowing, in whole or in part, each and all of said claims, and to file in this cause as soon as possible after the time for filing claims has expired written report setting forth for the confirmation of this Court the results of such findings, subject to the right of any claimant to object to any findings so made, such objection to be filed in writing in this cause at such time as the Court may hereafter prescribe;

That in the event that any creditor, creditors, or claimants shall not so present or file their claims with the receiver aforesaid on or before the 20th day of August, A. D., 1941, it is hereby ordered that they shall be debarred from participating in any dividend or distribution that may hereafter be made in these proceedings, or from any interest in and to the assets of the defendant corporation administered by the receiver or any proceeds derived from the sale or other distribution thereof;

That the receiver be, and he is, hereby directed to cause all of the assets of the defendant corporation located within the State of Iowa, and coming into his hands as said receiver, to be appraised by two (2) competent appraisers whom the receiver shall select, and who shall report to this Court before any sale is made of the same and findings with respect to the value of the assets so appraised;

That the receiver be, and he is, further authorized and directed to sell all of the assets of the defendant corporation situated within the State of Iowa, and coming into his hands as said receiver, at either private or public sale, free and clear of all liens and encumbrances, but subject, however to the expenses of the receivership and the costs;

That the receiver be, and he is, hereby authorized to employ Carl J. Stephens and his associate, Ben C. Buckingham, as counsel to advise him in the performance of his duties as receiver, and that he shall have leave to employ such agents or employees as may be necessary to enable him to properly perform his duties as said receiver;

That the said Chas. R. Fischer before entering upon his duties herein shall take an oath and file a bond with the Clerk of this Court as receiver, which bond shall be in the sum of $10,000.00, with sureties to be approved by the Clerk of this Court, conditioned that said receiver shall well and truly perform the duties of his office; whereupon letters of receivership shall issue to him;

That the said Chas. R. Fischer shall file his report as receiver pendente lite with this Clerk, and upon approval thereof he shall stand discharged as receiver pendente lite;

That the title to the assets deposited by the defendant corporation pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 392, Code of Iowa, 1927, vested at the time and times said securities were deposited and were at the time of the appointment of the receivers for the defendant corporation by the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, State of West Virginia, and at the time of the appointment by this Court of Chas. R. Fischer, as receiver pendente lite of the defendant corporation, held by the said Chas. R. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa, in trust for the benefit of contract purchasers of said defendant corporation residing in Iowa, and that the title to said deposited securities be, and the same is, hereby vested in the said Chas. R. Fischer as permanent receiver of said defendant corporation for the benefit of the contract purchasers for whom the same were deposited to be distributed in accordance with this order and decree and the subsequent orders of this Court;

That the findings of this Court, as herein contained, be, and the same are, hereby made a part of the order and decretal portion of this order and decree with the same force and effect as if specifically set out therein;

That this Court retains jurisdiction of this cause for the purpose of giving such further directions and the granting and entering of such orders, supplemental orders or decrees as may be necessary and proper in connection with the winding up of the affairs and business of the defendant corporation within the State of Iowa, and the administration and distribution of the assets of said defendant corporation situated within the State of Iowa, and coming into the hands of the receiver.

CERTIFICATE OF AUDITOR AND EX OFFICIO INSURANCE COMMISSIONER AND SECRETARY OF STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA AS TO AMENDMENT OF CHARTER, CHANGE OF NAME AND LICENSING AS INSURANCE COMPANY

(Exhibit 24)

June 25, 1941

This is to certify that Fidelity Investment Association, with its principal place of business in Wheeling, West Virginia, chartered under the laws of the State of West Virginia to engage in the sale of annuity contracts on fixed and stipulated installments, made application to this office on December 31, 1940, as required under the provisions of section 3, article 2, chapter 33 of the 1931 Code of West Virginia, to change the charter powers of such corporation to include the power to engage in the life insurance business and to change the name of the corporation from Fidelity Investment Association to Fidelity Assurance Association. These changes were approved by the Insurance Commissioner and The Honorable William S. O'Brien, Secretary of State, issued his certificate and changed the records of his office pertaining to this corporation as per the attached copy of the certificate of amendment.

Thereupon, the same date the corporation made application, copy of which is attached hereto, to the Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia for a license to engage in the life insurance business as provided in article 3 of chapter 33 of the 1931 Code of West Virginia, as amended, and such license was granted, copy of which said license is also attached hereto.

On January 13, 1941, the company also made application, upon forms supplied by the Insurance Commissioner for that purpose, for the licensing of twenty-one persons to engage in the sale of life insurance policies, which said licenses were issued.

Furthermore, on January 14, 1941, the company filed, in duplicate, and secured approval for use in this state of a form titled, "Special Annuity Contract."

Also, on January 27, 1941, the company filed, in duplicate, and secured approval for use in this state of the following forms:

Ordinary Life
Ten Payment Life
Fifteen Payment Life
Twenty Payment Life
Fifteen Year Endowment
Twenty Year Endowment
Ten, Fifteen and Twenty Year Term

The company license, heretofore referred to as having been issued December 31, 1940, expired on March 31, 1941, as specified by law, and a renewal of such license was issued, dated April 1, 1941, for a term of one year, expiring March 31, 1942.

The foregoing statement is predicated upon the files and records of the office of the Insurance Commissioner in the State of West Virginia.

Given under my hand and official seal of office this 25th day of June, 1941.

In the Matter of
FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION,
Debtor
In Proceedings for Corporate Reorganization.
No. 4514.

TO THE HONORABLE BEN MOORE,
JUDGE OF SAID COURT:

Central Trust Company, Trustee, respectfully reports unto Your Honor that since its appointment herein on June 6th, 1941, to the date hereof, it has been continuously studying and analyzing the various securities which comprise the Portfolio. The policy adopted by your Trustee as a yardstick for measuring the advisability of handling each individual issue has been, and continues to be, in effect, that preservation of principal is the primary object and that conservation of income, although important, is secondary to the preservation of principal.

Your Trustee further respectfully reports that all of the securities, excepting United States Treasury obligations and those rated "A" or better, are regarded in the main by your Trustee as either falling in the so-called "marginal" classification, or securities which cannot be regarded as satisfactory for investment of savings funds.

Economic conditions, as a result of the present state of emergency occasioned by a transition from what may be termed a "peace economy" to a "war economy," have, in the opinion of your Trustee, increased the risks of such a heavy concentration in marginal securities, by reason of which your Trustee has suggested to the various State Depositories the advisability of considering the sale of many securities as hereinafter more particularly set out, and your Trustee is of the opinion that a great many more such suggestions will be made in the very near future, depending upon conditions affecting individual issues which may arise from day to day.

Your Trustee further respectfully reports that the factors which it interprets as indicating the market trend of the various groups of securities classified by your Trustee as marginal, may be more specifically expressed as follows:

STATE, COUNTY, MUNICIPAL and REVENUE BONDS. In the opinion of your Trustee, there are two important influences bearing on the future of individual state and municipal securities:

(1) The uncertainty as to the permanency of tax exemptions which exerts an influence on the market value of all states and municipals; and

(2) The decrease in revenues that may result in certain states and municipalities by reason of the dislocation of industries brought about by the war.

As to the first point, the Treasury proposal before Congress involving a recommendation for the retroactive elimination of tax exemption on state and municipal securities, although Congress has given no indication that it will comply with the Treasury proposal, there is every indication that the Treasury will continue to press for the elimination of such tax exemption on state and municipal securities at subsequent opportunities and the threat will continue to overhang the entire state and municipal bond market. Of equal importance, states and municipalities that are dependent for revenues on gasoline taxes, sales taxes, tourist trade and the like may suffer severely. To summarize, your Trustee concludes that states and municipals today are being subjected to major changes bearing on the strength of their credit position, and this applies directly to many of the state and municipal securities now held in the Portfolio of the Debtor.

Your Trustee further respectfully desires to point out that in many cases exceptionally poor markets exist for the sale of the type of state and municipal issues held in the Portfolio. Therefore, considerable time is required in disposing of these securities to the best interests of the estate. The longer the delay in acting on such vulnerable securities, just to such an extent is the danger increased that satisfactory sale can be accomplished. Reasonable selling opportunities for the middle and lower grade securities would, in the opinion of your Trustee, develop only during periods of firm to uptrending prices, and at present such a period seems to have developed from the low levels of last January and February when war and the tax threats were being widely publicized and discussed; and it is only a matter of time until these factors calling for caution again get attention.

The revenue bonds are, in the opinion of your Trustee, even more vulnerable to the factors hereinbefore mentioned for state and municipal securities, for the reason that they are not general obligations and could be classified as taxable without violating states rights.

RAILROAD BONDS. As will hereinafter appear in more detail, your Trustee has recently suggested the advisability of considering the sale of many of the marginal railroad securities held in the Portfolio and deposited with various State officials. This is because of two main factors:

(1) The price appreciation which such bonds have attained; and

(2) The uncertainty as to how long such values can be sustained under war conditions.

Such bonds have now recovered to a price level where they are again selling in the area at which liquidation by banks and other financial institutions can reasonably be expected to be greatly accelerated.

Your Trustee is of the opinion that even with a background of favorable current railroad earnings (before taxes), there can be no assurance that further substantial recoveries in such securities will come about, and, furthermore, favorable markets for such securities are only available on a firm or rising trend.

There are many potential influences which might readily cause a considerable decline in the value of these securities. First, there is the uncertainty as to the duration of the war. An earlier than generally anticipated termination of the war would, in the opinion of your Trustee, cause a great increase in the liquidation of railroad securities by investors and institutions alike. The railroad industry almost more than any other single classification has obtained the greatest financial benefit from the war economy. Conversely, in the post war period, it must face a serious readjustment of its traffic and earning factors. The long term outlook, particularly the threat of truck and air freight competition, further emphasizes the advisability of protecting this trust against the consequences of overstaying the present position in railroad securities.

An added factor indicating the desirability of prompt action relative to the reduction of railroad bonds is the possibility that agitation for government operation of the railroads may develop in the event there is serious congestion growing out of the increased demands on the industry because of the movement of war materials. Assuming that any such possible government operation would be on a basis of a guaranty of earnings based on a three-year average of earnings, as was the case in the last war, there would be a sharp reduction in the net earnings available to the industry as compared with the prospects for 1942 under private operation. Of particular significance is the restraint which would thus be placed on the volume of bond repurchases in the open market by the railroad companies of their own securities, thus limiting purchases from the sources generally regarded as likely to provide the major support for such bonds.

A further factor of considerable weight is the very substantial blocks of these marginal railroad bonds held in the Portfolio. Considerable time must be allowed to effect an orderly sale of such large blocks, and, therefore, in the opinion of your Trustee, it is essential that such selling action be initiated during the period of demand for this type of security in order to assure that such sales be accomplished at satisfactory levels.

PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS. Your Trustee respectfully submits that the best opportunities for disposing of marginal utilities may already have been passed, by reason of the fact that there has been a steady decline in the market value of this portion of the Portfolio for the past several months. The major influences exerting force on the market value of these securities is the inability of the utility industry to overcome the penalty of a rising tax structure and cost of operation without a comparative increase in rates. An estimated analysis based upon the pending tax bill now before Congress indicates a 15% to 20% decline in the net earnings of the public utility industry, the variation depending on the final tax terms which may be enacted.

Of even greater importance, in the opinion of your Trustee, is the fact that a conservative estimate of future tax factors leads to the conclusion that a high normal and surtax rate structure will endure well beyond the termination of the war. Thus the current decline in the utility industry earnings must be regarded as more or less of a permanent condition, with prospects for rehabilitation of earning power in the post war period likely to be held to negligible proportions.

As previously suggested, the opportunity for the most favorable disposal of this portion of the Portfolio already may have been passed. However, the dangers of further capital loss in these public utility securities are still of sufficiently large proportions to justify aggressive action in the sale of these securities, and your Trustee further desires to emphasize the necessity of prompt action because of the very substantial blocks involved, which require emphasis upon orderly disposition to avoid unduly depressing the market. Once the tax bill is finally enacted by Congress, and the general public begins to find the reflection of such tax penalties in published earnings, the opportunities for disposal of such issues may be still further reduced, as against the present.

INDUSTRIAL BONDS. Your Trustee respectfully suggests that there are many of the same factors operating in the case of the industrial bonds in the Portfolio as are exerting an influence in other marginal securities. A substantial portion of the industrial bonds held represents companies that rank as war beneficiaries, and as such have enjoyed a substantial temporary recovery in earning power. In numerous cases sinking fund provisions, based on a rate of earnings, have been the important contributing factor in the market conditions for such issues. It is significant that this temporary stimulus of war earnings has influenced the market conditions for many of the Portfolio industrial issues, with the result that they have only recently been selling in the open market for close to the top price in the war period, and in many instances 20 or 30 points above the levels which they might be expected to command in a peace economy. Your Trustee, therefore, respectfully suggests that such opportunities as have been presented should be realized upon in order that the preservation of the principal may thus be obtained at the satisfactory levels now prevailing.

REAL ESTATE BONDS. Your Trustee further respectfully submits that the real estate issues held in the Portfolio are, in the main, highly speculative, and in many cases involving defaults, and are, therefore, in much the same position as other marginal securities. Some of the issues are deriving partial benefit from the war economy, and such an improvement is being reflected in the price of the individual issues. These factors, among others, would seem to dictate the desirability of prompt action, and your Trustee feels that certain of these issues should be disposed of as opportunities are presented. Here again the matter of orderly liquidation would be a paramount problem since marketability of this type of issue is exceptionally poor, thus if a decision is made to dispose of any individual issue, your Trustee will require a considerable period of time, in all probability, before a market can be found. This, of course, further substantiates the fact that prompt, rather than delayed, action is desirable.

MISCELLANEOUS BOND GROUP. The thirteen bond issues contained in the financial and foreign group represent special situations, each of which must be decided on its own merits. Action on these issues is largely a matter of price, with a view of taking advantage of such market opportunities as may develop.

PREFERRED AND COMMON STOCKS. This portion of the Portfolio represents a highly volatile group of issues, which is subject to all the uncertainties of the stock market. As such, they should be regarded as candidates for ultimate disposal. Individual decisions will depend on timing of market factors, and the individual influences, such as taxes, which affect the value of each specific security. As the spring war campaigns unfold, the price of these individual issues may readily be subjected to considerable pressure, although as a group they may be expected in turn to respond to a possible improvement in war news to a greater extent than the bond portion of the Portfolio. Your Trustee suggests particular attention to the industrial issues which constitute the heaviest portion of the stock Portfolio. This group is constituted in substantial part in war beneficiaries, such as the steel, paper and machinery industries. In the opinion of your Trustee, it is essential that these issues be disposed of well before the termination of the war economy if a reasonable price is to be obtained.

Your Trustee further respectfully submits that the above comments have been confined to an expression of general policy rather than a discussion of individual issues. Recommendations as to individual issues are more particularly set out on a comparative summary of the Portfolio of Fidelity Assurance Association prepared by Standard & Poor's Corporation hereto attached, marked "EXHIBIT A" and prayed to be made a part hereof. This comparative summary gives the par value, book value and market value of each individual issue as of June 6, 1941, December 31, 1941, and March 31, 1942, in addition to which is a recommendation as to the disposition of each issue as of March 31, 1942.

Your Trustee further respectfully submits a schedule showing the securities recommended for sale on deposit with various States which said schedule is hereto attached, identified as "EXHIBIT B" and prayed to be made a part hereof, which said schedule shows, by States, sale recommendations complied with, sale recommendations not complied with, and as to each individual issue the book value June 6, 1941, the value as of date sale was recommended the unit price, value at date of recommendation, unit price at date recommendation withdrawn, proceeds of sale, unit price market March 31, 1942.

Your Trustee respectfully directs Your Honor's attention to the fact that the only States which have complied with the recommendations of your Trustee are Delaware and Missouri. Illinois and Maryland each made one sale as suggested by your Trustee, and your Trustee respectfully directs Your Honor's attention to the fact that in making the sale handled by the State representative, a price from 2 to 3 points under the market at the date of recommendation was obtained by the State officials, respectively. Your Trustee does not intend to criticize the State officials, but merely desires to call attention to the fact as substantiating the position of your Trustee, to the effect that skilful handling of sales is necessary to avoid depressing the market.

Your Trustee further respectfully reports unto Your Honor that as of May 1st, 1942, it suggested to various State Depositories the advisability of selling a very substantial number of securities, all as more particularly shown by a detailed list thereof hereto attached and marked for identification purposes "EXHIBIT C" and prayed to be made a part hereof. The State of Missouri is the only depository which has complied.

As shown by the schedule hereto attached, marked "EXHIBIT D" and made a part hereof, your Trustee has, as therein set out, made purchase recommendations, and only the Delaware and Missouri depositories have complied as indicated. A very substantial loss of income is resulting thereby because of the fact that there is now available cash on deposit with the various State officials in excess of three million dollars ($3,000,000.00) as shown by a statement thereof, by States, hereto attached and marked "EXHIBIT E," and made a part hereof.

In conclusion, your Trustee respectfully submits that in its opinion it would be for the best interests of the estate to have all the securities comprising the Portfolio of the Debtor, regardless of location, either placed in the actual custody of your Trustee or placed in the custody of the State Depositories' New York correspondent banks subject to the orders of your Trustee for the purpose of facilitating delivery against payment, and therefore recommends that a decree be made and entered herein to the foregoing effect.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT.

BRIEF OF RESPONDENT, JOHN B GONTRUM, INSURANCE COMMISSIONER OF THE STATE OF MARYLAND.

OPINIONS BELOW.

The opinion of the District Court is printed in the record (R. 176-202) and is reported in 42 Fed. Supp. 973.

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit is printed in the record (R. 238-263) and is reported in 129 Fed. (2d) 442.

The opinion of the District Court and the final order of the District Court approving the Debtor's petition were filed on January 5, 1942 (R. 175-176). The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals reversing the District Court was entered on June 16, 1942 (R. 263-264). A petition for rehearing was filed on July 13, 1942 (R. 264-266), and was denied on July 22, 1942 (R. 267). The petition for certiorari was filed on August 20, 1942, and granted on October 12, 1942 (R. 286).

JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under Sec. 240(a) of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C. Tit. 28, Sec. 347(a)), and Sec. 24(c) of the Bankruptcy Act (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Sec. 47(c)).

STATUTES INVOLVED.

The statutes involved are Chapter X of the Federal Bankruptcy Act (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Secs. 501-676) relating to the reorganization of certain private corporations; the Federal Investment Company Act of 1940 (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Sec. 107(f), and Tit. 15, Secs. 80a-1 to 80a-52), relating to the federal regulation of so-called face amount certificate companies; Secs. 218 to 234 of Art. 48A of the Annotated Code of Maryland (1939 Ed.), Tit. "Insurance", Sub-Tit. "Installment Accumulation Contracts", relating to the regulation by the State of Maryland of the sale of so-called "face amount certificates" or "installment accumulation contracts"; and similar regulatory statutes of the States of Alabama, Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia and Wisconsin. The particular sections of Chapter X of the Federal Bankruptcy Act and of the Federal Investment Company Act which will be relied upon in this brief will be printed in the argument. The pertinent Maryland statutes are printed as Appendix A to this brief. The other state statutes relating to the regulation of Fidelity Assurance Association are printed in Appendix D to the brief of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

Fidelity Assurance Association, formerly Fidelity Investment Association, a corporation of the State of West Virginia with its principal office at Wheeling, West Virginia, for a number of years had been engaged in the business of selling a form of annuity contract somewhat similar to that issued by insurance companies. The company did business in 29 states, most of which had laws regulating the conduct of such business. In 15 states, including its home state of West Virginia, Fidelity was required to deposit securities with designated state officials to secure the payment of its liabilities on contracts issued in such states. As of the time of the institution of this proceeding, the value of these deposited securities was in excess of $20,000,000, about one-half of which amount was deposited with the State of West Virginia.

On December 31, 1940, Fidelity ceased issuing any contracts because it could not comply with the provisions of the Federal Investment Company Act of 1940 which took effect on January 1, 1941. On April 11, 1941, receivers were appointed for Fidelity by the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia. The receivers took charge of the free assets of Fidelity, which amounted to something less than $1,000,000.00, and continued in charge until June 6, 1941, when Fidelity filed in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of West Virginia a voluntary petition for reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. On the same day, by ex parte order, the District Court undertook to require the immediate surrender to a trustee appointed by it, of the approximately $20,000,000 of securities which had been deposited by Fidelity with state officials. On June 10, 1941, again by ex parte order, the order of June 6, 1941, was amplified so as to be specifically directed against the state officials, who were designated by name and title.

None of the deposited securities were surrendered to the Trustee by any of the state officials. Some of the states filed answers controverting the allegations of the Debtor's petition and others filed motions to strike out and rescind the turnover orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941. Some states filed both answers and motions to strike out the turnover orders, and controversial answers and similar motions were also filed by creditors. The Insurance Commissioner of Maryland, who held a little less than $500,000 of securities which had been deposited with him by Fidelity as required by the laws of the State of Maryland, filed a motion to strike out the turnover orders, but did not file an answer controverting the allegations of the Debtor's petition.

The State of West Virginia and the West Virginia state court receivers had filed motions to strike out the turnover orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941, a few days after the entry of said orders, and after a brief hearing these motions were overruled, whereupon an appeal was entered to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. While these appeals were pending the District Court heard argument on the similar motions of the State of Maryland and other states but it did not act immediately on the motions. Instead, on motion of the trustee appointed by it, the District Court on August 9, 1941, amended its turnover orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941, by eliminating the provisions thereof requiring the various state officials to turn over the deposited assets to the Trustee for the Debtor, and in lieu thereof, enjoined the state officials from making any disposition of the deposited securities. The long (and needlessly involved) order of August 9, 1941, is printed in the record (R. 102-114). This action rendered moot the questions pending on appeal but the State of Maryland and other states promptly filed motions to strike out the injunction order of August 9, 1941. Argument was heard on said motions but the District Court did not act thereon until the conclusion of the hearing on the petition and controversial answers.

After an extended hearing over a period of several months, the District Court filed a lengthy opinion (R. 176-202) in which numerous objections to the jurisdiction of the court interposed by the respondents were considered and overruled. On January 5, 1942, the District Court entered an order (R. 175-176) approving the debtor's petition for reorganization and specifically overruling the motions to strike out the turnover orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941, and the injunction order of August 9, 1941. An appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit was filed on March 12, 1942, and that Court, holding that the Debtor was an insurance company and also that the petition had not been filed in good faith, reversed the District Court and remanded the cause with directions to the District Court to dismiss the petition (R. 263-264).

While the Circuit Court of Appeals did not deem it necessary to pass directly upon the question of whether the District Court had authority to enter the turnover orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941, or the injunction order of August 9, 1941, in view of its decision on the other points which were decisive of the case, nevertheless the question is presented to this Court inasmuch as the order of the District Court entered on January 5, 1942, from which the appeal was taken, not only approved the filing of the Debtor's petition but also specifically overruled the motions to strike out the turnover orders and the injunction order. Accordingly, the question of whether the District Court had authority to enter such orders will be argued in this brief.[1]

THE FACTS.

Inasmuch as a complete and comprehensive statement of the facts relating to Fidelity Assurance Association and this reorganization proceeding is contained in the Wisconsin-Iowa brief, it will not be necessary to make an extended statement of the facts in this brief. However, we do wish to point out and emphasize the facts relating particularly to the situation of this respondent and certain other vital facts and circumstances which we will especially rely upon in the argument in this brief.

Maryland Statute and Proceedings.

In Appendix D to its brief, the Securities and Exchange Commission purports to print the pertinent Maryland statutes (S. E. C. Appendices, 41-44). However, the Securities and Exchange Commission has omitted

[1] Even though the Respondents have not sought a review of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, nevertheless they are not limited in the argument before this court to points decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals. The entire record is before this court, and the Respondents may urge any legal grounds which will support the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals. Lagnes v. Green, 282 U. S. 531; Story Parchment Co. v. Paterson Parchment Paper Co., 282 U. S. 555; Helvering v. Gowran, 302 U. S. 238; Le Tulle v. Scofield, 308 U. S. 415; Ryerson v. United States, 312 U. S. 405.

to print all of the pertinent parts of the Maryland statute and we have, therefore, printed the same as Appendix A to our brief. In addition, because of its complete misunderstanding of the nature of the Maryland proceeding, the Securities and Exchange Commission has printed certain Maryland statutes (Sections 52 and 61 of Article 48A of the Maryland Code) which are applicable to the liquidation of insolvent or illegally conducted companies similar to Fidelity but which have no application whatsoever to the pending Maryland proceeding.

In April, 1941, Fidelity Assurance Association had no assets physically located in the State of Maryland which could have been taken possession of by a receiver. The only assets in the State of Maryland were the securities which had been assigned to and deposited with the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland and which were held in trust by him under the provisions of the Maryland statute. Consequently, when proceedings were instituted against Fidelity in West Virginia on April 11, 1941, the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland made no effort to institute receivership proceedings under Section 52 of Article 48A of the Maryland Code because there were no assets to be turned over to a receiver. The Maryland Insurance Commissioner, as Trustee, continued to hold the deposited securities and later the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, an equity court, in the exercise of its ordinary chancery powers assumed jurisdiction of, and supervision over the administration of the trust.

It will thus be seen that not only is there no receivership proceeding pending in Maryland but likewise there is no reorganization or rehabilitation proceeding, or any other kind of proceeding directed against the Fidelity Assurance Association. The only pending proceeding is an ordinary chancery proceeding for the administration of a trust under the jurisdiction of the court. Under Maryland law the Trustee (the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland), in the management and final liquidation of the trust, is subject to the complete control of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City.

More than a year and a half has elapsed since the institution of this proceeding in the District Court. During that time some of the securities held by this respondent as trustee have been called for redemption and other securities have, at the request of the Trustee for the Debtor and pursuant to the order of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, been sold. In this way approximately 36% of the trust assets held by this respondent have been liquidated and are now represented by cash.

Fidelity's Relations With the State of Maryland:

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 222 of the Maryland statute, Fidelity in 1932 assigned to and deposited with the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland certain securities having an approximate market value of $500,000. From time to time additional securities were assigned to and deposited with the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland by Fidelity and securities then held by him were thereupon surrendered to Fidelity. As of June 6, 1941, the securities in the possession of the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland had a market value of $470,806.25 and as of April 10, 1941, the net cash liability of Fidelity on its contracts held by persons then residing in Maryland was $492,552.24 and the reserve liability on these same contracts was $508,163.70 (Exhibit No. 48, R. 814). There is testimony in the record to the effect that there are 2080 such contracts held by persons now resident in the State of Maryland but the formal report and list of contract holders filed with the District Court by the Trustee for Fidelity discloses only 1135 such contracts, with approximately the same reserve and cash surrender liabilities. The difference of 915 contracts represents those contracts which are delinquent and on which there is no present liability by Fidelity, but under the terms of which the contract holders have certain options, such as redating privileges, privilege to pay up arrearages and reinstate the contract, etc.

The petitioners and the Securities and Exchange Commission contend that on its books Fidelity kept accurate and separate accounts for the reserve funds of each series of contracts issued by it and that the books indicated what securities were purchased with the reserve funds of each series. These statements are misleading. It is true that the testimony developed that Fidelity maintained books showing such a segregation of reserve funds by series but none of the securities themselves were in any way earmarked and it does not appear that even on the books, particular securities could be identified as belonging to any one series where securities of the same issue may have been purchased from the reserve funds of two or more series.

In other words, the securities themselves were not identifiable with any particular reserve fund, and prior to the institution of an injunction proceeding by the Securities and Exchange Commission in the latter part of 1938 Fidelity had made no effort to segregate the securities deposited with each state in accordance with the outstanding contracts of each series in such state. It was only during the past few years and after the entry of the injunction order in December, 1938, that Fidelity made any attempt to segregate its state deposits by series (R. 634-635), and by that time the deficiency in assets made segregation impossible (R. 608, 638). There is some testimony of efforts on the part of Fidelity in 1939 and 1940 to advise some state officials of a segregation by series of the securities deposited with such state officials (R. 754-756) but the record does not disclose that any effort was ever made to advise the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland of the segregation on the books of Fidelity (R. 754, 756), and the only direct evidence on this point is that the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland was not advised of the breakdown into series funds of either the deposited securities or of Fidelity's liabilities in the State of Maryland. See note at the bottom of the first page of Exhibit No. 79.

It should also be pointed out that even where Fidelity made some effort to advise state officials of the segregation of the securities by series funds, such advice was not given at the time of the deposit of the particular securities (R. 646-648, Exhibit 67) but the state officials were advised some months later and after they had accepted the securities as a general deposit without segregation by series. In addition there was not only no effort to advise contract holders that state deposits were to be segregated by series, but on the contrary each contract holder was given a booklet which called his attention to the fact that "the securities deposited with state authorities are subject to the requirements of the states with respect to all the contract funds of Fidelity Investment Association, and are not necessarily held for the sole benefit of the holders of these particular contracts." (R. 657, 765).

The securities deposited in Maryland are registered in the name of the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland as Trustee and under the provisions of the Maryland statute these securities were and are held by him "in trust, as security for all the holders of contracts or other obligations * * * sold, negotiated, issued or accrued in said company in the State of Maryland". In no instance were the securities which were deposited in Maryland earmarked as belonging to any particular series. For instance, no securities were ever registered in the name of "Fidelity Investment Company in trust for Series B contract holders". On the other hand, in many instances the securities deposited with the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland were purchased by Fidelity specifically for the purpose of making such deposit and were caused by Fidelity to be registered initially in the name of the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland. Consequently the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland at the time the securities were deposited had no notice whether they had been purchased from general funds of Fidelity or from reserve funds allocated to one or the other of the various series of contracts issued by Fidelity.

Insolvency of Fidelity.

The Debtor in its brief makes the bland assertion that Fidelity is 90% solvent. The District Court fell into the same error. It is true that on the basis of schedules submitted by the Debtor, the assets of Fidelity (95% of which are deposited assets) amount to about 90% of the aggregate cash surrender value of Fidelity's outstanding contracts. These figures are, however, misleading both as to the value of the assets and as to the extent of the liabilities.

In preparing such schedules some effort was made to show the market value rather than the book value of securities which had a market value, but with respect to securities which had no readily ascertainable market value and with respect to the tangible assets of Fidelity, book values were used in arriving at the total value of assets. No effort was made to appraise these assets and no testimony was offered as to their real value. The indications are that these assets, such as, for instance, the Home Office building at Wheeling carried on the books at $450,000.00, are worth very much less than their book value. Accordingly, while the record does not show the true value of all the assets, we may safely assume that it is less than the figure submitted by the Debtor and relied on by the District Court and by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

On the other hand, the liabilities are understated. In the first place, there is not the slightest warrant for using the cash surrender value of contracts as the measure of the liability of Fidelity to its contract holders. At the very least the contract liability of Fidelity is the reserve value of each contract.[2] The reserve liabilities exceed the cash surrender liabilities by $745,982.69 (see Exhibit 48, Tr. 1116). As a matter of fact the liability to the contract holders may actually be considerably in excess of this amount because the contract has been broken not by the contract holder but by Fidelity, and in measuring the damages for the breach of contract, a contract holder might not necessarily be limited to the reserve liability on the contract. In addition, these schedules do not indicate the extent of Fidelity's liabilities to persons other than contract holders, and we have no way of knowing what such claims may amount to. The testimony does indicate that the Federal Government alone is asserting an income tax deficiency amounting to approximately a quarter of a million dollars (R. 1221, Exhibit 118).[3] Accordingly while the exact amount of the liabilities does not appear, it is clear that they are substantially in excess of the amount shown on the schedules submitted by the Debtor.

[2] This was recognized by the Securities and Exchange Commission in its brief filed as amicus curiae in the 1938 receivership proceeding involving Fidelity. Hutchinson v. Fidelity Investment Co., 106 Fed. (2d) 431. At pages 34 and 35 of its brief as amicus curiae, the Securities and Exchange Commission objected strenuously to the use of the cash surrender values to measure liabilities and insisted that "the company's real liability is the actuarial reserve necessary to pay the contracts at maturity according to their terms", and that "the present existence of a liability equal to the entire actuarial reserve is indisputable".

The record, therefore, does not support the statement that Fidelity as a whole is 90% solvent. On the contrary, the indications are that it is much less than 90% solvent although the Debtor has failed to show exactly what deficiency of assets there is.

The petitioners fall into the same error in making the statement (brief p. 46) that reserve funds A, B, C and D are solvent. As pointed out in the Securities and Exchange Commission brief (pp. 7, 8), securities were "sold" and moneys were "borrowed" on open account between the separate series funds. The Securities and Exchange Commission admits that the series funds which have inter-fund accounts payable are insolvent, and that "the solvency of other funds depends on the extent to which their inter-fund accounts receivable are collectible assets".

Even if on the books of Fidelity it should appear that one or more series funds were solvent, this would only be on the basis that all of the securities which had been purchased from the reserve fund of that series could be recovered and applied solely to the payment of the liabilities on that series of contracts. As we shall show later in this brief, such an assumption is clearly untenable.

[3] An examination of the notice of the deficiency assessment, Exhibit 118, shows that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has completely disregarded the series trust fund theory, and is assessing income taxes on the basis of the total income from all the securities, irrespective of series.

Contract Provisions as to Segregation of Reserve Funds.

The statement is made by the petitioners that the contracts of all series provide for the creation and maintenance of a separate reserve fund solely for the discharge of the liability upon the contracts of that series. This statement is incorrect. No such provision is contained in the special income contract, the special annuity contract or, the Series A contract. There is only one Series C contract outstanding (R. 492). The contracts which contain such a provision are Series B and D. It is true that all of the contracts contain a provision that a certain portion of the payments of each contract holder shall be set aside in a reserve fund which reserve fund shall be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia. There is no indication, however, except as to the Series B and D contracts, that such reserve funds are to be kept separate solely for the discharge of liabilities under contracts of that particular series.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

I.

The basic, fundamental issue in this case is whether the state deposit statutes are valid and effective, or whether such statutes may be abrogated to the extent that they prevent or interfere with any plan of reorganization which the Debtor may desire to effect under the provisions of Chapter X. If not, this proceeding is at an end because the free or undeposited assets of the Debtor are negligible, and unless the state deposits can be seized by the bankruptcy court there is no possibility of reorganizing the Debtor. We contend that the state deposits are not subject to the jurisdiction and control of the bankruptcy court.

A. The state deposit statutes are valid regulatory laws enacted pursuant to the police power reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment. These statutes provide for the creation of an actual trust for the benefit of citizens of the respective states, and although they provide for liquidation of the trust assets in certain contingencies, they are not mere insolvency statutes which would be superseded by the bankruptcy statutes.

B. Title to, as well as possession of the state deposits are in the various state officials, as trustees, and the state deposits therefore do not constitute property of the Debtor subject to the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court. Accordingly the bankruptcy court has no authority to require the surrender of the state deposits or to enjoin the disposition thereof by the state officials pursuant to the provisions of the various state laws.

C. The state officials having possession of the state deposits are immune from the judicial process of the federal courts under the provisions of the Eleventh Amendment. Although the states perhaps have no pecuniary interest in the deposited securities, nevertheless they have seen fit to throw their cloak of immunity around the state deposits, and the turnover orders and the injunction order directed against the state officials in their capacity as such are therefore void.

D. Even though it were assumed arguendo that the state officials were not immune from the process of the federal court under the Eleventh Amendment and that the bankruptcy court had a discretionary power temporarily to enjoin the disposition of the deposited securities, nevertheless the federal courts, having a scrupulous regard for the rightful independence of state governments, should be extremely loathe to issue turnover orders or injunction orders against state officials in cases like the present. The issuance of such orders by the District Court in the case at bar constituted an abuse of discretion, rather than a wise exercise of discretion.

II.

The petition of the Debtor was not filed in good faith within the meaning of Section 146(3) of Chapter X in that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected.

A. The Debtor has not met the burden of proving that it is not unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected. On the evidence it is clear, and all parties virtually concede, that there is no real possibility of a rehabilitation of the Debtor as a going concern.

B. A "slow and orderly liquidation" is not a plan of reorganization within the meaning of Chapter X, but even if a plan providing for the creation of some sort of liquidating corporation to conduct a slow and orderly liquidation of the Debtor's assets could be considered a plan of reorganization within the meaning of Chapter X, nevertheless there has been no showing by the Debtor that any such plan is necessary or would be beneficial to contract holders, or that it is reasonable to expect that any such plan could be effected.

III.

The petition was not filed in good faith within the meaning of Section 146(4) of Chapter X because it appears that the interests of the creditors would be best subserved in the prior pending state court proceedings.

A. Since there is no hope of a reorganization of Fidelity, as distinguished from a liquidation, the so-called "safeguards" of a Chapter X proceeding are not pertinent considerations.

B. A central administration by the federal court is not essential in order that an impartial investigation of the acts of the management of the Debtor can be made. Nor is there any necessity for a single administration of the Debtor's affairs in the federal court in order to settle any supposed problems of marshalling assets and of distribution, or in order to properly liquidate the assets of Fidelity. Liquidation can be accomplished just as efficiently and much more expeditiously in the pending state court proceeding.

C. A central administration is not necessary in order to determine the numerous questions alleged to exist with respect to the construction of the state statutes and the determination under state laws of the relative rights of the contract holders. Such questions of state law can best be determined by the state courts, and the federal courts should be extremely reluctant to undertake to construe and apply the state statutes.

ARGUMENT.

I.

THE STATE DEPOSITS ARE NOT SUBJECT TO THE JURISDICTION AND CONTROL OF THE BANKRUPTCY COURTS.

The basic, fundamental issue in this case is whether or not the statutes of the various states where Fidelity made deposits to secure contract holders are valid and effective, or whether such statutes are to be abrogated to the extent that they prevent or interfere with any plan of reorganization which a debtor may desire to effect under the provisions of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. The question is fundamental because 95% of Fidelity's assets are deposited with the officials of fifteen different states pursuant to the laws thereof and if these statutes are to be given effect, the deposited securities must be distributed in accordance with the laws of those states to the persons entitled thereto and it is futile to talk about reorganization of Fidelity either as a going concern, or by means of a "slow and orderly" liquidation through the federal court as a central administrative agency. Unless the federal court can ignore the state statutes and require the various state officials to surrender the securities in their possession to the Trustee for the Debtor this proceeding is at an end because the free, or undeposited assets of Fidelity are insignificant in comparison with its liabilities. Recognizing this fact, the Debtor, the Trustee and the Securities and Exchange Commission have from the very beginning sought to have the District Court secure the control and possession of the deposited securities. Without the deposited securities, there is nothing left to reorganize.

On the other hand, the states whose citizens are fairly well protected by adequate or nearly adequate deposits have resisted from the beginning all efforts to compel them to surrender the securities,[4] and it was for this reason that the State of Maryland and other states refused to comply with the turnover orders entered by the District Court on June 6 and June 10, 1941, and instead filed motions to strike out and rescind such orders, thereby immediately raising the fundamental issue of whether or not the state deposits were subject to the jurisdiction and control of the bankruptcy court. The Debtor, the Trustee, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the District Court, while asserting the paramount authority of the bankruptcy court over the state deposits have constantly endeavored to avoid a decision on the fundamental question of the validity of the state deposit laws. The District Court overruled a motion of the West Virginia respondents to strike out the turnover orders, and while an appeal from that order was pending in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, and while the motions of the State of Maryland and other states to strike out the orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941, were pending and undisposed of, the District Court entered its amendatory order of August 9, 1941, thereby rendering moot the question then pending on appeal, at least for the time being.

[4] Even the states where the deposits are wholly insufficient to secure the outstanding liabilities refused to surrender their deposits and none of them have at any time suggested that the well secured states give up their deposits.

Not until after the District Court had completed the hearing and had finally approved the Debtor's petition did it formally overrule the motions of the State of Maryland and other states (R. 175). A number of times during the course of the hearing the District Court disavowed any intention to interfere with any vested rights of contract holders in state deposits but postponed consideration of what, if any, vested rights there were. The District Court took the position that the construction of such state statutes, that is the determination of the effect thereof and whether any contract holders were secured thereby, and if so what contract holders, and the extent to which they were secured, were questions which the District Court and not the state courts would decide. Similarly the District Court, even after the turnover orders were modified on August 9, 1941, continued to assert the right to require the surrender of the state deposits in the future (R. 958). Thus, while giving lip service to the principle that the state deposit laws are valid, the District Court strikes at the very heart of the state statutes by its holding that the state deposits are subject to the jurisdiction and control of the bankruptcy court. In the same way both the Debtor and the Securities and Exchange Commission, while even now stating that they do not contend that the state deposit laws are invalid or that they should not be given full effect, nevertheless assume a position completely contrary to such statements.

It seems futile for the Debtor to urge and the District Court to decide that it is reasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization of Fidelity can be effected, reserving for later determination the question of whether there will be any property to form the basis for a reorganization. It seems to us that it would have been much better had the District Court first determined the fundamental question of its authority over the state deposits, and then determined the question of whether Fidelity could be reorganized only in the event it concluded that it did have authority over the state deposits and could subject them to its control. In this way the extended hearing as to the feasibility of reorganization might have been avoided. Such was the procedure approved by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Seaboard Terminals Corp. v. Western Maryland Railway Co., 108 Fed. (2d) 911, where the District Court first determined the question of title to property claimed by the debtor before undertaking to determine the question of whether it was feasible to reorganize the debtor.

We contended in the District Court and in the Circuit Court of Appeals and we contend now, (1) that the state deposit laws are valid and effective regulatory statutes enacted pursuant to the reserved powers of the states under the Tenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution; (2) that the securities deposited with various state officials do not constitute "property of the debtor" within the meaning of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act; (3) that the state officials having possession of such securities are immune from the judicial process of the federal courts under the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution; and (4) that even if it be assumed arguendo that the bankruptcy court has some measure of jurisdiction or control over the state deposits, the ex parte turnover orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941, and the injunction order of August 9, 1941, were an abuse of discretion.

1. The State Deposit Laws Are Valid And Must Be Given Full Effect By The Bankruptcy Courts.

By the Tenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution there is reserved to the several states, or to the people thereof, all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the states. Within the limits of the powers thereby reserved to them, the states are as independent of the federal government as that government within its sphere is independent of the states.

One of the most important of the powers thus reserved to the states is the police power, and it was in the exercise of the police power that the State of Maryland and other states passed statutes regulating the sale of installment accumulation contracts, a business affected with a public interest. Corporations issuing and selling such contracts could only do so upon compliance with the laws of the respective states in which they sought to do business. The statutes of the 29 states in which the Debtor transacted business vary widely in their specific provisions and it is not possible within the limits of this brief to refer to and discuss the statutes of all 29 of these states. Accordingly we will confine our discussion to the statutes of Maryland, although the general argument set out in this portion of our brief is applicable, with perhaps some modifications, to at least the 15 states in which the Debtor made deposits to secure its contract holders.

The statute passed by the State of Maryland provides in detail for the regulation of the business conducted by companies selling such contracts, and probably the most important regulatory provision is that requiring the assignment and deposit of approved securities to be held in trust by the state for the benefit of the persons designated in the statute. The Maryland statute is therefore a declaration of a public policy; a statute passed by a sovereign state in a valid exercise of its police power. The police power to pass such legislation is one undoubtedly reserved to the States by the Tenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. It is a power which never has been, and never can be, delegated to the federal government as long as we are to have a dual system of government—as long as there is to be an indestructible union composed of indestructible states.

The Maryland statute is not at all a mere liquidation or insolvency statute, and as such susceptible of being interpreted as legislation upon the subject of bankruptcies and thus falling within the powers expressly granted to the federal government. It is true that the Maryland statute does provide a method by which deposits made by such companies shall be liquidated in the event they become insolvent, but the primary purpose of the statute is much more than this. It is to provide security for the citizens of the state who deal with the company and purchase its installment accumulation contracts. It should also be noted that the Maryland statute is not merely a deposit statute. In other words, the Maryland statute does not merely provide for a deposit of securities to be held as collateral for the performance of the company's obligations; it provides expressly for a transfer of title from the company and the creation of an actual trust for the benefit of designated persons. Most state statutes providing for the deposit of securities by insurance companies have been held to create express trusts for the benefit of designated policy holders of the company, American United Life Ins. Co. v. Fischer, 130 Fed. 2d 643, and in Maryland this is undoubtedly the case because the statute in express terms provides for a transfer of title and possession, and in addition expressly provides that the securities so transferred shall be held "in trust" for the designated beneficiaries. Even apart from the express language of the Maryland statute, it is clear under Maryland law that an express trust was created. Casualty Insurance Company's Case, 82 Md. 535.

The incidental provision of the Maryland law providing, among other things, for the liquidation of certain specific securities held in trust, upon the happening of certain contingencies and for payment to a definite group of its citizens, is not to be confused with a statute requiring that the general assets of a foreign corporation be liquidated in Maryland courts for the benefit of Maryland creditors of such corporation. Such a law might be considered a law on the subject of insolvency and therefore superseded by the federal bankruptcy statutes. But such is not this case.

It is true that the Federal Constitution grants to Congress the express power to enact uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, but to hold that Congress, under such power, could grant to the federal courts the power to set aside state statutes on matters of public policy passed in the exercise of the police power would be to set at naught the whole theory of state sovereignty.[8] Consequently, it has been held that the express powers conferred upon the federal government by the Constitution are always subject to the implied limitation that the Congress in the exercise of such powers cannot transgress upon the rights of sovereign states.[9]

Thus, in Ashton v. Cameron County District, 298 U. S. 513, this Court, in holding the Municipal Bankruptcy Act invalid said: "The power 'To establish * * * uniform laws on the subject of Bankruptcies' can have no higher rank or importance in our scheme of government than the power 'to lay and collect taxes'. Both are granted by the same section of the Constitution, and we find no reason for saying that one is impliedly limited by the necessity of preserving independence of the States, while the other is not. * * * Like any sovereignty, a State may voluntarily consent to be sued; may permit actions against her political subdivisions to enforce their obligations. Such proceedings against these subdivisions have often been entertained in federal courts. But nothing in this tends to support the view that the Federal Government, acting under the bankruptcy clause, may impose its will and impair state powers—pass laws inconsistent with the idea of sovereignty." (298 U. S. 530, 531).

[8] It may well be doubted whether Section 67(f) of the Bankruptcy Act (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Sec. 107(f)) added by Sec. 29(b) of the Investment Company Act of 1940, is constitutional in so far as it declares that deposits of securities made by a face amount certificate company pursuant to state law, shall be voidable as against the Trustee of the Debtor and to the extent it authorizes the Trustee to take possession of the securities. The question is not directly involved here inasmuch as Section 67(f), by its terms applies only to deposits to secure face amount certificates sold after January 1, 1941. In addition, it should be noted that the statute requires the Trustee for the Debtor to keep the deposited assets segregated and to distribute the proceeds thereof to the creditors entitled thereto under the provisions of the state laws.

[9] In United States v. Perkins, 304 U. S. 27, a similar statute was upheld, but the Supreme Court did not overrule the Ashton case and pointed out that in enacting the new law Congress was careful to avoid the objections to the previous statute set out in the opinion in the Ashton case.

And see Hopkins Federal Savings and Loan Association v. Cleary, 296 U. S. 315, 337.

The District Court, relying upon an article by Professor A. H. Feller entitled "The Tenth Amendment Retires", published in the April, 1941, issue of the American Bar Association Journal, assumed that the Cleary and the Ashton cases were overruled by this Court in United States v. Darby Lumber Co., 312 U. S. 100. We respectfully submit that this Court has not done away with the Tenth Amendment as an effective precept in American Constitutional Law, as the title of Professor Feller's article would seem to imply, nor has this Court overruled the Cleary and Ashton cases, or the principles therein stated. Nowhere in its opinion does this Court refer to these two cases, and certainly there is nothing said in the opinion which questions the principles enunciated in them. In the Darby case no question of conflict between federal and state statutes was involved, but here the question involved is whether the power conferred upon Congress to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies is subject to the implied limitation that it must not unduly restrict or limit the exercise of their police power by the states, just as the power of Congress to levy and collect taxes is subject to the implied limitation that they shall not be a direct burden on the states. We respectfully submit that the bankruptcy power is subject to such a limitation.

The District Court in its opinion says: "The only respect in which the state statutes can be said to conflict with the Bankruptcy Act is that they give to state officials the right to retain custody of the deposits until final settlement or redemption of the Debtor's liabilities. If such provisions are in conflict with Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (a question which I do not deem it necessary to decide at this time) * * * the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act must be held to be 'paramount to any state statute the effect of which may be to impair or emasculate them' ". (R. 201). In other words, it is claimed that the powers granted to the federal courts under the Bankruptcy Act are sufficient to enable them to override the plain provisions of the Maryland statute, the validity of which is not questioned. It is our contention that no such power is conferred by the Bankruptcy Act and that if Congress attempted to confer such a power upon the bankruptcy court, the statute would be in direct violation of the Tenth Amendment.

For these reasons we respectfully submit that the state deposit laws are valid and must be given full effect in the bankruptcy courts.

2. The Securities Deposited With The Various State Officials Do Not Constitute Property Of The Debtor.

It is our contention that the securities deposited with the various state officials do not constitute property of the Debtor, and hence are not subject to the jurisdiction and control of the bankruptcy court. For this reason the District Court had no authority to enter the turnover orders of June 6 and June 10, 1941, or the injunction order of August 9, 1941. However, the District Court held that "the assets deposited with the states remain assets of the Debtor and the maximum extent of the interest of the states in those deposits is that they be held in custody until the liabilities of the Debtor are redeemed or settled" (R. 200), that the various state officials are not adverse claimants, and that "the assertion of adverse claims, being merely assertion, and no more, may be disposed of summarily, as I have done" (R. 202). In other words, the District Court has decided that the cash and securities held by the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland constitute property of the Debtor within the meaning of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, and as a matter of fact it so declared expressly in the order of August 9, 1941, recognizing that otherwise there would have been no foundation whatsoever for the injunction.

Since this is a proceeding under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, the power and jurisdiction of the District Court to enter the turnover orders and the injunction order must be found in some provision of that Act. The only provision relied upon by the petitioners is Section 111 (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Sec. 511), which provides that the bankruptcy court "shall, for the purposes of this chapter, have exclusive jurisdiction of the debtor and its property, wherever located". Consequently if the District Court had jurisdiction to enter the turnover and injunction orders, it must be on the ground that the securities held by the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland constitute "property of the Debtor" within the meaning of this section of the Act. We contend, however, that this is not true.

It must be borne in mind that the securities are not held merely as a pledge to secure the repayment of obligations of the Debtor to its contract holders. The Maryland statute shows clearly that title, as well as possession, is in the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland as the agent of the State of Maryland. The Maryland statute (Section 222) provides not merely that securities must be "deposited" with the Insurance Commissioner, but that such securities must be "assigned to" the Insurance Commissioner. This was done, and the securities are registered in the name of the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland as Trustee, so that unquestionably the legal title is vested in the Insurance Commissioner, and not in the Debtor.

It is also clear that not only is the legal title vested in the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland, but the equitable title to the cash and securities is likewise not vested in the Debtor, because the Maryland statute expressly provides that the "securities so assigned to and deposited with the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland shall be held by him in trust, as security for all the holders of contracts or other obligations heretofore or hereafter sold, negotiated, issued or accrued in said company in the State of Maryland."

In other words, the Maryland statute contemplates and requires the creation of an active trust in which the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland is the Trustee and the Maryland contract holders are cestuis que trust or beneficiaries. The legal title is in the Trustee, and the equitable owners of the securities are the Maryland contract holders. So long as there was no default, the Debtor was entitled to receive the income from the securities (Section 224), but upon default it lost even that right and had left to it only the right to receive any surplus that might remain after the securities had been sold and all obligations to contract holders in the State of Maryland had been paid in full. This bare right to receive such surplus, if any, does not constitute the securities themselves the property of the Debtor. In the first place, the interest of the Debtor in these securities is merely that of another beneficiary or cestui que trust, and as such it has no title or property right in the securities constituting the res. In addition, even this interest of the Debtor is subordinate to that of its Maryland contract holders, and the trust assets are not even subject to the expenses of administering the general assets of the Debtor. Casualty Insurance Company's Case, 82 Md. 535. Under such circumstances, how can it be said that the securities constituting the trust res are the property of the Debtor? The Debtor was no more the owner of these securities than the settlor of a conventional trust is the owner of the property transferred by him in trust even though he might also be a beneficiary of the trust.

The situation is not at all the same as that existing where securities are pledged to secure a debt and the creditor has merely a lien upon the property. Even in such a case it might well be doubted whether such securities would constitute "property of the debtor" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act (see In re Patten Paper Co., 86 Fed. (2d) 761), but it is not necessary for us to go that far in the present case because here the Maryland statute has clearly and explicitly created an express trust, has designated a Trustee, and has accurately and fully described the beneficiaries of the trust. It would therefore seem clear from a mere reading of the Maryland statute that the securities held by the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland do not constitute "property of the debtor".

There are several cases which support this contention and in so far as we are aware there are no authorities which hold that under a similar state of facts securities so held in trust would constitute "property of the debtor".

In the case of In re Prudence Co., 82 Fed. (2d) 755, (cert. den., 298 U. S. 685), securities were deposited with trustees to secure bonds issued by the creator of the trust. An affiliated corporation guaranteed payment of the bonds and under the trust indenture had the right to service the securities constituting the trust res and collect the income therefrom so long as no default occurred in the bonds. Securities constituting the trust res had originally belonged to the guarantor of the bonds and had been transferred by it to the corporation which created the trust and issued the bonds. A default occurred in the bonds and subsequently reorganization proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act were instituted against both corporations. The trustee appointed in the reorganization proceedings for the guarantor corporation asserted that as between it and its affiliate which had issued the bonds, the securities constituting the trust res belonged to the guarantor corporation. He therefore sought and obtained from the bankruptcy court an injunction restraining the trustees designated in the trust indentures from disposing of or taking any other action with respect to the securities constituting the trust res. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals held that even though the title of the guarantor corporation be assumed to be superior to that of the corporation which had issued the bonds, nevertheless, since a default had occurred, the guarantor corporation had lost all rights in the securities under the terms of the trust indentures, and therefore the Bankruptcy Court had no jurisdiction to enjoin or restrain the trustees from performing the duties imposed upon them by the respective trust indentures.

Warder v. Brady, 115 Fed. (2d) 89, is exactly in point. There a trustee for a debtor in a reorganization proceeding sought to obtain possession of certain monies which, pursuant to the order of a state court in a prior receivership proceeding, had been deposited by the debtor in a sinking fund to secure the repayment of certain obligations. The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, in holding that the sinking fund did not constitute property of the debtor, said: "A sinking fund under a bond mortgage is a trust fund, the title to which passes from the debtor to the trustee who holds it for the benefit of the bondholders." See also: Seaboard Terminals Corporation v. Western Maryland Railway Co., 108 Fed. (2d) 911.

The situation is not at all the same as that presented to this Court in Continental Illinois National Bank and Trust Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 294 U. S. 648, so strongly relied upon by the Debtor in the Circuit Court of Appeals. There this Court upheld an injunction restraining the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and certain banks from disposing of securities held by them as collateral for the payment of obligations of the debtor corporation, but it appeared that the value of the securities held as collateral exceeded the debtor corporation's obligations secured by the collateral, by $28,000,000 in one case and $10,000,000 in another case. As a matter of fact the total value of all collateral was more than three times the total amount of the debtor corporation's obligations secured by the collateral. This Court held that the injunction was proper and necessary in order to protect these equities of $38,000,000 which equities, as this Court pointed out, constituted property of the debtor.

In the Rock Island case the assets in question were merely pledged and title thereto remained in the debtor corporation subject to a lien; here title to the assets in question passed completely from the Debtor prior to bankruptcy and was then and is now vested in a trustee. There the debtor corporation had a tremendous equity in the assets in question since the liens against the same amounted to less than one-third of the value of the assets; here the Debtor has no equity whatsoever in the trust assets and the value of the assets is actually less than the Debtor's obligations, the payment of which they secure. In the Rock Island case the injunction was upheld as a temporary measure to grant the debtor a reasonable delay and opportunity to satisfy its obligations without a forced sale of the collateral; in the case at bar the court has not only enjoined a sale or other disposition of the trust assets, it has also declared that such trust assets constitute property of the Debtor. Certainly the Rock Island case is no authority for such action.

We also submit that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Re Central Funding Corporation, 75 Fed. (2d) 256, cited by the Debtor, is not pertinent. That case involved a turnover order entered after the approval of a plan of reorganization which was binding upon the beneficiaries of the trust and which provided for a termination of the trust. The order was entered pursuant to Section 227 of Chapter X which authorizes the court to require the execution of such instruments as may be necessary to effect a transfer of property dealt with by a plan which has been confirmed. In other words, the debtor and the beneficiaries of the trust entered into an agreement with respect to their mutual rights, which agreement provided for a termination of the trust and a transfer of the trust property to the debtor. The court merely required the trustee, who had no further interest in the trust property, to surrender the same in accordance with the plan. That is, of course, far different from the situation in the case at bar.

We respectfully submit, therefore, that the cash and securities held in trust by the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland for the Maryland contract holders of the Debtor do not constitute property of the Debtor. While we have been discussing this point primarily in connection with the Maryland statute, the same reasoning applies to the statutes of the other states, and it is our contention that none of the deposited securities constitute property of the Debtor. This being so, the bankruptcy court has no jurisdiction or control over the deposited securities and not only can it not require the state officials to turn over the same to the trustee appointed in this proceeding, but neither can it enjoin the state officials from disposing of the deposited securities in accordance with the laws of their respective states.

3. The State Officials Having Possession Of The State Deposits Are Immune From The Judicial Process Of The Federal Courts Under The Eleventh Amendment To The Federal Constitution.

The Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that "the Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State or by Citizens or subjects of any Foreign State". The respondents contend that this provision of the Constitution is a direct prohibition against any suit or action, or other proceeding or order, summary or plenary, in the District Court or any other federal court to take possession of or exercise authority over the securities heretofore deposited with officials of the various states. On the other hand the petitioners contend that the Eleventh Amendment is not applicable because the turnover orders and the injunction order are not directed against any state as such, but only against the state officials as individuals.

It is true that these orders were not directed against any State by name and were directed only against certain named state officers, but they were directed against such state officers in their official capacities and the Eleventh Amendment covers "not only suits brought against a state by name, but those also against its officers, agents and representatives, where the State, though not named as such, is nevertheless the only real party against which alone in fact the relief is asked, and against which the judgment or decree effectively operates". Ex Parte Ayers, 123 U. S. 505, 506. It has long been settled that the Eleventh Amendment will bar the action where the State officer or agent named as defendant has no personal interest in the controversy but is acting solely for and on behalf of the State. See Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711; Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., 109 U. S. 446; Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S. 52; Murray v. Wilson Distilling Co., 213 U. S. 151; Worcester County Co. v. Riley, 302 U. S. 292; and Read v. National Equity Life Insurance Co., 114 Fed. (2d) 977.

In the present case the State of Maryland, by valid statute, heretofore required the Debtor to assign to and deposit with the Insurance Commissioner certain securities to be held, in the language of the statute, "in trust, as security for all the holders of contracts or other obligations heretofore or hereafter sold, negotiated, issued, or accrued in said company in the State of Maryland". While the State of Maryland itself has no direct pecuniary interest in the securities so assigned to and deposited with the Insurance Commissioner, the legal title to said securities has passed from the Debtor and is now in the State of Maryland, or its agent the Insurance Commissioner, as Trustee for certain citizens of Maryland. The purposes of the trust are explicitly set forth in the statute, and the persons who are the beneficiaries thereof are clearly designated. The Trustee (the State of Maryland, or its Insurance Commissioner) has legal title and possession of the securities, and clearly, therefore, any action to obtain possession of the securities must be directed against the Insurance Commissioner, not in his private or individual capacity, but in his capacity as an agent of the State of Maryland. This being the case, the State of Maryland is the real party defendant.

This proceeding was instituted by the Debtor and the action of the Court in requiring the Insurance Commissioner of the State of Maryland to turn over, and in enjoining him from selling or otherwise disposing of the securities now held by him must necessarily be predicated upon the contention that the securities constitute property of the Debtor. But the title in the Debtor thus asserted is here disputed, and title to the securities in question is claimed by the Insurance Commissioner of the State of Maryland not as an individual, but as an officer of the State of Maryland. It is not possible to assert title in the Debtor without controverting the title of the State of Maryland and its officer. Since the State of Maryland, through its officer, has possession, any action to take possession away from it or to interfere with such possession is directed against the State of Maryland as the real party in interest. It is not necessary, in order to assert immunity from suit, that the State hold title for its own benefit. It is enough that title is in the State, or its officer, even though held by it or him as Trustee for the benefit of others. Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., 109 U. S. 446.

Lankford v. Platte Iron Works, 235 U. S. 461, and the companion case of Farish v. State Banking Board, 235 U. S. 498, are squarely in point. There the State of Oklahoma had provided by statute for the creation of a depositors' Guaranty Fund to be sustained by contributions required to be paid by the banks in the State, the Fund to be disbursed for the purpose of liquidating deposits of failed banks. Administration of the Fund was committed to the Oklahoma State Banking Board, and certain depositors of a failed bank filed suit in the federal court to require the Banking Board to pay their claims. This Court dismissed the action on the ground that the State Banking Board was immune from suit under the Eleventh Amendment, even though the contention was made that the Fund was not under the executive or legislative control of the State, and could be used solely for the purpose of paying depositors of failed banks; in other words, that the Fund was held in trust for private persons and the State had no pecuniary interest in it. This court held, however, that even if the Fund were not a State Fund, it was at least a Fund under the management of the State, through its officers, and that the federal court had no jurisdiction to subject the management of the Fund to judicial control.

The Debtor relied strongly upon Hobbs v. Occidental Life Insurance Co., 87 Fed. (2d) 380, where it was held that an order requiring the Insurance Commissioner of Kansas to surrender certain securities to a federal court receiver of an insolvent insurance company was not a proceeding against the State of Kansas in violation of the Eleventh Amendment. However, the facts in that case were quite different from those in the case at bar. There the securities were held for the benefit of policy holders of the insurance company, all of whom were parties to the receivership proceeding. With the approval of the Court, an arrangement was made with another insurance company whereby it assumed all the liabilities of the insolvent insurance company and took title to all of its assets. This arrangement was approved by all except 28 out of 27,000 policy holders, and the 28 dissenting policy holders were paid the amount of their claims. Thereafter the turnover order against the Insurance Commissioner was entered, but, as the Court pointed out, the insolvent insurance company had no further liabilities after the other insurance company had assumed all of the liabilities and the policy holders had acquiesced therein. Thus it appeared that the purposes of the deposit had been fulfilled and that the Insurance Commissioner was not acting in conformity with his state law in retaining the same.

In the Hobbs case the court distinguished the Lankford case on the ground that in the Lankford case title to the fund was in the State, even though the real beneficiaries of the fund were private persons. Here too title to the securities is in the State of Maryland, although the beneficiaries of the trust are citizens of the State, and it would, therefore, appear that the Lankford rather than the Hobbs case is analagous to the case at bar.

The District Court, apparently conceding that the State, through its agent, was a party, held that "here the state is only a nominal and not a real party in interest", and that since the order of August 9, 1941, did not affect the States' "political or property rights" the Eleventh Amendment was not applicable. But every distinction which the District Court points out could apply with equal force to the situation in the Lankford case and yet this Court held in that case that the suit was barred by the Eleventh Amendment.

The District Court cited only two cases in addition to the Hobbs case: Morrill v. American Reserve Bond Co., 151 Fed. 305, and Porter v. Beha, 12 Fed. (2d) 513. The Morrill case was a case at nisi prius decided in 1907, eight years before the decision of this Court in the Lankford case, and much of the language of the court in that case has been overruled by the decision in the Lankford case. The facts in the Porter case are quite different from those in the case at bar, but it is not necessary to discuss these facts in detail because the court there clearly pointed out the distinction between that case and the Lankford case when it said: "Of course, a state may prefer to pursue a position of ownership of assets of insolvent or embarrassed corporations, * * * but New York has not assumed that position."

In the present case the securities held by the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland were not merely deposited with him as collateral security for the payment of a debt, but title to the securities was actually vested in the Insurance Commissioner of the State of Maryland; not in the particular person who might for the time being hold that office, but in that officer of the State of Maryland. Obviously this is the same thing as saying that title was vested in the State of Maryland. It is true that the State held title not for its own benefit, but as Trustee; but hold title it did, and the securities were not only physically delivered but they were at all times registered in the name of the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland as Trustee.

We respectfully submit that the situation is exactly the same as that presented to this Court in the Lankford case, and that the decision in that case is controlling here.

4. The Turnover Orders and the Injunction Order Were an Abuse of Discretion.

The rights of the secured contract holders cannot be cut down (Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., 308 U. S. 106; Consolidated Rock Products Co. v. Du Bois, 312 U. S. 510), and unless the state statutes are held to be wholly ineffective and to be completely disregarded in determining the rights of the secured contract holders, no possible advantage can be gained by enjoining the various state officials from liquidating the trust property in their hands and making a distribution thereof to the beneficiaries of the trust. On the other hand, there is an ever present danger that delay will result in serious loss to the secured contract holders by depreciation in the value of the securities held in trust for them by the state officials in their respective states. Accordingly, even if it be assumed arguendo that the turnover orders and the injunction order were not void under the Eleventh Amendment and that the District Court had a discretionary power to enjoin disposition of the deposited securities pending the outcome of the reorganization proceeding, we nevertheless submit that the District Court abused its discretion in entering the turnover orders and the injunction order under the circumstances of the case.

As pointed out by Mr. Justice FRANKFURTER in Railroad Commission v. Pullman Co., 312 U. S. 496, 500-501: "Few public interests have a higher claim upon the discretion of a federal chancellor than the avoidance of needless friction with state policies, whether the policy relates to the enforcement of the criminal law * * *; or the administration of a specialized scheme for liquidating embarrassed business enterprises * * *; or the final authority of a state court to interpret doubtful regulatory laws of the state * * *. These cases reflect a doctrine of abstention appropriate to our federal system whereby the federal courts, 'exercising a wise discretion,' restrain their authority because of 'scrupulous regard for the rightful independence of the state governments' and for the smooth working of the federal judiciary. * * * This use of equitable powers is a contribution of the courts in furthering the harmonious relation between state and federal authority without the need of rigorous congressional restriction of those powers." See also Palmer v. Massachusetts, 308 U. S. 79, 89.

Had the District Court followed these precepts, it never would have entered an ex parte order requiring duly constituted officials in 15 states to turn over and surrender to a trust company in Charleston, West Virginia, over twenty million dollars of securities which had been deposited with such officials by Fidelity pursuant to the laws of their respective states. Such an order was clearly entered in complete disregard of the rights and duties of such state officials with respect to the deposited securities.

Not only have the federal courts restrained their authority because of "scrupulous regard for the rightful independence of the state governments", but the Congress also has wisely refrained from giving even the federal bankruptcy courts authority over certain kinds of business enterprises which are strictly regulated by the states and supervised by means of extensive administrative machinery set up under state statutes. It was for this reason that insurance companies, banks, and similar companies were excluded from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. For similar reasons, the Congress, although authorizing the bankruptcy courts to reject executory contracts, excepted "contracts in the public authority".[7]

[7] Sections 116(1) and 216(4) of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Secs. 516(1) and 616(4)). It might well be contended that the state statutes are in the nature of contracts between Fidelity and the respective states, since Fidelity could enter said states and transact business therein only in accordance with the terms and provisions of such statutes. Having transacted business pursuant to the statutes, Fidelity accepted the terms and provisions thereof, including the provisions with respect to deposits. These contracts are executory in the sense that the obligation of the Debtor to maintain the market value of the trust res still exists even though the Debtor has discontinued the sale of its contracts, and are also executory in that the trusts created by the contracts have not yet terminated and will not terminate until the payment of all obligations of the Debtor to contract holders in the respective states.

Even if it should be determined that Fidelity was not an insurance company, it was nevertheless in that class of corporations which are extensively regulated by the states. The federal courts, even if not prohibited from so doing by the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, should be extremely loath to issue turnover orders or injunction orders directed against state officials requiring them to turn over securities, or enjoining them from disposing of securities deposited with them pursuant to state law by such corporations.

These considerations have particular weight in situations such as that here presented where, if the state deposit laws are accorded that validity and effectiveness which neither the petitioners nor the Securities and Exchange Commission deny, the surrender of the state deposits to the Trustee for the Debtor would be an utterly futile act since the securities making up the deposits would be sold and the proceeds thereof turned over to the same contract holders who would have received the money had the deposits not been surrendered. The only thing accomplished would be a liquidation by the Trustee for the Debtor rather than by the duly constituted and experienced state authorities acting pursuant to their respective state statutes. If the contract holders in the respective states are ultimately to receive their distributive shares of the securities deposited in their states for their protection (which would clearly be the result unless the state deposit laws are to be entirely abrogated) why raise grave constitutional questions involving the respective spheres of the state and federal governments to accomplish a futile end? At the same time there would be no benefit to the contract holders but only loss and inconvenience caused by the unnecessary delay and by requiring them to travel many hundreds of miles from their homes in order to vindicate their rights.

We, therefore, respectfully submit that even if the District Court did have a discretionary power to enter an injunction order, it should have stayed its hand in order to avoid a needless conflict with state policies, as exemplified by the various state deposit statutes affecting Fidelity.

Summary.

We earnestly urge that the fundamental issue presented by this case is whether the federal courts of bankruptcy have such jurisdiction and control over securities deposited by debtor corporations with state officials pursuant to valid state regulatory laws as to empower the bankruptcy courts to seize such state deposits and thereby, in effect, abrogate the state statutes. If not, then this proceeding is at an end because it is idle to talk of reorganizing the Debtor without having control of the state deposits. We submit that the state deposit laws are valid regulatory statutes which cannot be superseded by any supposedly "paramount" powers of the bankruptcy courts, that the Eleventh Amendment bars any attempt by the bankruptcy courts to require the state officials to surrender the state deposits, and that the state deposits are not property of the Debtor. We also respectfully submit that even aside from these considerations it was an abuse of discretion, under the circumstances of this case, for the District Court to enter the turnover orders and the injunction order, and that due regard for the delicate nature of the relationship between the federal courts and the states should have caused the District Court to stay its hand.

II.

THE PETITION OF THE DEBTOR SHOULD BE DISMISSED BECAUSE IT IS UNREASONABLE TO EXPECT THAT A PLAN OF REORGANIZATION CAN BE EFFECTED.

Section 141 of the Bankruptcy Act (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Sec. 541) provides that "Upon the filing of a petition by a debtor, the judge shall enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it if not so satisfied." Section 146(3) of the Bankruptcy Act (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Sec. 546(3)) provides: "Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term 'good faith', a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if * * * (3) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected." It is our contention that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization of Fidelity can be effected and that, therefore, the petition of the Debtor should have been dismissed.

The Findings of the Courts Below.

The District Court in that portion of its opinion dealing with this issue (R. 194-197) apparently proceeded on the assumption that not only was the burden on the respondents to establish that it was unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization of the Debtor could be effected, but that it was incumbent upon the respondents to show that it would be impossible to reorganize Fidelity. Under the law, however, the burden is upon the Debtor to sustain this issue and it is incumbent upon the Debtor to prove that it is not unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected. Marine Harbor Properties, Inc., v. Manufacturers' Trust Co., No. 24, this Term, decided November 9, 1942.

On the evidence before it the District Court found that the prospects for the rehabilitation and continued operation of the Debtor were to say the least far from promising. The court said: "The proceedings are not yet at a stage where the court is called upon to consider any particular plan of reorganization. It is true that the broad picture developed by the testimony at the hearing does not present a very favorable view with respect to the rehabilitation and continued operation of the Debtor as a face amount certificate company. Whether the Fidelity plan is fundamentally unsound depends upon the definition given to that term. It is apparent that it is a plan of investment which yields a very low rate of income to the investor and subjects the investor to substantial loss should he cease to pay the required installments during the early stages of the contract; but this very element of weakness from the investor's standpoint strengthens the company from an operating viewpoint, provided the contracts can be sold in sufficient volume to take care of the necessary overhead expenses. It is extremely doubtful whether, in view of unsettled economic conditions and the critical international situation, the Fidelity plan would any longer appeal to a large public; but it is not impossible; and it is not the duty of the court to decide for the public that investors will not or should not buy these contracts in the future." (R. 194-195).[8]

Viewing the situation in an entirely different light, the Circuit Court of Appeals, after stating the conclu-

[8] This last conclusion of the District Judge is at variance with the general rule stated in Finletter, The Law of Bankruptcy Reorganization, pp. 62 and 63, as follows: "The nature of the business of the debtor is important in determining feasibility. A public utility or large industrial company with a prosperous history carries with it almost a presumption of the necessity for its continuance as a going concern. On the other hand the courts will inquire carefully into the feasibility of a reorganization of an enterprise of no public importance which has not proven that there is a demand by the public for its product."

sions of the District Court, said: "This resumé of the District Judge presents a dark picture of the company's future. Nevertheless, it suggests that some plan of reorganization not yet formulated, much less proposed by any person financially able to carry it into effect, may not be impossible. We think it is our duty to review the situation realistically, and when this is done, there appears to be no reasonable hope of a reorganization of the business as a going concern, but only the immediate need of a liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of the contract holders. Obviously there will be nothing left for the stockholders. * * * Moreover, as the District Judge points out, it is quite doubtful whether this form of investment presents any further appeal to a public that has now been informed as to the nature of the business; certainly the possibility that thousands of contract holders could be persuaded to modify their contracts and scale down their claims to enable the company to go on is so remote as to exist only in the imagination. No proposal for the investment of new capital has been forthcoming." (R. 259-260).

Contentions of the Petitioners.

As a matter of fact the Securities and Exchange Commission in the argument before the Circuit Court of Appeals admitted that there was virtually no hope whatsoever for the rehabilitation and reorganization of Fidelity as a face amount certificate company or as any other kind of going concern; they frankly stated that liquidation was practically inevitable. And even in this Court the Securities and Exchange Commission does not seriously argue that Fidelity can be reorganized as a going concern; they, in fact, admit that the possibility of its rehabilitation as a going concern is "negligible". (S. E. C. brief, p. 46). On the other hand, the Debtor and the Trustee, still holding fast to the illusion that somehow, in some way, Fidelity can be reorganized, refuse to give up hope and argue that there is "much testimony of qualified witnesses that in the opinion of such witnesses Fidelity can be reorganized". In support of this argument they refer to the testimony of seven witnesses. In order to show clearly the essential weakness of the testimony thus relied upon, we have printed as Appendix B to our brief, excerpts from the testimony of these witnesses which show its vague nature and the wholly insufficient reasons given by each of the witnesses for his opinion. In a large measure this testimony speaks for itself and needs but little comment.

The witness D. A. Burt, a stockholder of Fidelity, did testify that in his opinion Fidelity could be reorganized but his testimony clearly shows that he was expressing a fond hope rather than an intelligent opinion (App. B, p. 30). He admitted that a number of problems existed in connection with any possible reorganization and that he had not made any study of the matter; and he refused point-blank to indicate any opinion as to what form a reorganization should take. He recognized that new capital would be required but offered no suggestions as to how it could be raised. He also thought the present stockholders ought to have some equities in the new company. He talked a great deal about the supposed advantages of the Fidelity plan and pointed out that he and other members of his family had purchased contracts, but when asked whether he or any of the members of his family still owned such contracts at the time of the institution of this proceeding he said he didn't know.

The witness Hubert F. Young, an employee interested in keeping his job, also testified that in his opinion Fidelity should be reorganized and offered three suggestions: (1) that a mutual insurance company be formed, (2) that a new company with new capital take over the liabilities under the contracts on the basis of the liquidating value of the various funds, and (3) that Fidelity merge with another insurance company. However, he admitted that he did not see much possibility of a merger and offered no suggestions as to how the new capital could be raised although he admitted that under the Investment Act of 1940 a capital of $50,000 was required of old companies, and $200,000 of new companies. He finally indicated that he had in mind some vague idea of creating a capital structure by reducing the liabilities to the contract holders to 70% or 80% of the full amount. When pressed about the hazard to contract holders in investing funds of the company in semi-speculative and speculative securities, he replied: "Well, if they didn't they would probably lose their money some other way in my opinion." (App. B, p. 87).

Auditor Sims testified that when he had filed the bill of complaint for the appointment of receivers in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County he had "hoped" that the company could be reorganized and had a "thin and nebulous" idea that in some way the "company could be mutualized and turned over to the contract holders". On the other hand, he expressed the very emphatic opinion that Fidelity could not be reorganized as an annuity company, and pointed out that "twenty-six of the biggest insurance companies in the last five years have lost $66,000,000 on annuity contracts". (App. B, p. 88).

The witness H. Isaiah Smith indicated clearly that he was not qualified as an expert to express an opinion and that his personal opinion that Fidelity should be reorganized was based solely upon the fact that "with the assets the size that Fidelity has, a reorganization of some sort can be done". He further indicated that he had no idea what kind of a plan could be worked out and that he did not know whether any plan could be worked out which would be approved by two-thirds of the creditors or contract holders. He had only the vaguest idea of what might be accomplished and frankly admitted that he had not tried to work out even an outline of a plan of reorganization. (R. 483).

The witness Allen G. Messick, in a broad general way, indicated that in some way not explained by him Fidelity could be reorganized. This was the same man who had been brought into the company for the specific purpose of putting it on its feet and raising new capital and who had for two years tried, without success, to reorganize it. At one time, in company with another individual, he entered into a contract with Fidelity to furnish additional capital of $500,000 but, for reasons of his own, failed to carry out the contract. Certainly the testimony of such a witness is entitled to no consideration.

The witness Raymond Latta, an actuary, had been employed in 1940 by Fidelity for the specific purpose of assisting in working out some plan of reorganization. He had made tentative studies as to several proposed plans of reorganization, none of which were carried to fruition and all of which contemplated a reduction in the claims of the contract holders. He did not testify that in his opinion Fidelity could or should be reorganized. As a matter of fact the District Court refused to permit him to express his opinion on this question and insisted that he was qualified only to express an opinion as to whether or not it was actuarily possible to formulate a plan of reorganization (R. 1105-1106). As to this, the answer of the witness was in the affirmative because, as he pointed out (App. B, pp. 91-92), almost anything is actuarily possible. The record shows that if he had been permitted to express his opinion, he would have testified that it was unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization could be effected and that the Debtor can never be reorganized either as a face amount certificate company or as a life insurance company.

The witness Howard E. Reed, another employee, whose duties had been to make speeches promoting the Fidelity plan, expressed the opinion that Fidelity could be reorganized but he indicated that the only basis for his opinion was "purely from the sales standpoint". He thought there was a great field for the Fidelity contract (R. 737). His opinion was influenced by the fact that he thought the Franklin Life Insurance Company was doing well in the sale of annuity contracts (R. 735-736); and yet the Vice-President of the same Franklin Life Insurance Company later testifying on behalf of the respondents stated that that company had undertaken to sell a contract very similar to the Fidelity contract, had instituted an aggressive sales campaign similar to that conducted by Fidelity, had employed a number of the salesmen who had been with Fidelity, but had found results very disappointing (R. 1016-1018). He further pointed out that the Franklin sales volume on this contract reached a peak of $300,000 in April, 1941, but by June, 1941, with the Defense Bond program competing very seriously, it had dropped to $100,000 and had been below that ever since (R. 1018).

Mr. John E. Marshall, Sr., large stockholder, general counsel and prime mover in Fidelity's affairs for a number of years, testified "I have not any idea of the plan, have not worked on the plan, and don't feel that I am competent to work on it. I have hoped some plan could be worked out * * * I would not even sit here as a witness and say a plan could be promulgated * * *" (R. 420).

The witness Henry M. Steussy who had had long experience in selling Fidelity contracts, testified that in his opinion Fidelity could not be reorganized (R. 1027-1028, 1039-1040).

The witness Tom Foulk, General Attorney for Fidelity, testified that in his opinion Fidelity could not be reorganized. He said: "I felt that so far as an investment company was concerned that we were done. I couldn't see any possibility to carry on in the investment field. We couldn't qualify and go ahead under the Investment Act of 1940, and I felt that that type of business had had its day * * *" (R. 944-946).

Even at this late date, after having had complete charge of the Debtor's affairs for twenty months, and with full opportunity to make such investigations as might be necessary, neither the Trustee nor the Debtor are able to present even an outline of a proposed plan of reorganization, nor are they able to suggest in any tangible way what kind of a plan of reorganization might possibly be effected. The most they are able to do is to suggest three possibilities: (1) that some insurance or investment company might be found to take over or buy the assets of Fidelity and issue to Fidelity contract holders investment certificates or insurance policies which might be worth more than the contract holders would get through liquidation, (2) that a beneficial merger might be worked out with some other investment company or insurance company, and (3) that the organization of some kind of a mutual company is not beyond the realm of consideration. (Debtor-Trustee's brief, pp.

47-48). It is argued that these are "suggestions" supported by the record, and "thoughts" which should not be relegated to the realm of mere possibilities as distinguished from probabilities until there has been some opportunity to transform them into realities (Debtor-Trustee's brief, p. 48). However, not only does the record not support these "suggestions" and "thoughts", it clearly refutes them.

The Debtor's own witness Hubert F. Young, made it clear that there was no basis for hope that some other insurance or investment company would buy Fidelity's assets or be interested in a merger with Fidelity, because, as he pointed out, Fidelity had no advantage to offer to any other company (R., 631). The same opinion was expressed by the witness Steussy who said Fidelity "has lost that which a company taking it over is after—the sales organization. It has disappeared, disassembled and disintegrated" (R. 1027-1028). And is it not reasonable to suppose that if there were any possibility of a merger with another investment company or insurance company, that some such company would certainly have long since communicated with the Trustee and suggested such a merger?

The Debtor and the Trustee infer that an insurance company could issue to each of the contract holders of Fidelity; insurance policies which would be worth more than the contract holders would receive in liquidation and they conclude that such an arrangement would afford the contract holders the benefit, in whole or in part, of the cost of selling the insurance. Not only is there no evidence whatsoever to support this conclusion, but a moment's reflection will indicate clearly that it is false. In the first place, no insurance company could issue policies to all the contract holders without regard to their insurability, and in the second place, no insurance company could issue to a contract holder an insurance policy in any amount greater than his equity would buy on the basis of the ordinary insurance rates applicable to him. In other words, the contract holder would get no more than if he took his dividend in liquidation and made his own independent purchase of insurance.

The suggestion is also made that at least "the solvent funds or series of Fidelity contracts might be reorganized" and the statement is made that the Series A, B, C, and D funds are solvent (Debtor-Trustee's brief, pp. 46, 48). But, as pointed out by the Securities and Exchange Commission (S. E. C. brief, p. 8) the solvency of the funds depends upon the extent to which their inter-fund accounts receivable are collectible assets, so it cannot be stated that there is any one fund which is definitely solvent. In addition, the Debtor's suggestion is based upon the assumption that the state deposits will be entirely disregarded because otherwise it is not possible to talk about reorganizing one or more of the Fidelity funds or series. The state deposits cut across all series funds and the series fund theories advanced by the Debtor and the Trustee are untenable unless the rights of the contract holders with respect to the state deposits can be eliminated from consideration.

We respectfully submit that not only has the Debtor failed utterly in meeting the burden of proving that it is not unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected, but all of the evidence demonstrates beyond peradventure of a doubt that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected.

Actually, neither the Debtor nor the Trustee nor the Securities and Exchange Commission have any real hope that Fidelity can be reorganized either as a face amount certificate company or as an insurance company. Their main reliance is upon the contention that "a slow, orderly and unified" liquidation is a method of reorganization within the meaning of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. The Circuit Court of Appeals did not pass upon this question because it concluded that if liquidation were inevitable, the interests of the contract holders would be best subserved in the state court proceedings. The District Court, however, did conclude that "it is not necessary that there be a reasonable prospect for the successful rehabilitation of the Debtor as a going or continuing corporation. It is sufficient if it is shown that the Debtor is in a position to conform to and obtain the benefits of the statute for a slow, beneficial and orderly liquidation." (R. 196).

There are two clear answers to this contention: (1) that a "slow, beneficial and orderly liquidation" is not a plan of reorganization within the meaning of Chapter X, and (2) that even if a plan providing for the creation of some sort of liquidating corporation to conduct a slow and orderly liquidation of the Debtor's assets could be considered a plan of reorganization within the meaning of Chapter X, nevertheless there has been no showing in this case that any such plan is necessary or would be beneficial to the contract holders, or that it is reasonable to expect that any such plan could be effected.

We will not in this brief attempt to argue fully the first point because we understand that it will be fully discussed in the Wisconsin-Iowa brief. We do wish to point out, however, that liquidation is the antithesis of reorganization and it would indeed seem anomalous to use a statute expressly adopted for the purpose of providing the machinery for reorganization of corporations as a vehicle to accomplish the liquidation of a corporation, particularly when the Bankruptcy Act itself provides other machinery for the liquidation of insolvent corporations. In addition, Section 236 of Chapter X (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Sec. 636) specifically provides that if no plan of reorganization is consummated, the judge may either direct that bankruptcy be proceeded with, or dismiss the proceeding under Chapter X. If liquidation can be accomplished under the guise of a plan of reorganization under Chapter X why authorize the court to direct that bankruptcy be proceeded with or to dismiss the petition for reorganization if no plan is consummated? It should also be observed that Section 146(3) of Chapter X would be virtually nullified if a slow and orderly liquidation could be deemed a plan of reorganization because there could always be a plan providing for liquidation and it would, therefore, never be unreasonable to expect that such a plan could be effected.

The petitioners argue that Section 216(10) of Chapter X (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Sec. 616(10)) provides that a plan of reorganization may include the sale of all or any part of the debtor's property and the distribution of all or any of its assets, or the proceeds derived from the sale thereof among those having an interest therein. But we submit this is not the effect of Section 216(10). Section 216 sets out a number of things which must be included and some things which may be included in any plan of reorganization, and paragraph 10 of this section requires that a plan "shall provide adequate means for the execution of the plan, which may include", among other things, the sale of all or any part of the debtor's assets. This is not at all the same as saying that a plan providing for the sale of all of the assets and the distribution of the proceeds thereof is a plan of reorganization. Paragraph 10 merely gives broad power for the consummation of a real plan of reorganization and the portions thereof relied upon by the petitioners should be read in connection with paragraph 7, which requires that a plan shall provide for any non-accepting creditors "adequate protection for the realization by them of the value of their claims against the property dealt with by the plan" either by the transfer or sale or retention by the debtor of the property subject to the claims, or by a sale of such property free of claims, at not less than a fair upset price. In other words, the portions of paragraph 10 relied upon by the petitioners are merely included to carry into effect those provisions which must, under paragraph 7, be included in a plan in order to fully protect non-assenting lien creditors.

Aside from these considerations, the contention of the petitioners that it is not unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected because there is a necessity for a slow and orderly liquidation which can be accomplished only through the means of a proceeding under Chapter X, is without foundation. There is no special problem in disposing of the assets of the Debtor in spite of what might be said as to the rating of the securities deposited with the various states. The deposited securities constitute 95% of the assets of the Debtor and with the possible exception of some few securities deposited with the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia, all of them are readily marketable. Of the remaining 5% of the assets, one-half is represented by cash and the other one-half by tangible assets. Only about $350,000 or $400,000 of assets, or approximately 2% of the total assets, is represented by real estate. Certainly this is no indication that a slow liquidation is required. Certainly there is no necessity of continuing this proceeding under Chapter X merely in order to work out a plan to liquidate assets, practically all of which are readily marketable securities.

We, therefore, respectfully submit that even if it were admitted, for the purposes of argument, that under some circumstances a slow and orderly liquidation might be deemed a plan of reorganization, certainly this is not such a case, and there has been no showing whatsoever that there is any necessity for a slow and orderly liquidation by means of some new corporation to be created for that purpose, and no showing whatsoever that any such course of action would be in the slightest degree beneficial to the creditors of Fidelity.

III.

THE PETITION OF THE DEBTOR SHOULD BE DISMISSED BECAUSE IT APPEARS THAT THE INTERESTS OF THE CREDITORS WOULD BE BEST SUBSERVED IN THE PRIOR PENDING STATE COURT PROCEEDINGS.

Section 146(4) of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act (U. S. C. Tit. 11, Sec. 546(4)) provides: "Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the term 'good faith', a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if * * * (4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of the creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding."

It is conceded by all parties that the stockholders have no further interest in Fidelity, and it is likewise conceded that the West Virginia state court proceeding and other state court proceedings were prior pending.

proceedings. Accordingly, if it appears that the interests of creditors would be best subserved in such prior pending state court proceedings, then the Debtor's petition was not filed in good faith, and it should have been dismissed.

Contentions of the Petitioners.

Most of the petitioners' argument on this point is directed to a showing that the proceedings in the several state courts are not under any reorganization statute, and that there is no single prior pending state court proceeding, that is, that there is no one state court having jurisdiction over all of the assets of Fidelity. It is said that the prior pending state court proceedings are mere equity receiverships and that all of these proceedings lack the safeguards provided by Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. A number of "safeguards" which it is argued are of benefit to the contract holders of the Debtor, are referred to (Petitioners' brief, pp. 53-54), but it will be noted that with possibly two exceptions all of them pertain to the preparation, submission and approval of a plan of reorganization and would, therefore, be pertinent only if there were some hope of reorganization. The only safeguards which could possibly be said to have any bearing apart from a plan of reorganization, are the report to creditors as to the value of their respective interests, and "the independent appraisal of the assets of the Debtor's estate by the Securities and Exchange Commission". As to the first, it is sufficient to say that a report to creditors showing the extent of their interests is not peculiar to Chapter X, and we think we can safely say that all creditors will be advised of their interests in the Debtor's assets and the value thereof, in the pending state court proceedings. With respect to the suggested independent appraisal by the Securities and Exchange Commission of the Debtor's assets, we can say merely that not only do we find no provision in Chapter X for such an appraisal or valuation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, but the Securities and Exchange Commission has not indicated in this proceeding that it has the facilities for making such an appraisal or that it will undertake to do so. As a matter of fact, practically all of the assets consist of securities, which do not present any difficult problems of valuation. The remaining assets are largely real estate, which constitute possibly 2% of the Debtor's assets.

It is true that none of the prior pending state court proceedings were instituted under the provisions of any state reorganization statute. We would also be willing to concede, for the purposes of argument, that if it were reasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization (as distinguished from a plan of liquidation) could be effected, the "safeguards" provided by Chapter X and relied upon by the petitioners might well be considered in determining whether the interests of creditors would be better subserved in the proceeding under Chapter X or in the prior pending state court proceedings. Marine Harbor Properties, Inc. v. Manufacturers' Trust Co., No. 24, this Term, decided November 9, 1942. But here, where there is no real hope of a reorganization, and when it is practically conceded that liquidation is not only inevitable but is for the best interests of the contract holders, these safeguards have no real bearing. They are important only if there is a reasonable prospect that a plan of reorganization can be effected. If there is to be a liquidation, then there will be no plan of reorganization to be reported on by the Securities and Exchange Commission or approved by the court.

The Circuit Court of Appeals held, largely on the basis of the findings of fact of the District Court, that it was clearly not feasible to rehabilitate the Debtor as a going concern. The court referred to the fact that this was virtually conceded by the District Court and by the Debtor, the Trustee, and the Securities and Exchange Commission, and it pointed out that the only suggestion made by these parties was that it was feasible to have a "slow and orderly liquidation" in the federal court and that such a "slow and orderly liquidation" was a method of reorganization within the meaning of Chapter X (R. 260). The Circuit Court of Appeals clearly did not pass on the question of whether a "slow and orderly liquidation" was a method of reorganization, but instead held (1) that the record did not justify the conclusion that it was reasonable or feasible or desirable to have a "slow and orderly liquidation" in the federal court, and (2) that since liquidation was inevitable, the question then arose as to whether the interests of the creditors would be best subserved by such a liquidation in the federal court, or by liquidation in the state courts (R. 261-263).[9]

The issue then is not whether Fidelity can best be reorganized in a proceeding under Chapter X or whether the state court proceedings will better serve that purpose since liquidation in some form is inevitable, the issue is simply whether the interests of the creditors can best be subserved by a liquidation in the federal court or by a liquidation in the prior pending state court proceedings.[10] We strongly urge that not only is there a complete failure on the part of the Debtor to show that it was reasonable or feasible or desirable to have a "slow and orderly liquidation" in the federal court (supra, pp. 35-56), but the record shows clearly that the interests of the contract holders would be best subserved by a liquidation in the pending proceedings in the courts of their respective states.

[9] The Securities and Exchange Commission apparently concurs in this construction of the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals. Brief, pp. 28-29.

[10] Of course, as we have pointed out in the argument under Section 146(3), the whole idea of liquidation is completely antagonistic to any concept of reorganization. This being the case there never would be any issue of whether the interests of creditors would be best subserved by a liquidation in the federal court or a Chapter X proceeding. If liquidation appears inevitable, the proceeding should be dismissed under Section 146(3). We, therefore, discuss the point on the same basis the Circuit Court of Appeals did, that is, by assuming arguendo without conceding, that liquidation may be a form of reorganization.

The Contentions of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The Securities and Exchange Commission argues that a liquidation in the federal court rather than in the state courts, is desirable because there are too many state court proceedings, and there is a necessity for a central administration of the Debtor's assets. Three reasons are urged in support of this contention: (1) "the necessity for impartial investigation" of the acts of management of the Debtor, (2) "the necessity for a single administration to settle problems of marshalling assets and of distribution", and (3) "the necessity of orderly procedure to liquidate the assets". Keeping in mind that we are here considering the desirability of a central administration of a liquidation in the federal court, as compared with liquidation in the state courts, we will discuss each of these points.

1. "The necessity for impartial investigation." It is stated that "there are strong indications in the record that extravagance and other serious mismanagement mark Fidelity's history", and it is said that an investigation of possible civil actions on behalf of Fidelity's estate against the officers, directors, and perhaps others, is desirable. Assuming the truth of these statements, we submit that such an investigation is clearly secondary to the principal objective, namely, the liquidation of the state deposits for the benefit of contract holders as expeditiously as possible. There would seem to be no reason whatsoever why the liquidation and distribution of the bulk of the assets to contract holders should be delayed pending an investigation of whether there exist possible civil actions against former officers and directors of the Debtor. Certainly nothing would prevent a liquidation and distribution of the bulk of the assets to contract holders now, and an investigation now or later as to whether they have any such civil rights of action.

It is suggested, however, that problems of venue and jurisdiction would present obstacles to civil suits at the instance of state officials in every state but West Virginia, and that the "interlocking relationships among the officials of Fidelity and the receivers and their counsel" are such as to indicate that there would be no adequate investigation and prosecution of causes of action against Fidelity's management by the officers appointed by the West Virginia state court. Without conceding that it would not be possible for investigations to be made and suits to be instituted at the instance of other state courts, we respectfully submit that there is no justification whatsoever for the inference that the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, would be remiss in its duty and would not appoint impartial disinterested persons to conduct such investigation as might be necessary and to prosecute such suits as might be proper.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the petitioners treat the matter as though the question were whether such investigations could best be conducted by the Central Trust Company, or by Mr. H. Isaiah Smith and Mr. Ross B. Thomas, the West Virginia state court receivers. But we submit that this is not at all the issue. The question is not whether the interests of the creditors will be better protected by the Central Trust Company than by the present West Virginia state court receivers;

the question to be decided is whether the interests of the creditors will be better protected by the federal court or by the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia. In initially appointing receivers, Judge Bouchelle of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, was careful to appoint as one of the receivers a man who had broad previous experience, who had held responsible public positions with honor, who was respected for his honesty and integrity, and who had had no previous connection whatsoever with Fidelity. That Mr. H. Isaiah Smith is such a man is demonstrated by the fact that immediately upon the appointment of Central Trust Company as Trustee herein Mr. Smith, with the approval of the District Court, was employed to aid and assist it in performing its duties as Trustee. He has continued in the employ of the Trustee and, with the possible exception of investment problems, has supervised virtually all of the Debtor's affairs for the Trustee.

No one suggests that Mr. Smith would not be capable of making the impartial investigation which is deemed desirable, but it is contended that his co-receiver, Mr. Ross Thomas, is not in a position to do so because of his previous relationships with Fidelity. But this contention completely ignores the fact that in appointing Mr. Thomas as co-receiver, Judge Bouchelle did so solely because of his familiarity with Fidelity's affairs and his previous broad experience in corporate reorganization matters. Judge Bouchelle had been told that an effort would be made to work out some sort of voluntary partial reorganization of Fidelity, and he appointed Mr. Thomas to aid in this aspect of the receivership, at the same time stating that if it later appeared that no such voluntary plan of reorganization could be worked out, Mr. Thomas would be discharged as receiver. This information was communicated to the District Court by a letter from Judge Bouchelle and there is no reason to suppose that he will not carry out his announced purpose.

The argument of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the petitioners comes simply to this. Because Mr. Ross B. Thomas was appointed one of the receivers for Fidelity by the West Virginia state court, it is now necessary that all the contract holders throughout the country be required to present their claims to the federal court at Charleston, West Virginia, many miles from their homes, and that the proceedings pending in the courts of their own states, which are conveniently located and readily accessible to them, and which would provide a prompt distribution of the assets deposited with their state officials for their protection, shall now be abandoned. We respectfully submit that such a course of action could hardly be said to be in the best interests of the creditors.

2. "The necessity for a single administration to settle problems of marshalling assets and of distribution." It is suggested that there is a "complex task of disentangling the assets of each of the several series in order that they may be properly and effectively marshalled." It is assumed that the reserve funds of each series and the securities in which they were invested were effectively segregated as separate trusts and that the contract holders must be divided into classes by series and their claims limited to the assets which may ultimately be determined to belong to their particular series. At the same time it is recognized that there was no real segregation and it is urged that before distribution can be made "the accounts of the various funds inter sese must be settled". Such a theory of course ignores the fact that pursuant to valid state laws, 95% of the assets of Fidelity have been deposited with various states as security for the contract holders of Fidelity, and if the validity of the state deposits is recognized, the series fund theory of distribution must necessarily fall. (supra, p. 52). Also, this theory ignores the fact that there is no contract provision for a segregation of reserve funds except possibly with respect to Series B, C and D. (supra, p. 14). Series C has only one contract holder (R. 492) and Series D is also comparatively small and was sold only in four states (R. 315).

It is further suggested "that there is a problem whether states may retain securities accepted in disregard of knowledge or notice that the assets deposited belong to particular series funds and were deposited to secure liabilities of other series", and that "should this issue be decided adversely to the states in question, these states might not be able to retain their entire deposits". Here again several erroneous assumptions are made: (1) that states did accept securities for deposit with knowledge or notice that such securities belonged to particular series funds, and (2) that if so, such securities were improperly deposited and, therefore, cannot now be retained.

We have already shown (supra, pp. 9-11) that it is not true that the reserve funds and the securities purchased therefrom were actually segregated by Fidelity. On the contrary, the record shows clearly that although separate books were maintained for the B, C and D series, no actual segregation of securities purchased from the reserve funds of these series was ever even attempted until very recent years, and that even when some little attempt was made to segregate the securities, it was found to be utterly impossible. The record also clearly shows that even if the state laws had permitted separate series deposits and if initially these deposits had been segregated by series, it would have been impossible for Fidelity to function and to have kept separate deposits for each series (R. 586, 608-609, 652).

Likewise, there is no foundation for the statement that the state officials accepted deposits of securities with knowledge that the securities belonged to one particular series fund. We have shown above (supra, pp. 9-10) that none of the securities were earmarked or in any way identified with a particular fund when they were originally deposited. The securities were deposited with the state officials as one general deposit and there was no effort made to advise the state officials that the securities belonged to one series fund or another (R. 586-587).

But even if there had been notice to the state officials at the time securities were deposited that they had been purchased from particular reserve funds, this would not mean that such deposits would now have to be surrendered. None of the state laws provide for a segregation of deposits by series funds. All deposits were in fact general deposits and all of the state laws seem to contemplate only general deposits for the benefit of all contract holders in the state. The idea is advanced that the so-called "improper" deposits can be recaptured on some theory of tracing trust funds, but it must be remembered that the state laws must be read into the contracts as a part thereof and provisions of the contract which are inconsistent therewith must fall. If the state laws do not provide for deposits segregated by series, and for separate trusts, then any provisions in the contracts purporting to create such separate series trust funds cannot be given effect so as to defeat the purpose or requirements of the state deposit laws.

As a matter of fact, all of the contracts specifically provide that the reserve funds shall be invested in securities which shall be deposited in trust as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia. The laws of the State of West Virginia provide for the deposit of the securities in one trust for the benefit of all contract holders except to the extent that securities have been deposited in other states for the protection of contract holders in such states. The contract, therefore, specifically provides not for deposits in trusts segregated as to separate series funds, but deposits in trust pursuant to state deposit laws. The only separate trusts provided for are the trusts for the contract holders in the states which require such deposits in trust.

It is also urged that there may be some conflicts of interest between resident and non-resident contract holders in respect to the deposits in each state and that, therefore, in order to avoid giving the resident contract holders an advantage, both the resident and the non-resident contract holders should be compelled to litigate their rights in the federal court at Charleston, West Virginia. This is certainly a novel proposition. What possible justification is there to require Maryland contract holders to go to the expense and inconvenience of litigating in West Virginia their rights in the Maryland deposit merely because it is possible that residents of Pennsylvania, for instance, may assert some sort of claim adverse to that of the Maryland residents? We completely fail to see the equities of any such procedure. The Maryland contract holders of the Debtor bought their contracts in reliance upon the Maryland law and in the belief that the Debtor deposited in Maryland securities of a sufficient value to protect them (R. 536-537, 921, 936-937, 1048). Contract holders in states not requiring deposits bought their contracts in reliance upon West Virginia law and the deposit with the Treasurer of West Virginia. What possible equitable principle would compel the Maryland contract holders to give up their securities and litigate their right thereto in a court four hundred miles from their residence merely because the other contract holders who relied on the West Virginia law and the West Virginia deposit must assert their claims in West Virginia?

3. "The necessity of orderly procedure to liquidate the assets." The argument that one centralized administration is necessary and essential for the orderly liquidation of the Debtor's assets is based upon the false premise that each state depositary will separately proceed to liquidate immediately "without regard to the overall effect of simultaneous sale", and also fails to take into account that regardless of the rating of the securities held by Fidelity, all of the securities deposited with all of the states, with the possible exception of West Virginia, are readily marketable, that the only securities which might not be readily marketable are deposited with the Treasurer of West Virginia and that the only other assets, such as real estate, which might not be quickly marketable are located in the State of West Virginia.

Assuming that the sale and liquidation of the deposited securities requires careful handling and special supervision, what reason is there to suppose that each state official will proceed to liquidate immediately without regard to the overall effect of simultaneous sale. As said by the Circuit Court of Appeals: "The liquidation in every state in which deposits were made will be subject to the supervision of established governmental departments, as well qualified for the business as the trustee in bankruptcy. There is every reason to believe that the liquidation under their supervision will proceed without needless expense in a careful and expeditious manner so as to save as much as possible for the contract holders" (R. 262).[11] It may be assumed that the state courts supervising the sale of the deposited securities by the state officials and the state receivers will require the liquidation and sale of such securities in an orderly manner so as to realize as much as possible therefor without at the same time running the risk of losing large sums of money by reason of fluctuations in security markets.

Since all of the assets which might be considered not to be readily marketable are concentrated in the West Virginia assets and all of them would come under the control of the Circuit Court for Kanawha County, West Virginia, or the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia in the event this proceeding were dismissed, there would be only one central administration of, or supervision over the sale of such assets, the only difference being that the administration would be in the West Virginia state court instead of in the West Virginia federal court.

The State Laws Should Be Construed by the State Courts.

The argument that a centralized administration of all of the securities deposited with the various state officials is necessary in order to determine judicially the numerous questions alleged to exist with respect to the rights of the various contract holders, is likewise based on a false premise. It is argued that if these various questions are determined by the state courts, fourteen or fifteen separate judicial determinations will be required, and the assumption is made that if there is centralized administration there will be only one judicial determination of one legal question. But of course this is not true. Centralized administration as contended for by the appellees would mean that there would be but one forum for the determination of these numerous legal questions alleged to exist, but there would still have to be a separate judicial determination as to the rights of the contract holders in each of the different states where deposits were maintained by the Debtor. In other words, in the one case there would be fourteen of fifteen legal questions judicially determined by as many courts; in the other case, there would be the same number of legal questions to be judicially determined, but the determinations would be made by one court.

No advantage can possibly accrue by having these various questions determined in one forum. The determination of these questions depends upon a construction of the various state statutes, a construction of the contracts of the Debtor, and a consideration of the actions of the Debtor and its contract holders with respect to state deposits. But there is no federal law governing such matters. Erie Railroad v. Thompkins, 304 U. S. 64. On the contrary, all of such matters are governed by state law, and consequently the rights of the contract holders in one state will differ from the rights of the contract holders in other states to the same extent as the laws of those states differ. If this be an inconsistency, it is one which cannot be avoided, and would exist regardless of whether the ultimate decision was made in the federal court or in the various state courts.

Since this is the situation, it seems to us that it would be more desirable to have the Court of Appeals of Maryland, for instance, decide what the Maryland law is with respect to contracts of the Debtor sold in this State, and what the rights of the Maryland contract holders of the Debtor are with respect to the securities held in trust for them by this appellant, rather than have the Federal Court at Charleston undertake to determine how the Court of Appeals of Maryland would construe and apply the Maryland law.

The desirability of following this procedure and the extreme reluctance of the federal courts to construe state statutes or determine matters of state law, particularly in the absence of applicable state decisions, has recently been forcefully emphasized by this Court. In Thompson v. Magnolia Co., 309 U. S. 478, this court held that although "a court of bankruptcy has an exclusive and non-delegable control over the administration of an estate in its possession", nevertheless "the proper exercise of that control may, where the interests of the estate and the parties will best be served, lead the bankruptcy court to consent to submission to state courts of particular controversies involving unsettled questions of state property law and arising in the course of bankruptcy administration." (p. 483). Acting on this principle this Court directed the District Court to require the trustee in bankruptcy to submit to the Illinois state courts the question of the fee simple ownership of a right-of-way.

In Railroad Commission v. Pullman Co., 312 U. S. 496, this Court reversed the decision of a three-judge court construing a Texas statute, and held that the question of state law should not be determined by the federal court but should be submitted to the state court for decision. This Court said: "The lower court did deny that the Texas statutes sustained the Commission's assertion of power. And this represents the view of an able and experienced circuit judge of the circuit which includes Texas and of two capable district judges trained in Texas law. Had we or they no choice in the matter but to decide what is the law of the state, we should hesitate long before rejecting their forecast of Texas law. But no matter how seasoned the judgment of the district court may be, it cannot escape being a forecast rather than a determination. The last word on the meaning of Article 6445 of the Texas Civil Statutes, and therefore the last word on the statutory authority of the Railroad Commission in this case, belongs neither to us nor to the district court but to the supreme court of Texas. In this situation a federal court of equity is asked to decide an issue by making a tentative answer which may be displaced tomorrow by a state adjudication (R. 499-500). See also Beal v. Missouri Pacific Railroad Co., 312 U. S. 45, 49-50; Watson v. Buck, 313 U. S. 387, 402; Chicago v. Fieldcrest Dairies, Inc., 316 U. S. 168, 171-173; Texas v. Donoghue, 302 U. S. 284; 54 Harvard Law Review 1379.

We respectfully submit that these considerations apply with particular force in a case such as this where not only are there present questions as to the interpretation and meaning of state statutes, but where the statutes involved are regulatory measures enacted pursuant to the public policy of the states to protect and secure their citizens dealing with companies selling securities, and where the questions also involve the title and right to possession of millions of dollars of securities now in the possession of the duly constituted officials of such states. Such a situation is indeed one where the federal courts might well "restrain their authority because of scrupulous regard for the rightful independence of the state governments and for the smooth working of the federal judiciary" (312 U. S. 501).

CONCLUSION.

We earnestly contend that the petition of the Debtor was not filed in good faith and should have been dismissed because: (1) the state deposits are not subject to the jurisdiction and control of the bankruptcy court, and without control of the state deposits there is no possibility of reorganizing the Debtor; (2) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization of the Debtor can be effected; and (3) the interests of the creditors would be best subserved in the prior pending state court proceedings.

For these reasons we respectfully submit that the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit was correct and should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

GUY B. BROWN,
H. VERNON ENEY,
Counsel for the Respondent,
John B. Gontrum, Insurance Commissioner of the State of Maryland.

APPENDIX A.

MARYLAND STATUTES.

The Laws of Maryland relating to companies selling installment accumulation contracts were enacted by Chapter 530 of the Acts of the General Assembly of Maryland of 1931, and are now codified as Sections 218 to 234, inclusive, of Article 48A of the Annotated Code of Maryland (1939 Edition) title "Insurance", sub-title "Installment Accumulation Contracts". We have printed below only the sections which are pertinent in this case and have shown only the descriptive title of the sections not printed in full.

Several of the following sections were amended in certain particulars by Chapters 121 and 639 of the Acts of the General Assembly of Maryland of 1941, effective June 1, 1941. The amendments are not pertinent in this case and have not been reproduced here.

218. (Definitions.) Whenever used in this sub-title the following shall be construed as follows:

The term "company" when used in this sub-title shall be deemed to include any individual, firm, partnership, association, trust, including a common law trust, corporation heretofore or hereafter formed under the laws of this State or any other State or territory of the United States or any foreign State or country.

The term "contract" when used in this sub-title shall include any bond, note, certificate, obligation, annuity agreement or passbook evidenced by writing, or other agreement to pay money.

The term "Commissioner" when used in this sub-title shall mean the Insurance Commissioner of the State of Maryland.

219. (Licenses.) No company shall hereafter engage or continue, either directly or indirectly, in the business of issuing, negotiating, offering for sale or selling any contract payable on the installment plan with or without definite maturity dates which contracts contemplate the accumulating of money or funds for making loans or investments and undertaking or agreeing to pay or deliver at any future time any sum of money, contract, or other thing of value, without first having obtained a license as provided in this sub-title.

Every company desiring to obtain a license under the provisions of this sub-title shall file with the Commissioner an application in writing in such form as may be prescribed by him. In case of a foreign company there shall be filed with the Commissioner a copy of its charter, declaration of organization or deed of settlement, if there be such, duly certified by the proper officer of its home state. Such foreign company shall also file with the Commissioner a power of attorney, appointing the Insurance Commissioner of the State of Maryland as agent or attorney for the company, upon whom process of law may be served, together in the case of a company having directors with a certified copy of the vote or resolution of the directors appointing such attorney. Said writing or power of attorney shall stipulate and agree on the part of the company making the same, that any lawful process against said company which is served on such agent shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served on such company within this State, and also that in the case of death or absence of the attorney so appointed, service of process may be made upon the Deputy Insurance Commissioner. Said power of attorney cannot be revoked or modified, so long as any obligations of the company remain outstanding in this State. The term "process" used above shall be held and deemed to include any writ, summons or order whereby any action, suit or proceeding shall be commenced or which shall be issued in or upon any action, suit or proceeding by any court, officer or magistrate. Every company shall further file with the Commissioner a statement of the condition of the company on the 31st day of December next preceding.

Before a license shall be issued by said Commissioner, he shall make or cause to be made an investigation of the conditions and affairs of the applicant and its general plan of operation. If the Commissioner is satisfied that the company is sound and is being operated in such a manner as to afford proper protection to the holders of its contracts heretofore or hereafter entered into, he shall issue a license to said company authorizing said company to solicit, negotiate, sell and dispose of its contracts in the State of Maryland until July first next following, which said license may be renewed from year to year by the Commissioner upon payment by the company of the fees hereinafter provided for in this sub-title. If the Commissioner is not satisfied that the applicant company is sound or that it is being conducted in such a way as to afford proper protection to holders of contracts heretofore or hereafter entered into, he shall forthwith notify the applicant to that effect, and upon request from such applicant filed within ten days after receipt of such notice, the Commissioner shall fix a time and place for hearing, of which ten days' notice shall be given to such applicant, at which hearing the applicant may offer such information and evidence relating to its application as it may deem proper. If satisfied as aforesaid, as a result of said hearing, the Commissioner shall thereupon issue a license, but if the Commissioner is not satisfied, as aforesaid, then he shall refuse such license.

220. (Revocation of Licenses.)

221. (Right of Appeal.)

222. (Deposits Required.) No company licensed under the provisions of this sub-title shall at any time offer, negotiate, or sell contracts in the State of Maryland, unless and until such company shall have assigned to and deposited with the Commissioner, or with some independent trust company approved by him, in trust, as security for all the holders of contracts or other obligations heretofore or hereafter sold, negotiated, issued or accrued in said company in the State of Maryland, bonds, coin or treasury notes of the United States of America, or interest or dividend paying bonds or stocks of this or any other State of the United States or of any county, incorporated city or other corporation of this or any other State having legal authority to issue the same and not in default, or other securities approved by the Commissioner, having a market value of not less than $25,000, and at no time less than the aggregate contract liability of the company under all contracts heretofore or hereafter sold in the State of Maryland; provided that in the case of a non-resident company which shall annually produce a certificate of the insurance commissioner or other proper financial officer of the State in which such company is organized, setting forth that such company has deposited with him securities having a market value of not less than $25,000 and not less than the aggregate contract liability of the company to the holders of all contracts or other obligations heretofore or hereafter sold, negotiated, issued or accrued by said company in the United States, and that he holds said deposit in trust and on deposit, under and by the laws of the State in which he resides for the benefit of all the contract holders of such company in the United States, and that he is satisfied that the securities so deposited by such company and held by him are worth not less than $25,000 and not less than the aggregate contract liability of the company to the holders of all contracts or other obligations heretofore or hereafter sold, negotiated, issued or accrued by said company in the United States, then in such case such company shall be excused from making the deposit hereinbefore required. When the value of said securities shall depreciate so that the market value of the deposit shall be less than hereinbefore required, additional securities shall be deposited in order that the deposit shall at all times be maintained in the amount of not less than that hereinbefore required. (Italics supplied.)

223. (Exchange and Surrender of Deposits.) Any deposit of coin, treasury notes or securities as aforesaid made, may at any time be withdrawn by the company making the same, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner may reasonably make, provided other securities authorized by law and of at least equal value shall be substituted therefor. Whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said Commissioner with whom any deposit shall have been made as aforesaid that the aggregate amount of the liability of the company under its contracts heretofore or hereafter sold in the State of Maryland is less than the value of the securities so deposited, then to the extent of such surplus over the amount of $25,000, the said Commissioner shall permit said Company to withdraw a portion of said deposit. Whenever a company shall discontinue the negotiation or sale of its contracts in the State of Maryland, it shall notify the Commissioner in writing, and the Commissioner shall thereupon cancel the license of such company, and at any time thereafter upon the furnishing of proof satisfactory to the Commissioner that the obligations of the company under its contracts theretofore negotiated or sold in the State of Maryland have been satisfied in full, then said company may withdraw the deposit of securities required by this sub-title. If upon such discontinuance the company furnished proof satisfactory to the Commissioner that the liability of the company under contracts theretofore sold in the State of Maryland cannot in the future equal the amount of the securities deposited under the provisions of this section, then with the approval of the Commissioner the surplus over such possible liability may be withdrawn. If at any time this sub-title be repealed and a law be enacted in the State of Maryland governing the licensing, supervision and regulation of companies engaged in the sale in the State of Maryland of contracts of the kind and character covered by this sub-title, then the securities deposited under the provisions of this sub-title may be withdrawn by the company.

224. (Sale of and Income From Deposits.) All deposits made under the provisions of any of the preceding sections shall be held by said Commissioner subject to sale and transfer and to the application of the proceeds of any such sale only on the order of a court of competent jurisdiction. So long as a company shall be solvent and not in default under any section of this sub-title, it shall be entitled to receive the income from any deposit made under any preceding section.

225. (Annual Statement.)

226. (Publication of Revocation or Refusal to Renew License.)

227. (Examination of Companies.)

228. (Production of Books, etc.)

229. (Liquidation of Insolvent or Illegally Conducted Companies.) Whenever the Commissioner shall have reason to believe that any company is insolvent, or fraudulently conducted, or that its assets are not sufficient for carrying on the business of the same, or during any non-compliance with the provisions of this sub-title, it shall be his duty in addition to revoking the license of such company to proceed against it as provided by Sections 52 to 63, both inclusive, of this Article, for the liquidation of insolvent or fraudulently conducted insurance companies.

230. (Proceedings to Vacate Charter.)

231. (Fees.)

232. (Penalties.)

233. (Exceptions.) The provisions of this sub-title shall not apply to any company engaged in the business of issuing, negotiating, offering for sale or selling contracts wherein the liability under such contracts is adequately secured in advance of sale by the lien or pledge with an independent trust company of property, real or personal, nor to any company engaged in the business of issuing, negotiating or offering contracts for the sale of securities where no payment is made to said company except upon the contemporaneous delivery by said company to or for the account of the purchaser of the securities agreed to be sold, nor to any domestic or foreign banks, banking institutions, banking companies, savings institutions, trust companies, safe deposit companies, insurance companies, building and loan associations, nor to contracts issued by a company for the purpose of raising money for its principal business, if its principal business is other than the issuing or negotiating or selling of contracts or obligations described in Section 219 of this sub-title.

234. (Severability Clause.)

APPENDIX B.

EXCERPTS FROM TESTIMONY OF DEBTOR'S WITNESSES.

D. A. BURT.

(R. 708-709):

The Court: I would like for you to go a little further and say what type of organization you have in mind, when you say that you believe it can be done. A. The first thing, of course, is to get a plan of such character that new capital can be obtained. If that plan is actuarily sound, and, as I said, meets the approval of the Securities and Exchange Commission and of the Auditor of this State, I think the capital can be found. If the general fund of the company is improved by the addition of a large amount of capital—and I admit that is a large amount—the contract holders are infinitely better off than they would be in the event of liquidation.

Q. Well, it is your idea that it should be continued as a face amount certificate company solely or some other form or a combination of more than one form of business? A. I don't know, Your Honor. It would seem to me a committee on reorganization would have to work that problem out with the supervisory authorities. I understand some of them object to that type of contract. If that is the case, the contract would have to be so modified as to meet their desires.

* * * * * * *

(R. 715):

Q. My point is this, Mr. Burt. I think your answer has given me partially the answer that I want, but you are not prepared to say, are you, that Fidelity should again engage in the selling of face amount certificates as a sole business? A. I won't answer that. That is a matter for the committee and the SEC and the Auditor to work out.

Q. And I say, you are not prepared to say that, in your opinion, it should engage in that business alone, are you? A. Not without a great deal of study.

Q. Which you have not—— A. Which I have not made.

* * * * * *

(R. 718):

Q. You answered, I believe, as I understood you, that you thought the present common stockholders ought to have some equities in the new company? A. Merely future earnings, if there are any.

Q. Sir? A. Merely future earnings, if there are any.

Q. What form would those equities take that you have in mind? A. Might take the form of——

Q. I can't hear you, Mr. Burt. A. I don't know whether the Investment Act would permit it or not, but I would think a no-par security of some sort.

Q. Voting rights? A. Yes.

Q. Voting rights. Will you speak out just a little bit louder. It seems to me like I am a little hard of hearing. Have you gone into the situation and are you familiar with the situation of this company with respect to deposits of securities in the different states—— A. No.

Q. (Continuing) Securing these contracts? A. No.

* * * * * *

(R. 720-721):

Q. Now, suppose, Mr. Burt, that under the laws of some twelve states other than the State of West Virginia there are, as I have put in my previous question, about ten million dollars of these assets being held to secure the liabilities of this company to contract holders who have their money in it, would you think that a plan that involved the cutting down or reducing of the claims of those contract holders—those secured contract holders—in those deposited funds would likely meet with their approval? A. There again you are getting back to the plan. Now, I am not going to discuss the plan. That plan will have to be worked out by a committee, and it will have to meet the situation, and if it is approved, as I said, I think the contract holders in all the states will be so glad to have it, rather than a liquidation, that more than sixty-six and two-thirds per cent will approve it.

Q. I understand that you would agree with me that in forming an opinion as to the reasonableness and the prospect of a plan of reorganization, that we have to weigh the present situation with which we are dealing with respect to the assets of the company and how the assets are held. A. The committee will do that.

Q. You mean that you don't think that you should do that in expressing an opinion as to whether or not there should be a reorganization? A. No, I don't think so. This plan is in the air yet; it is not formulated; it depends on a great many factors, including state laws and national laws and the approval of supervisory boards, and I am not going to attempt to make a plan on this witness stand.

Q. I think you recognized that there was a need for a considerable amount of new capital? A. Yes.

Q. How much new capital do you think would be needed? A. I don't know. It changes from time to time; our securities list is up and down. We are at the moment in an advancing market. As soon as this tax bill is finally passed, investment funds will probably come out. There is a reasonable hope, at least, that securities will sell higher in six months than they are doing today. The portfolio might appreciate somewhat. I don't know what this committee might face.

Q. Do you know at the present time how much the deficiency is—— A. I do not.

Q. Well, wait. You haven't heard my question. A. Pardon me.

Q. Do you know at the present time how much the deficiency is between the reserves—invested reserves—and assets of the company—on the outstanding contracts—and the cash liabilities or reserve liabilities of the contract holder. A. I do not.

Q. Sir? A. I do not.

Q. You didn't know that that was about at least as much as $2,600,000? A. I did not. I understand——

Q. In your opinion, would there be a fair chance of reorganization, of getting the approval of the Auditor of the State of West Virginia and the Securities and Exchange Commission and two-thirds of these contract holders—these secured contract holders—to a plan of reorganization that did not bring up these reserves to the liabilities of the company, reorganizing it as a solvent company? A. There is again your plan. You are trying to get me to discuss the plan, which I will not discuss.

Q. Then you recognize that there is a problem of getting the new capital? A. Certainly.

* * * * * *

(R. 723-724):

Q. Did you own any contract at the time this company went into receivership? A. I don't know.

Q. Sir? A. I don't know.

Q. When was the last time you held a contract? A. I don't know that.

Q. Can you look that up and tell us? A. I don't know whether I can or not.

Q. How much did you ever hold? (No answer.)

Q. Well, I will ask you to do this. I see you are pausing—— A. I don't know. I had several contracts. Some I bought for my children and some for Mrs. Burt, but I can't tell when I bought them or what I paid on them.

Q. I want to ask you to do this, please sir. During the noon hour, to look up the information and then give it to us after lunch, the dates and amounts of all the contracts that you or any member of the family of you bought and the dates when you cashed them in, if you cashed them in.

Mr. Ray: Your Honor, that is an unreasonable request. Mr. Burt lives in Wheeling. Undoubtedly all his records are at Wheeling and I don't think those things have any place in this case at all.

Mr. Farmer: Could you get that for us, Mr. Burt?

The Court: Mr. Farmer, that would have pertinency only to the extent whether Mr. Burt owned any contract at the time of the receivership, and possibly whether he had cashed in any contracts before their maturity prior to the receivership. If you will confine it to that, I will admit it.

Mr. Farmer: I had in mind, if the Court please, it was a very practical test of his faith in this sort of savings institution.

The Witness: Not necessarily.

Mr. Farmer: I just thought that would be some test.

The Witness: Not necessarily. I might have needed some money.

Mr. Farmer: Well, can you get that information for us, Mr. Burt? A. I don't think I can.

* * * * * * *

HUBERT F. YOUNG.

(R. 631):

Q. In your opinion, from your knowledge and experience with the operations of Fidelity and your general business experience, what is your judgment in reference to the feasibility of rehabilitating Fidelity through a proper plan of reorganization? A. I think it could be done and should be done.

Q. Will you explain that to the Court, please? A. Well, in my opinion there are two ways it can be done. One is by making an insurance company mutualized; the contract holders would own the company. One other way, the only way I know to have a face contract company, have a new company with new capital absorb the various contracts, with liability on a fair basis, to be arrived at by market value and liquidating value of the various funds; and one reason I think it should be done I think 1938 was the largest sales of any year we ever had. As I recall it, we went at the rate of fifty to sixty million dollars face value. Those people who bought then have not had an opportunity of paying long enough to get a reasonable amount of money back on their investment. I think they should be allowed to continue to pay in, on a proper basis of course.

Q. What would you think about a third possibility of merging, say with an insurance company, and continuing to write annuity contracts but also engage in business in the general insurance field? A. Well, that would be my idea, if we had a mutual insurance company, except not to merge. I don't know what advantage we could show to some other company, just offhand, probably could—why they should merge with us.

Q. Could that be done either with a stock company or mutual company? A. I think that could be done with either, except in a mutual company you are giving your contract holders something for giving up something. I think we all know they will have to give up something, and they should be given some kind of compensation.

* * * * * *

(R. 671):

The Court: By the changes you speak of, do you refer, perhaps, to a scaling down of loading or some other feature that would render the expense of selling the contracts less and thereby increase the profits? A. I think that there would have to be a contribution made by the contract holders of the various series and especially the ones that are insolvent, and that the others should be asked to reduce the required amount presently required to redeem them.

* * * * * *

(R. 796-797):

Mr. Palmer: There is one other thing, I do not believe it was brought out by Mr. Young before that one of the requirements of the Investment Companies Act was a net capital of $50,000, and Fidelity, having no capital, but being minus a million and a half, it couldn't go ahead under that Act. A. That is the chief reason we couldn't qualify.

Q. Unless it got new capital? A. Unless it got new capital, but under present conditions that was the chief stumbling block.

The Court: How much capital? A. $50,000 in an old company. A new company requires $200,000.

Mr. Jaegerman: If the contract liabilities of Fidelity were reduced so it had $50,000 for capital, I suppose that would also comply, would it? A. It would comply, yes.

* * * * * *

(R. 799-800):

Q. Now, you talked about a plan that you had here, and as I caught it your plan contemplated cutting down these old contracts, these special annuity and special income contract holders. A. I didn't say I had a plan. I said that was one of the possibilities of working into a plan.

Q. You said first it might be made an insurance company. A. I said that is possible.

Q. Do you know any insurance company that would undertake to issue policies to these contract holders, who have not been selected on any basis of risk, either age or sex or physical condition? A. I didn't say I would give them an insurance policy. We would give them an insurance annuity.

Q. And cut down on the existing reserves that they have now? A. Possibly. Those are details.

Q. You would have to do that? A. Would you? Well, you answer that.

Q. You said you were going to cut them down about 20 per cent, didn't you? A. I didn't say I was going to cut them down at all. I said that was one possibility.

Q. Didn't you say by cutting them down to about 80 per cent it might be done? A. I possibly did, 80 or 70 or whatever it works out.

Q. If you will assume with me that there are some twenty million dollars of assets in this company, or better than that, which could be distributed among contract holders on the basis of their cash surrender values at the present time—cash liabilities at the present time—of about twenty-three million dollars, they could get that amount out of liquidation if you just sold them out and distributed the money, couldn't they? A. I doubt it, after years of liquidation expense and the expense of litigation I don't think they would get anything like twenty million dollars.

Q. That would depend on court expense? A. Yes, and you don't know what kind of market you are going to have by the time you liquidate. It would take quite a while, in my opinion, to liquidate. It might drive the market down to the bottom when you start to liquidate, and instead of getting 70 per cent you might get 50.

Q. Those are conditions that you think might reduce the amount? A. Easily.

Q. But what you are proposing to do is to cut down these old contract holders whose contracts at maturity would have to be much lower than 80 per cent wouldn't it? A. Sure it would.

Q. And then invest the funds of this company in semi-speculative and speculative securities? A. Well, if they didn't they would probably lose their money some other way in my opinion.

Q. Did you ever hear of Mr. Ponzi? A. Yes, I have heard of him.

Q. He had his plan, didn't he? A. Do you think that is comparable to ours?

* * * * * *

EDGAR B. SIMS.

(R. 454):

Q. Mr. Sims, let me see if I understand you. The structure of the company economically and financially was unsound from the beginning; is that right? A. Yes, they promised too much in the twenties.

Q. And never could have succeeded? A. Not at that rate they were promising.

Q. No matter about the extravagance or anything else; if run economically it was bound to be condemned; is that right? A. I think so. I think they were quarreling with Ray's arithmetic all the time back there; and there was another reason it was doomed to failure. They had bought German government bonds, Mexican bonds and second mortgage bonds and fourth mortgage bonds, and of course, they are not worth much.

* * * * * *

(R. 455-456):

Q. And you said also that you would not license any company that might be built upon the corpse of this company to write installment contracts in West Virginia, did you not? A. That is what I said.

Q. Suppose the company was reorganized out of new cloth entirely. Do you feel that you would—— A. (Interposing). I just doubt——

Q. Just a minute, now. Supposing it was reorganized out of new cloth entirely, a reorganization that was authorized after this matter had gone through the Federal Court, under Chapter 10, do you still say you would not grant it a license to operate in West Virginia? A. I don't understand what you mean when you put that verb in the past tense, or the past perfect tense—"was reorganized".

Q. Well, I will say "will be reorganized". A. Organized by whom; and how much money will be put in it? I want to know that before I could answer that. I am not going to permit it to be organized on thin air.

Q. You can answer it or not, Mr. Sims. A. I think it inadvisable to relicense the company to sell these contracts exclusively. Twenty-six of the biggest insurance companies in the last five years have lost $66,000,000 on annuity contracts.

* * * * * *

(R. 457):

Q. Well, Mr. Sims, you filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, did you not? A. Yes, sir.

Q. You filed that under the statute which gave you the right to do it? A. Yes.

Q. In that petition, you asked for dissolution or reorganization, did you not? A. Yes, sir.

Q. You proposed, when you filed that bill of complaint, to reorganize the affairs of this association through the Circuit Court of Kanawha County? A. That was what I had hoped to do.

Q. Then you do think it can be reorganized? A. Not as an annuity company alone.

Q. Part annuity? A. I have serious doubts about the annuity business in any form.

The Court: How did you intend to reorganize it through the Circuit Court, Mr. Sims? A. I don't know; I am not a lawyer, Judge. I had hoped to work out a plan and submit it by mail to the contract holders.

Q. What sort of plan had you hoped to work out? A. Well, that was very thin and nebulous.

Q. Suppose you give it to us, however thin and nebulous it may be. A. I thought the company could be mutualized and turned over to the contract holders, give the stock to the contract holders; it ought to belong to them because there is nothing left there for the stockholders.

* * * * * *

ISAIAH SMITH.

(R. 480):

Q. Do you think it could be done? A. My personal thought?

Q. Yes. A. Without attempting to qualify as an expert, and without attempting to say what sort of plan, in my opinion with the assets the size that Fidelity has, a reorganization of some sort can be done.

* * * * * *

(R. 481-482):

Q. Now, with reference to reorganization, I think I copied your words down when you said you believed reorganization of some sort can be done. Is that substantially what you said? A. Yes, that is a pretty broad term, I expect.

Q. Now, you have had some two months' experience as a state court receiver, and have had approximately the same time as an employee of the trustee in this proceeding, is that not right? A. Yes.

Q. As such you have had some little chance to study the working of Fidelity although your main employment has been in trying to gather the various funds together and to get reports up on them. A. That is right.

Q Now, when you say reorganization of some sort can be done, you are using that purposely in a very broad sense, are you not? A. I am.

Q. You are not attempting to state you believe there can be 66⅔% of the creditors or contract holders, either as a whole or of any one class, who can or will agree to any specific plan, are you? A. Of course, I could not answer that question without knowing something about the plan. I don't know what they are going to do, and even any kind of plan we might finally think is good I don't know who will accept it and who will not.

* * * * * * *

RAYMOND LATTA.

(R. 1105-1106):

The Court: I will sustain that objection in that form. I will ask the witness this question, however, which I think will cover the situation, as I see it.

Q. Mr. Latta, is it possible to construct an actuarial plan of reorganization for Fidelity? A. Yes.

Mr. Palmer: In your experience, Mr. Latta, would that actuarial plan work?

Mr. Ray: Oh, that is the same thing in another way, trying to get the witness to answer something the Court has ruled he is not qualified to answer.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Palmer: I will have to make an offer upon the record, your Honor.

The Court: All right.

Mr. Palmer: The witness, if permitted to answer the question, would state that it is unreasonable to expect a plan of reorganization can be effected for Fidelity. The witness would further say, if permitted by the Court so to testify, that Fidelity itself can never be reorganized as a going concern, either as a face amount certificate company or as a life insurance company. If the Court would permit, I would like the witness to be permitted to state his reasons why Fidelity can never be reorganized and operated as a face amount certificate company and as a life insurance company, those reasons being based upon his experience and actuarial knowledge. I ask the Court's permission for that.

* * * * * *

(R. 1110-1111):

Q. Mr. Latta, will you please explain your answer to the Court's question when he asked you if Fidelity could be reorganized actuarially—I don't know the exact question, but you answered the Court's question "Yes". Would you explain your answer, please? A. Actuarially whether it could be reorganized strictly from a mathematical viewpoint, as I interpreted his question to be, would be as to whether there could be computed, as far as figures are concerned, in order to place this company in a solvent condition, ready for operation on a sound financial basis as of that time. That is my interpretation of what he meant.

Q. Would it be possible to answer the Court's question by saying, "We will take from each contract holder forty per cent or place a forty per cent lien upon each contract holder," work that out actuarially, and then you would have the company reconstructed actuarially upon a sound basis? Would that be possible?

Mr. Huwe: I object to that question.

The Court: Overruled.

A. It would make the company solvent, but it wouldn't be reorganized on a sound basis, no.

Mr. Palmer: Beg your pardon? A. It would be solvent at the time provided the forty per cent was sufficient. You could make the company solvent, but that doesn't make it sound from an operating viewpoint, actuarially or otherwise.

Q. What would you do to do that? A. Well, as far a plan of reorganization was concerned, you would have to make the entire construction of the company so that the future operations could be done on a sound basis—could be carried on on a sound basis. By a sound basis, I mean as far as being able to meet the obligations when they may become due as specified in the contract.

Mr. Palmer: In other words, whether or not you could possibly construct an actuarial plan for Fidelity and your answer to that bears no relation to what your answer would be as to whether Fidelity could be successfully rehabilitated, is that correct? A. They are entirely separate questions.

Q. And bear no relation to each other? A. No.

* * * * * *

HOWARD E. REED,

(R. 736-737):

Q. Mr. Reed, from your business experience in the past and from your knowledge of Fidelity and the character of its business, will you state whether or not, in your opinion, a plan of reorganization of Fidelity can be developed which will be practical and feasible? A. I think it can.

Q. Do you care to make any statement of your reasons for your answer? A. Well, of course my reasons are purely from the sales standpoint. I think that there is a great field in this country for an income contract—an income reserve contract. I don't believe that we have scratched the surface in systematic saving in this country. We are today reputed to be the greatest savings nation in the world, but the per capita savings as of June 30, 1940, were $196. So that there is yet a tremendous field for this business which has not been touched. Mr. Carpenter told me in Cleveland that he had made twenty-five interviews that week and in no instance did any man whom he interviewed mention defense bonds, so that we feel that there is still a great field for this business regardless of any so-called government competition.

| QUESTION PRESENTED | 22 |
| SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT | 22 |
| ARGUMENT | 25 |
| I. THE DEBTOR'S PETITION SHOULD BE DISMISSED BECAUSE IT WAS NOT FILED IN GOOD FAITH AS DEFINED IN SECTION 130 (7) AND SECTION 146 (4) OF CHAPTER X OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, IT NOT BEING SHOWN THAT THE PRIOR PROCEEDINGS PENDING IN STATE COURTS, PARTICULARLY IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF KANAWHA COUNTY, WEST VIRGINIA, WOULD NOT BEST SUBSERVE THE INTERESTS OF CONTRACT HOLDERS; SUCH PRIOR PROCEEDINGS HAVING BEEN INSTITUTED IN STATE COURTS BY OR ON BEHALF OF STATE AUTHORITIES HOLDING AS TRUSTEES SECURITIES DEPOSITED BY FIDELITY PURSUANT TO VALID AND APPLICABLE STATE LAWS, FOR THE BENEFIT OF ITS CONTRACT HOLDERS IN EACH SUCH STATE | 25 |

A. The case at bar is governed by the decision of this Court in the Marine Harbor Case, and the rules of law therein decided should be applied herein ..... 25

B. Congress in enacting the Investment Company Act of 1940 intended that deposits made with State officials by face-amount certificate companies prior to January 1, 1941, should in the event of insolvency be retained by them, and the trust liens created by State statute should not be set aside; and Congress recognized the validity of, and legislated concerning, insolvency proceedings of such companies when instituted in proceedings other than under Chapter X, and permitted a very limited and strictly defined intervention therein by S. E. C. ..... 35

Intent of Congress as Expressed in Committee Hearings on Act ..... 35

Congress strictly defined and delimited intervention by the S. E. C. in insolvency proceedings of investment companies such as Fidelity, and enacted specific provisions for such proceedings when instituted other than under Chapter X ..... 40

C. Securities were deposited in trust with States or other officials by Fidelity as required by valid State laws, for the benefit and protection of the purchasers and holders of Fidelity contracts in those States, and such securities so deposited should not now be taken from those States or State officials, and the trust lien thereby created in favor of the contract holders in each such State should not be nullified or avoided ---------- 48

The State deposits constitute trust funds for the benefit of the contract holders which may not be avoided or nullified ---------- 49

The Federal Court under its equity powers should release its jurisdiction, if any, in favor of the State Courts -- 54

D. The Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides immunity to the Sovereign States holding deposits, and to the State officials in whose custody, possession and control are the State deposits, from suit or order by the District Court to such State officials concerning such deposits, and effectively prohibits a compulsory turn-over of said deposits to the Trustee under Chapter X -- 60

II. The State Courts in the States in Which the Deposits Are Located Are Best Fitted to Interpret and Decide the State Depository Law Under Which the Deposits Must Be Distributed to the Contract Holders in Each Such State ---------- 70

State Courts Should Interpret State Depository Statutes ---------- 70

Necessity of an Interpretation of State Depository Statutes ---------- 76

III. The State Officials of the Fifteen Depository States, Acting Under the Guidance of Each of Their Respective State Courts and Rep-

RESENTED BY THEIR ATTORNEY GENERALS AND OTHER PROPER ATTORNEYS, HAVE NOT BEEN SHOWN NOT TO BE BETTER FITTED TO LIQUIDATE AND DISTRIBUTE THE DEPOSITED SECURITIES THAN IS THE TRUSTEE ..... 81

Liquidation Should Promptly Ensue, and in the State Court Proceedings ..... 84

The Salutary Safeguards of Chapter X ..... 87

Proceedings Subsequent to Circuit Court of Appeals Decision ..... 96

IV. REPLY BY THE ACTING ATTORNEY GENERAL OF WEST VIRGINIA TO THE S. E. C. BRIEF ..... 100

V. THE JURISDICTION OF THIS COURT HAS BEEN IMPROPERLY INVOKED ..... 106

CONCLUSION ..... 108

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Foreword

The petitioners herein are Fidelity Assurance Association, a West Virginia corporation, hereinafter called the Debtor or Fidelity, and Central Trust Company, of Charleston, West Virginia, called the Trustee. The Securities and Exchange Commission, one of the respondents herein, which seeks reversal of the judgment below, is referred to as the S. E. C.

There are seven respondents in this case† who filed controversial answers to the Debtor's petition in the District Court, and joint and several appeals in the Circuit

*In the Appendix hereto, Parts I and II, are set out the United States and West Virginia statutes and constitutional provisions which are herein involved, or discussed in this brief, except those statutes which have been printed in the Appendix to petitioners' brief, to which reference is made.

†See R. 287-288 for official designation and 42 F. Supp., at 976, for their official representation.

Court of Appeals; five of them will be referred to herein as the Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Maryland and Tennessee respondents.

This brief is filed jointly on behalf of Edgar B. Sims, Auditor and ex officio Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia, and H. Isaiah Smith and Ross B. Thomas, West Virginia State Court Receivers, hereinafter referred to jointly as the West Virginia respondents, and separately, as the Auditor of West Virginia and the West Virginia Receivers or State Court Receivers.

Four briefs will be filed by the respondents, who have divided the legal points among themselves; therefore each brief will not set out all questions in issue, but only those which will be discussed therein; so it will be necessary for the Court, if it will, to consider all briefs filed by the respondents as one composite brief.

In the brief of the Wisconsin respondents will be a full "Statement of the Case"; this and other briefs of respondents will set forth such additional "Statement" as may be necessary to a proper presentation of the points therein argued.†

How the Case Arose

Fidelity Assurance Association, formerly Fidelity Investment Company, a West Virginia corporation, with its principal office in Wheeling, West Virginia, from 1911 through 1940 sold installment investment annuity contracts, recently called face-amount-certificates. By reason of State laws so requiring, deposits of securities were made in fifteen States, in trust with State officials, for the protection of contract holders in each of those States. Fidelity being unable to comply with the provisions of the Investment Company Act of 1940, and having been in financial difficulties for some years, and being unable to obtain new capital, the Attorney General of West Virginia, on behalf of Auditor Edgar B. Sims, on April 11, 1941, instituted statutory proceedings in a West Virginia State Court against Fidelity as an insolvent. Fidelity's assets were then valued at approximately $2,500,000 less than the liabilities (R. 181), and no equity remained for the stockholders (R. 196, 259). Officials in other States having a deposit of Fidelity then instituted similar proceedings in their States. (See Appendix, Part III.) While those proceedings were progressing, some of Fidelity's former officers, on June 6, 1941, instituted Chapter X proceedings in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia, which approved the petition and appointed a Trustee.

Auditor Sims, officials of other States, and groups of contract holders contested the good faith in the filing of the petition, and the jurisdiction of the District Court. After a lengthy hearing, all questions were decided against them, and an appeal was taken to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. The decision of the District Court was reversed and the Debtor's petition was ordered dismissed, the Court holding that Fidelity had become an insurance company before the petition was filed, that the company should be liquidated, and that prior proceedings were pending in the State Courts which would best subserve the interests of the contract holders in such liquidation. Debtor and its Trustee petitioned this Court for a writ of certiorari, which was granted. The facts upon which the arguments made in this brief will be based are stated below.

Background of State Deposits Made by Fidelity

The Legislature of West Virginia in 1911 first enacted legislation licensing the selling of annuities in West Virginia by companies other than life insurance companies, after a compliance with certain conditions precedent. Shortly thereafter, Fidelity was incorporated in West Virginia and, after a compliance with the statutory requirements and conditions, obtained a license and engaged in the business of selling installment annuity contracts.

The most important feature of this legislation was the requirement that such a company, as a condition precedent to receiving a license to do business in the State, deposit with the Insurance Commissioner, "in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders in this State," approved securities in the amount of $10,000.00.

This legislation was amended from time to time so that by 1933, when respondent Edgar B. Sims was elected and took office as Auditor of West Virginia, and by statute (Code 33-1-1) became ex officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia, the pertinent part of the depository law with regard to annuity companies (Code 33-9-3) required that companies selling installment annuities "deposit with the state treasurer (in accordance with Article 5, Chapter 12 of this Code), in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders," approved securities in the amount of $100,000.00, and in addition thereto an amount equal to its cash liabilities to its contract holders; and when "the laws of any other state" require a deposit "equal or greater in amount for the benefit of contract holders in such state," upon filing a certificate from the proper official of that State with the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia, no deposit was required in West Virginia for the benefit of contract holders in that State; and "when the laws of another State require such deposit less in amount," then a certificate showing the amount deposited must be filed and a deposit is required in West Virginia "which together with the deposit made in such other state shall make up the total amount required by this state to be deposited * * * and such contract holders in such other state shall not be entitled to the benefit of the securities deposited with the treasurer of this State under this article, except so much of such deposit as may be made to complete the total amount required by this article where the law of any other state requires a lesser amount." On January 1, 1941, there was approximately $10,000,000 in securities on deposit with the State of West Virginia for the protection of Fidelity's contract holders, by virtue of this statute.

Statutory deposit requirements were enacted by other States sometimes as a part of their "Blue Sky" laws, and sometimes as special laws to regulate companies of this type (see Ex. 6, pp. 125 and 177, Report of S. E. C. to Congress); and at the institution of these proceedings, in thirty-six States of the United States (see Table B, infra) a deposit was required of either Fidelity or Investors Syndicate, the only other substantial company doing a similar business to that of Fidelity,* and deposits had been made in fourteen of those States by Fidelity.[1] The required deposits were in an amount not less than 100% of cash liability to the contract holders, except in

*Together these two companies did 98% of said business. See Ex. 6, pp. 3, 128-9, Report of S. E. C. to Congress, Appendix, Part VIII.

[1]In Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin a deposit was required by the statute. In Kansas the requirement for a deposit was not reenacted into their securities laws after 1929. The Ohio deposit law was passed on April 21, 1939, and beginning March 1, 1940, was to be retroactive. The Illinois deposit law was passed July 7, 1931, and at a later date it was made retroactive. In Indiana there was a deposit law prior to April 1, 1935, and there was no depository requirement between that date and April 1, 1939. After that date, Indiana (as did Alabama, Kentucky and Missouri, through their Securities Department) required Fidelity to enter into a trust indenture, with a named trustee, usually a local bank, and to deposit securities under said trust agreement to be equal at all times to not less than 100% of its cash liability to its contract holders in the state.

Pennsylvania and Virginia, where fixed amounts of $100,000.00 and $25,000.00, respectively, were required to be deposited. On January 1, 1941, there was on deposit in these fourteen States approximately $10,000,000.

All such deposit statutes and required trust indentures specifically provided or stated in substance that the required deposit of securities was to be in trust, for the benefit of contract holders or purchasers in the particular State requiring such a deposit; most of the deposit laws and all of the trust indentures provided a proceeding for liquidation and distribution in event of insolvency, usually in a State Court, and under the supervision of State officials, advised by their Attorney Generals.[2]

In West Virginia, the supervising authority for Fidelity and its deposit was the Auditor and ex officio Insurance Commissioner, who upon default or insolvency (Code 33-9-10) could revoke the license of the company, and thereupon "the deposit, or a sufficient amount of the same, shall remain under his authority and control" until the total liability of all the contracts is redeemed or settled.

It was further provided (Code 33-2-45) that the Insurance Commissioner, when any company under his supervision became insolvent, could file a bill in the Circuit

[2]In the Appendix, Part III, is set forth a brief summary of the deposit laws and requirements of each of the fifteen States wherein Fidelity made a deposit, and as well a brief resume of the proceedings pending therein on June 6, 1941, at which time the Chapter X proceedings were instituted; also, a table (Appendix, Part VIII) prepared by the S. E. C. showing the thirty-one States having a deposit of over $48,000,000.00 from Investors Syndicate.

Appendix D of the S. E. C. brief purports to set out in full all the laws and trust indentures of the fifteen depository States. However, it is incomplete, since it leaves out some sections and parts of sections of the State laws and trust indentures, believed by respondents to be pertinent. Briefs of respondents will set out all the applicable laws of their own States, and the summary in Appendix, Part III, hereof attempts to give a correct summary of the laws and indentures of every depository state.

Court of Kanawha County (the seat of the State government) for the administering of the assets of such company as an insolvent, and for the purpose of taking possession of its property in the State and the distribution of its assets among those entitled thereto, according to their respective rights.

Fidelity's contracts contained a provision that the reserve funds were to be invested in approved securities and "deposited in trust in acordance with the laws of West Virginia."

Institution of State Court Proceedings

As set out fully in the Wisconsin brief, Fidelity's financial difficulties began at least as early as the depression years, and new capital was sought for Fidelity for several years prior to 1941. None was ever procured, none has since been promised, and there is no pending promise for new capital to be forthcoming in these proceedings.

Fidelity was unable to comply with the requirements of the Investment Company Act of 1940 (passed in August, 1940), and was thereby prohibited from further engaging in the annuity business after January 1, 1941. It failed to procure new capital, and failed in attempted voluntary reorganization plans. On December 31, 1940, it converted itself into an insurance company, but being unable to comply with West Virginia laws to continue in such business, it shortly became apparent that Court proceedings were necessary. On March 25th, Auditor Sims requested the company to advise him of its choice between Federal and State Court proceedings (Ex. 94, set out in Appendix, Part V). On April 4, 1941, all of its licenses having been revoked, Fidelity was ordered by Auditor Sims to freeze all of its accounts and the West Virginia deposit remained under the authority and control of the Auditor until the total liabilities were redeemed or settled (Code 33-9-10). Thereupon, Fidelity, at a two-day session of its board of directors (April 7th and 8th), resolved and expressed its preference in favor of State Court proceedings (R. 408).

On April 11, 1941, the statutory proceedings authorized to be brought by the Insurance Commissioner (when any company under his supervision becomes insolvent) in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County were instituted by the Attorney General of West Virginia on behalf of the Auditor (R. 61, 82). This Court had full equity jurisdiction (R. 1206), the exercise of which was also prayed for in the bill of complaint (Ex. 21, p. 16). Officials of all other States holding a Fidelity deposit were notified by Auditor Sims by telegraph, and they immediately took proper action and brought proper proceedings under the laws of their States (R. 62).

In the West Virginia proceedings receivers were appointed to collect the undeposited assets of the Debtor (Ex. 70), and those receivers are respondents in the case at bar. Fidelity appeared and raised no objection and filed no answer.

The State Court Receivers took charge of the home office of Fidelity, and collected the undeposited assets of Fidelity. In the two months period of their operation, they had prepared most of the financial and other data necessary to a study of the situation.

Institution of Chapter X Proceedings

On June 3, 1941, a purported corporate meeting of Fidelity was held in Pittsburgh (this meeting later being held by the District Court to have been invalid [R. 189]), at which a resolution was passed, purporting to authorize the filing of a petition under Chapter X.

Pursuant to this purported authority, on June 6, 1941, Debtor's petition was filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia. Immediately thereafter Central Trust Company of Charleston, West Virginia, was appointed as the disinterested trustee and attorneys for it were appointed by the Court (R. 1); a turn-over order was at once entered against all State authorities, and all State Court Receivers, including the respondents in the case at bar and any others who had in their custody, possession or control any assets which had been deposited by Fidelity, or which belonged to it. (R. 2). This order was amplified and strengthened on June 10, 1941 (R. 11). All of these proceedings were ex parte and without notice to these respondents (R. 176).

The West Virginia State Court Receivers, under written protest (R. 80), turned over the undeposited assets of Fidelity which they had collected, together with an escrow fund comprising payments made by contract holders after Auditor Sims' freezing of accounts on April 4th.

The Auditor of West Virginia, who had not turned over the West Virginia deposit to the State Court Receivers (such deposit having remained in the custody of the State Treasurer and under the authority and control of the Auditor as required by Code 33-9-10), together with the officials of the other fourteen depository States, refused to comply with the turn-over order. Auditor Sims, through the Attorney General of West Virginia, and the State Court Receivers by their attorneys, applied to the District Court for a stay of the turn-over order; and, upon refusal thereof, made application to the Circuit Court of Appeals for a stay, pending an appeal from the order. Thereafter, by agreement of counsel, the then status quo of the deposited securities was continued pending a hearing in the District Court. Auditor Sims and the State Court Receivers intervened in the District Court as parties, by permission of the Court, and filed controversial answers to the Debtor's petition (R. 58, 79) challenging the jurisdiction of the District Court to entertain the Chapter X proceedings, and challenging the good faith in the filing of Debtor's petition, and appealed to the Circuit Court of Appeals from the turn-over order.

While there had been no objections raised by contract holders to the State Court proceedings (R. 483), groups of contract holders from West Virginia, Tennessee, Iowa, Michigan and Ohio appeared in the District Court, by counsel (R. 287-288), and objected to the Chapter X proceedings, and most of them filed controversial answers to the Debtor's petition.

Thereafter, a majority of the States which held a deposit of Fidelity entered an appearance in the District Court on behalf of their proper State officials, represented in most part by their attorney generals, and filed controversial answers to the Debtor's petition (R. 287-288).

The S. E. C. intervened as a party in the proceedings and undertook to sustain the validity thereof and the jurisdiction of the District Court. The Trustee, through its attorneys, took part in the proceedings for the same purpose.

A hearing was had upon the issues raised by the petition and answers from August 5, 1941, intermittently until October 10, 1941.

On August 9, 1941, during the hearing, the turn-over order against the depository States was amended nunc pro tunc to June 6th into a "freezing" order which enjoined the officials of the depository States from doing anything with the deposited securities except hold them (R. 102), but the Trustee was not required to return to the West Virginia State Court Receivers the funds they had turned over to the Trustee. Maryland, Tennessee and West Virginia respondents filed motions to vacate this order (R. 124, 128, 168, 170, 172).

The West Virginia respondents sought a writ of prohibition in the Circuit Court of Appeals against this "freezing" order, which on October 21, 1941, was argued jointly with their appeal from the turn-over order. The principal issue raised by the appeal was whether the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States was a bar to taking the deposited assets from the State of West Virginia and causing them to be turned over to the Trustee. The Circuit Court of Appeals, being informed during oral argument, of the hearing currently being held below, and perceiving that later a more complete record would be before it in an appeal upon the merits, and that the rights of other depository States who were not parties to the appeal would of necessity have to be adjudicated, thereupon refused the writ of prohibition and dismissed the appeal without prejudice. Sims v. Central Trust Company, 123 F. (2d) 89.

Solvency of Fidelity

While there are many financial statements of Fidelity in evidence, none adequately presents a correct picture of the net assets and net liabilities of Fidelity as of April 10, 1941, its last day in active business. Therefore, counsel has compiled Table A below from original and unprinted Exhibits Nos. 35, 47 and 48.

Exhibit 48 correctly states the liabilities as of April 10, 1941, both net reserve and net cash surrender (that is, after deduction of loans to contract holders). However, the figures given in Ex. 48 for the total at market value as of June 6, 1941, of all securities deposited with the States ($20,056,680.27) and the free securities ($556,467.51), although used by Judge Soper in the opinion below (R. 242), are incorrect. The sum total of those two amounts is exactly the same as shown in Ex. 35 for total value as of June 6, 1941, of all the deposited securities at market value, plus the value of all mortgages at book value. Therefore, the figures given in Ex. 48 are not market value, but include all the mortgages at book value.

Attached to Ex. 35 is a breakdown of the mortgages into classes. In view of the testimony as to the value of the mortgages and real estate (Original transcript of evidence, pages 1248, 1250-53, 1258-60, 1331-46, and 1353-56, only part of which is in the printed record at R. 612-15 and 619-20), and the statement in S. E. C. Appendix C to brief, page 7s. 2(b), counsel has arbitrarily set the value of the real estate, furniture and fixtures, and all mortgages except F. H. A.'s at 60% of the stated book value.

Exhibit 47 gives the gross assets of Fidelity as of April 10, 1941, hence the necessity for restatement to show only the net assets.

There are other small liabilities, and perhaps other small amounts of assets, but counsel believe Table A presents a reasonably correct and adequate picture of the situation as it then existed.

The deficit of Fidelity on April 10, 1941, was therefore $3,192,666.55, and the percentage of solvency was 86.97% based upon net assets and net reserves.

Liquidity of Deposited Securities

On pages 96 and [illegible] of Exhibit 6, the report made to Congress by the S. E. C. concerning Fidelity, it is stated: "The Association has followed a settled policy of investing its funds almost entirely in marketable securities, about 90% of which have consisted of bonds and notes. Investments in stock have consisted principally of preferred stocks and have been, in the main, too small to be of any importance." On the same pages, as set forth in the Appendix, Part VIII herein, is Table 26, showing the percentage by years of investments by Fidelity in various categories. The percentage of investment in real estate, as shown by the table, has always been less than 1% of the assets.

In a letter to the contract holders dated July 3, 1941, the Trustee herein stated that Fidelity's property "is almost entirely in the form of liquid assets composed of stocks, bonds and other forms of securities" (R. 45).

At the present time, Fidelity is even more liquid, as many securities, some real estate, and some mortgages, have been converted to cash.

Specific Data on Contract Holders and Deposits

The numerous exhibits introduced in evidence, which contain voluminous detailed financial data, are not printed in the record herein, but are before the Court in their original form. Counsel have taken the liberty of transposing and shortening much that is therein contained into the following tables, with accompanying explanations.

A composite picture of the location of the contract holders by States, showing the net reserve and net cash liability due them, and the location of the deposited securities, together with their market value, and the percentage of market value to cash liability, is set out hereunder in Table B.[a]

Fidelity listed the contract holders on its books by States, according to their residence, such information being furnished by the contract holder. Deposits in the States were made, changed, substituted and withdrawn accordingly, as the contract holder gave his residence or change of residence (R. 758, 759). Therefore the statement in Appendix A, p. 2, footnote, S. E. C. brief, is not correct. For that reason, the table is in the form below.

[a]This table is compiled principally from unprinted Ex. No. 34 and No. 48, and the market value of securities contains mortgages at book value as heretofore explained. See also Appendix, Part IX.

†—Includes mortgages at book value as explained for table A.

Explanation of Table B

In column 1, the "D" indicates a State with a depository law and which holds deposits of Fidelity or Investors Syndicate, the "FD" indicating Fidelity deposits.

Column 4 gives the total number of contracts, including those with no cash surrender or reserve value, but having a re-date privilege.*

Column 3 includes contracts upon which payments were currently being made, but an aggregate amount had not been paid sufficient to create, in some cases a reserve value, and in other cases a cash surrender value. It lists only the number of contracts and not contract holders, some of whom owned more than one.

Mr. McNulty, Secretary of the Debtor (R. 407), testified there were 22,000 to 25,000 actively paying contract holders on April 4, 1941 (R. 407). In addition, there were some fully paid-up contracts and some matured contracts.

Therefore, the number of contract holders financially interested varies between 22,000 minimum and 50,000 maximum.

In column 5 and 6 the net reserve and net cash liability is shown, which are those values after deducting the loans and accrued interest thereon.

The peculiarities of the Illinois and Indiana depository statutes are set forth in the Appendix, Part III, and the reason for the divisions of their deposits made in the foot-note.

Table C

This table is a summary of an arrangement into appropriate groups of the States and figures shown in Table B, with percentages calculated.

---

*The re-date privilege is one whereby the contract may be given a new issuance date after it falls into arrears, with prior payments credited on the new certificate. The privilege is, practically speaking, perpetual. (Ex. 6, p. 110).

QUESTION PRESENTED

The issue discussed in this brief is whether a corporation which sold installment annuity contracts pursuant to State laws especially enacted to regulate such corporations, and whose only substantial assets are securities deposited (as required by those State laws) with States or State officials in trust for the purchasers in each such State, and whose liabilities to its contract holders exceed its total assets, including such statutory deposits, may force State officials charged under such State laws with possession, administration, and in the event of insolvency, liquidation and distribution of the proceeds, of such deposited securities, into proceedings under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, when there are then pending prior statutory and general equity State proceedings, instituted by those State officials, which are designed to safeguard and protect the rights of contract holders; and in such Chapter X proceedings take possession and control of the deposited securities from these States or State officials, and nullify or set aside the trust liens of the contract holders, created by the State statutes.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Briefs of other respondents will discuss and argue the question of whether Fidelity was an insurance company; whether it can or should be rehabilitated as an annuity or "face-amount certificate" company, or in any other line of business; if liquidation must ensue, whether a slow and orderly one is a reorganization within the purview of Chapter X; and whether there was good faith as defined in Section 146(3) of Chapter X in the filing of the petition. These issues will not be discussed hereinunder, except incidentally.

The West Virginia respondents will endeavor to show the Court that the Debtor's petition was not filed in good faith as defined in Section 146(4) of Chapter X, in that there were then pending in State Courts, particularly in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, prior proceedings which would best subserve the interests of Fidelity's contract holders, its only creditors.

In arguing this issue, these respondents will contend that the case at bar is governed by the decision of this Court in the Marine Harbor case; that Congress evinced and expressed the intention that in the event of insolvency the deposits should remain with and be administered by the State officials with whom those deposits were made; that there is no necessity for intervention by the S. E. C., and a lack of Congressional direction that it should intervene other than in the limited manner provided by Congress; that the deposits should not be taken from the possession of the State officials, and the trust liens created by the State depository laws, in favor of the contract holders in each State, should neither be nullified nor set aside; that the deposits were made with sovereign States or State officials who, because of the Eleventh Amendment, are not subject to suit, order or injunction by the District Court; that the deposit laws of each State must be interpreted by the State Courts thereof, which are better fitted so to do than is the Federal District Court to do it for them; and that these State officials represented by their Attorney Generals, and acting under the guidance of their respective State Courts, have not been shown not to be as able as the Federal Trustee to liquidate the deposits, and properly to distribute the proceeds thereof.

These respondents in this brief will argue fully one point, and will raise but not argue other points, which were issues raised in the District Court (R. 186-187) and in the Circuit Court of Appeals below, but were not discussed or decided in the opinion below. However, it is believed that this is permissible, and that any ground raised below, which will tend to sustain, not overthrow, the judgment below, may be herein urged in support thereof.[5]

ARGUMENT

I

THE DEBTOR'S PETITION SHOULD BE DISMISSED BECAUSE IT WAS NOT FILED IN GOOD FAITH AS DEFINED IN SECTION 130 (7) AND SECTION 146(4) OF CHAPTER X OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, IT NOT BEING SHOWN THAT THE PRIOR PROCEEDINGS PENDING IN STATE COURTS, PARTICULARLY IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF KANAWHA COUNTY, WEST VIRGINIA, WOULD NOT BEST SUBSERVE THE INTERESTS OF CONTRACT HOLDERS; SUCH PRIOR PROCEEDINGS HAVING BEEN INSTITUTED IN STATE COURTS BY OR ON BEHALF OF STATE AUTHORITIES HOLDING AS TRUSTEES SECURITIES DEPOSITED BY FIDELITY; PURSUANT TO VALID AND APPLICABLE STATE LAWS, FOR THE BENEFIT OF ITS CONTRACT HOLDERS IN EACH SUCH STATE.

A

The case at bar is governed by the decision of this Court in the Marine Harbor Case, and the rules of law therein decided should be applied herein.

In the case of Marine Harbor Properties, Inc., v. Manufacturer's Trust Company, decided November 9, 1942, 11 U. S. Law Week 4020, 87 L. Ed. (Adv.) 73, Debtor's sole asset was a building located in New York, the value of which was admittedly less than the first mortgage on it. There were also junior mortgages, as well as unsecured debts. The mortgage had been purchased by a mortgage guaranty company, and participating certificates sold to the public, and later the guaranty company became insolvent. Special New York legislation, called the Shackno Act, was enacted to deal with such insolvencies, and under that Act a trustee had been appointed and was acting in State Court proceedings. Four months after the trustee instituted a foreclosure action for the benefit of the first mortgage holders, the debtor instituted Chapter X proceedings.

The question in issue in the Marine Harbor case is the same as that with which we are here concerned, namely, should the Debtor's petition under Chapter X be dismissed under Section 130(7) and Section 146(4) because of prior proceedings pending in State Court?

In the Marine Harbor case the property involved was real estate; in the instant case the property is securities. In the former case a mortgage was placed on the real estate and the general public, by reason of having purchased certificates of participation, became the equitable owners thereof; and in the instant case, by virtue of the contract entered into with the purchasers of its contracts, the Debtor contracted to deposit reserve funds "in trust in accordance with the law of the State of West Virginia." (See Statement and Appendix, Part I.) Fourteen other States, by statute or trust indenture, required a similar deposit to be made in each such State, also in trust for the benefit of contract owners or purchasers in each such State.

In both cases the debtor had been in financial difficulties for a number of years; in the instant case at least since 1932. In both cases the debtor had unsuccessfully tried every logical and legitimate way of getting out of its financial difficulties, particularly by obtaining new capital. In the instant case the evidence shows that the Debtor for more than three years scoured the financial centers of the country in an attempt to interest new capital in the enterprise, wholly without success. In the Marine Harbor case there was an intimation of possible new capital to be forthcoming upon reorganization; in the instant case there is positive evidence that there can be and will be no new capital available from any source (R. 260).

In both instances the value of the property is less than the liens upon it. In the Marine Harbor case it was less than the first lien; in the instant case there is only one lien, that is a trust lien for the benefit of contract holders, and upon a reserve liability basis (Table A in Statement) the company is only 86.97% solvent.

In both instances State legislation was especially enacted to deal with the particular circumstances. (Ex. 6, S. E. C. Report to Congress, pp. 125 and 127.) In New York the Shackno Act and other co-related legislation was passed to deal with insolvent mortgage guaranty companies. In West Virginia and other States, securities laws were enacted regulating companies selling annuities on the installment plan, requiring deposits from them, and providing proceedings for liquidation upon insolvency. (See Summary in Appendix, Part III.)

In the Marine Harbor case, because the value of the property was less than the first lien thereon, there was a necessity of dealing only with those first lienors, under the absolute priorities doctrine of Northern Pacific R. Co. v. Boyd, 228 U. S. 482, 57 L. Ed. 931, and Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., 308 U. S. 106, 84 L. Ed. 110. In the instant case only the contract holders, all of whom are trust beneficiaries or secured creditors, need be dealt with, because the evidence discloses conclusively (R. 181), and both the District Court and Circuit Court of Appeals have so held, that there is no equity remaining in the assets for the stockholders (R. 196, 259), and it is admitted by petitioners herein (Brief, p. 40).

In both cases, before application was made to the Federal Courts there had been other proceedings. In the Marine Harbor case there were voluntary efforts at adjustment between the trustee of the mortgage and the debtor; there were Shackno Act proceedings in which the debtor took part; and then a mortgage foreclosure proceeding, which would have wiped out the debtor's entire interests, and those of the junior lienors.

In the case at bar, Fidelity tried all possible voluntary means of rehabilitation, including attempts to obtain new capital, and finally a conversion into a life insurance company. The S. E. C. had thoroughly investigated it and had presented its findings in a printed document to Congress (Ex. 6), and Congress had enacted the Investment Company Act of 1940 for the future regulation of such companies, and Fidelity was unable to continue in the annuity business under that Act.

As set out in the Statement, on April 4, 1941, the Auditor revoked Fidelity's license, retained the deposited securities (Code 33-9-10), and on April 11, 1941, caused his statutory suit to be instituted by the Attorney General in the State Court provided by statute (33-2-45).

The other depository States, by their proper officials, instituted proper proceedings under their laws.

All of these proceedings progressed satisfactorily, and apparently met with the approval of the contract holders, for at least there was no substantial objection thereto (R. 483), until a dissatisfied group of officers and stockholders of the company, held a purported corporate meeting on June 3, 1941, in Pittsburgh (held invalid by the District Court [R. 189]), and authorized the institution of the instant proceedings, for the apparent purpose of obtaining some equity or benefit for themselves, although as stockholders they had no equity remaining. (R. 196, 259).

Again the similarity to the Marine Harbor case is noted, in that those who there initiated the proceedings under Chapter X in debtor's behalf, apparently so did hoping to obtain some benefits thereby.

After the proceedings herein were instituted under Chapter X, the various State officials who were trustees of the deposited funds for the benefit of contract holders intervened and objected to the Chapter X proceedings, as well as groups of contract holders from West Virginia, Tennessee, Iowa, Missouri and Ohio (R. 287, 288).

After the affairs of the company had been fully aired by the hearing in the Chapter X proceedings, and it was judicially determined that the Debtor was insolvent in the bankruptcy sense, it was entirely apparent that the company could not be rehabilitated, and the need for prompt liquidation was seen (R. 259). This is apparently admitted by the S. E. C. brief filed herein (Brief, p. 47).

These respondents contend that liquidation should promptly ensue and the prior pending State Court proceedings are proper and adequate therefor.

The decision of the Marine Harbor case is exactly applicable to the situation here. There is positive evidence that the company is insolvent in the bankruptcy sense. There is entire lack of evidence that any new capital can be produced. It is admitted that the stockholders have no remaining interest or equity (Petitioners' Brief, p. 40). There are no junior interests in this case. Nothing remains under the "full priority rule of the Boyd case" but permitting the contract holders to realize upon their security.

Again like the Marine Harbor case, "much emphasis is placed on numerous safeguards contained in Chapter X." Again it can be said that these considerations might be relevant and persuasive "if this was the case of the usual reorganization proceeding dealing with more than one class of securities under the older procedures which Chapter X was designed to improve and supplant"; or those safeguards might be given some consideration if the desired result was rehabilitation instead of liquidation.

However, there is only one class of creditors, that is the contract holders (in re Stoddard, 242 N. Y. 148, 151 N. E. 159), each and every one of whom, under the West Virginia law and the laws of the other fourteen depository States, is not only a secured creditor, but a cestui que trust or beneficial owner of the securities deposited in trust with the State of West Virginia or with the State in which that contract owner resides.

Therefore, in the case at bar, as in the Marine Harbor case, there is no need to determine whether the salutary safeguards of Chapter X exist in the pending State Court proceedings. Particularly is this true since liquidation and distribution are the only actions herein sought, or contemplated.

We request the Court particularly to note that no contract holder in any State, who must look primarily to the West Virginia deposit for his protection, has instituted any action in any State, or has made any objection or taken any Court action, in either his own State or within the State of West Virginia, to the proceedings carried on in the West Virginia Courts and by the Auditor of West Virginia; nor have the officials of any such States.

Mr. McNulty, Secretary of Fidelity, testified however, that forty to fifty per cent. of the contract holders who wrote to the West Virginia Receivers shortly after their appointment, even at that early stage, wanted cash immediately; that is, they desired an immediate liquidation and return of such money as was due them. (R. 320, 330).

After the Federal proceedings were instituted, the evidence shows that a mass meeting of contract holders was held in the City of Wheeling, West Virginia, where the home office of the company is located, and where naturally a large number of its contracts were sold; that the purpose of this mass meeting was to take proper steps to object to the proceedings instituted in the United States Court for the Southern District of West Virginia, and to demand that liquidation promptly ensue (R. 398, 402, Ex. B, C).

The proceedings instituted in the various States with reference to the securities deposited there, are in purpose and effect a foreclosure proceedure upon those deposits, and in nearly every instance are actually liquidation proceedings; and in each depository State there is ample legal machinery, either set up in the depository law, the securities law, or the general or equity law, whereby the securities deposited with the States can be therein liquidated and proper distribution made of the funds to those rightfully entitled thereto. As shown in Appendix Part III, by virtue of either the State statute, or by action in the proceedings, and before institution of the Chapter X proceedings, the legal title to the deposited securities, had become vested in the State or State official acting as trustee for the benefit of the contract holders in Alabama, Maryland, Iowa, Wisconsin and West Virginia.

Again the similarity to the Marine Harbor case is noted, because in that case there remained nothing for the trustee in State Court to do but sell the security and distribute the proceeds thereof, which could be done in the State Court in which the matter was pending, and proceedings for which had been started. In our instant case the same situation exists.

In the Marine Harbor case this Court held:

> "In view of the burden on a petitioner to make the showing required by Section 130(7) and Section 146(4), the Bankruptcy Court is not warranted in assuming, without more, that a State foreclosure proceeding instituted for and on behalf of the first mortgage creditors exclusively is inadequate, measured by Chapter X standards, to protect their interests. The contrary course would result in Chapter X making greater inroads on prior proceedings than Section 130(7) and Section 146 (4) indicate was the purpose."

Those words are directly applicable to the case at bar, particularly since the affirmance of the decision of the Court below is requested not only by the State officials, respondents herein, who are acting as trustees for the contract holders, but also by officials of other States wherein a deposit was made for the benefit of contract holders, who are acting as trustees in behalf of the contract holders of their respective States. These State officials are not respondents herein, but in a brief amici curiae adopted the position of these respondents and requested the same relief.

This Court specifically held: "Every petition under Chapter X must state, inter alia, 'the specific facts showing the need for relief under this chapter.' Section 130(7)," and further, "Congress in effect directed the bankruptcy courts not to approve petitions under Ch. X in such cases unless it appeared that the interest of creditors and stockholders would not be best subserved in the prior proceedings. And it put the burden on the petitioner to make that showing." An examination of the Debtor's petition shows that in paragraph III the Debtor stated that it engaged in the annuity business until December 31, 1940, when the Investment Company Act of 1940 went into operation, "which Act so increased the reserve requirements on the part of Debtor to contract holders that Debtor found it impossible to comply with the provisions of said Act," (R. 5).

The Debtor neglected to state that the Investment Company Act (Sec. 28[a] [1]) provides that each such company must have a clear capital of fifty thousand dollars if organized and continuously operated prior to March 15, 1940, and a capital stock paid in cash of $250,000 if organized after that date, with which provision Fidelity could never comply; because in Section V of its petition it sets out its reserve liability at approximately twenty-five million dollars and its assets at "approximately twenty-three million dollars." (R. 6).

The petition states, in paragraph VII, "by reason of said interest requirements under its said contracts the Debtor is now suffering an annual loss of approximately two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, and that this loss will continue, and probably increase" (R. 7). Debtor further neglected to set forth in its petition that its operating expenses were 25.2% of each dollar of contract holders' money received, of which 18.9% was for selling costs alone (Ex. 6, p. 88, Report by S. E. C. to Congress), and that under the Investment Company Act of 1940 it was restricted to a loading charge of 7% total.

In view of the Marine Harbor decision and the language above quoted, we believe this Court will find particularly relevant the reasons Debtor stated in paragraph VII of its petition as showing the need for relief under Chapter X (R. 7).

> "• • • Debtor has been unable to meet its obligations as they mature and will be unable to meet its obligations as they mature, unless the rights of its contract holders are modified so that the earnings received on securities and assets owned by Debtor will be sufficient in amount to meet the requirements under its outstanding contracts; and if the rights of its outstanding contract holders are modified to this extent, Debtor will be able to meet its reserve requirements and be able to comply with the Investment Company Act of 1940, and will be able to resume the operation of its business.

"* * * and that the rights of all contract holders must be modified as above set forth in order that Debtor may be permitted to obtain adequate relief * * *."

In substance, the Debtor, who had no equities of its own as set forth by its own petition, states openly in its petition that the rights of the secured creditors, that is the contract holders, must be modified, and not only must they be modified so that the Debtor can continue business and procure the increased reserves required under the Act, but modified so as to procure the capital required by the Debtor to do business under the Investment Company Act of 1940; as there is no statement or intimation that any new capital would be forthcoming.

Therefore, it is submitted that the Debtor has failed to sustain the burden of proof of showing (as required by Sec. 130[7] and Sec. 146[4] of the Bankruptcy Act) that the Chapter X proceedings will better subserve the interests of the contract holders than the prior proceedings pending in the State Courts, particularly that in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia.

B

Congress in enacting the Investment Company Act of 1940, intended that deposits made with State officials by face-amount certificate companies prior to January 1, 1941, should in the event of insolvency be retained by them, and the trust liens created by State statute should not be set aside; and Congress recognized the validity of, and legislated concerning, insolvency proceedings of such companies when instituted in proceedings other than under Chapter X, and permitted a very limited and strictly defined intervention therein by the S. E. C.

Intent of Congress as Expressed in Committee Hearings on Act

The Investment Company Act of 1940 was enacted as HR-10065 and was introduced in the Senate as S-4108, a substitute for S-3580. As set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency accompanying S-4108 (Report No. 1775), the original bill was the outgrowth of extensive study of investment trusts and investment companies, conducted by the S. E. C. at the direction of Congress. In the original draft of the Act (S-3580) there was no provision for deposits with States or State officials, and in Section 29 relating to bankruptcy of face-amount certificate companies, it provided that every deposit made with a State agency for the benefit of the holder of any security sold on or after October 1, 1940, should be null and void as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the company. It left unaffected the status of deposits for the benefit of holders of securities sold prior to October 1, 1940.

The bill was explained to the Sub-Committee by Commissioner Healy and Mr. David Schenker, Chief Counsel for the S. E. C. Investment Trust study. He was talking about the provisions therein contained which after amendment became Section 29 of the Investment Company Act, entitled "Bankruptcy of Face-Amount Certificate Companies." With respect to the deposits already made with the States as required by State laws, Mr. Schenker stated:

> "We do not disturb the present deposits and the situation with respect to future payments made on outstanding contracts."
>
> Hearings before Sub-Committee of the Committee on Banking and Currency, United States Senate, Part I, p. 302.

Under questioning by Senator Herring (Iowa) concerning these State deposits, Mr. Schenker stated that they could not unequivocally say "that such security, in the event the company were bankrupt, would be applicable to the certificate holder in the States which required security. There were certain Supreme Court cases which seemed to cast some doubt upon that fact."

> "Senator Herring. Well, we have possession of them and I would like to see them get them.
>
> "Mr. Schenker. Yes; of course you have possession of them. We used meticulous care to see that those States which have them can hold on to them. With respect to payments made on certificates already sold, you can keep those, too; but with respect to the future we provide differently.
>
> "Senator Herring. • • • you cannot assume that the Federal authorities are any more competent than the State authorities. If you say that, then you may want to send everything down here to Washington.
>
> "Mr. Schenker. We are not unmindful of that, and we are not disparaging present deposits.
>
> • • • • •
>
> "Mr. Healy. • • • Now, as Mr. Schenker points out, the existing status is not disturbed so far as the deposits are concerned."

(Pages 310-311, 312.)

The hearings ended after four weeks and resumed on May 31, 1940, at which time there had been a redraft of the bill. In Part IV of that hearing, pages 1124-1125, when Commissioner Healy and Mr. Schenker explained the matter to the Committee, Senator Herring stated:

> "You see our position. We are protecting our face-amount policyholders and are taking care of them, and we are not going to give up that security, for some State that does not take care of them."

And after some further questions, Commissioner Healy stated, with reference to provisions in the new bill:

> "What would happen if the company went into bankruptcy would be this: The people in your State should use up the deposit; and then if it had not been paid for in full, when they came to take their share out of the national deposit, there would be an equalization process there, so that their share of the settlement recovered would be the same as everybody else's. But in the meantime they would have that deposit."

In the afternoon of that day, Mr. Schenker made the following statement, in part:

> "The way the proposed law is set up, the Investors' Syndicate may form a new company after the enactment of this bill. They may stop selling in the old company, although they will make collections on certificates, so that this bill in no way, Senator Herring, touches deposits that have been made to secure certificates issued up to the time of the passage of this bill. • • • If such deposit is made and the company goes bankrupt, then certifi- cate holders of a State in which the deposit was made will get a preference with respect to moneys realized on liquidation of this collateral. * * * So we have not abolished deposits. * * *

"Senator Herring. It will be just a question of whether a State will be willing for a company to do business in that State. In the case of our State, we will expect protection for certificate holders.

"Mr. Schenker. * * * In other words, this bill does not prevent any State in the future insisting upon a deposit for the protection of its certificate holders.

"Senator Wagner. In other words, it does not change the present status. I mean, so far as the requirement of a deposit is concerned.

"Mr. Schenker. That is right. (The bill makes an addition). The addition is that where you have a deposit in a State, and the certificate holders get a sum of money on that deposit, they cannot share in the general funds of the company until other people receive an amount equal to what the people in that State receive."

This is similar to the provision in the West Virginia depository law (Code 33-9-3), which provides that where a deposit is made in a State for the contract holders therein, they can only share in the West Virginia fund to the extent that a deposit was not made in their State fully to protect them, but the difference of the deposit was placed in the West Virginia fund for the benefit of the contract holders of that State.

Mr. Schenker went on to state, immediately following the above:

"So that if a security commissioner of a State has a 100 percent deposit, and a company goes bankrupt, the deposit he holds will be liquidated and certificate holders in that State will receive the money and be paid in full.

"Senator Hughes. But they get the full benefit of their deposit?

"Mr. Schenker. Yes. And the securities commissioner of a State can require a deposit in any amount he wants.

"Senator Herring. I think that is all right."

Hearing, Part 4, pp. 1128-1129.

Senator Wagner, Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, made the report accompanying the substitute bill (S-4108), the report number being 1775. With respect to the provisions concerning State deposits, Senator Wagner stated, in part:

"The bill preserves the rights of residents in those States which require specific deposits with their State officials."

On June 12, 1940, Representative William P. Cole, Jr., Chairman of the House Sub-Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, introduced HR-10065, a companion bill to S-4108, and submitted Report No. 2639, which states, in part:

"Section 29. Bankruptcy of face-amount certificate companies, subsection (a); while preserving the rights, even in the event of bankruptcy, of residents in those States which require specific deposits with their State officials, * * *."

Therefore, Congress, in passing the Investment Company Act of 1940, specifically intended the deposits made with the States prior to January 1, 1941, to remain in those States, under the custody and control of the State officers properly entitled thereto, and in the event of insolvency Congress especially intended that these deposits should be liquidated and distributed in the States, for the benefit of the contract holders in those States.

In any event, the provisions of the Act were to apply only to deposits made on contracts sold after January 1, 1941. In our instant case no deposit was made in any State after that date, so the deposits previously made were intended by Congress to be retained by the depository States.

Congress Strictly Defined and Delimited Intervention by the S. E. C. in Insolvency Proceedings of Investment Companies Such as Fidelity, and Enacted Specific Provisions for Such Proceedings When Instituted Other than Under Chapter X.

The S. E. C. in its original draft of the Investment Company Act of 1940, provided for wide discretionary powers by it with reference to investment companies, their reorganization and insolvencies. As stated in 50 Yale Law Journal 442:

> "While it was never seriously proposed to outlaw investment companies entirely, the original bill for Federal regulation, submitted by the S. E. C. to Congress (March 1940) surpassed even the Holding-Company Act in grants of discretionary power to the S. E. C. Whether it would have been politically possible to pass the bill in its original form is questionable. At any rate the present bill is a drastic modification . . . ."

As finally enacted, Section 3(a) defines investment companies, and subsection (2) includes companies selling face-amount certificates on the installment plan. There were only three of them then in existence in the United States, and Fidelity and Investors Syndicate, the two principal ones, were discussed by the S. E. C. with the Congressional Committees. So the Act was definitely intended to cover Fidelity.

Section 25 of the Investment Company Act as passed by Congress is entitled "Plans of Reorganization." This section contains provisions concerning proceedings for reorganization of all investment companies, including face-amount certificate companies, instituted in any court of competent jurisdiction. Congress was not dealing with reorganization under Chapter X, because that was already law, and in (d), the final subsection of Section 25, Congress enacted that the section was not to derogate from or affect the powers of the Courts of the United States and the S. E. C. with reference to reorganizations contained in the Bankruptcy Act as amended. Also, subsection (c) provides for injunctive proceedings in District Courts to restrain these other proceedings under certain circumstances.

Therefore, Congress in enacting Section 25 clearly intended and recognized that investment companies, including face-amount certificate companies, could have reorganization proceedings in State Courts. A mere reading of this section will refute petitioners' contention that Congress intended all such proceedings to be under Chapter X, and under a Court with "national jurisdiction."

And Congress not only recognized the validity and legality of such State Court proceedings, but enacted into the Act the specific and limited part the S. E. C. could play therein. And this after a full hearing upon a bill presented by the S. E. C., giving that body, as above stated, practically unlimited supervisory jurisdiction and veto powers over such reorganization proceedings.

As stated in 50 Yale Law Journal 454:

> "The original draft of Section 25 gave the S. E. C. veto powers over reorganization plans unless they met the bankruptcy standard of being 'fair, equitable and feasible' . . . ." As finally redrafted, however, Section 25 gave the S. E. C. practically no powers over reorganization proceedings of investment companies, except for the possibility of the Commission exercising an extra statutory authority.

Therefore, we submit, Congress intentionally provided for and permitted proceedings such as those pending in the State Courts when the Chapter X proceedings were instituted, and apparently contemplated, as these respondents contend, that such proceedings could be consummated with only limited aid from the S. E. C.

Section 25(b) of the Investment Company Act provides that the S. E. C. is authorized, if requested by 25% of the holders of any class of securities, or by any registered investment company, to render an advisory report on plans of reorganization, which is then required to be mailed to interested persons. However, even if so requested, if the fairness or feasibility of such plan is in issue before any Court of competent jurisdiction, such report cannot be rendered unless submitted by the Court to the S. E. C. for that purpose.

Section 25(c) makes provision for those cases in which S. E. C. was not invited into the State Court proceedings, and gives that body certain rights and control over those proceedings nevertheless. This section provides:

> "Any [U. S.] district court [in the state of incorporation, or where the company maintains its principal place of business] is authorized to enjoin the consummation of any plan of reorganization > * * * upon proceedings instituted by the Commission [who shall appear for the security holders], if such court shall determine any such plan to be grossly unfair or to constitute gross misconduct or gross abuse of trust on the part of the officers, directors * * * or other sponsors of such plan."

And this is the full extent of the provision Congress made for S. E. C. participation in reorganization of investment companies, including Fidelity, when not under Chapter X.

But it is stated in 50 Yale Law Journal 443:

> "Although the role of the S. E. C. is ostensibly little more than that of a watch dog, with power to enforce the Act by stop order, injunction or criminal prosecution, it seems likely that the Commission will exercise considerably greater power by way of persuasion than a literal reading of the Act would imply."

The Congressional intent is further discerned from Section 29(a) of the Investment Company Act, entitled "Bankruptcy of Face-Amount Certificate Companies," the section under discussion in the above colloquies between the S. E. C. and the Congressional Committee. While in Section 25 Congress dealt with reorganization of all categories of investment companies, including face-amount certificate companies, in Section 29(a) Congress set out special provisions dealing with bankruptcy of this latter class alone; and placed this section, enacted as part of the Investment Company Act, as an amendment to be at the end of Section 67 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 as amended; and Section 67 is in Chapter VII, or straight bankruptcy.

Subsection (f) (2) of Section 29(a) provides that deposits with State officials for protection of contracts sold after January 1, 1941, shall be voidable at the option of the Trustee, if the company is insolvent and "cannot make full payment and discharge on account of all face-amount certificates sold by Debtor." But subsection (3), immediately following, provides the liens created by the State deposits must be recognized and given effect:

> "In the event any deposit or transfer described in paragraph 2 of this subsection (f) shall be avoided the trustee shall segregate the property received by the trustee from the depository and charge the same with the costs and expenses of maintenance and liquidation and distribute the net proceeds thereof to the creditors who would have been entitled thereto under the provisions of the law or agreement providing for the deposit or transfer of the property; * * *."

Congress made no provision for participation by the S. E. C. in bankruptcy of face-amount certificate companies, except under Section 29(b), which provides that the District Court alone shall appoint the Trustee, but only after notifying the S. E. C. and giving it an opportunity to be heard.

We again call the Court's attention to the use by Congress of the word "liquidation" in subsection (3), quoted immediately above.

This was not an oversight upon the part of the S. E. C. or Congress, because under former Section 77-B(c)(8) of the Bankruptcy Act the Judge, in addition to the reorganization powers conferred upon him by Section 77-B, could under certain circumstances "direct the estate to be liquidated, or direct the Trustees to liquidate the estate * * *."

Section 236 of Chapter X, together with Sections 237 and 238, were substituted in place thereof when Section 77-B was amended and became Chapter X, and were specifically considered by Congress, as shown in the report of Senate Committee on the Judiciary, May 27, 1938, page 37. The provision of Section 77-B empowering the District Court to order liquidation of the debtor was not enacted into Chapter X, but instead the District Court under Section 236 of Chapter X has the option of dismissing the petition or adjudicating the debtor a bankrupt.

In other words, Congress in its original enactment on reorganization proceedings in Section 77-B had directed that liquidation could ensue in those 77-B reorganization proceedings in the event of failure of rehabilitation; but after due consideration, when it passed the Chandler Act amending Section 77-B into Chapter X, Congress expressly withdrew liquidation of corporations from reorganization proceedings. Instead the Court, under Sections 236, 237 and 238, in the event rehabilitation fails, can either dismiss the petition, or adjudicate the Debtor a bankrupt. In the latter event, Chapters I to VII of the Bankruptcy Act apply, which include no intervention by the S. E. C.

Further to show that Congress did know and realize the distinction between "rehabilitation" and "liquidation" is shown by 11 U. S. C. A., Section 203(i), providing for confirming a farmer's proposal by the Bankruptcy Court if satisfied "(1) it includes an equitable and feasible method of liquidation for secured creditors and of financial rehabilitation for the farmer * * *."

Likewise, the S. E. C., in its Report to Congress on the study, etc., of Protective and Reorganization Committees, Part VIII* at page 2, stated:

> "The term 'reorganization' in this, as in the foregoing parts of this report, is applied to all sorts of changes which affect the rights of security holders, except actual liquidation under State statutes or under the Bankruptcy Act."

*Submitted by Jerome N. Frank, chairman, the study being headed by Mr. Justice Douglas during his period as chairman, p. iii.

The petitioners and the S. E. C. contend that only under Chapter X can liquidation proceed in a slow and orderly manner, and apparently take the position that straight bankruptcy requires something otherwise.

Chapter 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, Section 2(a) (5), provides that bankruptcy courts have the power to "authorize the business of the bankrupt to be conducted for limited periods by receivers, the marshal or trustee, if necessary in the best interests of the estate * * *." Subsection (7) permits the Court to "cause the assets of the bankrupt to be collected, reduced to money and distributed * * *." Therefore, there is nothing in Chapters 1 to 7 (straight bankruptcy) which requires speed or haste in regard to liquidation where it would be against the best interests of the bankrupt or of the creditors, and no need to stretch the reorganization provisions of Chapter X as enacted by Congress, to include liquidation therein, especially since it was taken out by Congress.

Therefore, we respectfully insist that our interpretation of the intent of Congress is sound. For liquidation of ordinary corporations straight bankruptcy is available; for reorganization of corporations (meaning rehabilitation), Congress, in September 1938, enacted Chapter X, and set forth the part the S. E. C. was to play therein. For bankrupt face-amount companies Congress, in August 1940, in the Investment Company Act of 1940, Section 29, amended the straight bankruptcy provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, and set forth a procedure for their liquidation, including an optional voiding by the Trustee of State deposits made after January 1, 1941, but with full recognition of all liens, trust relationships or other rights acquired by virtue of the State statutes requiring the deposit, and with the S. E. C. to have no part therein.

For reorganization of investment companies, including face-amount certificate companies, Congress prescribed therefor in Section 25 of the Investment Company Act, and provided in (b) that under certain circumstances, the S. E. C. could be invited into such proceedings, to a limited extent, by the security holders, the company or the Court.†

Section 25 further provides in (c) that if the S. E. C. is not invited into the reorganization proceedings of investment companies, it may still exercise a degree of control over them, by having consummation of unfair or fraudulent plans enjoined in a Federal District Court.‡

Thus Congress rounded out its entire scheme or plan for insolvent corporations, which, we submit, should not be disrupted to permit the attorneys for the S. E. C. to carry their rights and duties from one category or class into all the others; especially when there is no urgent need therefor, and in opposition to the expressed intent of Congress.

So, it is respectfully submitted that Congress did not intend an annuity company such as Fidelity, in any event, to partake of the provisions of Chapter X for liquidation purposes, and it is further submitted that Congress particularly was careful to avoid the enactment of legislation which upon insolvency would in any way disturb the deposits made with the States, or the trust liens of the contract holders thereby acquired; and Congress expressly recognized that liquidation of investment companies, such as was Fidelity, could take place in State Courts.

†Congress apparently recognized that reorganization of investment companies were for State Courts, because had Congress intended them to be under Chapter X, no such invitation to the S. E. C. would be necessary.

‡This also indicates Congressional contemplation and recognition of investment company reorganizations in State Courts.

C

Securities were deposited in trust with States or State officials by Fidelity as required by valid State laws, for the benefit and protection of the purchasers and holders of Fidelity contracts in those States, and such securities so deposited should not now be taken from those States or State officials, and the trust lien thereby created in favor of the contract holders in each such State should not be nullified or avoided.

The typical contract sold by Fidelity had a provision in Section 1 that the reserve fund "shall be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia," or "shall be invested in securities and deposited with State authorities in trust."

The applicable feature of the West Virginia law (Code 33-9-3) requires that securities approved by the Insurance Commissioner shall be deposited "with the State Treasurer * * * in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders."

It is uncontrovertible that a State may make such reasonable restrictions as it desires before permitting a charter to be issued for a domestic corporation and before permitting it to receive a license to do business in the State, and the deposit law of West Virginia, so far as it concerns Fidelity, a West Virginia corporation, is, of course, unchallenged.

With regard to the other depository States, the deposit is exactly the same as that required of a foreign insurance company as a condition prerequisite to its being permitted to engage in business within the State, and this Court early upheld the constitutionality of State statutes requiring a deposit for the protection and benefit of local citizens of a State before a foreign insurance company would be permitted to do business in the State. Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 168, 19 L. Ed. 357. In upholding the constitutionality of such a Virginia statute, this Court stated: "They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely * * * or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as in their judgment would best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion."

In re Bajardi, 8 F. (2d) 551:

> "The power of the State to require the deposit of the securities as a condition precedent to the transaction of business in this State is unquestioned."[8]

The rights of such insurance companies are governed by the statutes in force in the State when the securities are deposited therein, and the interpretation thereof by the Courts of the State. Lawson v. Aetna Ins. Co. (W. Va.), 41 F. (2d) 316.

Therefore, there can be no real challenge to the validity of the laws requiring the State deposits.

The State Deposits Constitute Trust Funds for the Benefit of the Contract Holders Which May Not Be Avoided or Nullified

There were fifteen States in the United States which required and received a deposit by Fidelity, and there are thirty-six States in the United States which required and received a deposit from either Fidelity or Investors Syndicate, the other company doing a similar annuity business to that of Fidelity. The question then arises whether, upon insolvency of the depositing company, such a deposit of securities made in compliance with valid State statutes can or should be retained and administered by the State authorities with whom the deposit was made, and whether such deposited securities in each State were trust funds for the benefit of contract holders in those States, which trust liens should not be destroyed or set aside.

This Court decided (1898) the status of such funds deposited with States, in the case of Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 43 L. Ed. 432, at 439.

The actual decision in that case was that a statute of Tennessee in giving a preference in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent foreign corporation was unconstitutional, but the Court in its decision stated:*

> "* * * the objections to the statutes of Tennessee do not necessarily embrace enactments that are found in some of the States requiring foreign insurance companies, as a condition of their coming into the State for the purposes of business, to deposit with the state treasurer funds sufficient to secure policy-holders in its midst. Legislation of that character does not present any question of discrimination against citizens forbidden by the Constitution. Insurance funds set apart in advance for the benefit of home policy owners of a foreign insurance corporation doing business in the State are a trust fund of a specific kind to be administered for the exclusive benefit of certain persons, * * * funds or property specifically set aside as a trust fund, and at the outset put into the custody of the state, for the exclusive benefit, or for the benefit primarily, of Tennessee creditors, * * *."

*Because of the pertinency we quote at length.

†The digests state the general rule and the reasons therefor:
In 104 A. L. R. 748, 749:

"In order to protect the interests of residents in their dealings with foreign corporations most States have adopted statutes requiring foreign corporations, and more especially insurance, surety, or other corporations, * * * to deposit with the State, as a prerequisite to their doing business therein, securities or a

And recently this Court held that such deposit cannot be taken from possession of the State official holding it, and domestic creditors may have exclusive remedy against the fund, if such is the policy of the depository State.

In the case of Fischer v. American Life Ins. Co., 314 U. S. 549, 86 L. Ed. 328, Mr. Fischer, Commissioner of Insurance of the State of Iowa (also a respondent in the case at bar), as such, was the custodian of a deposit made by a foreign insurance company in the State of Iowa for the benefit of policyholders in that State, which company later became insolvent. The policies were re-insured by a Michigan company, the deposit remaining unchanged, and then the re-insuring company became insolvent. Mr. Fischer instituted his proper suit in State Court for the administration and distribution of said deposit for the benefit of the Iowa policyholders, and because of the claim by the Michigan receiver that the latter "had title to all of its assets wherever situated," Mr. Fischer brought a suit in Federal Court to remove an encumbrance, lien or cloud upon the title of the property. This Court held that: bond, * * * and the Courts are inclined zealously to guard the rights of residents arising under such statutes.

"* * * by the interpretation of most Courts it (the deposit) is considered as a trust held by the State for the protection of those doing business with the corporation.

* * *

"* * * in the majority of cases the Courts have held that such protection extended only to such resident claimants."

In 29 R. C. L. 69-70, Sec. 32, it is further stated:

"The deposits constitute a special trust fund for the purpose of meeting the depository company's policy obligations arising out of the transaction of business within the State, and may be subject thereto."

Again at 29 R. C. L. 107-108, Sec. 81:

"Generally a deposit with a State official creates a trust for the benefit of policy holders in case of insolvency, to the exclusion of other claims."

And in 29 R. C. L. 108, Sec. 82:

"Requirement of funds or deposits from foreign insurance companies are generally regarded as having for their purpose the protection of the resident claimants."

> "* * * even if that claim of the Michigan Receiver were true, that nevertheless claimants entitled to the benefit of the fund in Iowa might pursue their suits and remedies against it and in derogation of the claim of the Michigan Receiver if that were Iowa's policy. Clark v. Willard, 294 U. S. 211. That is the asserted Iowa policy here. The Iowa Receiver is in possession of the securities in question; * * *."

and

> "We repeat that neither Michigan nor Texas is entitled to the securities if such a disposition of them would contravene Iowa law."

The Federal Courts in In re Bajardi, 8 F. (2d) 551, and in In re Rosett, 204 F. 431, have held that "the proceeds of the securities there deposited are impressed with the trust and must be applied and distributed as provided in" State statutes. See also Firemen's Insurance Co. v. Hemmingway, Fed. Case No. 4794.

A number of State Courts likewise have made decisions regarding deposits made with the States, and unanimously uphold the contention of these respondents, that such deposits are trust funds for the benefit and protection of domestic creditors and policyholders, and in the event of insolvency of the depository company, are to be retained in and by the depository State.*

> "The treasurer is required by the statute to retain the securities in the treasury for the special objects contemplated by the act, until the liabilities of the company are settled or terminated. So long as any thing remains to be done, so long as these liabilities continue, he is expressly prohibited from disposing of or surrendering them. * * * He holds the securities in trust, to be administered, first for the people of Virginia, and then for the company making the deposit. This is the distinction given them by law, controlling not only the treasurer but the courts also; and it would seem there is no power, except that of the Legislature, to change such destination [distinction?].
> "* * * The theory of this whole legislation is, that a foreign insurance company may come into the State, deposit its funds and securities with the treasurer, and carry on business here for an indefinite period. However long this may continue, the securities deposited cannot be surrendered or subjected to the claims of creditors. If this exemption be wrong, * * * the policy of this legislation is bad, and ought to be abandoned."

And this Court in Straton v. New, 283 U. S. 318, 75 L. Ed. 1060, held that in the distribution of the estate of a bankrupt that liens acquired, if valid under State law, are preserved and must be accorded priority, in accordance with applicable local law.

Even the S. E. C. in substance admitted in its brief in the Circuit Court of Appeals, below, that these trust liens created by State statute cannot be avoided, when it stated (Brief, p. 52), "The rights of contract holders by State statutes will be recognized appropriately by the Federal Courts in the proceedings."

Therefore, it is respectfully submitted that the securities deposited in each State should remain in that State, and with the official designated by statute of the State to receive and hold and administer that deposit, and that the States cannot and should not be compelled to turn over the deposited securities to the Central Trust Company, Trustee; and that the trust created, and the beneficial ownership and the trust liens of the contract holders in each such State should not be nullified or set aside.

The Federal Court Under Its Equity Powers Should Release Its Jurisdiction, If Any, in Favor of the State Courts

In the case of Securities & Exchange Commission v. U. S. Realty and Improvement Co., 310 U. S. 434, 84 L. Ed. 1293, this Court held that the question therein was based "on considerations growing out of the public policy of the [Chandler] Act * * * and of the authority of the Court clothed with equity powers and sitting in bankruptcy to give effect to that policy * * *," and that "a bankruptcy court is a court of equity, and is guided by equitable doctrines and principles except in so far as they are inconsistent with the Act. * * * A court of equity in its discretion * * * may in the public interest, even withhold relief altogether; and it would seem that it is bound to stay its hand in the public interest when it reasonably appears that private right will not suffer. Pennsylvania v. Williams, * * *. This interest of the [S. E. C.] does not differ from that of a liquidator under a state statutory proceeding who may, in a proper case, intervene in an equity receivership in a federal court to ask the court to relinquish its jurisdiction in favor of the state proceeding. Pennsylvania v. Williams, * * *. Their [State Banking Commission] only interest, like that of the Commission, is a public one, to maintain the state authority and to secure a liquidation in conformity to state policy."

We submit that this Court should again follow the rule and reasoning of Pennsylvania v. Williams, 294 U. S. 176, 79 L. Ed. 841, because of the similarity of that case to the case at bar. While the case at bar is under Chapter X, and the former case involved a Federal equity proceeding, which had been instituted prior to the State Court proceedings, however, since a bankruptcy court is in reality a court of equity, the same principles should be applicable.

In Pennsylvania v. Williams, there was a contest between a Federal equity proceeding alleging insolvency and asking for appointment of receivers, and the Secretary of Banking of Pennsylvania, desiring to liquidate an insolvent banking company under Pennsylvania statutes particularly enacted to provide for that kind of a company. It was held that the District Court had jurisdiction and could have made the liquidation, but that under the circumstances the equity discretion of the District Court invoked by the petition of the Banking Commissioner was such that the Court should have relinquished its jurisdiction "in favor of the statutory administration of the corporation assets by the State officer," this Court stating:

> "It has long been accepted practice for Federal Courts to relinquish their jurisdiction in favor of the State Courts where its exercise would involve control of, or interference with, the internal affairs of a domestic corporation of the State. (Cases cited.) There are stronger reasons for adopting a like practice where the exercise of jurisdiction involves an unnecessary interference by injunction with the lawful actions of State officials."

The italicized words are particularly and peculiarly pertinent to the case at bar.

In the case of Gordon v. Ominskey, 294 U. S. 186, 79 L. Ed. 848, a somewhat similar question was involved, with this Court again holding the District Court had acquired jurisdiction of the cause, but that upon the request of the Secretary of Banking of Pennsylvania, showing possession and control of the assets by him, pursuant to statute, the District Court, under Pennsylvania v. Williams, should have been induced by the same considerations to relinquish its jurisdiction to the State Courts.

In Pennsylvania General Casualty Co. v. Pennsylvania, 294 U. S. 189, 79 L. Ed. 850, there was a Federal Court suit to liquidate an insurance company and a similar State Court proceeding under the statutes of Pennsylvania by the Insurance Commissioner, with injunctions against interference being issued by each Court, and again the Federal Court had acquired its jurisdiction in the case because the bill there was first presented.

This Court held that the District Court's authority to entertain the suit was not restricted by the procedure of the local statute for liquidation of insurance companies, and that it had rightfully acquired jurisdiction, but that the end result "in the State Court is the liquidation of a domestic insurance company by a State officer, and in the absence of a showing that the interest of creditors and share holders would not be adequately protected by this procedure, the case was a proper one for the District Court in the exercise of judicial discretion to relinquish its jurisdiction in favor of the administration by the State officer."

This policy, so clearly expressed by this Court, of allowing the continuation of State statutory proceedings by State officials for liquidation of domestic companies, even though the Federal Court had jurisdiction of the cause and had first acquired its jurisdiction, we believe should be a guiding principle in the case at bar.

Here the officials of six States are respondents and there are eight additional States wherein Fidelity made a deposit, joined with them amici curiae requesting this Court that they be permitted to continue their prior pending State proceedings to liquidate Fidelity. There are also a number of other States appearing amici curiae herein, all of which together total approximately one-half the States of the United States, which are respectfully urging this Court, through their Attorney Generals and other proper State officials, that depository statutes such as those in question in the case at bar be held valid, that the trusts thereby created be not nullified or avoided, and that in the event of insolvency the State officials with whom the deposits are made and who, by the statutes and laws of the States, are required to act in regard thereto, be permitted so to do, even though Chapter X proceedings are instituted.

Nearly every State has laws requiring deposits by foreign corporations, particularly insurance companies, wherein deposits must be made as a condition prerequisite to doing business in the State. It is not beyond the realm of possibility that in the future Congress may enact legislation extending the Bankruptcy Act to include insurance and other companies now exempt. If the decision of the District Court in the case at bar be upheld by this Court, and Blake v. McClung, supra, and the decision of the Court below overruled, it would mean that in the event of insolvency, the first District Court acquiring jurisdiction could require all deposits made in compliance with State law, by insurance and other such companies, to be turned over to a Trustee appointed by that Federal Court; it would permit the trust liens existing by virtue of the State depository laws in favor of domestic creditors and policyholders to be nullified. It could literally cause millions of people to be compelled to go to a distant and foreign Federal jurisdiction to protect their rights. It is to urge this Court to decide against any such invasion of rights of the sovereign States that many of the States have enjoined in the amici curiae brief.

That the District Court fully intends, and believes it has the power and authority, to compel a turn-over of the State deposits to the Federal Trustee, is clear from the record. These respondents are not jousting with a shadow. Even the S. E. C. brief now advocates not only taking the deposited securities from the States, but nullifying the trust liens created by the State statutes (Brief, p. 37).

The District Court entered the turn-over order of June 6, 1941 (R. 2), and strengthened it on June 10, 1941 (R. 13); although the West Virginia respondents moved for a stay in its enforcement until the legal questions were determined, this was refused. (R. 15, 19.) The turn-over orders were amended to freezing orders on August 9, 1941 (R. 108), except the turn-over against the West Virginia State Court Receivers was not amended (R. 107). The Court expressly reserved the right to extend or modify this freezing order at any time (R. 109).

During the hearing the District Court informed Assistant Attorney General W. F. Gray of Illinois, in the record, that if jurisdiction was sustained, the Federal Trustee was to have the management of the Illinois deposit, and if the company was liquidated, the Court had the right to require liquidation through its trustee (R. 958).

Lastly, at the end of its written opinion in this case (R. 202), the District Court held that the State officials and Receivers were not adverse claimants. "No plenary suit is required in dealing with them. The assertion of adverse claims, being merely assertion and no more, may be disposed of summarily, as I have done."

That meant, and means, that the District Court believes it has already decided it can take the State deposits of securities from the custodians thereof, and put them under the control of its Trustee. And that is the very thing which the respondents, together with all the States appearing amici curiae, are so strongly contending against, and so earnestly urge this Court to prohibit.

In straight bankruptcy, the State officials, as trustees or lienholders, could liquidate the deposited securities in their possession, turning over to the trustee only the balances, if any, remaining. Hence the bitter fight by petitioners to retain the proceedings in Chapter X, and the attempt to stretch its provisions to include liquidation; all for the sole purpose of taking these deposited securities from the possession of the States and their officials, and turning them over en masse to the Federal Trustee appointed under Chapter X, and nullifying or destroying the trust liens created by State statute, as the brief of the S. E. C. advocates.

We respectfully but earnestly submit that under the equity powers of the Bankruptcy Court, this Court should follow Pennsylvania v. Williams and the other similar decisions and grant the request of these States, as prayed for by the West Virginia respondents in paragraph XV of their answer filed in the District Court (R. 78), and permit the deposited securities to be retained by the State officials, and the trust liens to be left undisturbed.

D

The Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides immunity to the Sovereign States holding deposits, and to the State officials in whose custody, possession and control are the State deposits, from suit or order by the District Court to such State officials concerning such deposits, and effectively prohibits a compulsory turn-over of said deposits to the Trustee under Chapter X.

The West Virginia respondents contend the deposit in West Virginia was made with the Sovereign State of West Virginia, and that the District Court was prohibited by the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States from entering the turn-over orders of June 6th and 10th, 1941, and the "freezing" injunctive order of August 9th, 1941, against the States, or their officials; and therefore cannot take custody and possession of the deposited securities from the State officials. Since, then, the District Court is thus prohibited from exercising control over these deposited securities, and since they are substantially the only assets of the Debtor, Fidelity, it follows that reorganization of Fidelity cannot be had in Chapter X proceedings.

Following the lead of Virginia, the Mother State of West Virginia, which in 1866 enacted a requirement for a deposit to be made with the Insurance Commissioner by any foreign insurance company which came into the State to do business, such deposit to be for the benefit of the policyholders in that State, West Virginia first enacted such a law in 1867, which has been continued to the present time (Code 33-2-7).

In 1911 West Virginia first enacted legislation permitting a company, other than a life insurance company, to be licensed in West Virginia for the purpose of selling annuities. The legislation at that time required a minimum deposit with the Insurance Commissioner of $10,000.00, and an additional deposit of securities to an amount of 100% of all its liabilities "on contracts outstanding in this State * * * in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders."

In 1921 the legislation was changed to require a $100,000.00 deposit in addition to a deposit "equal to 100% of the liability on outstanding contracts." In 1929 the law was again changed so where the deposit had formerly been required to be with the Insurance Commissioner, thereafter only the additional deposit for other States was to be made with him. Thereafter, in 1930, when the Code of West Virginia was revised, this was again amended so that the statutory law of West Virginia (Code 33-9-3) reads:

> "The Insurance Commissioner shall require the applicant to deposit with the State Treasurer (in accordance with Article 5, Chapter 12 of this Code), in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders, * * * securities * * * as may be approved by such Insurance Commissioner * * * to the aggregate amount of $100,000.00, and in addition to such deposit, such * * * corporation shall maintain at all times a deposit with the State Treasurer of bonds and securities, approved by the Insurance Commissioner, to an amount equal to the total amount which such * * * corporation may be liable to pay in cash to the holders of all contracts under the terms thereof at the time of the deposit; * * *".

The provisions concerning deposits made with other States then follow. (Set out in the Statement [supra].)

For the purpose of the instant argument, we will restate the pertinent part of the above statute and put in place of the parentheses the exact words of the relevant part of Section 2 of Article 5, Chapter 12, so that the deposit law reads:

> "* * * the applicant to deposit with the State Treasurer (who shall be the custodian of all securities belonging to the State of West Virginia or by law required to be deposited with the State or held in legal custody by the State), in trust, for the benefit of its contract holders, * * *."

It is the contention of the West Virginia respondents that by this language the Legislature of West Virginia intended the deposit of securities to be made with the Sovereign State of West Virginia, and designated the Treasurer of West Virginia as the official custodian of such deposit, with the Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia having supervision and authority thereover.

This contention is substantiated by the fact that in 1941 the Legislature amended Code 12-5-2 by adding a paragraph thereto, by which the Board of Public Works of West Virginia could fix "fair and reasonable charges for the care, custody, exchange and substitution of securities deposited by insurance companies and companies issuing annuity contracts" and deposit such charge "in the State fund general revenue." Thus the State could charge the depositor of these trust funds for expenses, as would the trustee of any conventional trust charge the settler thereof, and these charges became a part of the State's general revenue.

Also, in 1939, the Legislature amended Chapter 12, Article 5, by adding a new section, number 6. (Code 12-5-6.) It provided that where an approved deposit be required by statute, it may "be deemed to include and mean notes executed * * * and made payable to the State of West Virginia, upon demand, in the event of insolvency or default by such person or corporation, for the benefit of those for whom such securities are deposited * * *" if the deposit were not being made with the Sovereign State itself, then why the legislative requirement that the notes be made payable to the State of West Virginia?

If this contention is sound, then the Eleventh Amendment is an absolute bar to any order or suit in any Court against this fund held by the Sovereign State of West Virginia, except such suits or actions as the Legislature has seen fit to authorize to be instituted for or by the State of West Virginia or its proper officials with relation to said deposit. The Constitution of West Virginia itself, Article VI, Section 35 (Appendix, Part II), prohibits the State of West Virginia being made a defendant in any court of law or equity; and the State of West Virginia has permitted no such suits or actions, except the suit of the Auditor in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County (Code 33-2-45).

The first decision directly sustaining this contention of respondents was made in Virginia shortly after the separation of West Virginia therefrom, and such a decision, while not absolutely binding authority in the State of West Virginia, is persuasive authority of the very highest kind.

In Rollo, Assignee, v. Andes Ins. Co., 23 Gratt. (Va.) 509 (1873), a deposit had been made with the State Treasurer of Virginia by a non-domestic insurance company, as required by statute. A judgment creditor from still a different State brought an attachment and garnishment suit against the State Treasurer for payment of his judgment against the insurance company, procured in that foreign jurisdiction.

In holding that such attachment would not lie against the deposited fund and the garnishment action could not be maintained against the State Treasurer, the Court said specifically:[16]

> "Something more is involved than the rights and obligations of the treasurer. It is a question that concerns the State. It is certainly not compatible with her sovereignty, and dignity to be arraigned before her own tribunals, at the suit of individuals, in any other mode than is prescribed by her statutes. Nor is it consistent with her interests, nor the proper administration of public affairs, that her officers shall be arrested in their public duties, and required to answer before the courts for funds or securities committed to their custody for a specific purpose, under authority of a public law. The treasurer of the State is one of the most important officers of the commonwealth, with grave, arduous and difficult duties to perform. It is impossible to foresee the mischiefs and embarrassments that will ensue, if, in addition to these duties, he is to be involved in the conflicts of creditors, to answer innumerable rival attachments, employ counsel, answer interrogatories, and otherwise consume time and attention which should be devoted exclusively to the public interests."

The facts in State ex rel. Stephenson v. Stephens, 136 Mo. 537, 37 S. W. 806, are nearly identical with those of the instant case. Under Missouri laws passed in 1889 (Sec. 8662) a deposit was required of a Montana "installment investment bond company," coming into the State to do business. In 1893 legislation was enacted for winding up such companies in event of failure, and for liquidation and distribution of their assets. In interpreting this latter statute after insolvency of the depository company, the Court held that the deposit had been made with the State of Missouri, even though it did not thereby become a part of the general funds of that State.

In Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 43 L. Ed. 432, this Court, in speaking of a deposit of securities by a foreign insurance company made with a State Treasurer as a condition prerequisite to doing business in the State, said:

> "* * * funds or property specifically set aside as a trust fund, and at the outset put into the custody of the State, for the exclusive benefit, or the benefit primarily, of Tennessee creditors, * * *."

In 104 A. L. R. 748, the annotator, speaking of deposits by foreign insurance companies as a condition of doing business within a State, states:

> "Most courts hold such a deposit is considered as a trust held by the State for the protection of those doing business with the corporation."

The specific contention herein raised by the West Virginia respondents that because of the Eleventh Amendment, State officials having custody of a deposit made with a State under valid State statutes have immunity from suit or order of any Court was sustained by this Court in Lankford v. Platte Iron Works Co., 235 U. S. 461, 59 L. Ed. 316, and Farish v. State Banking Board, 235 U. S. 498, 59 L. Ed. 330, which have never been overruled nor modified. In those cases there was a fund created by the statutes of Oklahoma for the purpose of repayment of deposits in insolvent Oklahoma banks, which fund was placed under the supervision of the Banking Board of Oklahoma. The Iron Works filed a bill in equity to compel payment of its certificates of deposit in an insolvent bank out of this fund for guaranty of deposits. This Court held that the property was that of the banks who contributed to the fund "and is accumulated in a fund for the security of their respective depositories," and then held:

> "The State can be said to be a necessary party in the pending case because of its interest that the fund which it has caused to be created in pursuance of its policy shall be administered by the officers it has appointed rather than by judicial tribunals."

This Court then said that since such a construction could be given, it was necessary to consider the decision of State tribunals thereon. After discussing such decisions, this Court dismissed the action on the ground that the State Banking Board was immune from suit under the Eleventh Amendment, even though the contention was made that the fund was not under the executive or legislative control of the State and could be used solely for the purpose of paying depositors of failed banks; in other words, that the fund was held in trust for private persons, and that the State had no pecuniary interest therein. This Court held that at least the fund was under the management of the State through its officers; that the Federal Court had no jurisdiction to subject the management of its fund to judicial control.

The Sovereign State of West Virginia and any other State as such can be a legal trustee and hold title to the deposited property, even though there is no remedy against the State to enforce the trust. Restatement of the Law on Trusts 264, Section 95.

> "The United States or a State has the capacity to take and hold property in trust, but in the absence of a statute otherwise providing, the trust is not enforceable against the United States or a State."

Even should it be held that the deposit was only made or required to be made with an official of the State, yet the Eleventh Amendment gives him an immunity from any order or injunction which restrains him from performing his duties, such as those required by the valid West Virginia statutes.

As stated in Ex parte Ayres, 123 U. S. 443, 31 L. Ed. 216:

> "* * * The very object and purpose of the Eleventh Amendment were to prevent the indignity of subjecting a State to the coercive process of judicial tribunals at the instance of private parties. It was thought to be neither becoming nor convenient that the several States of the Union, invested with that large residuum of sovereignty which had not been delegated to the United States, should be summoned as defendants to answer the complaints of private persons, * * * or that the course of their public policy and the administration of their public affairs should be subject to and controlled by the mandates of judicial tribunals without their consent, * * * *. In this spirit it must be held to cover, not only suits brought against a State by name, but those also against its officers, agents, and representatives, * * *."

The Eleventh Amendment will bar action against the State officer named as a defendant where he has no personal interest but is acting solely for and on behalf of the State.*

ance company which had made a deposit required by statute in California. After institution of insolvency proceedings in Texas, the Insurance Commissioner of California instituted proceedings in his State Court as provided by statute. A Federal Court proceeding was instituted, ancillary to the Texas proceedings, and therein the District Court enjoined the Insurance Commissioner of California from proceeding further in the State receivership proceedings and from interfering with the Federal Court Trustee's possession of the Debtor's deposited assets. In effect, a turn-over and injunction order, the same as in the case at bar.

That Insurance Commissioner likewise appealed from the ruling, and in reversing the decision of the District Court and holding the injunction and turn-over order invalid, the Circuit Court of Appeals held:

> "• • • This injunction prohibits the Insurance Commissioner from performing the duties imposed upon him by State statute (liquidation of insolvent companies). The order directs the Insurance Commissioner to violate his official duties under such statute by turning over to the receiver of the Federal Court a fund that was in the custody of the State through its officers for the protection of the creditors of insolvent insurance companies before this action was begun."

And the Court stated this injunction order was entered because the Insurance Commissioner was doing his duty, not because he was neglecting it.

> "The mere statement of this situation is sufficient to show the impropriety of the order of the District Court. • • • The Federal Court had no right to enjoin the further prosecution of that action."

The highest Courts of West Virginia and Virginia, have by their decided cases upheld the exclusive jurisdiction of the administrative bodies of the State and its agents and appointees, holding that the administrative bodies are such a part of the Sovereign State as to be immune from suit under the Constitution; and permitting exclusive control by those administrative agencies of matter placed by statute under their control.[11]

In Picklesimer v. Morris, 101 W. Va. 127, 132 S. E. 372, the West Virginia Commissioner of Banking had appointed a receiver for an insolvent bank, and the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia held that thereafter a West Virginia Circuit Court had no power or jurisdiction to entertain a general creditors' suit and appoint equity receivers therein for that insolvent bank.

Therefore, the West Virginia respondents respectfully submit that there is and was no jurisdiction of the District Court to entertain any proceedings, or to enter any order, or issue any injunction against the Auditor or Treasurer of the State of West Virginia (and the officials of other depository States), concerning the funds deposited with the State of West Virginia (and other depository States), in the custory of the Treasurer, and under the authority and control of the Auditor, which were deposited in compliance with valid and applicable State statutes.

Particularly must this be true since legal title to the securities which had been deposited was vested in the State authorities in the States of Alabama, Iowa, Maryland, Wisconsin and West Virginia (Code 33-9-3 and 10), either by the requirements of their depository law, or the order or decree of a State Court, prior to the institu-

THE STATE COURTS IN THE STATES IN WHICH THE DEPOSITS ARE LOCATED ARE BEST FITTED TO INTERPRET AND DECIDE THE STATE DEPOSITORY LAW UNDER WHICH THE DEPOSITS MUST BE DISTRIBUTED TO THE CONTRACT HOLDERS IN EACH SUCH STATE.

State Courts Should Interpret State Depository Statutes

As held in Guaranty Trust Co. v. Blodgett, 287 U. S. 509, 513, the existing statutes of a State when applicable must be considered by Federal Courts in the same manner as if the words of the State law had been adopted, and specifically reenacted by Act of Congress; and as held in Knights of Pythias v. Miles, 255 U. S. 559, 65 L. Ed. 785, the Supreme Court of the United States must accept the construction given to a State statute by the highest Court of the State as though it were specifically expressed in the statute. We believe it is axiomatic that in determining questions as to title of property the Federal Courts are bound to apply the laws and rules of property of the State in which the property is situate, and to decide the controversy as the State Court would, and that in the administration of the local law of a State that the Courts of the United States follow implicitly the settled decisions of the Courts of last resort of the State in question. See notes in 6 L. Ed. 290; 18 L. Ed. 350.

Glenn v. Field Packing Company, 290 U. S. 177.
Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co. v. Nelson Mfg. Co., 291 U. S. 352, at 358.
Lee v. Bickell, 292 U. S. 415, at 425, 426.

The Trustee, one of petitioners herein, in its brief filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals, stated (p. 8):

> "Since the (depository) statutes vary widely in their language, it is probable that no uniform construction can be applied to them, and that each must be construed according to its own terms."

With that we agree.

Therefore, in the case at bar, it is apparently agreed that the right of the contract holders in each State will be determined by the depository law thereof, since the Trustee in that brief also stated (p. 9):

> "Whatever effect any State statute requiring the deposit of assets therein may have upon the rights of the creditors in that State can be as well determined by the Federal Court as by the State Courts."; and the S. E. C. in its brief in the Circuit Court of Appeals stated (p. 52):

> "The rights of contract holders by State statutes will be recognized appropriately by the Federal > Courts in the proceedings. We do contend the assets should be administered in the Bankruptcy Court and the rights under the State depository statutes there determined and recognized."

Therefore, the question for determination is whether petitioners have proven that the Bankruptcy Court is more capable of interpreting and deciding the meaning of the State depository laws than the Courts of the States where legislatures enacted them, and whose contract holders' rights are affected thereby.

This Court has repeatedly stated that questions of State law are for the decision of State Courts. In Clark v. Willard, 293 U. S., at 130, it is stated in the minority opinion:

> "But this Court is neither called upon, nor can it without impropriety, discuss mere questions of state law. * * * It is not our function to suggest to State Courts how they shall interpret their own laws; theirs is the duty of deciding such matters; ours requires forbearance from tendering advice in that regard."

More recently this Court, in R. R. Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U. S. 496, at 501, 85 L. Ed. 971 (a case involving the validity of a ruling by the Commission that all persons acting as Pullman conductors must hold that rank, which ruling had been enjoined below), in remanding the case to the District Court to be retained therein pending institution of an action in State Court for determination therein of the questions of State law and policy, held:

> "But no matter how seasoned the judgment of the District Court may be, it cannot escape being a forecast rather than a determination. The last word [on interpretation of State law] belongs neither to us nor to the District Court but to the > Supreme Court of Texas. * * * Few public interests have a higher claim upon the discretion of a federal chancellor than the avoidance of needless friction with state policies, whether the policy relates to * * * the administration of a specialized scheme for liquidating embarrassed business enterprises, Pennsylvania v. Williams, 294 U. S. 176, 79 L. ed. 841, 55 S. Ct. 380, 96 A. L. R. 1166; or the final authority of a state court to interpret doubtful regulatory laws of the state, Gilchrist v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co., 279 U. S. 159, 73 L. ed. 652, * * * These cases reflect a doctrine of abstention appropriate to our federal system whereby the federal courts, 'exercising a wise discretion,' restrain their authority because of "scrupulous regard for the rightful independence of the state governments' and for the smooth working of the federal judiciary."

Those above quoted words of Justice Frankfurter were prophetic for the case at-bar. This company and Investors Syndicate were carefully supervised and controlled by the States, just as are insurance companies. The attempted intervention of the Federal Courts and the S. E. C. with the disposition of this insolvent company has created a needless friction and an unnecessary interference with State policies. The fact that these respondents are here and are joined as amici curiae by other States holding a Fidelity deposit, and by still other States with similar depository laws, but having no Fidelity deposit, in their efforts to prevent encroachment of Federal powers upon what they deem and believe to be within the province of the States and State officials and State Courts, speaks for itself as to the creation of friction and interference with State Court authority to interpret State laws. The needlessness thereof we leave for the determination of this Court.

Other decisions of this Court upon the same subject matter are:

Kline v. Burke Construction Co., 260 U. S. 226, at 235:

> "The rank and authority of the (Federal and State) courts are equal but both courts cannot possess or control the same thing at the same time, and any attempt to do so would result in unseeming conflict. The rule, therefore, that the court first acquiring jurisdiction shall proceed without interference from a court of the other jurisdiction is a rule of right and law based upon necessity. • • •"

Toucey v. New York Life Insurance Co., (Nov. 17, 1941), 10 Law Week 4025, 86 L. Ed. 107:

> "The act of 1793 expresses the desire of Congress to avoid friction between the Federal Government and the States resulting from the intrusion of Federal authority into the orderly functioning of a State's judicial process.
>
> "We must be scrupulous in our regard for the limits within which Congress has confined the authority of the courts of its own creation. Taylor v. Carroll, 20 How. 582, 597. The legislation of Congress, in organizing the judicial powers of the United States, exhibits much circumspection in avoiding occasions for placing the tribunals of the states and of the Union in any collision."

This Court unanimously followed the holding and decision of the Pullman case in the case of Chicago v. Fieldcrest Dairies, Inc., April 27, 1942, 10 Law Week 4039, 86 L. Ed. 888, and remanded the case to the District Court to be retained pending decision by the State Court in a suit to be brought therein. This decision involved an interpretation of milk ordinance of the City of Chicago and the question of its unconstitutionality and invalidity, and it was there held:

> "We are of the opinion that the procedure which we followed in the Pullman case should be followed here. Illinois has the final say as to the meaning of the ordinance in question."

It was again held that even this Court would be merely making a forecast as to what would be the ultimate decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois, and the Federal Court was being asked to decide an issue that might be displaced the next day by State adjudication, and the Court stated:

> "The delicacy in that issue and an appropriate regard 'for the rightful independence for state governments' (Beal v. Missouri Pacific R. Co., 312 U. S. 45-50) re-emphasizes that it is a wise and permissible policy for the Federal Chancellor to stay his hand in absence of an authoritative and controlling determination by the state tribunals. * * * In this case that discretion calls for a remission of the parties to the State courts which alone can give a definite answer to the major questions posed. Plainly they constitute the more appropriate forum for the trial of those issues. Considerations of delay, inconvenience and cost to the parties which have been urged upon us do not call for a different result, for we are here concerned with a much larger issue as to the appropriate relationship between Federal and State authorities functioning as a harmonious whole."

In the case at bar, we believe the words of Judge Soper, of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, in deciding the instant question below, are pertinent (R. 262):

> "Moreover, it must be borne in mind that the rights of the contract holders in the several States > must be determined in each instance by the local statutes, and that these statutes must be interpreted in accordance with the decisions of the State Courts. It is no reflection upon the Federal Court to suggest that the State Courts of the fifteen States are better qualified to construe and apply their own laws."

Petitioners contend that the District Court should interpret and decide the depository laws of each of the fifteen States and is better qualified to do so than the highest Courts of each of those States. Regardless of personal qualifications, such a decision would be, as this Court states, merely a forecast and not a finality, and could be set aside by each of those State Courts "the next day."

Necessity of an Interpretation of State Depository Statutes

While in a few States there has been a partial interpretation of the depository laws of those States, yet in a majority of the States there has not been a decision and interpretation by the Court of last resort of their depository laws, and particularly is this true of the depository laws in connection with annuity companies such as Fidelity, most of which were enacted within the last two decades. Furthermore an interpretation as to who are the specific beneficiaries of the trust created by the State deposit, and those who are to be included in the class of beneficiaries, and those who are to be excluded, has not been made in any of the State Courts; yet this will have to be decided by a legal interpretation of the depository law of each State by some competent Court.

It must be kept continually in mind that with a few exceptions, there are insufficient funds on deposit in each State to pay off in full the rightful claims of the contract holders in that State. Therefore, the question is presented as to how each State shall distribute the funds deposited therein among those entitled thereto. If one group receives more, a fortiori others will receive less. And respondents contend that the distribution and decision as to the exact beneficiaries, and the exact proportion of his claim that each contract holder as such beneficiary will receive, are purely problems for the Courts of each State; that is, an interpretation and decision as to their own depository law should be made by the Courts of the State enacting that law, as admittedly, the laws of each of the fifteen depository States are dissimilar.

In each State it will be necessary for a court to determine whether anyone who ever paid money into Fidelity on a contract will be included in the class of beneficiaries meant to be included within the terms of the depository statute; or whether those who were currently paying in on April 4, 1941 (when its accounts were frozen by Auditor Sims), are to be included, even though they had not then acquired a reserve or cash surrender value under the terms of their contract; or whether only those who by their contracts had acquired a reserve or a cash surrender value thereon shall be exclusively entitled to participation.

Again, as between those found entitled to share in the deposit of each State, the local Court must decide whether they are to share on the basis of cash surrender, or reserve value, or amount paid in, as under each basis different amounts will be allocated depending on the length of time the contract was in effect.

Also, in Illinois, Kansas, Indiana, and to a lesser degree, Ohio, deposits were made in those States in compliance with certain existing statutes, and at other times contracts were sold when no depository requirements were in effect. Surely, the question as to which of the contract holders in each of these States shall participate in the funds deposited therein is a problem solely for the Courts of each of those States to determine.

Of necessity, since there are fifteen different depository States in the case at bar, each with its own depository statute or requirement, there will have to be a decision on the State law of each of those States, expressly based upon its own laws and upon its own decided cases. And this is admitted in the S. E. C. brief, p. 45. The basis of participation in each State's deposited fund is purely a local problem of law within each State, as apparently by the deposit law of each State, except West Virginia, only domestic contract holders are entitled to share in the distribution of the deposited funds.

The peculiar provisions of the West Virginia depository statute (Code 33-9-3) are set out elsewhere herein. It is apparently provided that when "by the laws of any other State" a deposit is required equal to or greater than that required in West Virginia (100% of cash liability), then there shall be no deposit required in West Virginia for the contract holders of such a State. This apparently applies to Alabama, Delaware, Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Tennessee, Wisconsin, and probably to Illinois. In any event, the percent of deposit to the liabilities (percentage of solvency) in each of those States is such that there is every probability their contract holders will receive more from their deposited securities than will those who participate in the West Virginia deposited fund (See Appendix, Part IX). In this event, they would then apparently have no claim over against the West Virginia fund; but this is a question that can be finally settled only by the State Court in West Virginia.

It may well be contended that the West Virginia depository law (Code 33-9-3) apparently means that those above named States actually have no right ever to participate in the West Virginia deposited fund because they had a 100% deposit law of their own (Code 33-9-3), and no deposit was made in West Virginia for their contract holders; and the West Virginia statute provides they "shall not be entitled to the benefit" of the West Virginia fund "except so much of such deposit as may be made to complete the total amount required by this article where the law of any other State requires a lesser amount." By that it is not meant to say that if they are not paid in full, they are not entitled to participate in any undeposited funds in West Virginia, because they probably are. But their right to participate in the West Virginia deposited securities is surely a question that must be decided by a West Virginia State Court.

If, therefore, these 100% deposit law States will in no event participate in the deposited funds in West Virginia, then in each of the above named depository States, there must be an entirely autonomous proceeding in the Courts thereof. Only their own contract holders, as determined by their own Courts, can share in their deposited securities, and only on the basis that the local Court therein determines; and they can have no claim against the funds in West Virginia, and the contract holders in no other State have any claim against their fund, the deposit being exclusively for the benefit of domestic creditors.

The brief of the S. E. C. states, page 39, that the West Virginia deposit "is clearly intended to secure all creditors" and that West Virginia authorities contend that the West Virginia creditors have a preferential interest in their deposit. Both statements are equally inaccurate. The West Virginia respondents contend that the depository law of West Virginia needs judicial interpretation, and that only the State Courts of West Virginia can render a binding and final decision upon the questions that necessarily arise from its construction; and that West Virginia officials can be guided only by such a State Court decision, and will be bound absolutely to abide by it. The West Virginia respondents have no other contentions or intentions in this regard.

That the Courts in West Virginia will make a just decision upon these questions, and will give no undue preference to West Virginia claimants, can be readily discerned from Brunner v. York Bridge Co., 78 W. Va. 702, 90 S. E. 233.

On pages 58 and 59 of their brief, petitioners repeatedly refer to rights of "out-of-state-creditors" to participation in local deposits, other than West Virginia, and the S. E. C. brief makes similar refernces and claims for non-resident claimants (pp. 29 and 41); and particularly reference is made to such rights in States as Iowa and Wisconsin, where there is purported to be a surplus of assets. And petitioners claim that all contract holders would be compelled to go into such State Courts to present their claims to any such surpluses that may exist in any State.

But no cases are cited in support of these contentions, and the decided cases are unanimously opposed to petitioners' position.

The decided cases are unanimous in holding that after satisfaction of the claims of domestic creditors, such deposited funds are not subject to the claims of, or attachment by, foreign or "out-of-state" creditors, and any surplus or balance remaining must be returned to the West Virginia Receivers, that is the domiciliary receivers, to be a part of the general assets of the company there, but not a part of the domiciliary deposit fund. Rollo; Assignee, v. Andes Ins. Co., 23 Gratt. 509, 29 R. C. L. 108, Sec. 82; People v. Granite State Provident Ass'n, 161 N. Y. 402, 55 N. E. 1053; Lewis v. American S. & L. Ass'n., 98 Wis. 203, 73 N. W. 793; In re Stoddard (N. Y.), 144 N. E. 484.

And the domiciliary receivers may pursue and collect such surpluses by ancillary proceedings.

Therefore, the theoretical problems raised by petitioners cannot and will not arise.

We therefore submit that should the West Virginia depository statute be interpreted as above suggested, that at least nine States will have autonomous proceedings in their own State Courts; and that there cannot possibly be any necessity why any of the depository States, including those nine, should be compelled to have their own laws interpreted in a District Court in another State (West Virginia), and be made parties to, and a part of, a proceeding in which they can have no possible interest, and where the other parties thereto can have no possible interest in them; and that in any event, the problems of law arising by reason of the deposits made in each State as required by the laws and statutes thereof, should be decided only by the State Courts of each State. And no reasons have been advanced in opposition briefs for a holding to the contrary.

III

THE STATE OFFICIALS OF THE FIFTEEN DEPOSITORY STATES, ACTING UNDER THE GUIDANCE OF EACH OF THEIR RESPECTIVE STATE COURTS AND REPRESENTED BY THEIR ATTORNEY GENERALS AND OTHER PROPER ATTORNEYS, HAVE NOT BEEN SHOWN NOT TO BETTER FITTED TO LIQUIDATE AND DISTRIBUTE THE DEPOSITED SECURITIES THAN IS THE TRUSTEE.

Presuming, as we have throughout this brief, and as the S. E. C. has in its brief admitted (pp. 18 and 43), that Fidelity cannot be rehabilitated and that liquidation must ensue, there is then presented the single remaining issue, namely, Who should liquidate the securities held by the depository States, and who should distribute the proceeds thereof to the contract holders?

In this presumption we are following the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals below in no longer entertaining any idea "that illusory hopes of reorganization may be entertained" (R. 2[illegible]), and viewing the situation in the light of that which the Court below so ably stated, "We think it is our duty to review the situation realistically, and when this is done, there appears to be no reasonable hope of a reorganization of the business as a going concern, but only the immediate need of a liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of the contract holders. Obviously there will be nothing left for the stockholders" (R. 259).

The Court below, in deciding upon this particular issue (R. 262), stated:

> "It has not been and cannot be reasonably contended that the interests of the well secured creditors will be advanced by interfering with the state officials in the prompt liquidation and distribution of the securities in their hands. The liquidation in every state in which deposits were made will be subject to the supervision of established governmental departments, as well qualified for the business as the trustee in bankruptcy. There is every reason to believe that the liquidation under their supervision will proceed without needless expense in a careful and expeditious manner so as to save as much as possible for the contract holders. Certainly it would be unjust and unreasonable to delay the satisfaction of their claims in order that illusory hopes of reorganization may be entertained."

In commenting upon the same issue, under similar circumstances, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in In the Matter of Paloma Estates, Inc., 126 F. (2d) 72; certiorari denied December 8, 1942, 11 Law Week 3172, stated:

> "Though there might be a reorganization under Chap. X of the Bankruptcy Act, the value of the debtor's property is so small compared to the amount due on the first mortgage that under Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., Ltd., 308 U. S. 106; only the certificate holders represented by the appellee trustees could have any equity to be preserved. See also, Consolidated Rock Products Company v. Dubois, 312 U. S. 510. There is nothing to indicate that their interests would or could be better protected in the district court. There would be increased expense and delay without any compensating advantages. And it would be inequitable to subject the certificate holders to such expense in time and money when their security, already inadequate, is being well applied to subserve their best interests in the prior state court proceedings. See, Chapman Bros. Co. v. Security-First National Bank, 111 F. (2) 86."

Respondents contend that the State Court proceedings will not only afford a more rapid means of liquidation and distribution, but a less expensive method. That Chapter X proceedings are slow and lengthy, and are usually very expensive, is recognized not only by the Courts, but by the writers on this subject. (See brief of Attorney General of New York in the Marine Harbor case.) In New York Legislative Document No. 87, on the legislative investigation of the Prudence Bonds issue, it is stated: "In a reorganization under 77B, the proceedings were complicated and extended over a long period of time." Specific large fees paid in cases to many parties at the expense of certificate holders were cited.

Mr. Benjamin Wham, writing in 25 Virginia Law R. 389, states at 391:

> "Very likely [Chapter X] proceedings will take more time due to the increased numbers of petitioners, and it may be more expensive, and at least there will be more petitions for compensation * *. The provisions with reference to allowance of fees and costs are designed to invite active participation of the creditors and stockholders. It sounds like 'come and get it'."

Mr. James N. Rosenberg, also writing in 25 Virginia Law R. at 157-8 states:

> "The subject of expenses of administration gives food for thought * * *. The Chandler Act opens a new door. Designed to democratize the proceedings and encourage investors' participation, it permits the Court to compensate even those who submit mere suggestions or objections * * *. The flood gates are now open."

In 52 Harvard Law R. 1349 at 1350 it is stated that "the Chandler Act, subordinating the desire to minimize expense to the ideal of universal protection * * presages an increase in the costs of reorganization," and in note 8, citing the hearings before the House Committee of the Judiciary on HR-6439, 75th Congress, 1st Sess., p. 368, states that in the ordinary case it has been estimated the services of a competent disinterested trustee would cost $25,000 a year with a like sum for counsel. At p. 1353 the article states: "Care must be exercised lest the affairs of a hopelessly insolvent concern be dissipated in futile attempts at reorganization."

Liquidation Should Promptly Ensue, and in the State Court Proceedings

In Reading Hotel Corp. v. Protective Committee, 89 F. (2d) at 53, the Court held that the creditors had the right to foreclose when their lien exceeded the value of the property securing it, and there was no equity for stockholders, and held that the possibility of creating an equity for stockholders in years to come is not sufficient interest to permit them to compel the lienholders to wait.

This Court in Tennessee Publishing Co. v. American National Bank, 299 U. S. 18, 81 L. Ed. 13 held: "However honest in its efforts the debtor may be and however sincere its motives, the District Court is not bound to clog its docket with visionary or impractical schemes for resuscitation."

And Mr. Justice Douglas, speaking in 42 Yale Law J. at 592: "It seems moreover, not too extravagant to hope that bankruptcy can be viewed against the background of the condition with which it deals; that long term planning for the many separate problems can be made • • •. Such planning leads directly to a consideration of division of control and responsibility between State and nation as respects these various problems and of allocating or dividing between the two bankruptcy power as an incident of that control."

In 27 Cornell Law Q. at 373, Mr. Ganard Glenn, author of books on liquidation, states: "If a concern cannot be reorganized the older remedy of liquidation • • • remains and always will." And as Judge Jerome Frank stated at p. 349, speaking then as head of the S. E. C. and for it, "It would be amazing, therefore, if our construction were right every time."

And in First Nat. Bank v. Flershem, 299 U. S. 504, at 515, 78 L. Ed. 46, this Court in Note 7 stated, that all the cases in which it has exercised its power to aid in reorganization upon the ground of insolvency dealt with insurance or other public utilities where continued operation of the property and preservation of its unity seemed to be required in the public interest.

And in International Shoe Co. v. Pinkus, 278 U. S. 261, 73 L. Ed. 321, this Court held:

> "The general rule is that an intention wholly to exclude State action will not be implied unless when fairly interpreted an Act of Congress is plainly in conflict with State regulation in the same subject."

And in the Marine Harbor case (supra) this Court held:

> "While the pendency of prior proceedings in state or federal courts does not bar the filing of a petition under Ch. X (Sec. 256), Congress in effect directed the bankruptcy courts not to approve petitions under Ch. X in such cases unless it appeared that the interest of creditors and stockholders would not be best subserved in the prior proceedings. And it put the burden on the petitioner to make that showing."

In California Prune, etc. Co. v. Cate American Co., 60 F. 2d 789 at 790, the Court held: "The Act itself discloses it was the intent of the Legislature to provide a procedure peculiarly adapted to the State Courts of California; and in view of many of the provisions of the Act, it would be difficult if not impossible to harmonize it with federal law and procedure."

And as Mr. John Gerdes says in 18 N. Y. U. Law Q. Rev. at 313: "Paternalistic reorganization of insolvent companies by governmental agencies runs counter to fundamental and deep-seated American concepts."

On Oct. 22, 1942, Waring J. (D. C. S. C.) held in In re Unity Life Ins. Co., 11 Law Week 2361: "If the Court comes to the conclusion that there is no chance of a reorganization and that liquidation is the only expectation, the petition should be refused."

In its brief in the Marine Harbor case in which it appeared, the S. E. C. stated, p. 13: "Chapter X is designed for the permanent rehabilitation of a corporate debtor while safeguarding the interests of security holders." See also p. 27.

In Chapter X proceedings it is necessary to have fees paid the trustee, the trustee's attorney, the debtor's attorney, committees of creditors and stockholders, and their attorneys, appraisers, masters and probably a few others.

In the instant State Court proceedings there were no creditors protective, or stockholders, committees, no appraisers or masters, no debtors' attorney in most proceedings, and salaried State officials instituted the majority of the proceedings, by their salaried Attorney Generals.

Therefore, liquidation and distribution can better be had in the State Court proceedings, under the guidance of the State officials.

The Salutary Safeguards of Chapter X

We have earlier herein set forth the reason for our belief that under the ruling in the Marine Harbor Properties case it is unnecessary to determine whether the salutary safeguards of Chapter X exist in the prior pending State Court proceedings; that which is hereinafter stated is in answer to the brief of petitioners and upon the presumption that this Court may hold that it is necessary to investigate these safeguards.

Under the decision of this Court in Securities and Exchange Commission v. United States Realty Co., 310 U.

S. 434, 84 L. Ed. 1293, and the dissenting opinion of Judge Frank in the Marine Harbor case, 125 F. 2d 296, there are apparently three main safeguards contained in Chapter X, namely, that the S. E. C. be permitted a supervisory power in the proceedings; that a fair and equitable, and at the same time feasible, plan be presented; and that the creditors be given full information before they are required to act with reference to the reorganization.

However, petitioners have suggested a number of other and further reasons why Chapter X proceedings are superior to those in State Courts, which are: (1) the proceedings in the State Courts are not under any reorganization statutes; (2) the creditors should be protected from the old management group; (3) the need of advisory reports on the feasibility of a plan, and whether it is fair and equitable; (4) a report to the creditors under Section 175 giving the creditors information as to their interests; (5) an independent study by the S. E. C. to exclude collusive programs; (6) a requirement that the plan be approved by the Court prior to submission to the creditors; (7) an independent appraisal of the assets of the Debtor by the S. E. C.; (8) the retaining of jurisdiction by the reorganization Court; (9) the lack of jurisdiction in any State Court to review all of the liabilities of Fidelity or appraise all its assets; (10) Fidelity's business can only be administered in the Bankruptcy Court because it has national jurisdiction; (11) the creditors in State Court will be at the mercy of those having charge of the several State proceedings; (12) several State Courts threatened distribution without a judicial determination of the rights and interests of out of State creditors to participate in the local deposited assets; (13) the rights of participation among and between the contract holders must be judicially determined; (14) there will be balances remaining in several States after their local contract holders are paid from their deposited funds, and all of the contract holders will have to file a claim against these remaining balances.

Discussing these problems in the above order, with reference to the three main safeguards, Congress enacted Section 25 of the Investment Company Act of 1940 and Section 29 of that Act, dealing with reorganization and bankruptcy of face-amount certificate companies, after enacting Chapter X. As above discussed, the S. E. C. may participate in these proceedings, may render advisory reports therein, and has such supervisory control as the Congress believed and determined it was necessary that it should have over such companies.

The terms "fair" and "equitable" and "feasible" are words of art, which mean that any plan adopted must comply with the full priorities rule of the Boyd case. Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., 308 U. S. at 115. It is agreed by petitioners (Brief p. 40), as well as respondents, that the stockholders have no further interest in the proceedings, even though this present controversy is and has been carried on and this present hearing had by virtue of the activities of the stockholders alone. In no State Court proceeding will the stockholders be given any more rights than they would have in the federal proceedings, and their activities in fighting the State Court proceedings indicate their knowledge of this. The deposited funds will be distributed to the contract holders rightfully entitled thereto, under the State laws as interpreted by the State Courts. Since the only plan is liquidation and distribution, there is apparently no need for any further determination of its fairness and feasibility.

The State Court Receivers and the authorities in the various States were in communication with the contract holders until that was further prohibited by injunction by the District Court. The thousands of letters written by contract holders to the State Court Receivers (R. 320), the mass meeting of the contract holders at Wheeling (R. 398-403), and the fact that one receivership suit was brought as early as 1938, together with the fact that contract holders are and have been represented by committees in the instant proceedings, all indicates contract holders are alert, and have been receiving information concerning the affairs of the company.

Of course, Section 167(5) of Chapter X provides that the Trustee "shall, at earliest date possible, prepare and submit a brief statement of his investigation of the property, liabilities, and financial condition of the debtor, the operation of its business and the desirability of the continuance thereof, in such form and manner as the judge may direct, to the creditors," etc.

On October 10, 1941, the Trustee prepared and submitted to the Court a partial report under this section, and on April 13, 1942, a further partial report. To date, these reports have not been submitted in any form to the contract holders.

No criticism is meant or implied in the Trustee's action in this regard. The reports are extremely voluminous, contain many charts, and detailed financial statements. They undoubtedly took much time to prepare, even though the Trustee had available the data prepared by the State Court Receivers.

And it would appear, since the Trustee has not done so, that it was impossible to boil this material down into a reasonably sized statement for the contract holders. Also, the expense of printing and mailing such a statement to over 80,000 persons is for practical purposes, prohibitive, and we believe the Trustee's judgment in not doing it was sound.

But, this very section, 167(5), is supposed to be one of the main safeguards found in Chapter X which will not be present in any State Court proceeding, and therefore a substantial reason for preferring Chapter X proceedings, that is, that the creditors may act only upon an informed knowledge.

This safeguard, therefore, is not one to be considered by this Court, because since the Trustee has not given this information to the contract holders in the year and a half it has held office, presumably, for the sound reasons above stated, it will not do so in the future.

Therefore, the contract holders will have at least as informed an opinion in State Court proceedings as they would under Chapter X proceedings.

With reference to the points raised by petitioners:

(1) It is true that State proceedings are not under reorganization statutes, but any necessary reorganization could have been performed in the proceedings instituted in State Courts, either by virtue of the statute under which they were brought, or by virtue of the general equity powers of the Courts. Let it be remembered that with few exceptions every insolvent insurance corporation in the United States has been reorganized through these same statutory and general equity proceedings in the State Courts by State officials.

However, each of the State statutes or their general laws do have a provision for liquidation of the State deposits. The respondents here believe the question of reorganization statutes is beside the point, and since they have adequate legal machinery for liquidation and distribution, that is all that is necessary in this case.

(2) It seems anomolous that the petitioners who here represent the old management group of the company would, on page 52 of their brief state: "Chapter X was designed to provide safeguards for the creditors and stockholders against the superior knowledge and advantageous position of the management." The State officials are and were doing that very thing, the West Virginia Receivers having discharged the management group immediately after taking charge of the company under their appointment, and it is that management group so discharged which instituted the Chapter X proceedings. It is now argued that the proceedings are needed to protect the contract holders from that management group who raise that question.

(3) The management group of the company represented by petitioners can, under Section 25(b) of the Investment Company Act, request an advisory report of the S. E. C. in State Court proceedings, which they claim is needed.

(4) We will later discuss the report to creditors showing their interest, but it can be here stated that that has been done already in West Virginia and some of the other State Court proceedings, and to date has not been attempted in the Federal proceedings.

(5) The S. E. C. not only has made a study for several years of this particular company, but has submitted a printed book to Congress (Ex. 6) containing the results of that investigation, and has submitted other reports to Congress containing information upon investment companies, including face-amount certificate companies generally. Any collusive or fraudulent program in State Court proceedings can be enjoined by the S. E. C. under Section 25(c) of the Investment Company Act.

(6) It is again anomolous for the Debtor to raise, on page 53 and on page 57, the question that there is no statute which requires the plan to be submitted to the creditors only after it has been approved in State Courts. A petition was filed in the West Virginia State Court praying that no plan of reorganization be submitted to the contract holders without notice and right to be heard by that petitioner and her counsel. (Ex. 70-b of the case at bar, not printed).

The Circuit Court of Kanawha County, on May 26, 1941, after a hearing on that petition, in section 2 of that order (Ex. 70-c, not printed), ordered:

> "The form and manner of submission by such Receivers to contract holders of any plan of reorganization and rehabilitation of defendant, or any information concerning same, shall be submitted to this Court for approval before such submission, after notice thereof to petitioner and other contract holders who may at the time be parties to this suit, and after hearing upon such notice."*

Therefore, the question raised in this record by petitioners was fully answered for them in the State Court proceedings.

(7) Debtor's assets have been appraised by innumerable auditors and accountants prior to the institution of these proceedings by the Debtor, and at the request of the S. E. C., and have been and are before this Court in a number of financial statements.

(8) Petitioners contend on page 54 of their brief that Chapter X is superior to the prior State proceedings because "the reorganization court has jurisdiction to retain supervision for the purpose of seeing that the plan is fully and fairly carried out."

However, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in In re Flatbush Avenue-Nevins Street Corporation, decided January 8, 1943, 11 L. W. 2544, opinion by Judge Jerome

*See also letter of Circuit Court Judge, Appendix Part VI.

Frank, holds that after the plan has been approved by the reorganization court it has no further jurisdiction in the matter, and that Congress did not intend the bankruptcy court, after approval of a plan under Chapter X, should "have power to remain a wet nurse to the reorganized company. A bankruptcy court cannot obtain that power merely by inserting a provision reserving jurisdiction."

The State Courts can retain jurisdiction of the proceedings before them as long as there is any necessity so to do, and the State authorities are required by their own laws to maintain supervision over these companies until the proceedings are finally ended by complete distribution.

(9) It is not true that no single State Court has jurisdiction of Fidelity to review all of its liabilities and appraise its assets. This is a part of the function of the Auditor of West Virginia, and he has done that, and the State Court Receivers prepared complete lists of the assets and liabilities and filed them in the West Virginia State Court proceedings, which were in turn filed by the Federal Trustee herein as part of its required reports.

(10) Petitioners' contention that Fidelity's business can only be administered in the Bankruptcy Court under Chapter X, is wholly without merit. Congress, in enacting Sec. 25 of the Investment Company Act specifically provided legislation for reorganization proceedings in Courts other than the Bankruptcy Court.

Also, the Securities Exchange Commission, in its report to Congress on the Study and Investigation of the Work, etc., of Protective and Reorganization Committees, Part VIII, at p. 309, states: "Large numbers of reorganizations do not come within the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Some take place in state courts or under supervision of state agencies. * * * We do not believe it feasible to attempt to bring such reorganization completely under either judicial or administrative supervision by the federal government."

(11) While it may be true that in the State Court proceedings contract holders will be at the mercy of those in charge thereof, nevertheless those in charge are the State's officials, acting in their official capacity, and who were elected to their offices by those contract holders in their own States. We submit that those persons will be as careful of the rights of the contract holders in their States as would be a Federal corporate trustee, not selected by the creditors, but appointed by the District Court in a district many hundreds of miles from the location of the contract holders.

(12) It is true that the several States not only threaten but intend to distribute the assets held in those States, but it is not true that this is to be done wihout judicial proceedings. On the contrary, liquidation and distribution by the States will be made only in the State Courts thereof. Petitioners, as stated hereinbefore, failed to cite any authority whereby out of state creditors had any rights at all in the funds deposited in trust in a State for the benefit of the contract holders of that State alone, and therefore, there is no question which can arise under any decided authority concerning the rights of such out of State persons.

(13) As hereinbefore stated, it will be necessary for the Courts of each State to determine among the contract holders of their own State who, under the depository laws of that State, are entitled to participate in the deposited assets, and naturally this question will have to be decided before a distribution is made. The petitioners and the S. E. C. advance no reasons against the argument hereinbefore made that the determination of such questions of State law should only be made by the State Courts in the State which enacted those laws.

(14) We have hereinbefore set forth the cases which hold that balances or surpluses remaining after distribution in any State must be returned to the West Virginia Receivers, who are the domiciliary Receivers, and that no out of State contract holder has any right to go into the Courts of the State having such surplus or balance and make any claim thereto. See also 29 R. C. L. 108 s. 82. The petitioners cite no authority to substantiate their position.

Proceedings Subsequent to Circuit Court of Appeals Decision.

As shown by the record, shortly after the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals (R. 276, 282) the State officials, their Attorney Generals, State Court Receivers, and their attorneys, for each of the fifteen depository States, met in Charleston, West Virginia, for the purpose of exchanging information and to work out cooperatively their mutual problems, particularly the problems of liquidation and distribution.

Counsel for most of the parties herein, except the S. E. C., had a conference before Judge John J. Parker, of the Court below, prepared and had entered by the Court, on July 22, 1942. (R. 268), an agreed order permitting the servicing of the deposited funds by the State officials, permitting the necessary liquidation of securities and providing for the sending out and receiving of proofs of claims by the State authorities, and other administrative work looking to the future distribution of the assets.

Wisconsin, prior to the institution of the Chapter X proceedings, had sent out its proofs of claim and had received and filed them. In the Tennessee proceedings, a report on claims has been filed with the Court.

Under the order of July 22, the State authorities worked out a uniform proof of claim to be sent the contract holders and have laid tentative plans for liquidation of the deposited securities, under the advice of State officials, so that there will not be competition between the States in the liquidation, and in order to obtain the highest price possible for the deposited assets. At the conference in Charleston, Auditor Sims of West Virginia was chosen as head of an advisory committee for the liquidation of securities, and has requested the heads of the Insurance Departments of eleven other States to act with him on that advisory committee, and has received replies from each of them that they will act in such capacity. Those persons are the Security Commissioners or heads of the Departments of Insurance of the States of Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Virginia, Minnesota, Missouri, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Certainly this advisory group, acting together with those State officials who are directly in charge of the securities departments and who have direct supervision over the liquidation of Fidelity, and acting under the judicial guidance of the respective State Courts in fifteen States, are equally as capable as is the Federal Trustee of liquidating the deposited securities.

The uniform proof of claim tentatively agreed upon for use in this case has been used by West Virginia and Missouri, and is in the process of being used in Ohio, Delaware, Tennessee and Indiana, and other States have only refrained from continuation of their administrative procedure in this respect pending the final determination of this case by this Court. Copies of these uniform proofs of claims are contained in the Appendix, Part VIII. They answer many of the questions which petitioners have raised and, together with the letter of transmittal to the contract holders, were worked out with the cooperation and aid of the attorneys for the Federal Trustee.

They give to the contract holders all of the information concerning his claim which the company has in its books and records. The West Virginia Receivers, acting under the Auditor of West Virginia, as well as in their own capacity, have sent out proofs of claim, over sixteen thousand in number, to all of the West Virginia contract holders and to all of the contract holders in those States which have no deposit and which will look primarily to the West Virginia fund for payment. The work of receiving the returns and filing them has been practically completed at this time.

As will be noted, the form is very simple, and mechanically arranged so that one typing fills in the blank spaces on both the letter of transmittal and the proofs of claim.

All information as to the claim is filled in by the official sending out the claims, including the amounts paid in by the contract holder, the cash surrender value, loan amount (if any), and net cash surrender value; the contract owner need only fill in his residence at the time of the purchase, and his residence on April 11, 1941, the date of receivership, verify the correctness of the claim, swear to it, and return it. Missouri has sent out and received its proofs of claim on these forms, and has used the tentatively agreed upon form for proof of claim over against West Virginia.

Each of the depository States is expected to do as has Missouri,—send out two proofs of claim forms, filled in with the information from the company's books as to the respective claim of that contract holder, both of which claims will be returned to the officials of the State sending them out. One form will be a proof of claim against the deposited fund in that State; the other will constitute a claim over against the West Virginia fund in the event the contract holder does not receive full payment in his own State and has a claim against the assets in West Virginia. These will later be sent en masse by the State officials in the various States, together with the amount and percent of total claim each contract holder receives from his domestic deposit, to the Receivers in West Virginia, who will accept them as proper proofs of claim, subject, of course, to a decision as to their rights against the assets in West Virginia, which must be determined by the West Virginia State Court. Surpluses, if any exist in any State, will be sent to the West Virginia Receivers.

No objection to this procedure has been made by any contract holder, and it apparently resolves all of the questions which petitioners and the S. E. C. attorneys have raised as to the necessity of filing many proofs of claim.

Therefore, the remaining matters to be performed in the State proceedings are extremely limited. Those States which have not completed sending out and receiving proofs of claim will proceed to do so. The various State officials and Receivers acting cooperatively together, but under the jurisdiction of their own State Courts, and with the advice and help of the insurance Commissioners of many States, will liquidate the deposited securities. After the necessary legal determination as to amount each contract holder shall receive is had in each of the State Courts, a distribution of the proceeds will be made to those properly entitled thereto. West Virginia will be in charge of all contract holders in that State, and in all States having no deposit; all contract holders not receiving the full amount of their claim from their respective State deposits will settle all of their problems in this regard in the West Virginia State Court by claims over against the West Virginia assets.

It is, therefore, respectfully submitted that the officials of the fifteen States acting under their State laws and under the guidance of their Courts are capable of performing these acts, as shown by their actions in the past; that they are capable of working cooperatively together in the future for the best interests of the contract holders, and will do so, and should be permitted so to do.

IV

REPLY BY THE ACTING ATTORNEY GENERAL OF WEST VIRGINIA TO THE S. E. C. BRIEF

While all other parts of this brief have been written jointly on behalf of the West Virginia respondents, this particular reply (Part IV of this brief) is submitted solely by the Acting Attorney General of West Virginia.

The S. E. C. brief, page 30, states that the Circuit Court of Appeals below, in reaching its conclusion that the State proceedings better subserve the interests of Fidelity's contract holders, failed to give due weight to a number of factors which establish the superiority of Chapter X proceedings.

The first of those factors is that it is peculiarly salutary to utilize the provisions of Chapter X to investigate and prosecute possible causes of action for the benefit of the Debtor's estate (p. 31), and that problems of venue and jurisdiction are major obstacles to civil suits at the instance of all State officials but those in West Virginia, and these latter are unsuited to the purpose.

This question of suitability of the West Virginia respondents will be discussed first.

Certain statements are made on page 33 of the S. E. C. brief that counsel for the West Virginia Receivers were Fidelity's regular counsel and one of them was under indictment. The Solicitor General's office has advised that these statements were inadvertently placed in the brief, are not supported by the record, and it is the desire of that office that the statements be disregarded and not considered by this Court.

The correct fact is that counsel for the West Virginia Receivers had been local (R. 1184) and special (R. 1167) counsel for Fidelity in recent years. The Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, by proper order entered on April 11, 1941, authorized and approved employment of the counsel for the West Virginia Receivers, after a petition therefor had been presented by the Receivers (R. 574). That employment had the full consent and approval of the Auditor of West Virginia, and was undertaken at the request of, and with the express consent, recommendation and approval of, the then Attorney General of West Virginia.

The S. E. C. brief states that the position of the West Virginia respondents does not give promise of as adequate a prosecution of possible causes of action, against Fidelity's management (Brief, p. 33) for the benefit of the contract holders, as would be made by the Trustee, because one Receiver is a law associate of, a former Fidelity director, Mr. Arthur B. Koontz.

In fairness to Mr. Koontz and that Receiver, this separate answer is made. Mr. Koontz was a director, with one qualifying share of stock placed in his name (R. 1166), who lived and practiced law in Charleston, West Virginia (R. 1134), two hundred miles from Wheeling, where the home office of Fidelity was located. Mr. Koontz is a respected member of the bar in West Virginia.

In answer to a question as to whether he would feel free and unhampered in any attempt that might be made to recover funds due Fidelity from any party whom it was deemed advisable to proceed against (R. 1195), Mr.

Koontz stated that if his firm could not go ahead and prosecute the suit fully, they would step aside and the Attorney General would appoint somebody to go ahead and prosecute the suit, but that he, Mr. Koontz, could think of no personal or business association "that would retard any affirmative action on our part." (R. 1198.)

The propriety of the appointment of that same West Virginia Receiver was raised in the District Court, and because thereof, the Judge of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, who made that appointment, wrote a letter to the District Judge, giving his reasons therefor, and explaining the entire situation. This letter is in evidence, and is set out in the Appendix Part VI.

The same issue was raised in the Circuit Court of Appeals below, which considered the matter, and stated in its opinion (R. 262):

> "• • • and the suggestion is made that the state court receivers would not be likely to proceed diligently against the directors if an investigation should disclose the existence of some liability on their part to the corporation's creditors. No specific facts are set out in this respect, but if such facts exist and the necessity for a proceeding against the directors should arise, we have no reason to suppose that the state court will not do its full duty in the premises."

Not only does the evidence fail to disclose any such probable causes of action, but the Trustee, although it has held office for one and two-thirds years, has yet to make any report of any purported liability or cause of action against any officer or director; nor has the S. E. C. produced any such evidence in this case, although it investigated the affairs of the company for over four years; and no contract holder has made any such claim or instituted any action thereon.

The statements in the S. E. C. brief overlook the fact that the S. E. C. and the Trustee are supporting in this Court the position and contentions of the Debtor, and that it is the officials who comprised Fidelity's former management, who were instrumental in instituting the Chapter X proceedings, who testified in the District Court in Debtor's behalf, who have opposed Auditor Sims and the West Virginia State Court proceedings, and who are carrying on this present controversy against the respondents. There are no reasons given why the West Virginia respondents would not properly perform their required duties in the premises equally as well as the Trustee and the S. E. C., if there were proper need to act against those persons.

Also, Mr. H. Isaiah Smith, one of the two West Virginia State Court Receivers, and a respondent herein, has been employed by the Trustee ever since its appointment, as the active executive head and agent of the Trustee in charge of Fidelity's affairs at its home office in Wheeling.

The testimony of Auditor Sims indicates the fearless and impersonal manner in which he has heretofore discharged his duties concerning Fidelity; the Attorney General of West Virginia is counsel for the Auditor, the plaintiff in the West Virginia State Court proceedings, and the writer feels it will be presumed that whoever that Attorney General may be at the time action is needed will fully perform his duties in the premises.

Disregarding the question of suitability, there are several reasons why the contentions of the S. E. C. are without merit.

The alleged causes of action are those by contract holders against the former management or directors, and there is no claim alleged to exist against such persons on account of the Debtor or its estate alone. For this reason, neither the Receivers nor the Trustee would have any right to represent contract holders in any such suits, but if such rights of action existed, they would be solely the property of the individual contract holders.

Next, the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, on October 14, 1941, decided, in the case of Inter-Ocean Casualty Co. v. Leccony Smokeless Fuel Co. et al., 17 S. E. (2d) 51, at 53-4:

> "* * * In this state it is well settled that the creditor of a monied corporation cannot maintain an action at law against the directors thereof for simply nonfeasance of duty to the corporation or fraud in its management or mismanagement in the disposition of the money or property of the corporation in the absence of an active intent to deceive or defraud the plaintiff. Zinn v. Mendel, 9 W. Va. 580."

And there is no evidence in this case of any "active intent to deceive or defraud" the contract holders by any director or officer of Fidelity.

Apparently it is the S. E. C. contention that such rights of action could be brought in the reorganization proceedings, particularly if the causes of action inured to the benefit of the Debtor. There is no citation of authority in support of this position. However, in the Circuit Courts of Appeals of the 3rd, 5th, 7th, 8th and 9th Circuits, actions such as those contemplated were instituted against directors on behalf of the debtor in 77-B proceedings, and in every circuit it was held that such causes of action were not a proper part of reorganization proceedings, and for jurisdictional reasons could not be instituted in the Federal Court. Those cases are:

Bovay v. Byllesby & Co., 88 F. (2d) 990 (5th C. C. A.).

In re Standard Gas & Electric Co., 119 F. (2d) 658 (3rd C. C. A.).

Brockett v. Winkle Terra Cotta Co., 81 F. (2d) 949 (8th C. C. A.).

Thompson v. Terminal Shares, Inc., 104 F. (2d) 652 (8th C. C. A.).

U. S. v. Tacoma Oriental S. S. Co., 86 F. (2d) 363 (9th C. C. A.).

In re Prima Co., 98 F. (2d) 952 (7th C. C. A.); Certiorari denied 305 U. S. 658.

The theory upon which these cases were brought was that the right of action against the directors or former management was an asset of the debtor over which the Court had jurisdiction, and that it was in reality an in rem proceeding.

The Bovay case was one wherein it was claimed the directors falsely obtained money from the debtor. The Court held it was an action in personam and process served outside the territorial limits of the District Court was ineffective to acquire jurisdiction, as the claim was not in rem.

In the Standard Gas case, of the same nature, the same ruling was made, and also that a suit against a resident director would not lie, as there was no diversity of citizenship; that the Court's jurisdiction outside its own territory was only in rem, and therefore no valid service could be had on non-resident directors.

In the Brockett case it was held that charges of misconduct against officers and directors can not properly be determined in a reorganization proceeding.

There is only one director within the territorial jurisdiction of the District Court in this case, only a few in West Virginia, and the rest live elsewhere. Such a suit, even if there were grounds, would fail in the Chapter X proceedings.

Again disregarding the question of suitability, if the causes of action belonged to the Debtor and it was necessary to institute suit thereon outside of the Chapter X proceedings, either within or without the State of West Virginia, then the State Court Receivers, themselves or through ancillary receivers, would legally be as capable of prosecuting these causes of action as would the Trustee, for in either event the Trustee or Receivers would have to proceed in the proper State or Federal Court wherein the particular defendant lived in order to obtain proper service upon that defendant for an in personam action.

Therefore, no substantial reasons, grounds, or decided cases have been advanced in the S. E. C. brief that would sustain petitioners' burden of proving the superiority of Chapter X proceedings over those already pending in the State Courts.

V

THE JURISDICTION OF THIS COURT HAS BEEN IMPROPERLY INVOKED

The petitioners herein were without valid right or authority to file Debtor's petition for writ of certiorari.

It is submitted that the Trustee is not and should not be concerned with the merits of a petition filed under Chapter

X of the Bankruptcy Act, or with its dismissal, and has no right to partake in the controversies thereon.

Loomis v. Gila County, 103 F. (2d) 312, Certiorari denied, 307 U. S. 643.

The S. E. C., who is named a respondent herein, but who is in substance a petitioner, "may not appeal or file any petition for appeal in any such proceeding." Sec. 208, Ch. X.

It is further submitted that since the District Court held invalid the original corporate meeting of June 3, 1941, purporting to authorize the filing of the Debtor's petition on June 6, 1941, that thereafter there was no valid or lawful corporate meeting validly ratifying the filing of the petition, nor could there have been such lawful and valid ratification, since the directors were forbidden to serve by Section 9(a) of the Investment Company Act, they having been enjoined in the Detroit suit in 1938 (Ex. 6, p. 257), and no exemption having been granted them upon their application to the S. E. C. therefor (Ex. 88, R. 766-67).

Also, it is submitted that since there was no corporate meeting authorizing the filing of the petition for writ of certiorari in the case at bar, the purported authorization acted upon was invalid and improper. Further, the actions of those officers and directors, who purported to act in Debtor's behalf throughout these proceedings, were such that the Debtor's petition was not filed in good faith within the generality of the meaning of that term. Sec. 146, Chap. X.

Lastly, since the only assets within the territorial jurisdiction of the District Court were those deposited with the State of West Virginia, and since under the Eleventh Amendment the Court has no control or jurisdiction over those funds, and since the principal place of business of Fidelity was in Wheeling, in the Northern Federal District of West Virginia, these proceedings in the Southern District of West Virginia must fail for lack of proper venue under Sec. 128 of Ch. X.

The facts upon which the above contentions are based, and the citations of law and authorities which sustain these assertions, and the arguments thereon, are fully set forth in the West Virginia Respondents' Brief In Opposition To The Petition For Writ of Certiorari:

Realizing that the broad aspects of Section 146, particularly Sections 146(3) and (4), are now before this Court, and that the decision herein in all probability will not be based upon the more narrow issues under this jurisdictional heading, we, therefore, do not herein repeat those facts, citations of law and argument thereon, but refer the Court, if it deems the matter of importance, to our brief in opposition to certiorari, pages 5 to 10, 11 to 13, 17 to 26, 41 to 52, and 55-56 inclusive.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, your respondents, the Auditor and ex officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia, and the West Virginia Receivers, hereby respectfully submit that the decision, holding and judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

IRA J. PARTLOW,
Acting Attorney General of West Virginia,

KOONTZ & KOONTZ,
Attorneys for West Virginia State Court Receivers,

Eleventh Amendment.—The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

PART II

STATUTES DISCUSSED

United States Statutes

The following chapters and section of the Bankruptcy Act:

Chapter II.—The Bankruptcy Court shall have the power to:

Sec. 2a(5). Authorize the business of bankrupts to be conducted for limited periods by receivers, the marshals, or trustees, if necessary in the best interests of the estates, and allow such officers additional compensation for such services, as provided in section 48 of this Act.

Sec. 2a(7). Cause the estates of bankrupts to be collected, reduced to money and distributed, and determine controversies in relation thereto, except as herein otherwise provided, and determine and liquidate all inchoate or vested interests of the bankrupt's spouse in the property of any estate, whenever under the applicable laws of the State, creditors are empowered to compel such spouse to accept a money satisfaction for such interest.

Chapter X—

Sec. 236. If no plan is proposed within the time fixed or extended by the judge, or if no plan proposed is approved by the judge and no further time is granted for the proposal of a plan, or if no plan approved by the judge is accepted within the time fixed or extended by the judge, or if confirmation of the plan is refused, or if a confirmed plan is not consummated, the judge shall—

Sec. 236(1). Where the petition was filed under section 127 of this Act, enter an order dismissing the proceeding under this chapter and directing that the bankruptcy be proceeded with pursuant to the provisions of this Act; or

Sec. 236(2). Where the petition was filed under section 128 of this Act, after hearing upon notice to the debtor, stockholders, creditors, indenture trustees, and such other persons as the judge may designate, enter an order either adjudging the debtor a bankrupt and directing that bankruptcy be proceeded with pursuant to the provisions of this Act, or dismissing the proceeding under this chapter, as in the opinion of the judge may be in the interests of the creditors and stockholders.

Former Section 77-B—

(c) Upon approving the petition or answer or at any time thereafter, the judge, in addition to the jurisdiction and powers elsewhere in this section conferred upon him, * * * (8) if a plan of reorganization is not proposed or accepted within such reasonable period as the judge may fix, or, if proposed and accepted, is not confirmed, may, after hearing, whether the proceeding be voluntary or involuntary, either extend such period or dismiss the proceeding under this section or, except in the case of a railroad or other public utility or of a debtor which has not been found by the judge to be insolvent, direct the estate to be liquidated, or direct the trustee or trustees to liquidate the estate, appointing a trustee or trustees if none shall previously have been appointed, as the interests of the creditors and stockholders may equitably require; * * *"

11 U. S. C. A. 203(i) (1)—

The court shall confirm the proposal if satisfied that (1) it included an equitable and feasible method of liquidation for secured creditors and of financial rehabilitation for the farmer; * * *

The following sections of the Investment Company Act of 1940:

Sec. 3 (a) (2)—

When used in this title, "investment company" means any issuer which—

* * *

(2) is engaged or proposes to engage in the business of issuing face-amount certificates of the installment type, or has been engaged in such business and has any such certificate outstanding; * * *.

Sec. 9 (a) (2)—

It shall be unlawful for any of the following persons to serve or act in the capacity of officer, director, member of an advisory board, investment adviser, or depositor of any registered investment company, or principal underwriter for any registered open-end company, registered unit investment trust, or registered face-amount certificate company:

* * *

(2) any person who, by reason of any misconduct, is permanently or temporarily enjoined by order, judgment, or decree of any court of competent jurisdiction from acting as an underwriter, broker, dealer, or investment adviser, or as an affiliated person, salesman, or employee of any investment company, bank, or insurance company, or from engaging in or continuing any conduct or practice in connection with any such activity or in connection with the purchase or sale of any security; * * *

Sec. 25 (b)—

The Commission is authorized, if so requested, prior to any solicitation of security holders with respect to any plan of reorganization, by any registered investment company which is, or any of the securities of which are, the subject of or is a participant in any such plan or if so requested by the holders of 25 per centum of any class of its outstanding securities, to render an advisory report in respect of the fairness of any such plan and its effect upon any class or classes of security holders. In such event any registered investment company, in respect of which the Commission shall have rendered any such advisory report, shall mail promptly a copy of such advisory report to all its security holders affected by any such plan: Provided, That such advisory report shall have been received by it at least forty-eight hours (not including Sundays and holidays) before final action is taken in relation to such plan at any meeting of security holders called to act in relation thereto, or any adjournment of any such meeting, or if no meeting be called, then prior to the final date of acceptance of such plan by security holders. In respect of securities not registered as to ownership, in lieu of mailing a copy of such advisory report, such registered company shall publish promptly a statement of the existence of such advisory report in a newspaper of general circulation in its principal place of business and shall make available copies of such advisory report upon request. Notwithstanding the provision of this section the Commission shall not render such advisory report although so requested by any such investment company or such security holders if the fairness or feasibility of said plan is in issue in any proceeding pending in any court of competent jurisdiction unless such plan is submitted to the Commission for that purpose by such court.

Sec. 25 (c)—

Any district court of the United States in the State of incorporation of a registered investment company or any such court for the district in which such company maintains its principal place of business is authorized to enjoin the consummation of any plan of reorganization of such registered investment company upon proceedings instituted by the Commission (which is authorized so to proceed upon behalf of security holders of such registered company, or any class thereof); if such court shall determine any such plan to be grossly unfair or to constitute gross misconduct or gross abuse of trust on the part of the officers, directors, or investment advisors of such registered company or other sponsors of such plan.

Sec. 25 (d)—(Printed page 68 Petitioners' Brief).

Sec. 29 (a) and (2), (3)—(Printed page 66 Petitioners' Brief).

Sec. 29 (b)—

Section 44 of said Act of July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended by adding at the end of subdivision (a) thereof the following sentence:

"If the bankrupt is a face-amount certificate company, as defined in section 4 of the Investment Company Act of 1940, the Court alone shall make the appointment; but the court shall not make such appointment without first notifying the Securities and Exchange Commission and giving it an opportunity to be heard."

Constitutional Provisions Discussed

Constitution of West Virginia:

Article VI, Section 35.—The State of West Virginia shall never be made defendant in any court of law or equity, except the State of West Virginia including any subdivision thereof, or any municipality therein, or any officer, agent, or employee thereof, may be made defendant in any garnishment or attachment proceeding, as garnishee or suggestee.

PART III

DIGEST OF DEPOSITORY LAWS AND TRUST INDENTURES OF THE FIFTEEN STATES WHERE FIDELITY MADE A DEPOSIT AND STATUS OF STATE COURT PROCEEDINGS PENDING THEREIN

Alabama

By order of State Securities Commission, on July 9, 1938, Fidelity securities were admitted to record in the Registry of Qualified Securities, upon compliance with the following terms: To enter into a bond in the amount of $5,000.00 and a trust indenture. The trust indenture was entered into with the First National Bank of Montgomery, Alabama, for a two year period from March 23, 1939, and provided for a deposit and assignment of securities acceptable to the Securities Commission, "to be equal at all times to $110.00 for every $100.00 of liability under its certificates;" and further provided a method for valuing the deposited securities, provided that the deposit should be "in trust for the holders of all contracts issued and to be issued to residents of Alabama, and shall constitute a separate and exclusive trust fund," and shall not be available to general creditors of the investment company; that a full and complete assignment of all right, title and interest in the deposited securities should be made to the depository; and provided that upon a default by the company the securities were to be delivered to the State Securities Commission, upon written demand therefor, to be administered and liquidated for the benefit of Alabama investors; and in no event should the deposit be less than the liabilities of the company upon all contracts and certificates issued to residents of the State of Alabama.

Default was claimed, and the securities were transferred to the Securities Commission, who is holding them and acting under the advice and counsel of the Attorney General pending the outcome of these proceedings.

Delaware

Statutes require the company to obtain a license to do business in the State, and as a condition prerequisite, deposit with the State Banking Commissioner "in trust for the benefit of its contract holders resident in the State of Delaware, approved securities in the amount of $100,000.00," and that the Commissioner, if he shall determine that the deposit is insufficient for the protection of contract holders, having regard for its obligations, may demand forthwith additional securities not in excess of 100% of its obligations to contract holders resident in said State.

The securities have been retained by the Banking Commissioner in Delaware, who is acting under the advice of the Attorney General, pending the determination of these proceedings.

Illinois

Prior to July 7, 1931, there was no depository law in Illinois. On that date legislation was enacted requiring a deposit of not less than $50,000.00 of securities in which life insurance companies could invest, and the deposited fund at no time to be less than issuer's current contract liability on all contracts thereafter sold in the State of Illinois. The State Treasurer holds the deposit as custodian for the Secretary of State. By a later enactment, the Illinois Security Law was amended to provide that the deposit be maintained to cover all contract liability on contracts theretofore or thereafter sold in Illinois, and the Secretary of State is given the right, in the event of insolvency, to liquidate the deposited securities, under the supervision of a court of competent jurisdiction, and the procedural steps to be taken in that regard by the Secretary of State are stated.

The Secretary of State instituted a proceeding in the Circuit Court of Sangamon County, Illinois, under the Illinois Security Act, for the preservation and maintenance of the securities on deposit. The Attorney General of Illinois represents the Secretary of State in those proceedings.

Indiana

Prior to April 1, 1935, when the Legislature repealed it, the law of Indiana required a deposit of approved securities with the Auditor of not less than $25,000.00, and at all times a sum "equal to the amount of its liabilities to citizens of this State." The benefits of this law were preserved by a trust agreement, and the deposited amount retained in Indiana. There was no depository requirement until April 1, 1939, when the Indiana Securities Commission adopted and promulgated a rule requiring annuity companies to deposit, in trust, with the Auditor, a bank or other approved depository, for the benefit of the holders of such contracts, securities valued at not less than $10,000.00, and at no time less than the amount of the issuer's current contract liability on all outstanding contracts sold in the State.

A receiver was appointed for the assets of the defendant by the Marion Superior Court, in the suit of Kernel, plaintiff, v. Fidelity Assurance Association, but the bank with whom the assets are deposited in trust has retained possession of the deposited securities pending the outcome of these proceedings, and the Securities Commission of Indiana is being advised by the Attorney General, who is acting in the premises.

Iowa

Statute requires a certificate of authority from Commissioner of Insurance, and as a prerequisite a bond approved by him guaranteeing the faithful performance of all contracts entered into, or deposit of approved securities of $25,000.00, and a deposit equal in amount to all its liabilities to persons residing within said State.

On May 19, 1941, Charles R. Fischer, Insurance Commissioner, was appointed receiver of the assets by the District Court of Polk County, in the case of Shaw v. Fidelity Assurance Association, and in said action, by order of said Court, title to said securities was vested in said Insurance Commissioner.

Kansas

The State Securities Law required a deposit of $50,000.00 of approved securities in an amount between 100% and 120% of the liability on all outstanding contracts sold and held in said State. The 1929 Legislature of Kansas reenacted the Securities Law, but omitted the provision for making the deposit, and consequently no deposit was made in Kansas for contracts sold subsequent to that date.

Receivership proceedings were instituted in State Court in Kansas by the Attorney General on behalf of the Commissioner of Securities Division of the State Corporation Commission and an ancillary receiver was therein appointed.

Kentucky

In compliance with the requirements of the Securities Department, a deposit was made with the Farmers Deposit Bank of Frankfort, Kentucky, under agreement dated November 5, 1935. The securities deposited were to be held for the Securities Commissioner and were to be in the initial sum of $10,000.00, and in addition such amounts as might be necessary for the specific purpose of maturing and paying the amounts due under the terms of the Income Reserve Contract Series D. By agreement dated November 2, 1938, and with the approval of the Director of the Division of Securities of the State of Kentucky, the agreement was modified so as to provide for deposit of securities to cover the cash liability of the Association on all series of contracts issued by it and held by residents of the State of Kentucky.

Application for appointment of receivers was made in the Circuit Court of Franklin County, in the suit of Lusk v. Fidelity Assurance Association, no turn over has been made to them, and the Attorney General of Kentucky is acting in the premises.

Missouri

By approval of the Securities Commissioner of Missouri, a deposit was made with the Wheeling Dollar Savings & Trust Company, of Wheeling, West Virginia, for the benefit of holders of contracts of Fidelity residing in Missouri, the deposit to be held for the Securities Commissioner, in an amount equal to 100% of the cash liabilities to Missouri contract holders.

On May 28, 1941, in the cause of "State ex info. Roy McKittrick, Attorney General, ex rel. Russell Maloney, Commissioner of Securities, v. Fidelity Assurance Association," a receiver was appointed, who later demanded a return of the deposit physically to the State of Missouri, which the District Court granted, where the securities are now being held under order of the Circuit Court of Cole County.

Maryland

The laws of Maryland require companies such as Fidelity to assign to and deposit with the Insurance Commissioner, in trust as security for the holders of contracts sold in Maryland, certain securities of value not less than $25,000.00, and in addition an amount equal to the aggregate contract liability of the company under all contracts theretofore or thereafter sold in the State.

No receiver was appointed in Maryland, but the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, an equity court, in the exercise of its ordinary chancery powers assumed jurisdiction of, and supervision over, the administration of said trust, and the Insurance Commissioner of Maryland, as Trustee, is now subject to the orders of said Court.

Ohio

Prior to April 21, 1939, in Ohio, as a prerequisite to doing business, annuity companies were required to deposit with the Treasurer $100,000.00 as security for all claims of residents of Ohio against such company for judgments and decrees. Those laws were amended on the above date, so as to require Fidelity to maintain a deposit with the Supervisor of Bond and Investment Companies, of approved securities in an amount equal to the cash surrender value on all contracts thereafter entered into with persons resident in the State. Beginning March 1, 1940, if the company then or thereafter was licensed to do business, it was required to deposit securities to the full cash surrender value of all contracts held by residents of this State, including those issued prior to the effective date of the Act. Fidelity quit doing business in Ohio prior to March 1, 1940, and therefore never became subject to the retroactive provisions of the statute.

On April 17, 1941, John A. Lloyd, Superintendent of Insurance and Supervisor of Bond Investment Companies, was appointed Receiver of the assets of Fidelity situate in Ohio, including the deposited securities, by the Common Pleas Court of Franklin County, Ohio, in his suit against the company, instituted on his behalf by the Attorney General of Ohio.

Pennsylvania

The Pennsylvania Securities Commission must license incoming corporations, and as a prerequisite, a deposit of $100,000.00 as security for the fulfillment of its contracts theretofore or thereafter sold to residents of Pennsylvania.

In the latter part of 1939, an agreement between Fidelity and Pennsylvania Securities Commission was entered into, whereby Fidelity was given a temporary license to do business in the State upon its promise to make a deposit with the Securities Commission of $100,000 as security for the fulfillment of its contracts, sold during the existence of the temporary license, and a deposit of approximately $132,000.00 was made under said agreement.

On April 17, 1941, receivers were appointed by the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, in the equity cause entitled Levy v. Fidelity Assurance Association, and that Court required the Securities Commissioner in the Middle District of Pennsylvania to make a turn-over to those receivers of the securities deposited with that Commissioner. In June of 1942, this Court, upon request therefor, awarded approximately $11,000.00 to said receivers and their attorneys for their services, principally in retaining those securities in a proper bank vault.

Receivers were appointed in a similar suit instituted in the Western District of Pennsylvania, which receivers have in their possession approximately $32,000.00 of the general undeposited assets of the company. These receivers have agreed with West Virginia officials for a termination of their proceedings.

The Attorney General of Pennsylvania has tentatively agreed to cooperate with West Virginia officials to attempt to have the other Federal equity receivership terminated and the funds returned to the Pennsylvania Securities Commission.

Tennessee

The statute of March 10, 1939, required a deposit with the Commissioner of Insurance and Banking, for the benefit of holders of the contracts in that State, in an amount not less than $10,000.00 and in no event less than 100% of the issuer's cash liability on all outstanding contracts sold in Tennessee.

On April 21, 1941, in the Chancery Court for Davidson County, Tennessee, a general creditors' bill was brought by L. H. Brooks et al. v. Fidelity Assurance Association, and the Treasurer of Tennessee, as the legal custodian of the securities deposited therein, was made a party to the cause and directed to retain the securities, and the Court found that the appointment of a receiver was unnecessary, the Attorney General representing the Treasurer therein.

Virginia

In Virginia the Securities Division of the State Corporation Commission required Fidelity to post a bond of $25,000.00 as a condition precedent to doing business in the State, to which those doing business with the company could look, for payment of judgments obtained for fraudulent sales, failure to obey Virginia statutes, and other losses suffered by those who did business with Fidelity. In lieu of a surety on the bond, United States Government securities were deposited with a Richmond bank under a written agreement.

Alex W. Neal, Jr., was appointed receiver in the Circuit Court of the City of Richmond for said company, and has cooperated with the Securities Division. The above bond has expired, and the statute of limitations on claims thereunder will shortly expire, at which time the securities deposited as collateral to the bond will be turned over to the receiver, with the consent and approval of the Securities Division.

West Virginia

Statutes Given in Full in Appendix, Parts I and II.

Wisconsin

Under the laws of Wisconsin for the regulation of foreign building and loan associations, Fidelity was required to keep on deposit with the State Treasurer, in trust for the benefit and security of all its members (contract holders) in said State, the sum of $500,000.00, to be held in trust until all contracts held by residents of said State had been fully performed and discharged, the securities to be approved by the Banking Commission. Whenever the Banking Commission should find that the liability of the issuer for contracts outstanding for persons residing in the State exceeded 90% of the deposit required above, the Commission may issue an order requiring the deposit of an additional sum, so that at all times the outstanding liabilities shall not exceed 90% of the deposited securities.

On April 14th, the Banking Commission, by the Attorney General of Wisconsin, filed its petition in the Circuit Court of Dane County, Wisconsin, for the purpose of having adjudged and decreed the title, possession and control of the assets, business and property of Fidelity located in Wisconsin to be vested in the Banking Commission; and an order was entered in May liquidating approximately $1,500,000.00 of the deposited securities, and authorizing the Banking Commission to study any plan for reinstatement of the defendant, and, if acceptable, to submit it to the Court for approval.

PART IV

"WEST VIRGINIA SOUND VALUE" FORMULA FOR VALUATION OF DEPOSITED SECURITIES

The Auditor and ex officio Insurance Commissioner of the State of West Virginia has prescribed a formula for the valuation of deposited securities. According to said formula

(1) Bonds and debentures that are not now in default of their interest or principal, and that have continued to pay interest, should be valued at par;

(2) All preferred and common stocks should be valued at the market;

(3) All mortgages, real estate and secured notes should be carried at book value until such time as an appraisal or offer for sale indicates the value to be less, at which time the value for each should be changed to the lesser figure;

(4) All securities that are actually in default of principal or interest, or that have paid principal or interest in the past three years by the sale of additional securities or solely by means of borrowing money for this purpose, without having earnings equal to the amount to offset the loan, should be carried at current market prices.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA
AUDITOR'S OFFICE

EDGAR B. SIMS — AUDITOR
INSURANCE COMMISSIONER

INSURANCE DEPARTMENT
HARLAN JUSTICE

March 25, 1941

Mr. Arthur B. Koontz
Attorney-at-Law
Charleston, West Virginia

Dear Sir:

Owing to the precarious condition of the Fidelity Assurance Association, inasmuch as the company has been poorly handled and the capital and surplus would seem to be entirely wiped out and, perhaps, reserves impaired somewhat if absolute market values are applied, I have been giving serious consideration to asking for a receiver ship in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County as is provided under the special statute under which the company was originally organized.

However, before doing so I should like to explore the possibility of placing this company in trusteeship under 77B of the Federal Bankruptcy Act for the purpose of determining whether this company can be reorganized and put on a sound basis financially and under competent management.

Inasmuch as you have acted for this company in a legal capacity for several years, I would ask you to consider the observations made hereinbefore and advise me at your very earliest convenience what steps we should take in the premises. You, of course, are at liberty to consult the members of the staff of the Attorney General's office or the legal staff of the S. E. C., or both.

Please investigate this matter immediately as I feel that no time should be wasted in reaching a decision.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) EDGAR B. SIMS,
State Auditor,
Insurance Commissioner.

LETTER OF JULIAN F. BOUCHELLE, JUDGE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF KANAWHA COUNTY, WEST VIRGINIA, TO BEN MOORE, JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF WEST VIRGINIA

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA
THIRTEENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT
CHARLESTON

September 19, 1941.

JULIAN F. BOUCHELLE
JUDGE

Honorable Ben Moore, Judge
United States District Court
Charleston, W. Va.

My dear Judge Moore:

I noticed in this morning's Gazette a statement attributed to you questioning the propriety of the appointment of Mr. Ross B. Thomas as co-receiver of the Fidelity Assurance Association by this court. I feel that you should be fully advised as to the circumstances which motivated my action in appointing Mr. Thomas as co-receiver with Mr. H. Isaiah Smith.

When application was made to me for the appointment of receivers under the West Virginia statute, there were present Messrs. W. W. Goldsmith and P. D. Koontz of the firm of Koontz & Koontz, Ira J. Partlow, Assistant Attorney General of West Virginia, and Auditor Edgar B. Sims in person, and upon their presentation of the facts, and particularly the fact of Mr. Thomas' connection and intimate knowledge of the complicated affairs of the company, (which was later confirmed when I had made further investigation into the case), and with express consent of the auditor and the attorney general's office, I appointed the two above named persons as co-receivers.

Shortly thereafter I called Messrs. W. W. Goldsmith and P. D. Koontz to my office and explained to them that I would not place Mr. Thomas upon a salary as co-receiver, but would allow Mr. H. Isaiah Smith a monthly salary of $500.00 as receiver, and the firm of Koontz & Koontz a like sum as counsel for the receiver. I felt that upon the information given me and the knowledge I obtained that no one was better qualified to advise and act with Mr. Smith as receiver than Mr. Thomas. I indicated plainly to Messrs. Goldsmith and Koontz that this situation would continue only during the period of attempted reorganization, and which period I insisted should not be long-drawn out; and that if reorganization was found impossible and the time of liquidation reached, that I would give recognition to the representatives of the contract holders in the matter of receivership from that point on, and that Mr. Thomas would not be retained.

Counsel of this city representing some of the contract holders had conferences with me during the time the case was in this court, and I advised them of the foregoing and assured them that not only would they be notified but that they would be fully advised with upon the matter of reorganization; and that if and when the case became one of liquidation, I would give favorable consideration to recommendations by a substantial number of the contract holders in the receivership.

I feel that this explanation is due in fairness to Mr. Thomas and the firm of Koontz & Koontz, and, as previously stated, to acquaint you with my actions and intentions in this case.

Very truly yours,

JFB:SB (Signed) J. F. BOUCHELLE.

CC: Honorable Clarence W. Meadows
Honorable Edgar B. Sims

SAMPLES OF UNIFORM PROOFS OF CLAIM AND LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL TO CONTRACT HOLDERS, TENTATIVELY AGREED TO BY DEPOSITORY STATES, AND ALREADY USED BY WEST VIRGINIA AND MISSOURI

H. ISAIAH SMITH and ROSS B. THOMAS, Receivers for FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION and Agents of Edgar B. Sims, Auditor and ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia

FIDELITY BUILDING
WHEELING, W. VA.

The matter of Fidelity Assurance Association is now pending on an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. The United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Judicial Circuit, on June 16, 1942, reversed the lower court and held that the reorganization proceeding pending therein should be dismissed. The appeal will determine whether the matter will be proceeded with in Federal Court or whether liquidation will ensue under the supervision and control of the various state officials who have under their authority and control the assets deposited in their state.

Pending the appeal, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, by order of July 22, 1942, has permitted each proper state official or state court, having jurisdiction to make plans for future distribution of the funds under their control, supervision or jurisdiction. It is therefore necessary to ascertain the claims against the company, and the claims against each state deposit. Should it finally be held that the Federal Court has sole jurisdiction of the proceedings, all proofs of claim received will be turned over to the proper officials thereof.

Your contract account is set out below as shown by the company's books, as of April 11, 1941, the date of receivership. Enclosed is a proof of claim which must be completed by you and sworn to before a Notary Public, whose seal must be used, and returned in the enclosed envelope. If the figures are incorrect in any particular, insert the correct figures, stating in writing your reasons therefor. Payments received from you after April 4, 1941, are kept in a separate escrow fund, of which you have previously received notice.

EXCERPTS FROM EXHIBIT 6, REPORT OF S. E. C. TO CONGRESS CONCERNING FACE-AMOUNT CERTIFICATE COMPANIES

Chapter III, Fidelity Assurance Association:

"For the period from 1927 to 1936 installment payments by certificate holders aggregated $49,230,000, of which the Association applied on its books as income a total of $12,427,000, or 25.2%—25.2 cents of every $1 of installment payments. * * * Total commissions paid during the period 1927-1936 amounted to $9,308,000, a sum equal to 18.9% of total installment payments."

Page 96-7:

"The Association has followed a settled policy of investing its funds almost entirely in marketable securities, about 90% of which have consisted of bonds and notes. Investments in stocks have consisted principally of preferred stocks and have been, in the main, too small in amount to be of any importance. * * *

FOREWORD.

"We think it is our duty to review the situation realistically, and when this is done, there appears to be no reasonable hope of the reorganization of the business as a going concern, but only the *immediate need of a liquidation of the company's assets for the benefit of the contract holders."

Opinion of Court of Appeals, Tr., p. 259.

"It is true that the broad picture developed by the testimony at the hearing does not present a very favorable view with respect to the rehabilitation and continued operation of the Debtor as a face-amount certificate company."

Opinion of District Judge, Tr. pp. 194-195.

REPLY BRIEF ON BEHALF OF L. H. BROOKS, TRUSTEE, FREDERIC LEAKE AND A. L. GOLDBERG, JR., TRUSTEE, AND DEWEY S. GODFREY, RECEIVER FOR FIDELITY ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION, IN THE STATE OF MISSOURI.

STATEMENT AS TO THE ISSUES—GOOD FAITH.

Other respondents will discuss the question of whether or not Fidelity Assurance Association was such a corporation as could file a petition in bankruptcy. This brief will be confined to the question of good faith, and chiefly to that phase pertaining to whether or not there is a reasonable likelihood of a plan of reorganization being effected.

The issues as regards this aspect of the case, no longer admit of any canon. They have gone on a rampage and are like the surging floodwaters that have broken out of the banks of the river channel. They are like Mistress Quickly of whom Falstaff said "A man knows not where to have her."

The Debtor's petition filed June 6, 1941, (Tr., p. 4) indicated a purpose of effecting reorganization through a modification of the rights of all contract holders in the security of the deposits with the Treasurer of the State of West Virginia and the officials and departments of other States, "so that the earnings received on securities and assets owned by Debtor will be sufficient in amount to meet the requirements under its outstanding contracts." (Tr. p. 7-8)

Debtor's pleading pitches its case for reorganization on this single issue.

This issue has either been overlooked or forgotten by counsel presently in the case. The case in this Court is made to rest upon the possibilities of liquidation. If the pleadings in the Chapter X proceedings on the issue of good faith serve the same purpose of pleadings in the ordinary equity case, in the case at bar there is ample cause to question whether the case put forward in the adversary briefs is not subject to the usual rules as to variance.

We regard the findings of the Circuit Court of Appeals and the District Court as being concurrent on the point of whether or not the Company can be reorganized to carry on business. The brief of Securities & Exchange Commission indicates that it has the same view.

Petitioners and Securities & Exchange Commission know that the crucial question in this lawsuit is whether or not there is a reasonable likelihood of effecting a reorganization of Fidelity that will be fair, equitable and feasible. If they thought that Fidelity could be reorganized, they ought to have been able to say so in plain and direct language.

Nevertheless, we search their brief in vain for a single clear statement that they envisage the kind of reorganization which men ordinarily think of when they speak of reorganizing a corporation. When they come to this point, they skip over it with the agility of an expert skater jumping over a row of barrels and instantaneously commence talking about "other methods of disposition of the assets which will satisfy the requirements of Section 146 (3), such as "the creation of a new corporation or other device to liquidate assets." (Brief of Securities & Exchange Commission, p. 19)

It is true that the debtor and its Trustee in their brief refer to the opinion of several of the witnesses that Fidelity could be reorganized and add that there was much atmosphere or "color" about this proceeding substantiating these opinions. We submit that their opinions are entitled to be given very little weight. None of them are supported by any basis of fact from which such conclusion might legitimately be drawn. All of them had had some connection with the Company before the filing of the petition for reorganization, which made them interested (though not in each case pecuniarily) in saving Fidelity from dissolution.

It is a human disposition to postpone the admission of the inevitableness of failure and defeat as long as possible. A case in point is the profession of the leaders of France of a belief that some miracle would save her in the Spring of 1940, when the outside world knew that she was doomed.

The opinions of these witnesses that Fidelity could be reorganized were little more than the expression of hopes born of despair. The letter of John Marshall, dated June 17, 1941, to the publisher of the Wheeling Intelligencer (Original Tr. pp. 163-169) attests this fact. This is why the Court of Appeals said that the situation must be viewed realistically.

The Debtor and the Trustee make numerous suggestions—none of which they are ready to pin their faith on—and claim that they are "something" more than "remote possibilities." (Petitioner's Brief, p. 48) They completely fail, however, to conform any of these "suggestions" to the realities with which they must deal.

THE STATE DEPOSITS—THE CRUX OF THE LAWSUIT.

The confusion that is so manifest in the thinking of petitioners and Securities & Exchange Commission is attributable to one thing—their refusal to reorganize the fixed and vested rights of contract holders in the deposits in West Virginia and the fourteen other states. Perhaps we should say that they refuse to admit that these fixed and vested rights exist. We are bound to credit them with perceiving these rights.

True it is, that insolvency alone will not bar reorganization. But insolvency coupled with the utter absence of any likelihood of achieving solvency does bar reorganization. That is the case here.

The Circuit Court of Appeals summarized the situation by setting out in its opinion the following table and stating:

| State | Deposit by States as of June 6, 1941 Market Value | Liability by States as of April 10, 1941 Net Cash |
|---|---|---|
| Alabama | $ 32,555.16 | $ 31,346.71 |
| Delaware | 293,790.63 | 290,175.36 |
| Illinois | 3,759,894.00 | 4,225,790.75 |
| Indiana | 162,863.44 | 386,173.45 |
| Iowa | 45,082.50 | 34,478.27 |
| Kansas | 83,337.50 | 108,784.89 |
| Kentucky | 86,712.50 | 92,690.42 |
| Maryland | 470,806.25 | 492,552.24 |
| Missouri | 861,100.62 | 786,988.86 |
| Ohio | 509,573.44 | 2,360,418.70 |
| Pennsylvania | 232,591.57 | 4,668,582.25 |
| Tennessee | 196,574.38 | 200,504.97 |
| Virginia | 27,703.13 | 557,809.19 |
| West Virginia | 10,674,696.08 | 6,896,393.88* |
| Wisconsin | 2,619,399.07 | 2,342,978.73 |
| | $20,056,680.27 | $23,475,668.67 |

In addition, the Fidelity had undeposited securities of the market value of $556,467.51 on June 6, 1941, and approximately $500,000 in cash."

(Tr., p. 242)

*Of the liabilities shown opposite West Virginia $2,181,681.75 represent claims of West Virginia contract holders, and the balance of $4,714,712.13 the claims of contract holders in the States having no deposits.

The Federal Government has filed a preferred claim for income and excess profit taxes for the taxable years 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938 and ten months of 1939, amounting to nearly $300,000.00. (Tr., pp. 1220-1223) It is plainly to be seen that the nondeposited securities and assets would be practically consumed in paying taxes, expenses of administration, fees, etc.

Manifestly, no sort of a plan of reorganization could be effected which does not deal with the deposited securities. Debtor's petition presupposes some kind of omnipotence in the Federal Court capable of effecting a recapture of these deposits for use in supplying the deficiency of more than two and a half million dollars between the assets and liabilities of the company so that it can continue in business. In other words, it necessarily contemplates the carving of working capital out of the assets held in trust for contract holders.

There could be no sort of reorganization that does not eliminate the deficiency between assets and liabilities. If the company is to continue in business as a face-amount certificate company, as an insurance company, or as any other kind of company, it would have to be launched in a condition of solvency. The only other alternative, it occurs to us, would be the sale or transfer of a part of the Debtor's business to some other company that is already functioning; and again insolvency is a barrier to such a plan. No business man would take over assets with liabilities in excess of what he is getting.

Now when a business is insolvent—that is, when its liabilities are in excess of its asset—solvency can be attained in one of two ways only. Either the assets must be increased or the liabilities must be decreased. The assets of this company can be brought up to equal its liabilities only by new money being put in from the outside. All will agree that this is out of the question. The efforts of the company's directors and officers extending over a period of several years prior to the filing of the petition to bring in new capital demonstrate that this possibility has already been exhausted.

This leaves the possibility of scaling down the liabilities. It would not be enough to make them merely equal the assets. The liabilities would have to be brought way below the assets so as to free money from the trusts in which the securities are held to make capital and for use in paying operating expenses.

It is our belief that nothing like this has ever been attempted in the annals of corporate reorganizations. The crucial question in the case, therefore, is: How can the Bankruptcy Court use the State deposits as a basis for reorganization?

At the commencement of this proceeding it was reorganization through modification of the contract holders rights in the State deposits which was sought. Now, petitioners and Securities & Exchange Commission's plea is for reorganization through exploration, as to these contract holders rights. It has simmered down to this! Does the good-faith requirement of Chapter X mean nothing more than that a Bankruptcy Court will have jurisdiction of a reorganization petition to enable Securities & Exchange Commission to investigate and explore in order to see if it cannot devise some method of disposition of the bankrupt's assets "as slowly as necessary and as expeditiously as possible under the circumstances?"

But whether the proponents of reorganization are thinking of reorganization in the usual sense or an exploration with a view to the creation of a new corporation or some other device for liquidation, they must face—as so far they will not—the dominant fact in this lawsuit: That there is nothing to work with except the $10,000,000 of securities held in the West Virginia deposit and a like amount held in the deposits in the fourteen other States and that these deposits they cannot touch. Another proposition is equally true: That they cannot torture Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act so as to make it serve this end.

THERE ARE NO PROBLEMS OF "MARSHALING" ASSETS.

There need not be, in the case of Fidelity, any complex and difficult problems of creditors' rights involving the marshalling of assets. The distribution of Fidelity's deposits can be simple and easy. When the case is seen in its true light, there are no perplexing legal problems.

In the first place there is no conflict between contract holders in the States which have deposits and contract holders in the States which do not have their own deposits. The simple fact is that fourteen States outside of West Virginia required Fidelity to make deposits of assets to secure liabilities in those States. About the same number of other States did not have such requirements in their laws. They were content to rely upon the protection afforded by the laws of the State of West Virginia which required a deposit in that State to cover all outstanding liabilities that were not elsewhere secured.

Securities & Exchange Commission, instead of speaking of "unsolved" problems of "interfund accountings and marshalling of assets by series" which does create confusion, should have stated its proposition in plainer terms. "Marshalling" in the sense in which they have employed it means nothing more nor less than the annihilation of the State deposits. It is but a recurrent phase of the old attempt to lay hold upon the State deposits. Instead of modifying the contract holders rights in the State deposit, they are now talking about marshalling the assets.

That Fidelity sold more than one series of contracts, that it failed to segregate the moneys which it received according to the contract series, and that its books show some interfund "loans" or other transfers, do not alter the fact that contract holders have vested rights in the securities deposited in the several State deposits at the time of the filing of the petition. These rights cannot be modified against the contract holders' consent. They cannot be abrogated indirectly by some kind of "marshalling" of the securities as between the several deposits.

It will clarify the confusion—arising not so much from the actual situation as from the way it has been presented in the adversary briefs—for us to look to the condition under which the State deposits were created. The difficulties which obsess Securities & Exchange Commission vanish as soon as we stop pondering "the complex task of disentangling the assets" and examine the facts.

STATE DEPOSITS CONSTITUTE TRUST FUNDS FOR CONTRACT HOLDERS.

The statutes of the State of Tennessee require investment companies, such as the Debtor, as a condition to the right to engage in business in that State, to deposit and maintain securities at no time less than 100 per cent of the issuing company's cash or current contract liability on all outstanding investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee. By Chapter 209 of the Public Acts of 1939, it was provided that the Commissioner of Insurance and Banking of the State of Tennessee should hold as Custodian the securities deposited for the benefit of the holders of the investment contracts coming within the provisions of said Act. By Chapter No. 157 of the Public Acts of 1941, the State Treasurer of Tennessee was made the Custodian of all securities deposited with the State or any Department thereof. The laws of Tennessee further provide that only upon discharge in full of all liabilities on all investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee, and for which trust deposit is maintained, shall the issuing company be entitled to a release and return of the securities so deposited.

In compliance with the laws of the State of Tennessee, and in order to obtain a permit to do business and issue its investment contracts in the State of Tennessee, the Debtor company made a deposit of securities with the Commissioner of Insurance and Banking of the State of Tennessee. Citizens of the State of Tennessee, in reliance upon the protection afforded by the laws of that State, purchased the investment contracts issued by Debtor.

The evidence adduced on the hearing discloses that the company, in the latter years of its existence, was able to keep its head above water by issuing certificates with some variation in name and terms or features.* The implications in the brief of Securities & Exchange Commission that it was only in the later series of contracts that Fidelity agreed to segregate reserve funds are not correct.

The different contracts themselves when analyzed furnish conclusive evidence that no trust could come into existence until securities were deposited with State officials. In the first place, the contract holder was to make his payments to the Company. Undoubtedly when these payments were received by the Company a debtor-creditor relationship and not a trust arose. The Company agreed unconditionally (so far as reserve funds were concerned) to make the payments to the contract holder when due according to the terms of the contract. The point is that the Company did not agree to pay merely out of the separate reserve fund. The contract holder's right to receive the payments from the Company was not limited to any special or segregated fund.

In the Series B contract which was issued from 1934 on, the heading read:

"PROVISIONS.

This contract is issued upon the agreement of the association to maintain the required reserve fund, to distribute the apportioned surplus thereof to registered holders of matured income reserve contracts series B, to deposit approved securities in trust as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia and to pay and retire contracts in accordance with their provisions."

*For the different types of contracts or certificates and the varying terms and provisions thereof, see pages 79-80 and 164 of the Report of the Securities & Exchange Commission on Companies Issuing Face-Amount Installment Certificates.

While there is some slight difference between the wording of the section relating to the reserve fund contained in the different contracts, in substance the provision is the same. By this section (Section 1, Reserve Fund), the Company agreed to create and maintain a reserve fund. It was to be a special fund for the discharge of its liability under the different Series contracts. The reserve fund was to be set aside from payments received under the different Series contracts. This reserve fund was to be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust, as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia.

It is of special significance that the amount set aside for the reserve fund was to be the total amount of all payments, less administrative and agency charges, withdrawals and taxes. This, we believe, is a fair statement of the provisions of the Series B contracts. For the Special Annuity contracts, the amount set aside was to be the amount of all payments, less fixed administrative charges and necessary agency expenses. The Special Annuity contracts did not provide for the deduction of withdrawals and taxes.

Therefore, the entire amount paid in, less running expenses, was to constitute the reserve fund. This fund was to be created when it was invested in approved securities. So long as they were held by the Company, they were still general or unpledged assets. Only when the securities were deposited in trust, as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia, did a trust come into existence.

The laws of the State of West Virginia required a deposit in trust of bonds and securities approved by the Insurance Commissioner "to an amount equal to the total amount which such person, association or corporation may be liable to pay in cash to the holders of contracts under the terms thereof at the time of the deposit." As stated by the Court of Appeals in its opinion, it was further provided by the West Virginia laws that wherever other States required the corporation to make deposits to secure contract holders, the amount of the deposits in such other States might be deducted from the total amount required to be deposited with the Treasurer of the State of West Virginia.

These provisions, which were a part of the West Virginia laws, were, of course, by the provisions of the contract incorporated as a part of the contractual obligations of the Investment Company. Thus, when the Company deposited securities in Tennessee in accordance with the laws of the State of West Virginia, credit therefor was given against the West Virginia deposit. This was in compliance with the provisions of the contract that a reserve fund would be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust. The Tennessee statutes in this regard are unambiguous. The amount of the deposit was to be not less than one hundred per cent of the cash or current contract liability on all outstanding investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee.

Clearly no valid trust came into existence at any time until the securities were deposited by the company with the State depositaries. This means, of course, change of possession, actual or constructive. Such book entries as the Company made for the purpose of segregating reserve funds by series contracts plainly did not amount to the creation of a separate trust for the contract holders of the different series. In the first place, there was no agreement that the Company itself would be a trustee. The contract did not contemplate that there would be a trust fund or res until the reserve fund was deposited in trust as required by the States laws.*

The applicability of a principle which makes a trust res necessary for the creation of a trust is emphasized by the facts, so well illustrated in this record that, until the Company transferred securities to the State depositaries, they were still (notwithstanding bookkeeping entries) under the unrestricted dominion and control of the Company. They should be "switched" about from one ledger account to another. They could be "loaned," or "advanced." The record shows many such transactions in very large sums. There was no attempt even to make separate bookkeeping entries until the latter years of the Company's existence. (See complaint filed by S. E. C. and supporting affidavits in Report on Companies Issuing Face-Amount Installment Certificates, pp. 196, et seq.)

The evidence shows that with comparatively few exceptions (which are trivial and must be disregarded in the approach to the primary and basic question of the rights of contract holders in the State deposits generally) the Company in sending deposits to the State depositaries, did not specify the particular series fund from which the securities came. (Tr., pp. 754-756, 768, 769) The types of reports which were sent out are shown by Exhibits 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77 and 78.

The law in West Virginia was settled by its Supreme Court of Appeals in the recent case of Inter-Ocean Casualty Company v. Leccony Smokeless Fuel Company, et al—W. Va.—17 S.E. (2d) 51, 137 A.L.R., 488, in accordance with the rule of McKey v. Paradise, 299 U. S., 119, 57 S. Ct., 124, 81 L. Ed., 75.

The Securities & Exchange Commission fails to cite the record in support of its statement that the States accepted securities in disregard of knowledge or notice that the assets deposited belonged to particular series funds and were deposited to secure liabilities of other series. (Brief, pp. 36-37) There is no evidence that this happened. To make it perfectly clear, we are printing in the Appendix to our brief copies of the reports sent to Tennessee which were filed as Exhibit 77. (Tr., p. 756)

It has not been suggested that the rights of contract holders in the State deposits may be so far ignored as to bring all the deposited securities into one general pot with the general assets of Debtor so as to make all contract holders mere general creditors. All that is proposed is some "disentangling" of the assets by series funds. It would seem that nothing short of some superior rights of contract holder springing from a trust relationship by series funds would warrant such an invasion of the State deposits.

It will tend to clarify all the other points in the case, if we consider two fundamental legal propositions as established:

(a) No trust relationship between Fidelity and any series of contract holders ever arose or now exists or may hereafter be created by reason of the agreement of Fidelity expressed in the contracts to create and maintain separate reserve funds for each series contract; and

(b) Valid trusts or pledges of collateral security creating vested rights in favor of the contract holders entitled to benefit therefrom did come into existence when securities were deposited by the Company with State depositaries.

The relationship between Fidelity and the contract holders is that of debtor and creditor, pure and simple. The State deposit laws, and not the contracts, give rise to the trust relationship. By virtue of the statutes requiring the deposits, the contract holders entitled to the benefits therefrom as a matter of State policy acquired protective lien or trust rights in the deposited securities superior to those of the company or its other creditors in such assets. American United Life Insurance Company v. Fischer (C.C.A. 8th) 130 F. (2d) 643, 646.

When the brief of Securities & Exchange Commission is carefully read, it will be seen that the Commission avoids expressing any view of its own contrary to these propositions. To our minds, it is clear that the Commission does not have the conviction that an attempt by contract holders to set up trust funds according to the several series of contracts in derogation of State deposit laws will be successful. Disappointed contract holders may have claims against the company for breach of the agreement to create and maintain separate reserve funds by each series contract, but the attempt to enforce such claims will avail them nothing, because they can point to no trust res which they are entitled to trace. Those contract holders who are entitled to the benefit of the State deposits stand as bona fide purchasers having vested lien or trust rights in the disputed securities. American United Life Insurance Company v. Fischer, Supra.

This view is confirmed by the statement on Page 1 of the Report of Securities & Exchange Commission on Companies Issuing Face-Amount Installment Certificates that, irrespective of their designation, these face-amount installment certificates are in essence simply unsecured obligations of the companies which issue them to pay a specified sum to the holder at a specified future date. The footnote mentions the trusts by reason of the State deposit laws.

The authors of the brief on behalf of Debtor and the Trustee are almost as circumspect as the Commission. Although they say it is a "real question" whether any or all of the several series of contracts have resulted in the creation of trusts in particular assets for the benefit of creditors (p. 57), they are extremely careful to avoid vouching such a theory. Not one of our adversaries has the rashness to assert that any of the several series of contracts resulted in the creation of trusts in particular assets, except insofar as trusts came into being by reason of the State laws.

From whence then arise any rights or equities in favor of any contract holders which are superior to the vested rights of contract holders in the States having the deposits? Securities & Exchange Commission ought to be willing to answer this question or cease all talk about marshalling the several State deposits.

All contract holders in this case are secured creditors, for all are entitled to the benefit of the security of the West Virginia deposit. But contract holders claiming their security, not by virtue of any State deposit, and instead claiming securities held in State deposits on the theory of a trust relationship resulting from a contractual obligation of Fidelity, will find themselves in the position of common or unsecured creditors. At least they will be insofar as they may seek to recover securities from the States having the deposits. The mere equities which they assert will be subordinate to the substantive rights in the deposited securities which had previously vested under the State laws and which by virtue of the insolvency and receivership proceedings had acquired an exclusively local situs. American United Life Insurance Company v. Fischer, Supra.

Any plan which compels secured creditors to surrender without adequate consideration to the benefit of other creditors, whether secured or unsecured, the superior rights which they have acquired is inequitable and unfair. Consolidated Rock Products Company v. Du Bois, 312 U. S., 510, 61 S. Ct., 675, 85 L. Ed., 982.

Surely there can be no gainsaying the following statement by the Court of Appeals:

> ". . . certainly the possibility that thousands of contract holders could be persuaded to modify their contracts and scale down their claims to enable the company to go on is so remote as to exist only in the imagination. . . No proposal for the investment of new capital has been forthcoming." The facts underlying the whole situation are so clear that even the parties in this case who insist upon reorganization under the Bankruptcy Act hold out little hope of a resumption of the business as a going concern, and content themselves for the most part with the argument that reorganization in the statutory sense includes 'a slow and orderly liquidation.'" (Tr., p. 260)

A Bankruptcy Court is a Court of equity, but it cannot disregard or impair liens created by State laws. This is prohibited by Section 67 (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, which, by virtue of Section 102, is applicable to proceedings under Chapter X. If the Bankruptcy Court has no power to destroy, abridge or adjust a State deposit, may it hold that the petition to reorganize is filed in good faith merely in order to afford opportunity to the Trustee to try to discover ways of doing that?

CONGRESS HAS CONFERRED NO POWER IN BANKRUPTCY COURT OVER FIDELITY'S DEPOSITS.

Fidelity never came under any Federal regulation. During its entire existence it was regulated by the State authorities. All of the deposits which were made were in pursuance to State laws. No reason whatsoever is shown why the Federal Court should have any jurisdiction to nullify the rights which have been thus created.

The Securities & Exchange Commission had been studying investment trusts and investment companies for four years before the Investment Company Act undertaking to regulate face-amount certificate companies was recommended to Congress for enactment. The study was commenced in pursuance to the mandate contained in Section 30 of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935.

The Investment Company Act of 1940 (Title 15 U.S.C.A., Sec. 80a) expressly recites that it was upon the basis of facts disclosed by the record and reports of Securities & Exchange Commission and facts otherwise disclosed and ascertained, that it was found that investment companies were affected with a national public interest. The special report on Companies Issuing Face-amount Installment Certificates was a part of its over-all report on its study of investment trusts and investment companies. Chapter V of this Special Report deals with the subject of Governmental Regulation of face-amount certificate companies.* These deposits with State officials of cash and securities are referred to as "collateral security for the performance of the Company's obligations." (Page 128) On the same page is set out a summary of the deposit requirements of the various State statutes. Table 34 on Page 130 sets out the amount of deposits and cash surrender liability of certificates outstanding of Fidelity Investment Association by States as of December 31, 1937.

In 1938, the Securities & Exchange Commission had obtained an injunction in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan against Fidelity Investment Association, enjoining it, among other things, from: "A. 1. Purchasing and depositing with West Virginia, or any other State, insufficient securities or securities which do not meet deposit requirements." (Special Report, p. 257).

The variation in State deposit laws was made the subject of a special study by the Senate and House Committees, to which the Investment Company Act was referred. Commissioner Healy was the first to point it out. (See hearings before Sub-Committee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on H.R. 10065. Page 62.)

Mr. Schenker, counsel for the Securities & Exchange Commission made the following statement:

"... this bill in no way, Senator Herring, touches deposits that have been made to secure certificates issued up to the time of the passage of this bill." (Original printed transcript, p. 234)

The report of Senator Wagner, Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, accompanying the bill, states:

"The bill preserves the rights of residents in those States which require specific deposits with their State officials but makes provision for equalization of treatment of all certificate holders, by providing that residents of other States must receive an amount equal to that received by the residents of States with deposits, before the latter can share in the general assets of the bankrupt company. (Sec. 29.)". (Italics ours)

We ask the Court to give special attention to the memorandum as to the hearings preceding the enactment of the Bill set out in the original printed transcript at pages 226 to 237.

It is highly significant that the Securities & Exchange Commission in its report to Congress stated that neither of the two major companies (Fidelity Investment Association and Investors Syndicate) had registered their certificates under the Securities Act of 1933 "presumably by reason of the exemption in Section 3 (a) (8) of that Act." The footnote to said sentence points out that:

"Sec. 3 (a) (8) of the Securities Act of 1933 includes among the securities exempted from the registration and prospectus requirement of the Act, 'any insurance or endowment policy or annuity contract or optional annuity contract, issued by a corporation subject to the supervision of the insurance commissioner, bank commissioner, or any agency or officer performing like functions, of any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia.'"

Part Two, Statistical Survey of Investment Trusts and Investment Companies, p. 228;

See also p. 132, Report on Companies Issuing Face-Amount Installment Certificates.

Commissioner Healy, in his statement before the Sub-Committee of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the United States Senate, preceding the passage of the bill, compared these companies to savings banks (Part One hearings on S. 3580, pp. 33, 38).

Thus, until the enactment of the Investment Company Act of 1940, the Securities & Exchange Commission evidently held the view that investment companies selling face-amount certificates were exempted from the registration of their certificates under the Securities Act of 1933.*

It is as plain as the noon-day that so far as Fidelity is concerned, no greater power over State deposits exists in the Bankruptcy Court since the enactment of the Investment Company Act, than there was before. We have seen that it was not the intention of Congress to disturb the State deposits as they existed on the effective date of the Act, which was January 1st, 1941. As Mr. Schenker stated to the Senate Sub-Committee on Banking and Currency, "meticulous care" was taken to see that those States wich had de-

*By the same token, it would seem that a face-amount certificate company would not be the type of corporation that could file a petition in bankruptcy, because it possessed the essential characteristics of an insurance or banking corporation. (Sec. 4 (b) of the Bankruptcy Act.)

It is worthy of note that neither prior to the enactment of the Investment Company Act nor as a result of the amendment to that Act was any special provision made for the reorganization of face-amount certificate companies. Whereas, the Bankruptcy Act contained separate chapters with carefully framed provisions concerning Agricultural Compositions and Extensions, Railroad Reorgnizations, Debt Readjustments by Municipalities and Taxing Districts, Corporate Reorganizations, Arrangements, Real Property Arrangements and Wage Earners Plan, this simple amendment designed to facilitate the liquidation of face-amount certificate companies and the distribution of the deposits made after January 1, 1941 was added by the Investment Company Act as an amendment to Section 67 of the Chapter relating to ordinary bankruptcy. It is in such striking contrast to the carefully detailed methods set up with respect to other types of corporations as to make it exceedingly doubtful whether in any event there would be jurisdiction in the Bankruptcy Court, to attempt to rehabilitate, a face-amount certificate company as a going concern. But this is not a determinative question.

posits could hold on to them. (Original printed Transcript, p. 229)

The Investment Company Act embodied a separate section headed "Bankruptcy of Face-Amount Certificate Companies." This Section 29 undertakes to amend Section 67 of the Bankruptcy Act so as to give the Bankruptcy Court summary jurisdiction over State deposits in proceedings for the liquidation of face-amount certificates companies.

Section 29 expressly provides that it applies only to the deposit of securities made by a face-amount certificate company on or after January 1, 1941. Deposits made prior to that time may not be avoided by the Trustee, and the Bankruptcy Court is given no summary jurisdiction of any proceedings to hear and determine the rights of any parties with respect to such deposits. It is to be borne in mind that all of the deposits of Fidelity were made prior to January 1, 1941.

The Act contained an express reservation of the jurisdiction of State authorities. Section 50 provides as follows:

> ". . . nor shall anything in this title effect the jurisdiction of any other commission, board, agency, or officer of the United States or of any State or political subdivision of any State, over any person, security, or transaction, insofar as such jurisdiction does not conflict with any provision of this title or of any rule, regulation, or order hereunder."

The proof is irrefragable that Congress thoroughly considered the question of the application of the bankruptcy power to the then existing deposits and deliberately decided to confer no power upon the Bankruptcy Court over deposits as they existed when the Act took effect.

Fidelity's deposits before the Investment Company Act was enacted were not subject to the summary power of a court of bankruptcy. They did not become subject to such summary jurisdiction after the Act took effect. Indeed, the failure of Congress to amend the reorganization sections of the Bankruptcy Act, when the Investment Company Act was passed is persuasive that it was not intended that those sections of the Bankruptcy Act, so ill-adapted to the processes of reorganizing a face-amount certificate company, would be resorted to as the basis for such summary jurisdiction.

When consideration is given to the clear intent of Congress to leave the existing deposits undisturbed, it would not be consonant with justice to arrive at the result aimed at by the petitioners by resort to any forced or strained construction of the provisions of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.

The reason that we insist that the question of the rights of contract holders in the State deposits is crucial is that the disposition of the question of the want of power in the Bankruptcy Court to avoid the State deposits will leave the Debtor with practically no property that can be made the basis of a reorganization. As soon as this question is determined—as it seems to us that it must be against any power in the Bankruptcy Court to abrogate or cut down the State deposits—the dismissal of the petition is required.

PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT IN TENNESSEE.

The transcript of the proceedings in the Chancery Court of Davidson County, Tennessee, filed as an exhibit to the answer of the defendants to the Debtor's petition for reorganization shows that prior to the time the petition was filed, a suit was pending in the State Court to subject the deposit in Tennessee to the satisfaction of the claims of contract holders entitled to the benefit of deposit in that State. The deposited securities were then being held by the State Treasurer in pursuance to the statutes of that State, making him the Custodian of the deposit. By decree of the Chancery Court he had been enjoined from disposing of the deposit in any way except under orders of that Court. The time had been fixed for the filing of the claims of creditors and many claims had already been filed. Since that time many other claims have been filed. The time expired on November 1, 1941.

But for the injunction or stay in the order of August 9, 1941, the Tennessee State Court could have proceeded with the distribution of the deposit in Tennessee after November 1, 1941. The Debtor has no equity in the Tennessee deposit. (Original Transcript, p. 225)

By reason of these facts, the deposit in Tennessee cannot be affected in any way by any attempt to reorganize the Debtor except by delaying distribution. Even if there is an attempt to effect a plan of reorganization, any plan of reorganization must give the Tennessee contract holders the option of obtaining satisfaction of their entire claims out of the deposit in Tennessee. This deposit under the laws of the State cannot be withdrawn until the discharge in full of all claims of Tennessee contract holders. Since in Tennessee the Insurance Commissioner is prevented by statute from giving an investment company a license to do business unless it maintains a deposit of 100% of the amount of its cash liabilities to the holders of investment contracts sold in the State, there can be no scaling down in invitum of the claims of contract holders against the deposit so as to free any of the deposited securities for use in equalizing deficiencies in other States or to furnish working capital.

Respondents duly moved to vacate and set aside the stay order made by the District Court so as to permit the Chancery proceedings in the State Court to be prosecuted. Their motion was overruled by the District Judge. The Court of Appeals correctly envisaged the situation with respect to the State deposits generally, and concluded that it would be unjust and unreasonable to these contract holders to delay the satisfaction of their claims in order that illusory hopes of reorganization may be entertained.

PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT IN MISSOURI.

It is to the Missouri deposit that the Missouri contract holders must look for payment. The Commissioner of Securities in Missouri required the Debtor corporation, as a condition to the right to do business in that State, to deposit in trust for the benefit of Missouri contract holders securities equal to the amount of outstanding liabilities in that State. Prior to the appointment of the State Court receivers and prior to the filing of the petition for reorganization, the Attorney-General for the State of Missouri, on the information of the Commissioner of Securities, instituted a proceeding in the Missouri State Court and obtained the appointment of a receiver.

When the Missouri contract holders purchased their contracts, they were led to believe (as shown by Exhibits 37, 38, 39, 40, 85, 86 and 87) that they need look no further than the Missouri deposit for their protection, in payment of their contracts. The question with them is, when are they going to get their money? None of them would have turned his money over to Fidelity if he had contemplated the slightest possibility of the deposit in his State becoming involved in protracted and expensive litigation in a Federal Court nearly one thousand miles distant.

The deposit in Missouri is not substantially in excess of its liabilities to residents of Missouri, if at all. The finding of the Circuit Court of Appeals that there was no substantial showing that surpluses existed in any State other than West Virginia (Tr., p. 261) is not challenged.

The Missouri contract holders are not concerned with the deposits in the State of Maryland or in Tennessee or in West Virginia, or in any other State which required deposits for the protection of contract holders in that State. They have no purpose to deprive any other State of any of the benefits of deposits made therein in accordance with applicable laws and regulations of the several Insurance and Securities Commissioners. The claim of the average contract holder is of a small amount. They can see nothing but injustice to the contract holders in any scheme or plan that has for its purpose the handling of all claims of all contract holders in the State of West Virginia, regardless of the State in which the contract holders reside.

STATE DEPOSITS CONSTITUTE PROPERTY HELD ADVERSELY TO BANKRUPT ESTATE.

While there are no decisions in Tennessee on the legal rights of contract holders arising from the deposit of securities by investment companies in that State, there is a plain analogy to deposit of securities by insurance companies. In Pennebaker v. Tomlinson (Cooper's), 1 Tenn., Chy., 111, it was held that the Tennessee law requiring a deposit of bonds by an insurance company doing business in the State was equivalent to a statutory mortgage for the benefit of all citizens of the State having risks. The Tennessee statute, in compliance with which Fidelity made the deposit, is so plain that it needs no construction.

In Davis v. Amra Grotto M. O. V. P. E. R., Inc., et al., 169 Tenn. 564, 89 S. W., (2d) 754, 106 A. L. R., 1506, petition to rehear denied 170 Tenn., 19, 91 S. W. (2d) 294, 106 A. L. R. 1506, in which funds belonging to an insolvent foreign insurance company, domesticated in Tennessee, were impounded by a general creditors bill in the State courts, the Supreme Court of Tennessee declared the public policy of the State of Tennessee as follows:

> "It has long been the public policy of this state, declared through the decisions of this court, to retain within the state all assets of foreign corporations found within the state, and upon the insolvency of such corporations, to treat these assets as a trust fund, and to distribute them ratably among creditors. This is a sovereign right possessed by the state, consistently exercised, and one which we will protect and enforce."

The above case does not involve a statutory deposit for the benefit of residents of the State of Tennessee. There can be no question but that by virtue of the statute requiring the deposit of foreign investment companies, as a condition to doing business in the State of Tennessee, the deposit of securities rendered them subject to process within the State.*

Since the Trustee in Bankruptcy is not a purchaser for value, but stands in the shoes of the Debtor, it can assert no right having precedence over the lien which the Tennessee contract holders acquired.

This Court, on January 5, 1942 (which by a rare coincidence was the same day on which the District Judge rendered his opinion in the case at bar) denied certiorari in the case of In Re Mt. Forest Fur Farms of America, Inc., (6 C. C. A.), 122 F. (2d) 232, 314 U. S., 701, 62 S. Ct., 480, 86 L. Ed., 561. The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in its opinion said:

> "Neither exclusive jurisdiction of the debtor nor power to issue process outside the district confers upon the bankruptcy court the power, in a summary proceeding, to decide, without the consent of an adverse claimant, a controversy concerning property in his possession, unless his claim be merely colorable. Were it otherwise, every bona fide possessor of property held adversely to a bankrupt could be haled into a distant Federal Court to defend his right to the property when-

*In E. & J. Northman, etc., v. Liverpool, London and Globe Insurance Company, 1 Tenn. Chy., (Cooper's) 312, the Court said:

"But if it be conceded that the demand is purely legal, the fact that the insurance companies are non-residents, and that there is a trust fund in the hands of their co-defendant, the state comptroller, deposited by the companies for the express benefit of such claimants as the complainant alleges he is, is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction."

Cf. United States v. Knott, 298 U. S., 544, 56 S. Ct., 902, 80 L. Ed., 1321, 104 A. L. R., 741.

ever the trustee in a reorganization proceeding should choose to corral him summarily."

The authorities on the question convince us that the adverse claims to the various State deposits may not be disposed of summarily as the District Court undertook to do. A summary determination of these substantial claims arising under State laws, the validity of which is in no way questioned in this proceedings, seems to us to run squarely contrary to the principles announced by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Warder v. Brady, 115 F. (2d), 89.

This view also has the support of Dannel v. Wilson-Weesner-Wilkinson Company, 109 F. (2d), 364, another decision by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. The question there was whether or not the retainage in the hands of the Commissioner of the Department of Highways of the State of Tennessee which was reserved by statute for the benefit of unsatisfied laborers and furnishers of materials on State highways, and which was in the custody of the State and was to remain until the debts of the contractor in the construction of highways were satisfied, constituted property of the bankrupt. There, as here, the right to administer the fund was in issue. There was no surplus belonging to the bankrupt. The Court said:

> "He retained the fund under authority of the statutes of Tennessee and the decree of the Chancery Court for such parties as would be found entitled to it, among which were parties claiming adversely to the trustee. We have held that where a fund is in the possession of a legal custodian for claimants who are asserting rights adverse to those of the trustee in bankruptcy, and they, in accordance with law, invoke the aid of a proper State Court to perfect and enforce their lien, that they are adverse claimants. In re Farrell, 6 Cir., 201 F. 338; In re Rohrer, 6 Cir., 177 F. 381."

Neither the Investment Company Act nor any other Federal statute confers any power upon a Federal Court sitting in bankruptcy to avoid the deposits of the Debtor made in the various States because: (a) whereas the amendment to the Bankruptcy Act (Sec. 67 (f)) does confer power to require State deposits to be turned over to the trustee, this power is limited to deposits for the benefit of the holders of securities sold on or after January 1, 1941; and, (b) no power was conferred upon the Trustee to use the turned-over deposits for any purpose except liquidation and distribution of the net proceeds thereof to creditors entitled thereto under the provisions of the law or agreement providing for the deposit. (Sec. 67 (f) (3))

There has been no suggestion of any invalidity of any of the State statutes regulating the investment companies in pursuance to which the deposits with State officials were made. It is merely contended that all of these precautions which the States took for the protection of the investors in these companies against the day when there might be some failure on the part of the companies to meet their obligations, now that that day has arrived, must be held for naught.

Surely no court of equity would countenance for a minute such an attempt to undo the valid and salutary safeguards thrown up by the States to protect their citizens against the disaster which has come, except on grounds of a clear violation of some express prohibition in the Federal Constitution against State legislation of such character, Seven years have elapsed since Securities & Exchange Commission commenced its study of these companies, and no suggestion that the States did not have the power to require this protection for their citizens has yet been made, by anyone, so far as we know.

INVALID STAY OF TENNESSEE PROCEEDINGS.

But for the injunction or stay in the order of August 9, 1941, the Tennessee State Court could have proceeded with distribution of the deposit in Tennessee after November 1, 1941, the time fixed for filing claims. These respondents, on September 15, 1941, filed in the District Court a motion to modify this order so as to permit the State Court to proceed with the distribution. (Tr., pp. 128-130) The District Judge reserved decision on this motion until his decision on the issues raised on the good faith hearing. His order sustaining jurisdiction overruled all the motions for dissolution of the injunction "freezing" the deposits in the hands of the State depositaries. (Tr., p. 202)

Respondents prayed a broad appeal and in their brief before the Circuit Court of Appeals assigned error on the action of the lower Court in overruling their motion for modification of the injunction. Inasmuch as the Circuit Court of Appeals held that jurisdiction in the lower Court was entirely lacking, there was no express ruling on this motion. The order of the Circuit Court of Appeals staying mandate pending the application to this Court for certiorari modified the District Court's order of August 9, 1941 in several respects. For one thing, it authorized the sale of securities by the State Courts. It authorized the State Courts to proceed with the necessary administrative work looking towards the future distribution of the funds with the exception that no actual distribution should be made. (Tr., pp. 268-270)

The Tennessee respondents respectfully insist that the stay order proceedings in Tennessee looking to distribution of the State deposit was invalid and beyond the power of the Bankruptcy Court in this case.

There is an utter failure of the proof to show any reasonable likelihood of effecting a plan of reorganization which will either (a) require the use of the Tennessee deposit, or (b) by which Tennessee contract holders could be lawfully deprived of their option of obtaining cash out of the Tennessee deposit to the extent of the full amount of their respective claims.

The writ of injunction, when exercised to stay the rights of secured creditors during the pendency of reorganization proceedings, cannot be exercised beyond the dictates of necessity. Continental-Illinois National Bank & Trust Co., v. Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Co., 294 U.S., 648, 55 S. Ct., 595, 79 L. Ed., 1110; In Re Nine North Church Street, Inc., 82 F. (2d), 186; First National Bank of Wellston v. Conway Road Estates Company, 94 F. As regards the deposit in Tennessee (and as for that matter all of the other State deposits) possession was not in the bankrupt at the time of the filing of the petition and the Bankruptcy Court has never acquired either actual or constructive possession of the deposits. In Tennessee, at least, the sustaining of the bill in the Chancery Court of Davidson County impounding the State deposit prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy gave that Court prior and constructive jurisdiction of the res, the deposit, and, therefore, the exclusive power to settle the controversies concerning it without being subjected to a stay of such proceedings by the Bankruptcy Court. Dannel v. Wilson-Weesner-Wilkinson Company, 109 F. (2d) 364, (6th C.C.A.); Hoehn v. McIntosh, 110 F. (2d), 199, (6th C.C.A.).

The nation-wide jurisdiction conferred upon bankruptcy courts by Section 77-B and in proceedings under Chapter X of the Chandler Act is merely over the property in possession, actual or constructive, of the Debtor or the Bankrupt Court. This summary jurisdiction is essentially in rem, and while it enables the Court to issue its process for service outside of its district, in a summary proceeding relating to the rem, it does not extend to the persons of non-residents who claim the property adversely. Warder v. Brady, 115 F. (2d) 89, (4th C.C.A.); In Re Standard Gas & Electric Co., 119 F. (2d) 658 (C.C.A., 3rd); Kelso v. MacLaren, 122 F. (2d) 867, (8th C.C.A.); In Re Mt. Forest Fur Farms of America, Inc., 122 F. (2d) 232 (6th C.C.A.) (Certiorari denied, 314 U. S., 701, 62 S. Ct., 480, 86 L. Ed., 561.)

We respectfully submit that the authorities afford no basis for any power in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Virginia to dispose of the claims of all of the contract holders to the various State deposits summarily as the Court said that it had done and would do if necessary.

A PETITION MAY NOT BE FILED UNDER CHAPTER X AND SUSTAINED FOR PURPOSE OF LIQUIDATION.

Since petitioners and Securities & Exchange Commission makes the question of jurisdiction turn chiefly on the prospect of a "slow and orderly liquidation," it is necessary to discuss whether or not a plan of liquidation may be a plan of reorganization which will confer jurisdiction upon the Bankruptcy Court. This discussion may be begun by the observation that if Congress had intended to include "liquidation" there was no reason why that word could not have been used in Chapter X, along with "reorganization." The two terms as commonly understood are contradictory. And yet, invariably the word "reorganization" is used.

The Court is not authorized to retain jurisdiction unless there is a finding that the petition is filed in good faith, meaning, among other things, that it is not unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected. If not so satisfied, it is the duty of the Court to dismiss the petition. (Section 144)

If "reorganization" includes "liquidation," why the requirement of a showing that it was not unreasonable to expect that a plan could be effected? A plan of liquidation can always be effected. That is the last resort. If the imperative requirements of Sec. 146 of Chapter X, the heading of which is CORPORATE REORGANIZATION, are to have a natural and reasonable interpretation, liquidation must be excluded. In Sec. 130(6) Congress differentiated between a reorganization and a liquidation.

It is only after a petition has been sustained as having been filed in good faith and it develops that a plan of reorganization cannot be put into effect, that the power is conferred upon the Court to decide between adjudging the Debtor a bankrupt and directing that bankruptcy be proceeded with or dismissing the proceedings altogether. (Section 236 (2)) This may not be done without a hearing expressly for that purpose and after notice thereof to creditors.

The provisions of the Act are not susceptible of the construction that an affirmative finding of a reasonable likelihood of reorganization may be dispensed with by a finding that some kind of liquidation in the Bankruptcy Court would be better than a liquidation in State courts, or otherwise. The Act permits no escape from the issue which is raised at the very threshold of the litigation—is there a reasonable likelihood of reorganization.

The creditors of Fiderity had no notice of any hearing on the question of whether it should be adjudged a bankrupt in the Southern District of West Virginia and an order entered in that Court directing that bankruptcy be proceeded with there. They had notice, actual or constructive, that the Company had filed a petition for reorganization and that there would be a hearing on that question. Section 146 (4) does not extend the scope of the normal hearing on the issue of good faith. Creditors had the right to assume that if this requirement of good faith involving necessarily a reasonable likelihood of effecting a plan of reorganization, could not be met, the mandatory provision of Section 144 that the petition be dismissed would be complied with by the Court.

In the ordinary case, there would be no occasion for the Court looking ahead of the considerations normally to be weighed in determining whether there is a reasonable chance of reorganization. The proponents of reorganization are bent on showing how the rehabilitation of the company can be effected. Those who feel that it is not to their interest that the company be revived and its business continued adduce facts and arguments to show why reorganization cannot be brought about. If the petition for reorganization is dismissed, the company can ordinarily immediately file in the same court a petition to be adjudicated a bankrupt. So, at that stage of the proceeding, there is no necessity for any concern about what will happen to the company if the petition for reorganization is not sustained.

The difference between the ordinary case and this is that unless the petition which has been filed can be sustained as a petition for reorganization under Chapter X, territorial jurisdiction in the District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia is lacking.

Section 128 permits the filing of a petition for reorganization under Chapter X with the Court in whose territorial jurisdiction the corporation has had its principal place of business or its principal assets for the preceding six months or for a longer period of the preceding six months than in any other jurisdiction.

A petition for an adjudication (in what is commonly called ordinary bankruptcy proceedings) may be filed only where the corporation has had its principal place of business. Section 2, Bankruptcy Act. There is no territorial jurisdiction in the Court merely because the principal assets of the company have been in that jurisdiction for six months.

The principal place of business of the Debtor corporation has always been at Wheeling, West Virginia, in the Northern District of West Virginia. The petition was filed however, at Charleston in the Southern District on the theory that the deposit with the State of West Virginia constituted the principal assets of the Company.*

If Fidelity is not an insurance corporation and is subject to the Bankruptcy Act, a voluntary or involuntary petition can be filed at Wheeling where its office and all of its records are located. It can be liquidated in bankruptcy without indulging in the sophistry of calling a liquidation a reorganization.

Lord Macauley somewhere says that if the admission of the attraction of gravitation were inimical to any considerable pecuniary interest, there would not be wanting arguments against gravitation. Twenty million dollars is enough money to stir men's imagination.

Away with the vauntings of the disinterestedness of the Trustee in Bankruptcy in this case! Let us make it plain. If this Court affirms the decision of the Court of Appeals dismissing this petition for lack of good faith, it means that the present Trustee loses its chance to derive fees from the distribution of the assets of this company. Even if the company is held not to be an insurance company and should be adjudged a bankrupt, the adjudication would be in the Northern District of West Virginia and a Trustee in that District would be appointed. The present Trustee is a corporation organized for profit—not an eleemosynary institution. How can it claim to be disinterested on the issue of good faith?

*It seems to us that this premise is unsound. The deposit in West Virginia constituted a statutory trust fund. Inasmuch as the fund was less than the liabilities secured and the Debtor in this and in no other kind of proceeding, either in the Federal or in the State Court, can take any part of that fund away from the contract holders for whose benefit it is held, without their consent, it does not constitute "assets" of the Debtor.

"PROBLEMS OF DISTRIBUTION."

(i) Whether State Deposits Are Solely for Benefit of Local Residents.

Securities & Exchange Commission in its brief says that under the laws of the State of Tennessee it is not clear whether the deposit is solely for the benefit of local residents or for the benefit of all contract holders. It has gotten up an appendix purporting to set out State laws. Through inadvertence one whole paragraph from thte Tennessee statute was not copied in this appendix. The whole statute was printed in our brief filed in the Court of Appeals and was also printed as Appendix "A" to our reply to the petition for certiorari in this Court.

We submit that there is no ambiguity in this statute. It clearly provides that the amount of the deposit is to be at no time less than one hundred per cent of the Company's cash or current contract liability on all outstanding investment contracts "sold in the State of Tennessee." It provides that the Commissioner of Insurance and Banking of the State shall hold as Custodian the securities deposited "for the benefit of the holders of the investment contracts coming within the provisions of this Section. The omitted paragraph contains the following provision:

> "Upon discharge in full of all liabilities on all investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee, and for which such deposit is maintained, the issuer shall be entitled to a release and return of the securities so deposited."

Plainly, this deposit is for the benefit of the holders of all investment contracts sold in the State of Tennessee.

We are constrained to feel that Securities & Exchange Commission has been needlessly perturbed. It overlooks the fact that the deposit in West Virginia was for the benefit of all contract holders wherever situated. The amount of the deposit required in West Virginia was the full amount of the liabilities of the corporation under its contracts, less such additional deposits as it was required to make with respect to contracts sold in other States to the extent that the law of such other States required deposits to be made for the benefit of local contract holders. A reading of the proviso obtained in Section 3 of Article 2, Chapter 33, Michie's 1937 West Virginia Code, on page 71 of the brief of petitioners, Fidelity Assurance Association and Central Trust Company, would clarify this point.

Securities & Exchange Commission, in the appendices to its brief, has seen fit to insert a lot of extraneous matter, contracts, etc., with other State officials that are not in evidence in this case. We, therefore, cannot admit the accuracy or completeness of this extraneous matter.

We do not believe that there is the slightest ground for apprehension that contract holders in other States will claim the benefit of local deposits. All parties, except the Securities & Exchange Commission, understand that non-residents of a State having a local deposit are not beneficiaries of that deposit unless they can claim through some express statutory provision (such as the one in Tennessee securing all contracts sold in the State of Tennessee). The exceptional cases where contract holders have changed their residence after the creation of deposit, and such like, fall under the head of de minimis non curat lex. See discussion under next head.

"PROBLEMS OF DISTRIBUTION."

(ii) Time for Determination of Residence of Contract Holders Entitled to Benefit of Deposits.

It must be admitted that as Securities & Exchange Commission has delineated this question, it takes on an appearance of complexity. Securities & Exchange Commission cites pages 757 to 758 of the transcript. If it had not stopped there but had gone on to page 759, it would have found that Mr. F. J. McNulty, the Secretary of the Company, testified that this was no problem. We quote his testimony as follows:

> "Q. Would there be many states in which there was a considerable number of contract holders who did not buy their contracts or originally in this state but who now own the contracts and reside in those states?
>
> A. Well, if you take, say, two specific states, I would say no, but if you are talking about moving out of one state there might be fifteen or twenty more throughout the United States, but as to a change from one particular state to another particular state, I don't think the change would amount to very much.
>
> Q. Then if all that was required under the law in some of those states was that the company only deposit securities that were in funds that were sold in those states, and the debtor decided to withdraw the securities over and above those that were sold only in those states, would there be much withdrawal or would it be a very small figure?
>
> A. Well, I couldn't answer that. I would have to check that. (Tr., p. 759)

Q. You wouldn't be able to answer it?

A. It wouldn't be a substantial figure, but it would have to be checked."

"PROBLEMS OF DISTRIBUTION."

(iii) Measure of Claims.

The proposition, as we understand it, is that the Federal Court in Bankruptcy at Charleston, West Virginia, must take over the deposits in West Virginia and fourteen other States in order to bring some superior competency to bear on the question of the basis for the determination of the claims of the contract holders entitled to the benefit of the several deposits. Manifestly, if the State deposits are not to be abrogated, the Bankruptcy Court will be bound by the laws of the several States. Certainly there is no Federal rule which can be applied. The Tennessee contract holders will be thoroughly satisfied to let the Tennessee Court determine that question if any is raised. So will the Missouri contract holders. So, we believe, will be the contract holders in all of the other States.

It is admitted that there is no possibility of a surplus in the Tennessee deposit regardless of which of the possible rules may be applied in Tennessee. The entire deposit will be consumed in paying the claims of Tennessee contract holders. What interest do contract holders in other States, then, have in the basis for distribution which is adopted in Tennessee? The West Virginia Court distributing the West Virginit deposit can make its own decision as to the basis for deficiency claims in accordance with the laws of that State. Even though the rule in West Virginia be different from the rule in Tennessee, or one of the other States, we fail to see how it will be more beneficial to contract holders to have the question decided by the Federal Court in Bankruptcy at Charleston than by the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, at Charleston.

We are wondering why it appears strange to Securities & Exchange Commission that there is little inclination among the State officials to litigate these so-called conflicting rights inter sese.

STATES CAN LIQUIDATE DEPOSITS AS WELL AS BANKRUPTCY COURT.

The argument that liquidation in the Southern District of West Virginia at Charleston will result in a more orderly marketing of the securities held in the State deposits does possess a certain plausibility. Here again, however, an examination of the record discloses the speciousness of the argument.

There is not an iota of proof in the record to support the statement that Fidelity's assets are such that there is a serious peril to a maximum realization upon them if each State depositary separately proceeds to immediate liquidation. The record (pp. 799-800) is cited in support of the statement that the situation is plainly one which requires well-timed and skilful liquidation. It is true that the District Court found this, but his finding was not based on any evidence. The evidence cited in support of the statement is the testimony of Mr. Hubert F. Young, a witness for the Debtor and the Trustee, who handled Fidelity's investments.

Mr. Young testified that it would take "quite a while" to liquidate and said that it might drive the market down to the bottom when liquidation started. He expressed more concern, however, about the expense of litigation and the uncertainty as to what the state of the market would be after years of liquidation.*

This wasteful litigation and postponement of the realization of the present market values of the securities is exactly the thing that the contract holders are so disturbed about and is what these respondents are protesting. (Tr., pp. 799-800.)

The Securities & Exchange Commission makes use of the Trustee's report filed under Section 167 of the Bankrupt Act. It deduces from this report that Fidelity's securities are not readily marketable. (Brief, p. 44.) This conclusion is derived from some kind of system of rating of securities. In candor, these respondents must say that their attorneys are not thoroughly familiar with the basis which was used for this report of the Trustee. The conclusion that a large part of the securities in Fidelity's portfolio are not readily marketable may not be drawn from the fact that they all have been classified by the Trustee as high-grade securities.

*Almost significant portion of his testimony is:

"Q. If you will assume with us that there are some twenty million dollars of assets in this company, or better than that, which could be be distributed among contract holders on the basis of their cash surrender values at the present time—cash liabilities at the present time—of about twenty-three million dollars, they could get that amount out of liquidation if you just sold them out and distributed the money, couldn't they?

A. I doubt it, after years of liquidation expense and the expense of litigation I don't think they would get anything like twenty million dollars."

(Tr., p. 799)

The time for filing this report was extended by the Judge until the conclusion of the testimony. The Judge also ruled that those at odds with the Debtor and the Trustee could not cross-examine on the report. That portion of the record where this ruling was made (Tr., pp. 3008-3012) was not included in the designation of the portions of the typewritten record to be printed for the transcript. We are printing this in the Appendix to our brief.

The Report of Securities & Exchange Commission on Companies Issuing Face-Amount Installment Certificates, transmitted to Congress on March 13, 1940, states: "The Association has followed a settled policy of investing its funds almost entirely in marketable securities, about ninety per cent of which have consisted of bonds and notes." (Page 96 of Report.)

The Central Trust Company, Trustee in Bankruptcy for Fidelity, under date of July 3, 1941, sent out a circular letter to all contract holders stating that the property of the Debtor was "almost entirely in the form of liquid assets, composed of stocks, bonds, and other forms of securities."

The Haskins & Sells audit reports, filed as Exhibits 13 and 14, show the diversification of the investments and the amount of defaulted securities. We do not believe that the amount of bonds in default is abnormal for a port folio such as Fidelity had. For example, many railroad bonds, at the time these audit reports were prepared were in default, are readily marketable and indeed may be termed highly liquid.

Mr. Hubert F. Young further testified as to the character of the investments:

"Q. And has there been any appreciable change in the assets of Fidelity from 1939 to the present time?

A. I would say not an appreciable gain on a percentage basis, no.

Q. As a matter of fact, there has been considerable appreciation in the past two months, hasn't there, in the value of the securities in the port folio?

A. Yes, in certain categories, for instance, railroad bonds.

Q. What do you think about the possibility or probability of appreciation in the value of securities during the next two or three years ahead of us?

A. I think we have an excellent change of appreciation on the type of port folio we have, which consists largely of, you might say semi-speculative bonds and not a great many of the higher grade bonds, which can, I think, go down quite a bit."

This testimony was given in September, 1941. Subsequent events have borne out Mr. Young's prediction. This Court may take judicial knowledge of the fact that prices of the semi-speculative bonds are at a very high level as compared with the averages in past years. There probably has never been a better time than the present to liquidate securities of the type held in the State deposits. No one knows what the future will bring forth. It will take time—too much time—for the several States to complete liquidation. There need be no dread of frenzied dumping of the securities on the market.

The Securities & Exchange Commission was not warranted in stating that the market for these securities is so thin that when they are sold by the States the price will be greatly depressed. The investments are widely diversified. The investment market has recently indicated a practically unlimited capacity to absorb offerings of Government bonds. We have witnessed an almost phenomenal absorption of more than nine billion dollars in a single offering of Government securities. Surely Fidelity's little portfolio of twenty million dollars would not bring about any very marked depressing effect upon the bond market, even if all of the bonds were offered at one time for sale as a whole.

It would seem to us that offerings at different times and in the different sections of the country in which the State deposits are held will be more likely to result in an orderly marketing of the securities than any kind of liquidation that could be attained if the selling is all centered in the hands of one Trustee. Contract holders are afraid that if the latter occurs the liquidation will be stretched out over such a long period of time that no benefit will flow from it in the lifetime of most of them.

POSTPONEMENT OF LIQUIDATION FOR FURTHER INVESTIGATION OF FIDELITY'S AFFAIRS WILL BE PREJUDICIAL TO CONTRACT HOLDERS.

It is the conviction of the contract holders for whom we speak that the day for probing into Fidelity's affairs has passed. They have in mind an old adage to the effect that there is no use barring the door after the horse has gone.

We are reminded, however, that during the last half decade and longer there has been no hindrance upon investigations and explorations of Fidelity. During that period its books have been open to Securities & Exchange Commission.

Part One of the Report of Securities & Exchange Commission on Investment Trusts and Investment Companies informs us that the investigation of the face-amount certificate companies was commenced on June 30, 1936, when questionnaires were sent out to the companies. It could hardly be said that this questionnaire was limited in its scope. (See Statement in Part One of Report on the Nature, Classification and Origin of Investment Trusts and Investment Companies, p. 8.)

The Commission's Report on Companies Issuing Face-Amount Installment Certificates states that the first public examination into Fidelity's affairs was had on January 28, 1938. In the last month of the year 1938, Securities & Exchange Commission filed its bill in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan. The particulars of the proceedings against Fidelity, set out in Appendix X to the Report on Companies Issuing Face-Amount Installment Certificates (pp. 197 to 258), indicate that Securities & Exchange Commission was not wholly unfamiliar with the various things that Fidelity had been doing and which constituted the basis for the charge of wrongdoing and fraud. Chapter 3 of that Report, which embraces pages 75 to 120, inclusive, and the other details in Chapter 5 and the appendices relating to Fidelity, set out a considerable amount of detailed information concerning Fidelity.

Not all of the information which Securities & Exchange Commission compiled was set out in its printed report either. A lot more was contained in Fidelity's reply to the Commission's questionnaire. This consisted of several large volumes. These were produced at Charleston during the course of the hearing pursuant to an order made by Court at respondents' request. As we recall, they were about knee-high.

Immediately following the Detroit injunction, there came the suit in the Federal Court in the Northern District of West Virginia to have a Receiver appointed for the Company. During the receivership proceedings two Commission accountants were constantly around and stayed there until the receivership matter had been determined. (Tes. of Thos. B. Folk, Tr., pp. 939-940.) The Commission has had a perfect legal right to carry on its investigations without interruption since it first commenced nearly seven years ago. More than a year and a half has already passed since Fidelity's books and records came into the hands of the Trustee in Bankruptcy.

The record shows that no single major step has been taken since that time without at least tacit approval of the Commission. The Commission has been consulted on all of the things done to rehabilitate Fidelity, including its conversion into an insurance company. The testimony of Mr. John Marshall, Mr. Fred Risley, Mr. Thomas Foulk, Mr. Raymond Latta and Mr. Arthur B. Koontz makes that perfectly plain. The officers of Fidelity were in practically constant communication and consultation with them.

The insinuation of some sinister motives in connection with the proceedings in the Kanawha Circuit Court and the connection of Mr. Koontz' firm therewith have been put to the forefront as point No. One. It deserves no place in this lawsuit. In this respect we have the assurance that we speak the views of all parties in interest who are opposing this reorganization proceeding: it is a matter of absolute indifference to these parties whether Koontz & Koontz or Townsend & Townsend are to be the attorneys for the liquidators of Fidelity.

It may be said in Mr. Koontz' favor that the record shows with perfect clearness that the appointment of Mr. Ross Thomas, an associate of his firm, as co-Receiver of Fidelity, was not obtained through obreption but was with the full approval of all interested parties who now are disposed to criticize it. We are afraid that the greatest offense which he committed was, in the eyes of Securities & Exchange Commission, advising State instead of Federal proceedings. The decision that the Company's affiairs should be placed in a receivership in the State Court, however, was openly arrived at and was attended with the greatest deliberation, with full opportunity to all interested parties to express their views. It occurred in a Court located at the place where Mr. Koontz and Mr. Thomas lived and which was the proper and natural forum therefor.

It seems to us that the leaving of the important, nay crucial, question of the rights of contract holders in the State deposits undetermined and magnifying instead trivial and unimportant considerations, such as this one, is "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel." The inquiry (assuming, as is shown by the record, at times the character of an inquisition) into the relationship of the firm of Koontz & Koontz and Mr. Ross B. Thomas to the Debtor and its affairs, which the defendants steadfastly insisted was extraneous and irrelevant to the issue of good faith in this case, apparently in the mind of the Court was a point of major importance.

During the hearings before the District Judge in this case, altogether several hundred pages of testimony were taken, over the objection of respondents that it was irrelevant, about nothing except the amount of fees which Koontz & Koontz had been paid by Fidelity over a ten-year period. Respondents feel compelled to state that the District Judge, sitting in a Court two hundred miles away from the home office of the Company where all the company's records were located, and in a Federal District outside the District in which the receivership suit had been brought in 1939, manifested an inclination to allow the attorneys for the Trustee whom he had appointed an opportunity to conduct an "exploration" that was very far afield. This matter was the subject of an exchange of letters between the District Judge and the Judge in the State Court. (Original Transcript of Record, pp. 131-133.)

We feel that it was very unfortunate that the rights of contract holders in Tennessee and in the other States where deposits are being held should have depended in the slightest degree upon such a collateral inquiry. The jurisdiction of a court in bankruptcy to entertain this proceeding for reorganization of Fidelity most certainly should not turn upon weighing the ethical standards of Koontz & Koontz as against those of Townsend & Townsend.

There is an ancient maxim "Executio juris non habet injuriam," meaning "the law will not in its executive capacity work a wrong." A lack of integrity or competence to make decisions or to execute powers is never assumed in regard to Courts in this land. On the other hand, it is a fundamental assumption that Courts are sound and just.

A Federal Court would, therefore, not be warranted in assuming that a State Court would in its executive capacity work a wrong. If we assume, for the sake of argument, that the record in this case warrants the conclusion that it would not be to the best interest of creditors of Fidelity Assurance Association, for Mr. Ross Thomas to continue as a Receiver in the State Court, this works no disqualification of the State Court itself to serve the interest of creditors and in such proceedings to be guided solely by the dictates of justice.

The personal integrity of Mr. Ross Thomas is unquestioned. If there is any unsuitability on his part to be a Receiver in the State Court, there is no ground for this Court making any supposition that a proper and suitable correction will not be made by the State Court whenever its attention is challenged to the need therefor.

Judge Bouchelle, in his letter to Judge Moore, stated that he would not hesitate to perform his duty.

Securities & Exchange Commission, at page 33 of its brief, made reference to an indictment against Mr. Arthur Koontz. We have since been advised that the Office of the Solicitor-General admits that this was injected in the brief though a mistake. But still it is in there. We cannot refrain from expressing the opinion that Securities & Exchange Commission when it inserted this matter not only struck below the belt but went outside the record.

Something must be said about this attempt to weight the balances on the side of the Bankruptcy Court with scandal. The indictment referred to was obtained by Securities & Exchange Commission in Detroit, in December, 1941, (just before the statute of limitations would have run against acts committed prior to the filing of the injunction suit in Detroit) after the hearings in this case had been finished. Before the District Judge rendered his decision in this case these respondents made a motion to have it made part of the record for the purpose of showing that Fidelity Assurance Association, the Debtor, was under indictment. We thought that this was relevant on the question of whether or not there was enough vestige of good will left to justify any expectation that contract holders would consent to send good money after bad. The District Judge overruled our motion and excluded the indictment.

The chief basis for the indictment seems to be a lot of the matter set forth in the report on Fidelity in the Report on Companies Issuing Face-Amount Installment Certificates. We believe that all the material facts were either printed in this report or known to Securities & Exchange Commission when it filed the complaint and obtained the injunction in Detroit, in December, 1938.

We are reluctant to set ourselves up as critics of other men's conduct. It does seem to us, however, that before urging this matter as a ground of disqualification of the West Virginia State Courts to serve the best interest of contract holders, Securities & Exchange Commission should give a thought to consistency. The Detroit injunction which Securities & Exchange Commission obtained on December 22, 1938, was granted by reason of misconduct. It enjoined not only Fidelity, but its officers, directors, agents, representatives and employees, from engaging in and continuing such practices which were alleged to be fraudulent. All of these persons were ineligible to serve or act in the capacity of officer or director, by virtue of the provisions of Section 9 (a of the Investment Company Act of 1940. According to the testimony adduced in this case by the Commission, Fidelity became a registered investment company under the Act, by giving notice prior to January 1, 1941, of its intention to register.

Securities & Exchange Commission has made no objection to any of them continuing to act. Its representatives did not join the respondents in protesting the ruling of District Judge granting express permission to all of these ineligible persons, to have another meeting while the hearings were in progress, for the purpose of ratifying the previous action of the directors authorizing the filing of the petition in this case. Mr. Koontz was not one of these persons.

It would seem that if the Kanawha Circuit Court of West Virginia could not serve the best interest of the contract holders of Fidelity because Mr. Koontz' firm had been appointed attorneys for the Receivers and one of his associates, Mr. Thomas, was a co-Receiver, neither was it proper for Fidelity to employ them before the receivership suit. Nor were Mr. Koontz and Mr. Thomas by themselves. On the same ground, the directors and officers—Mr. John Marshall, Mr. Fred Small Risley, Mr. A. L. King, Mr. Carroll D. Evans and Mr. Howard E. Reed—named in the indictment ought to have been disassociated from the company.

Securities & Exchange Commission, as is shown by this record, worked very closely with all these men after the Detroit injunction. If it were wrong for Mr. Koontz and Mr. Thomas to have anything to do with the Company's affairs after the receivership, it was wrong for them and the officers and directors mentioned above to be connected with the company after December, 1938, and especially was it improper (unless Fidelity was an insurance company) for them to continue their connection after January 1, 1941, when the Investment Company Act became operative.

We think that Mr. Koontz and Mr. Thomas are honorable men. For that matter, we think that all of the gentlemen who testified at the hearing of this case are honorable men. As the Securities & Exchange Commission admits (Brief, p. 40), except for a brief period in 1937, Fidelity has been insolvent continuously since 1933. They were all fighting to save the contract holders from loss. There was a constant hope that some tide would lift Fidelity off the rocks.

One cannot read this record without being impressed with the fact that Mr. Koontz was the man on whom they all leaned in the darker hours. Even Mr. John Marshall, Sr., who, by the way, was Chairman of the Board of Directors and whose firm was general counsel for the company (Tr., p. 410), not only held Mr. Koontz in high esteem but depended on his support and guidance. (Original Tr., pp. 1140-1143)

When Fidelity could not comply with the Investment Company Act and it became apparent that some step of a rather drastic nature must be taken to avert disaster, it was Mr. Koontz who for several years past had been trying to raise new money for the company, that outlined before the Securities & Exchange Commission the plan of voluntary reorganization in the State Court which seemed then to all concerned to be the most feasible. We can see that Mr. Koontz had no choice but to stick by his friends. The fact that his firm was attorney for the Receiver was then no doubt regarded by Mr. Marshall, Mr. Messick and all of the other gentlemen as an asset and as furnishing the most likely presage of success.

There is nothing to indicate that Mr. Koontz and Mr. Thomas were actuated by any motive other than the welfare of the contract holders whose savings were tied up in this embarrassed company. Must we presume that they were concerned about stifling any investigations or concealing any liability after Securities & Exchange Commission had made a most thorough and searching investigation into the affairs of the Company and had printed its findings and made a report to Congress and to the public? Securities & Exchange Commission, in the year 1943, more than six years after its investigation of this company's affairs was commenced, now says that the case ought to be in bankruptcy because there might be liability on the part of Mr. Koontz if there is substance to its charges.

Section 167 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act imposes the duty on the Trustee to report any facts ascertained by it pertaining to fraud, misconduct, mismanagement and irregularities and any causes of action available to the State. The Trustee in this case, which will not be charged with any misprision, so far as Mr. Koontz is concerned, has made no report against him.

We are advised that the Trustee, on April 13, 1942, filed Part Two of its report due to be made under Section 167 of the Bankrupicy Act. The Trustee stated in this report in substance that it was making a detailed study of the alleged irregular practices of former management rendering participants therein liable in damages but was unable to make detailed report concerning same. No further report has been made since that date.

In short the Trustee, after a year and a half, aided by all of the data which Securities & Exchange Commission had accumulated during the previous five years, is unable to make up its mind whether or not it has a lawsuit. The fact that jurisdiction was unsettled was no hindrance to the performance of its duty in this respect. Let us suppose that it should finally decide that it has a probable cause of action. How many years will the case be in the courts before it is determined?

But if there need be further investigation it doesn't depend on a decision in this case that the good faith requirement of Chapter X may be satisfied by a showing that the insolvent debtor can be liquidated in the Bankruptcy Court.

If liquidation occurs in the State Court proceedings, would there be interference with an investigation by Securities & Exchange Commission? If a cause of action exists, couldn't it be as effectually prosecuted in a straight bankruptcy proceeding at Wheeling, in the Northern District of West Virginia, where the office of the company and its records are located?

INAPPLICABILITY OF DOCTRINE OF MARSHALING —FIFTH AMENDMENT.

Apparently what the Securities & Exchange Commission has in mind when it speaks of marshaling the assets of Fidelity is an attempt to redistribute all the assets on the basis of separate reserve funds for the various series of contracts outstanding (Brief, p. 38) It is insisted that a prerequisite to the accomplishment of this Herculean task is bringing all of the assets into one forum.

It will have to be conceded that, if this were otherwise possible (and the evidence clearly shows that Fidelity did not keep separate records on the several funds until the latter years of its existence and the expert employed by it, Mr. Latta, after working eight months concluded that it couldn't be done—Tr., p. 1072), it would only be accomplished through an abridgement of the rights of contract holders having the security of the State deposits.

The argument is based upon a misapprehension of the doctrine of marshalling. The doctrine may not be invoked so as to impair the remedy of the holder of a prior lien or deprive a litigant of a contract right, nor even to put his claim in jeopardy nor to subject him to unreasonable delay in the enforcement of his claim.

In Merrill v. National Bank of Jacksonville, 173 U. S., 131, 19 S. Ct. Rep., 360, 43 L. Ed. 640, this Court approved a rule of the Chancery Court to the effect that:

> " . . . as the trust created by the transfer of the assets by operation of law or otherwise is a trust for all creditors, no creditor can equitably be compelled to surrender any other vested right he has in the assets of his debtor in order to obtain his vested right under the trust. It is true that, in equity, a creditor having a lien upon two funds may be required to exhause one of them in aid of creditors who can only resort to the other, but this will not be done when it trenches on the rights or operates to the prejudice of the party entitled to the double fund. Story, Eq. Jur. (13th ed.) Sec. 633; Re Bates, 118 Ill. 524 (59 Am. Rep. 383). And it is well established that in marshalling assets, as respects creditors, no part of his security can be taken from a secured creditor until he is completely satisfied. Leading Cases in Equity, White & Tudor, vol. 2, pt. 1, 4th Am. Ed., pp. 258, 322."

In Sowell v. Federal Reserve Bank, 268 U. S., 449, 45 S. Ct. Rep., 528, 69 L. Ed., 1041, Mr. Justice Stone delivered the opinion of the Court, saying:

> "The equitable doctrine of marshaling rests upon the principle that a creditor having two funds to satisfy his debt may not, by his application of them to his demand, defeat another creditor, who may resort to only one of the funds. The debtor may not ordinarily invoke the doctrine, for by doing so he would disregard the express provisions for his contract on which the creditor is entitled to rely. The plaintiff in error is bound to pay his obligation, according to its tenor. He cannot deny his own contract merely because his creditor has acquired other rights with which he may satisfy his debt. . . ."

The creditors in the case at bar having the security of the State deposits do not have two funds from which to obtain satisfaction of their debts. In the two or three States which have apparently one hundred per cent security, they have only one fund. In all of the other States, as in Tennessee and Missouri, that one fund is not sufficient. Neither the insolvent debtor, Fidelity Assurance Association, nor the Trustee in Bankruptcy, standing in its shoes, has any right to invoke the doctrine. Neither does any creditor have that right. None of them have any right to take away or abridge to the slightest extent the security which the Company put up in those States requiring deposits as a condition to the grant of a license to do business.

A fortiori jurisdiction does not exist in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia for the purpose of bringing all of the securities in the State deposits into that Court to enable an exploration or investigation to be made, with a view of some kind of re-shuffling of the deposits.

---

The Bankruptcy Act is subject to the Fifth Amendment. An Act of Congress which is retroactive in terms and purports to take away the rights of a mortagee in specific property is violative of the Fifth Amendment. Louisville Joint Stock Land Bank v. Radford, 295 U. S., 555, 55 S.Ct., 854, 79 L. Ed., 1593, 97 A.L.R., 1106.

Although a Bankruptcy Court, once jurisdiction has been acquired, may direct the marshaling of all liens upon property forming a part of the bankrupt's estate, power to disregard the property rights created by State law is lacking. Wright v. Union Central Life Insurance Company, 304 U. S., 502, 58 S. Ct., 1025, 82 L. Ed., 1490.

After the States, in valid exercise of the police power, had enacted legislation requiring companies doing this kind of business to maintain deposits for the protection of its citizens, there was no power in the Federal Congress to abridge the vested property rights of contract holders in the deposits. As we have pointed out, Investment Company Act is prospective. Congress purposely refrained from enacting any legislation affecting the deposits made up to the effective date of the Act.

The argument of Securities & Exchange Commission that this Court should reverse the decision of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals and hold that the Bankruptcy Court has jurisdiction for the avowed purpose of abridging these vested rights of contract holders is tantamount to the insistence that through judicial fiat this Court may exercise a power which is denied Congress by the Constitution. Authority is not lacking for the view that the Fifth Amendment prohibits the judicial, as well as the legislative branch of the Federal Government, from depriving any person of his property without due process of law.

> "Individual citizens require protection against judicial action as well as legislative; and perhaps the question, what constitutes due process of law, arises as often when judicial action is in question as in any other cases. But it is not so difficult here to arrive at satisfactory conclusions, since the bounds of the judicial authority are much better defined than those of the legislative, and each case can generally be brought to the test of definite and well-settled rules of law."

Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (8th Ed., Vol. II, p. 845.

The judicial authorities of a State are bound by the prohibition of the Fourteenth Amendment. Chicago, etc., Railroad Company v. Chicago, 166 U. S., 226, 17 S. Ct., 581, 41 L. Ed., 979.

The very first order entered by the District Judge in this case approving Debtor's petition directed the State receivers to turn over all funds in their possession. This was on June 6, 1941. This was followed by the turn-over order entered on June 10, 1941. Without any notice or hearing, all custodians of the State deposits were ordered to surrender the deposits to the Trustee in Bankruptcy. (Tr., p. 11)

None of the custodians of the State deposits or the State Court Receivers, except the West Virginia State Court Receiver, complied with the order. Finally, perceiving that the order was invalid, on motion of the Central Trust Company, these orders were modified so as to permit the State custodians and State Receivers to retain the securities and merely to enjoin them from disposing of them. (Order entered August 9, 1941, Tr., pp. 102-114)

Although Congress withheld from the Bankruptcy Court summary jurisdiction over these deposits, Securities & Exchange Commission is now asking this Court to interpret Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act in such manner as to supply this power to the Bankruptcy Court. A decision that a liquidation of Fidelity under Chapter X proceeding in the United States District Court for the Southern Disfric̈t of West Virginia, where a petition in ordinary bankruptcy could not be filed by or against it, in order that the State deposits may be "marshaled" in that Court in the way in which Securities & Exchange Commission so strenuously insist should be done, would amount to a validation by this Court of the summary turn-over order made by the District Judge on June 10th. The very next thing that would happen would be a renewal of the order of June 10th in the District Court pursuant to the power which the Court reserved in the modifying order of August 9th. (Tr., p. 113) Petitioners and Securities & Exchange Commission make no effort to conceal their intentions. Their argument is grounded upon the presumed inadequacy of ancillary proceedings. They base their appeal upon the necessity of bringing all of the State deposits into the Bankruptcy Court under compulsion.

We respectfully insist that an interpretation of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act so contrary to any that has heretofore been given it, under all the attendant circumstances, would be so grossly arbitrary and unreasonable as to be incompatible with the fundamental law and a denial of due process to contract holders claiming the security of the State deposits.

CONCLUSION.

If the case were to be settled as a problem of dialectic concerning the powers and jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court, respondents, by reason therefor, would not be disquieted. But the ends of justice will not be subserved merely by the solution of abstract legal problems.

In the final analysis the question in the case is not what the Bankruptcy Court may do, but what it ought to do.

Can any possible benefit flow to the contract holders from the continuation of this proceeding? Who will benefit? When will they derive the benefits? How much will they benefit? These are the practical questions in the case that must not be sidetracked for legal theories.

Eighty thousand contract holders are not apathetic. They are not interested in fine legal points which lawyers excogitate. Scattered in twenty-nine States with an average claim of $250.00 each, they could not afford to employ the necessary accountants and lawyers to take part in Court hearings in a distant State. They rely upon their common sense, the most infallible of counsellors, which tells them that this company is through, and while reorganization may be talked about, it will never be accomplished.

They were induced to put money in the company because they thought it was secured by the deposits. Everyone assured them of that. They had the sales prospectuses of the company, the salesmen's representation, the assurance of their own State insurance or securities department, and if they consulted them, the advice of their lawyers. Also, if they came in after the news of the Securities & Exchange Commission's intervention had been disseminated, they felt that they had an additional guaranty that the plan was safe and sound and in conformity with the laws of the land.

There are in array against them the company itself, the Trustee appointed by the Court in Charleston, and Securities & Exchange Commission. The case which they insist for not only goes beyond settled principles of equity in bankruptcy, but is jarring upon the American sense of freedom, order and justice.

The fact that contract holders are entitled to look to the State deposits for their protection is too firmly embedded in the minds and consciousness of too many people to be uprooted by the eccentric premises which have been advanced. It tends to cast reproach upon too much that has been done in good faith, over so long a period of time, and by so many honest men. The striking down of the State deposits can only be purchased by paying a high price in American honor—the company was wrong, the officials were acting in bad fath, State laws were no good, State officials were acting in bad conscience. And what of the position of Securities & Exchange Commission which permitted State deposits to be created in this manner.

Liberty-loving Americans who cherish their institutions are appalled at the idea that a Bankruptcy Court would say: "Your State regulation has been no good, surrender everything that you have counted on and come up to Charleston, West Virginia, and prove, if you can, what yours rights are." They prefer to think that it is in keeping with the principles which Americans hold high and sacred that they be privileged to say, "You sent these securites to us. We accepted them in good faith. We assumed there was the same measure of good faith on your part. We thought that you knew what you were doing. Our Courts are open and they are just. If you conceive that there has been error come where we are and where the property is located and prove it. Be assured that we want nothing that we cannot keep in the clearest conscience."

It is not difficult to see the delay, the expense and the hardship on contract holders, which an affirmance of the decision of the District Judge would entail. First, the entire Twenty Million Dollars of securities held in the State deposits would have to be surrendered to the Trustee in Charleston just as it was ordered to be done on June 10, 1941. Since few individual contract holders can afford to employ attorneys and accountants and incur the expenses of attending hearings there, groups of them will have to organize protective committees. After hearings almost innumerable, the Court will rearrange the contract holders according to some scheme. The Trustee already contends that no plan of liquidation can be worked out until this has been done. Then will follow the flock of appeals to the Circuit Court of Appeals and from thence the case will wind its tedious way back to this Court.

If this happens, many of us might as well plan to devote the next decade to this muddle-clearing. There will be the annual costs in administrative expenses of the estate amounting to $150,000.00, the risk of depreciation or decline in securities, the possible liability for a large amount of additional income taxes that will accrue if the contention of the Federal government is sustained that the estate must pay Federal income taxes on all the income from the securities held in the State deposits, the compensation to attorneys for the contract holders and protective committees, and what will not be least of all the over-all fees on the whole Twenty Million Dollar estate that may be allowed to the Trustee and its attorneys after the deposits have been surrendered and the slow liquidation is conducted at Charleston. The contract holders' burden will not be eased, whether the plan of payment be on a pay-as-you-go or pay-as-you-stay basis.

There are contract holders who were laying aside their money to pay for the education of their children. There are others who put aside the savings for sickness, marriage and old age. Many of them need their money now. What untold amount of inconvenience and suffering will follow in the wake of the device that is formed to liquidate the assets as slowly as necessary and as expeditiously as is possible under such circumstances!

We submit again, as we have ever done, that the underlying issue is [redacted] of good faith. Debtor's case should be scrutinized with extreme care lest the Federal Courts unwittingly be used as an instrumentality for breaking faith with many thousands of humble persons who are as sheep dumb before their shearers.

FYKE FARMER,
RUDOLPH K. SCHURR.

APPENDIX B

RULING OF COURT ON OCT. 6, 1941, CONCERNING TRUSTEE'S SECTION ONE SIXTY SEVEN REPORT. (PAGES 3008-12 OF TYPEWRITTEN RECORD.)

"MR. PALMER: This is the day in which the trustee was to have filed its report, and I am wondering if copies are available for counsel at this time. If they are available I would like the opportunity to examine them.

THE COURT: I have already ruled that the trustee's report is not connected in any way with this proceeding in connection with any cross-examination.

MR. PALMER: I understand.

(There was a discussion off the record.)

MR. FARMER: I don't care to amplify what the record already shows, only as the matter came up last week, the first day, I stated my insistence that the trustee ought to make its report as to the desirability of reorganization. Your Honor made the same ruling last week that you made today. I don't care to press the matter further, but I wish to state an exception.

THE COURT: You were talking about the—

MR. FARMER: I was talking about the trustee.

MR. T. C. TOWNSEND: I understood in connection with the trustee's report, your Honor, that your Honor had very definitely ruled that report would not be considered in connection with the present proceedings.

THE COURT: That is correct.

MR. T. C. TOWNSEND: And the Court hasn't altered that ruling. Now, I do want to say that it is my information that there will be a partial report under Section 167 to be filed with the Court probably late today or tomorrow, and the trustees are continuing to work on an additional and further report; and in that connection, I want to say also that at the time the Court fixed October 6 as the date for the making of the report of the trustee, nobody anticipated that the present proceedings would continue for the length of time they have been drawn out, and in view of that, the Court probably ought to extend the time, in his discretion, for the trustee to make an additional and further report to anything that I might have to report at this time.

MR. FARMER: We object to any extension of time, because we think that no sufficient excuse has been offered for the failure of the trustee to have the report here and available for all the parties interested in this hearing.

THE COURT: I will extend the time to November 5, 1941, and ask the trustee to make as complete a report at that time as may be done, and if the report cannot be made completely at that time, then we will take up the question of further extension.

MR. PALMER: In that connection, will the trustee make its partial report now for the use of those who desire to make use of it, and also the time for those who wish to file a plan for the trustee extended from November 6 until December 5. At the present time, the Court's ruling is that on October 6 the trustee shall file its report, and those who desire to file a possible plan of the trustee will have a month to study it and submit their findings on November 6; and I am suggesting to the Court, if it is agreeable to the trustee, if they have this partial report, to submit it to those counsel interested, and then a further extension of time be granted for the complete report, and then an extension of time be granted after that complete report for a study of it, so that proper plans can be offered the trustee.

THE COURT: That would depend on just what character this partial report is. If the partial report is such that it can include all the necessary information that these persons would need who expect to submit the plan, then I don't see any reason for extending the time. If not, then I would extend the time, and we can probably tell more about that when we hear just what the scope of the present report is.

MR. PALMER: I understand that the present report will be made available to counsel not for cross-examination in this case, as the Court ruled, but I mean available to counsel for their information.

THE COURT: I don't know whether it is available in the sense that there are copies made for all counsel or not."

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 319.—October Term, 1942.

Fidelity Assurance Association, a corporation, Debtor, et al., Petitioners, vs.
Edgar B. Sims, Auditor of the State of West Virginia, etc., et al.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

[April 5, 1943.]

Mr. Justice Roberts delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents important questions concerning the construction of Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act.[1] Many states of the Union are interested because of the asserted incidence of its provisions upon state laws and rights thereby created. A number of state officers[2] are parties.

Fidelity Assurance Association, a West Virginia corporation, filed its petition for reorganization in the District Court for Southern West Virginia. The Judge made an order approving the petition as properly filed. He also entered orders enjoining state officials from dealing with property held by them.[2]

State banking and insurance commissioners and state court receivers answered, asserting that the debtor could not avail itself of the Act because it was an insurance company[3] and, in any event, the petition was not filed in good faith, as the phrase is defined in § 146(3)(4) of Chapter X.[4] The Securities and Exchange Commission intervened at the request of the District Court. After trial of the issues, the court formally approved the petition and overruled the motions to rescind the decrees granting injunctions.[5] The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed.[6]

The debtor was organized April 11, 1911, under the name of Fidelity Investment and Loan Association. Its corporate purposes were enlarged in 1912 to include the soliciting and receiving of payments on annuity contracts. Thereby it became subject to the provisions of Art. 9 of Ch. 33 of the Code of West Virginia,[7] relating to the selling of annuity contracts and, as therein provided, to the supervision of the Auditor, as ex-officio Insurance Commissioner of the State.

From December 1912 to the close of 1940 the company's business was the selling of investment contracts and for this purpose it was licensed in many states. It altered its contracts from time to time but in general they consisted of certificates evidencing the agreement of the purchaser to make specified periodic payments and the company's agreement that upon the expiration of a stipulated term it would return to him in instalments a sum designated as the face amount, or pay a lump sum less than the face amount.

During the six years preceding December 30, 1940, the debtor sold a contract having a collateral insurance feature provided by a blanket policy procured by Fidelity from Lincoln National Life Insurance Company. Approximately seventy-five per cent. of the contracts issued after 1934 contained this feature.

It will be seen that the business was essentially the conduct of a compulsory savings plan. The interest paid a certificate holder was at a low rate and the penalty for failure to keep a certificate alive was heavy. The expense of selling the contracts was inordinately high and, in spite of a large volume of sales, the company was constantly falling behind and suffering serious losses.

The present Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia took office in 1933. It was his duty to require and approve the deposit with the State Treasurer of bonds and securities to be held in trust for the benefit of the company's West Virginia contract holders to an amount equal to the cash liability to them; to require a similar deposit in trust for the benefit of holders located in other states to the extent that the laws of such states did not provide for a deposit equal to, or greater than, that called for by the laws of West Virginia. Shortly after taking office, the Commissioner discovered that the company was insolvent. There is a long history of negotiations and requirements, extending almost to the time of filing the petition, in an effort to restore it to a solvent condition.

The company was at one time licensed in twenty-nine states each of which had laws regulating its business; fifteen required a deposit of approved investment obligations with some state official to secure payment of outstanding contracts held by residents; the remainder had no such requirement, but the contracts sold in these states were secured by the deposit made with West Virginia.[8] As of the date of the filing of the debtor's petition, the deposits made with various states, including West Virginia, amounted, according to the debtor's figures, to $20,056,680.27 against a net reserve liability of $24,221,651.36. In addition, the company had securities not deposited anywhere valued at $556,467.51, most of which were ineligible for deposit under the laws of any state, and $500,000 in cash.

Each of the series of contracts sold by Fidelity embodied provisions for the creation and maintenance of a reserve fund. All of the contracts provided that the reserve fund maintained by the company should be invested in approved securities and deposited in trust as required by the laws of West Virginia. Securities purchased with the moneys paid by the contract holders were deposited with the Treasurer of West Virginia and officials of other states in compliance with their respective laws, but no effective effort was made to designate the source of the funds with which securities were purchased so as to identify the latter as belonging to the reserve of any series, nor did the state authorities make any such allocation. The securities on deposit with the states were at all times treated by the debtor, and state authorities, as securing all obligations to contract holders in the state where each deposit was made, and reports by the company to the states respecting total liabilities failed to show such liabilities by funds or series. There were certificate holders in all forty-eight states, the District of Columbia, and foreign countries.

December 14, 1938, the Securities and Exchange Commission sought an injunction in a federal court, alleging the Company was engaged in acts and practices violative of the fraud provisions of § 17(a) of the Securities Act of 1933.[9] This suit resulted in an [8] The security afforded by these laws was stressed by sales agents and was effective in the procurement of contracts.

injunction and was followed by another for appointment of a receiver in a federal court in West Virginia, which was dismissed.[10]

Prior to 1938 the debtor had made efforts to obtain fresh capital to be used in reorganizing its business. After 1938 the effort was continuous, but no capital was forthcoming.

Despite enormous sales[11] the company could not attain a solvent position. Moreover, the publicity ensuing the two suits resulted in the surrender of many contracts, the temporary suspension of the sale of new certificates, and a serious diminution of sales when activity was resumed.[12]

Pursuant to the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935,[13] the Securities and Exchange Commission conducted an investigation and reported its findings respecting Fidelity's business and other matters to Congress on March 13, 1940. As a result the Investment Company Act of August 22, 1940,[14] was adopted. Fidelity's officers and directors realized that the company could not meet the statutory requirements and survive. They, therefore, cast about for some other business to which the corporate resources might be devoted. They hit upon life insurance.

Accordingly, on December 31, 1940, the debtor amended its charter. The amendment changed its name to Fidelity Assurance Association, eliminated the existing corporate powers and purposes, and adopted as the corporate purpose "to issue insurance upon the lives of persons and every insurance appertaining thereto and connected therewith, and to grant, purchase, and dispose of annuities". In January 1941, by charter amendment, the authorized capital stock was altered in order to qualify the company to transact a life insurance business in West Virginia and elsewhere. The Company also registered under § 8a of the Investment Company Act, supra, so that it might continue to service outstanding contracts. The Insurance Commissioner of West Virginia issued a license for the conduct of an insurance business but with the understanding that no such business should be written until the company's affairs had been put into satisfactory order. Notwithstanding this arrangement, the company, by written negotiations, procured some 9800 of its certificate holders to accept an amendment of their outstanding certificates providing an insurance obligation on the part of the company.

At the instance of the Insurance Commissioner, the Attorney General of West Virginia, on April 11, 1941, instituted proceedings for the appointment of a receiver in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County. The company entered an appearance but interposed no answer or objection. The court appointed receivers who took over the cash and undeposited securities but did not essay to obtain possession of the assets on deposit with the Treasurer of West Virginia or with officials of other states. The authorities of the various states were notified of the pendency of this suit. Thereafter proceedings were instituted or steps taken by state officers, pursuant to state law, for the liquidation of the company's obligations to local certificate holders in Wisconsin, Iowa, Ohio, Illinois, Tennessee, Missouri, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, and Pennsylvania.

The respondents, other than Securities and Exchange Commission, contended below, and urge here, that the petition should be dismissed since (1) the debtor is an insurance company exempted from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, (2) the petition was not filed in good faith. The debtor, the trustee appointed under Chapter X, and the Commission, successfully opposed these contentions in the District Court. The Circuit Court of Appeals held with the respondents on both grounds. We find it unnecessary to consider or decide whether, at the date of filing, the debtor was an insurance company within the meaning of the Act, for we think the Circuit Court of Appeals was right in holding the petition not filed in good faith as the phrase is defined in § 146 (3) and (4).

Section 144[15] requires that if the judge is not "satisfied" that the petition "has been filed in good faith" he shall dismiss it. The relevant portions of § 146[16] are that "a petition shall be deemed not to be filed in good faith if . . . . (3) it is unreasonable to expect that a plan of reorganization can be effected; or (4) a prior proceeding is pending in any court and it appears that the interests of creditors and stockholders would be best subserved in such prior proceeding."

[15] 11 U. S. C. § 544.
[16] 11 U. S. C. § 546.

As the court below has said, in applying the statutory test the situation should be viewed realistically. If this be done, we think the rejection by the court below of the claim of the debtor and its trustee that it can be reorganized as a going concern must be affirmed. In appraising the soundness of this claim, certain facts additional to those already noticed must be kept in mind. On April 10, 1941, there were 87,999 contracts outstanding for a face amount of $181,948,026.70. At that time liabilities exceeded assets, on the company's showing, by $2,500,000. The business written in 1940 had shrunk to 23% of that written in 1938. The Company had been losing money at the rate of $250,000 per annum. Its sale of investment certificates had ceased December 30, 1940, and, even if it had been possible to resume this activity in compliance with the requirements of the Investment Company Act, the reestablishment of the sales force would have cost $500,000.

In the light of all relevant facts, it seems clear that Fidelity cannot be reorganized for the purpose of conducting its old business of selling investment certificates. Conviction that this was so led its managers to attempt to alter its corporate purposes to those of a life insurance company. The District Judge said: "It is true that the broad picture developed by the testimony at the hearing does not present a very favorable view with respect to the rehabilitation and continued operation of the debtor as a face amount certificate company." And he added: "It is extremely doubtful whether, in view of unsettled economic conditions and the critical international situation, the Fidelity plan would any longer appeal to a large public; but it is not impossible; and it is not the duty of the court to decide for the public that investors will not or should not buy these contracts in the future."

There is no prospect that the debtor can be reorganized as an insurance company and the District Judge did not find that it could.

The petitioners say: "Upon this record, can it be said that it is unreasonable to expect that some insurance or investment company can be found to take over or buy the assets of Fidelity under a contract for the benefit of the Fidelity contract holders, to issue them investment certificates or insurance policies, of one or more kinds of greater value than the dividends to such contract holders through the liquidation of Fidelity would buy?"

The court below properly concluded that "the possibility that thousands of contract holders could be persuaded to modify their contracts and scale down their claims[17] to enable the company to go on is so remote as to exist only in the imagination."

Petitioners and Securities and Exchange Commission urge, however, that Chapter X may be employed to accomplish a slow and orderly liquidation which they say is imperative in the interest of all creditors. The District Court so held.

It must be remembered that Fidelity is admittedly insolvent and no one suggests there is any equity in its stock; that there is one greatly preponderant class of creditors,—certificate holders—all having security for their claims on one or more deposits with state authorities, and all having unsecured claims against the unpledged assets of the debtor. The necessity for decision as to the relative rights of these classes in pledged assets may present difficult questions of distribution, but has little, if any, bearing upon the method of turning the debtor's assets into money.

The deposited securities are generally readily marketable at favorable prices. They are scattered through fifteen states in hands of public officials whose duty it is to liquidate them on terms most favorable to those for whose protection they stand pledged. The suggestion that these quasi-trustees will force the securities on the market without regard to its ability to absorb them, to the destruction of their beneficiaries' security, is inadmissible and, in addition, is contrary to what occurred after the institution of the West Virginia receivership. There is no foundation for the position that the so-called reorganization should take the form of the creation of a new corporation to which all these securities would be transferred for conversion into cash, particularly as the advocates of such a project admit that the application of the security afforded classes of certificate holders according to state law cannot be avoided in any distribution of assets.

It is urged that a plan of liquidation may constitute a reorganization under Chapter X, and decisions are cited to that point,[18] but an examination of them will demonstrate that in none save where the corporate purpose of the debtor was, in effect, holding and liquidating securities was the plan such as is proposed here.

17 The claims average less than $273 each.

Under the facts of this case, the suggested plan is but an alternative for ordinary bankruptcy without any readjustment of the rights of creditors and stockholders inter se, and this fact serves to distinguish the remaining cases on which reliance is placed.

We conclude that, in this aspect, good faith, in the statutory sense, is lacking since no such reorganization as the statute was intended to accomplish is reasonably to be expected.

In the second place, we hold that the interests of creditors would be best subserved in the pending prior proceedings in West Virginia and other states. The court below was of this opinion for these reasons: It appears unlikely that there will be any surplus after payment of local claimants in any state other than West Virginia; state law must govern the distribution of the respective deposits; creditors can as readily present claims against the surplus of the West Virginia deposit in the West Virginia court as in the federal court in this proceeding.

The Securities and Exchange Commission insists that the Chapter X proceeding is more advantageous as affording opportunity for impartial investigation of wrongdoing by company officers, and the solution of problems of marshalling and distribution. If, as the court below held, nothing is to be accomplished but the liquidation of Fidelity, it is difficult to see why that process and consequent distribution of the proceeds should be held up by the search for causes of action against officers and directors. Nor is any convincing showing made that such investigation cannot, or will not, be made and availed of by the state court receivers. Moreover, if Fidelity is not an insurance company, it could have been put into ordinary bankruptcy, orderly liquidation accomplished, and impartial investigation made by a trustee elected by the creditors.

There are no true problems of marshalling presented. Creditors in the various states will unquestionably go first against the local deposits. They may, or may not, be paid in full from those funds. They will have claims against the surplus of the West Virginia fund for any deficiency. On the other hand, a surplus in a state fund after satisfaction of local creditors, will be added to the surplus fund in West Virginia for the benefit of all having claims against it. Rights against local deposits will be adjudicated by the courts of the states, near the homes of the beneficiaries and at a minimum of inconvenience, delay, and expense.

The advantages of bringing all these funds to the District Court for administration in conformity to diverse state law, and compelling claimants to come there to assert their rights, are not apparent.

It is said, however, that Fidelity agreed to segregate the reserve fund of each series, and that the holders of certificates in any series are entitled to have the securities purchased for the reserve of that series traced and set apart for their benefit, and that this can be done only in the present proceeding by bringing all the funds under a single administration.

Without reciting the facts in detail, it is enough to say that, while the different reserve funds were separately set up on the books of the company, they were, for the greater part of the period in question, kept in a single bank account and the securities purchased for the various reserve funds were not earmarked as such. Moreover, for the most part, securities deposited with state authorities were not, at the time of the deposit, designated as belonging to the reserve fund for any series of contracts. In some instances designations of them were made subsequent to their deposit. In addition, it is to be noted that under the law of West Virginia and that of other states having deposits, the securities deposited are made a common fund for the protection of all outstanding contracts, and the certificate holders were advised by the company in its literature that it proposed to deposit reserve fund securities in accordance with the law of the states. The situation discloses so many difficulties of law and fact as to render segregation for purposes of distribution of the avails of the securities improbable. And the smallness of the average amount due certificate holders indicates that the expense of the effort, if successful, would in the end prove more detrimental to a claimant than foregoing the trifling advantage of a reallocation of securities to the respective reserve funds.

It was suggested at the bar that, even if liquidation is all that can be hoped, this would be better managed by a single bankruptcy court than in several separate proceedings. The difficulty with the suggestion is that Congress did not intend resort to Chapter X to be had for the mere purpose of liquidation. The scheme of the chapter precludes any such conclusion. The mandate of § 144 is clear that unless the judge is satisfied the petition was filed in good faith he must dismiss it. Under the predecessor of Chapter

X,—§ 77 B of the Bankruptcy Act—the district judge was given authority, by subsection (c)(8),[19] under certain circumstances, to "direct the estate to be liquidated, or direct the trustees to liquidate the estate . . . ." In Chapter X, on the other hand, § 236(2)[20] provides that if no plan is approved or accepted, or if it is not consummated, the judge may, after hearing all persons in interest, adjudge the debtor a bankrupt or dismiss the proceeding as he may decide is in the interest of creditors and stockholders. Thus the statute does not contemplate a liquidation in a Chapter X proceeding but a liquidation in ordinary bankruptcy or a dismissal outright.

If the liquidation of Fidelity's affairs in bankruptcy had been proposed at the start, the petition in bankruptcy could not have been filed in the District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia in which this proceeding is pending. A Chapter X proceeding may, under § 128,[21] be initiated either at the principal place of business of the corporation or where it has its principal assets. The present proceeding was initiated in the Southern District on the ground that the principal assets of the company are located at Charleston in that district in the possession of the State Treasurer. Under § 2 of the Bankruptcy Act,[22] an ordinary bankruptcy may be initiated only at the corporation's principal place of business, which is Wheeling in the Northern District of West Virginia.

Congress did not intend a Chapter X case to be turned into a liquidation proceeding at the outset, but intended the litigation to become a straight bankruptcy only after the failure to consummate a plan, and meant to limit the parties to their remedy in ordinary bankruptcy in all other cases. It would, therefore, be a perversion of the Congressional intent to treat the present as a liquidation proceeding, since the rights of persons having liens or security pledged for their claims differ widely in the two sorts of bankruptcy.

The judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice DOUGLAS and Mr. Justice RUTLEDGE took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.
